the morning they found verified, the earth having vomited vp that carcase, which there lay on the top of the graue. The Magi hereby appeare to haue had intercourse with the deuill as by their predictions also, of Sylas, Ochus, Sapores, and others, mentioned by Paterculus, Helianus, Agathias, and other Historians. Thus were the Magi buried in the bowels of beasts and birds. Turky saith, that the other Persians were wrapped in waxe, and so preferred. The Ossana and Astrampyschi are by Suidas reckoned iucessours of the Magi. Hierome citeth out of Eubulus three kinds of the Magi; the most learned of them liued onely on meale and hearbes. Pausanias reporteth, that in Lydia, in the Cities Hierocarea, and Hypzpo, he saw Temples hauing Persian surnames, and in euery of those Temples a Chappell and Altar, whercon were Ashes, not like in colour to the ordinary sort. The Magus entering into the roome, layeth drie wood on the Altar, after that hee hath set his mitte on his head, and then at the name of a certaine God, singeth barbarous hymnes (which the Greeks vnderstand not) out of the booke: which being done, the heape is fired, and the flame breakes forth. Diogenes Laertius relateth, that these Magi spent their time in the seruice of their Gods; offering vnto them prayers and sacrifices, as if none but they might be heard; they disputed of the substance and generation of the Gods, whom they reckoned to bee the Fire, Water, and Earth. They reprehended Images, especially such as made a differing sexe of Male and Female, among the Gods. They discoursed of Iustice. To burne their dead bodies, they held it impious: but to lye with their owne mothers, or daughters, they accounted lawfull. They practised Diuinations, and fore-tellings affirming, that the Gods appeared to them, that the ayre was full of formes or shapcs, which subtilly, and as it were by euaporation, insule themselves into the eyes. They forbod outward ornaments, and the vse of gold. Their garments were white, the ground their bed, Hearbs, Cheefe, & Bread, their food. Aristotle saith, that they held two beginnings; a good spirit and an euill calling the one Iupiter and Oromasdes; the other Pluto and Arimanius. (Empedocles translated this plant into Philosophy, and long after, Manes a Persian heretike into Diuinitie.) Theopompus addeth these opinions of theirs; That men should againe be restored to life, and become immortall, and that all things consilied by their prayers; Hecataeus that the Gods were begotten; Clearchus, that the Gymnosophista descended from the Magi. Thus saith Diogenes.

Plutarch in his Treatise de Osir. & Isid. citeth, approueth, and applyeth the opinion of the Magi vnto many others, which they conceiued touching their two beginnings, Arimanius and Oromasdes: for whereas they saw such a mixture of euill in euery good, (which made Salomon to brand them all with the title of vanitie) they gathering that good could not bee either cause or effect of euill, found out this remedy worse then the disease, to hold two Authors of all things, calling Oromasdes a God; and Arimanius; the fountaine of euill, a deuill; the one cause of light: the other of darkenesse. Betwixt these two they placed Mithras as Mediator or Intercessor. Zoroastres was author of this opinion. To the first of these was praise and vowes offered: to the later mournfull deuotions. For, rubbing a certaine hearbe called Osmi, they call on Diu Pater & Orcus, then they wash it with the blood of a flaine Wolfe, and carry it into a shadowie place, where they powre it out. They assigne plants partly to the good, partly to the bad God: as they doe also quicke creatures; the earthly creatures to the good, the watery to the bad, and therefore esteem him happy that hath killed most of them. Oromasdes, say they, begotten of pure light, and Arimanius the childe of darkenesse, warre one against another. The first created six Gods, Benenolence, Truth, Politic, Wisdom, Riches, Honesty delight: the later as many contrarie. When Oromasdes had thrice enlarged himselfe, he was as farre beyond the Sunne, as the Sunne is from the Earth, and formed the Starres: Of which, one he fixed as a Gardian and Watch-man, the Dogge-starre hee made other twentie foure Gods, which hee closed in an Egge. Arimanius didas much, but his twentie foure brake their shell: and so became good things and euill mingled. But a fatall time shall come, when Arimanius the Author of plague and famine shall perish, and then shall bee one societie of all mankind in happinesse, vng but one language. Theopompus saith, according to their opinion, that one of these Gods shall raigne three thousand yeeres, the other being discomfited; and other three thousand they shall fight and labour to destroy one another: at last Diu Pater shall be destroyed, and men shall bee happy. This opinion of the Magi, the Chaldeans haue applied to their Astronomy; in the seven Planets, making two good, two bad, three indifferent: The Grecians to their Iupiter, Diu Pater, and Harmonia; Empedocles to his Friendship and Discord; Aristotle to his Forma & Prinatio; Pythagoras to his One and Two: Plato to his Idem & Alterum Manes to his deuillish heresie, as before is said. The Persians in this respect, as some expound their mysteries, called Mithra triplex, as a third person and reconciler of the other two. And there haue not wanted, which ascribe this threefold Mithra to that threefold day, as they interpret that Signe of the Sunnes going backe ten degrees, in the dayes of Herakleus, which if there were houres made, made, the day twice ten beside the ordinarie twelue houres. But (as in Hercules his generation) a threefold night attends these mistie mysteries, which I could as willingly confute of some misconstrued notice of the blessed Trinitie. Dio Chrysostomus telleth of Zoroaster the Author of this science, that enflamed with the loue of vertue, hee forsooke the world, and went apart into a mountaine. And afterwards leauing that habitation, he seemed (to those to whom hee would shew himselfe, which was onely to the Magi) to shine with a fire which came downe from heauen vpon him. This perhaps was borrowed and peruered from the shining face of Moses.

Onely Persians, saith Gramay, were chosen into their number. The name Magi is among Authors applied also to the Chaldeans, which in Babylon professed the same Arts and superstitions: the Disciples (saith Lucian) of Zoroastres, of whose cunning in charmes you may reade in his Necromantia, a pleasant discourse: Mithrobarzanes, a Chaldean Magus and Momippus, whom hee washed twentie nine dayes in Euphrates by the Moone, and in the morning sets him against the rising Sunne, with long charmes: after that spiring three times in his face, hee brings him backe againe, not once looking aside. Their meate was Acornes, their drinke Milke, Mulse, and the water of Chosapi, their lodging on the wide field on the grasse. After all this, he brought him about midnight to Tygris, where washing him, hee purifieth him with a Torch, and the herbe Squilla, and other things, &c. which howsoever Lucian suteh to his scoffing humour, yet I haue inserted, as somewhat expressing their superstitions, obserued in charming and diuinations.

Of the religious, and other rites of the ancient Persians.

§. I.

Of their Gods and superstitions out of HERODOTVS.

30 Heaung these Magi, let vs take a view of the Persian religious rites which Herodotus thus describeth. The Persians neither erect Images, nor Altars, nor Temples, and impute it to madnesse in such doe: therefore, as I thinke, because they are not of the Greekes opinion, that the Gods haue risen from men: Their custome is ascending vp the highest Hills, to offer sacrifice to Iupiter, calling the whole circle of heauen Iupiter. They sacrifice to the Sunne and Moone, and Earth, to the Fire, and Water, and Winds; to these onely they haue accustomed to sacrifice from the beginning. They sacrifice also to Vrania, which they haue learned of the Assyrians and Arabians, The Assyrians call Venus, Militta; the Arabians, Aluta, the Persians, Metra.

Their rites in sacrificing are these. Being to sacrifice, they neither ser vp Altar, nor kindle fire, nor vse vestments, pipes, cakes, or libaments; but he which intendeth to sacrifice, placing the sacrifice in a cleane place, calleth vpon that God, wearing their Tiara, * girded about with myrtle. The sacrificer prayeth not for himselfe alone, but generally for all Persians, and especially for the King. And after that the sacrifice is cut into small pieces, he throweth vnder the foddren flesh, small herbes, chiefly Trifoly; and setting the flesh in order thereon, the Magus standing by singeth & some hymnes (of the generation of the Gods) which they hold to be a most effectuall incantment. Without one of their Magi no sacrifice is accounted lawfull. After all this, the sacrificer vseth the flesh at his pleasure.

Of all daies, every man accounteth his owne birth-day to be most solemnly obserued; and then maketh greatest cheare. The richer sort then set whole Breues, Camels, Horses, Ases, baked in an oven or furnace, * on the Table the poorer, smaller beasts. The Persians are small eaters: but in their drinking, consult of the weightiest affaires. Of which they deliberate fasting, but pronounce sentence after they are well in drinke. To vomit or make water openly, is vnlawfull to them. Those that are equall, salute when they meete each other with a mutual kisse, which is fastened on the cheek only, if they be of vnquall degree. They hold themselves the best of all men, their neighbors so much better, how much neerer then they dwell. They are much addicted to Venerie with both sexes. Next vnto Martiall valour, they repute excellent the procreation of many Children; the King allowing annuall presents to him who hath begotten most Children, and therefore they vse many women. The child commeth not in his fathers sight till hee be five yeeres old, but liueth with the women, that if hee die before, his father should thence conceiue no griefe. From that time till hee be twentie, hee learneth three things, to ride, to shoot, to speake truth. For to lie is with them the most shamefull thing; the second, to be in debt. For one fault onely no man ought to be punished. Whatsoever is not meet to be done, ought not to be spoken. A Leprous person, if hee bee a Citizen, may not enter into the Citie, nor haue any societie with men: for this disease is sent (say they) for some offence against the Sunne: if hee bee a forrenner, they banish him out of their Region, and for the same cause carry into that Region white Pigeons. In a Riuer they neither spit, nor make water, nor wash, but haue them in very religious veneration. They might not cast any carcasse or pollution therein. These things, saith Herodotus, I ascribe of the Persians out of mine owne knowledge: that which followeth I doe not so well know; that they burie not their dead bodies before they bee torne of some Fowle or Dogge: but I well know that their Magi doe wrap them vp in Waxe, and then bury them. These Magi differ both from other men, and from the Egyptian Priests in this, that these pollute themselues with the death of nothing but their sacrifices, but the Magi with their owne hands kill any thing: except a man and a dogge: yea, they esteeme it some great exploit, if they haue killed very many Ants or Serpents, or other things which creepe or flye. Thus saith Herodotus.

STRABO nameth Anaitis, Amanus, and Ananadatus, Gods of the Persians: When the Persian Emperors had ouerthrowne the Saca, they encompassed with a wall a certaine rocke situate in a field, and erecting a Temple of the foresaid Gods, there instituted yeerely solemnities, named Saca, which of the inhabitants of Zela are yet celebrated (so they call the place.) That Towne in great part belongs to them which are called Sacred Seruants, to which Pompey added a great Country. Some report that Cyrus, hauing overcome the Saca, attributing this victory to diuine power, consecrated that day to his Country. Goddesse, naming it Sacaea, and wherefoer the Temple of that Goddesse is, there also are celebrated thoe Saca in feasts in manner of the Bacchanals, day and night, the men and women drinking themselues drunken. Strabo in the end of the same eleuenth Booke mentioneth their Temples, and amongst others the Temples of Tanaïs, which before in Herodotus is denied to be the vie of the Persians: Cicero blameth the Magi, for procuring Xerxes to burne all the Temples of Greece, because they included their Gods in walls, and to whom the whole world was a Temple and house. Their deuotion to the Sun and Moone made them spare Delus, sacred to Apollo or the Sun, and the Temple of Diana, or the Moone at Ephesus, as an Interpreter of Aristophanes hath glossed. Some hold that Xerxes burnt the Græcian Temples for reuenge of the burning of Sardis, and the Temple of Cybele by the Athenians, and not for hatred of all Temples. The Greeks would not permit the Temples so burned to be re-edified, that those ruinous places might be places of argument for reuenge to all posteritie. The Ionians, as Isocrates testifieth, cursed them which should repaire them. Strabo thus also reporteth of the Persians: They haue neither Images nor Altars: they sacrifice in an high place, they thinke heu-en to be Iupiter: they worship the Sunne, whom they call Mithra, the Moone also and Venus, and the Fire, and the Earth, and the Winds, and the water: they sacrifice in a cleane place, and present their sacrifice crowned: and when as the Magus, ruler of this businesse, hath diuided the fesh in pieces to euery one, they goe their wayes, leauing no part thereof to the Gods, who (say they) are satisfied with the soule of their sacrifice. Some, as it is reported, lay a part of the Numbles on the fire. They sacrifice especially to the Fire and to the Water, laying on the fire drie sticks, the barkes pulled off, and laying thereon fat Tallow, and pouring on the same, Oyle, they kinde the same, not blowing with their breath, but fanning, or otherwise enforcing the winde thereto: If any bloweth the fire, or cast any dead thing or durt therein, he is punished with death. They performe their Water-ceremonies in this sort: Comming to a Lake, Riuer, or Fountaine, they make a Ditch, and there lay a sacrifice, with great heed that none of the next water be touched with the blood: after laying the fesh on Myrtle and Lawrell, the Magi burne the same with small twigs, and making certaine prayers, sprinkle oyle mixed with milke and honey, not in the fire or water, but on the earth. They are a long while muttering their prayers, holding a bundle of small Tame-riske-twigs. That which in one place Strabo saith they worshipped Mars onely, is a fault of the negligent Writers, as Casaubon hath obserued in his Notes.

In Cappadocia, where is very great store of the Magi, which (of the Fire) are called Pyrethi, and many Temples of the Persian gods, they slay not the sacrifice with a knife, but a club club or mallet, wherewith they beat it. The Pyreithia are great inclosed places in the midst, whereof there is an Altar: thereon the Magi keepe much ashes, and a fire continually burning, whither they every day resort, and make their prayers about an houres space, holding a bundle of twiggies before the fire, hauing their heads couered with a kind of labelled Mitre, hanging downe on both sides, that the fittings couer their lips. These things are done in the Temples of Anaitis and Amanus. For there are their Temples, and their Image of Amanus is carried in procession. These things we haue seene.

- It seemeth, that whereas Herodotus reporteth they had no Temples, Altars, nor Images: and Strabo so often mentioneth their Temples, and here the Altar and Image of Amanus: that in Herodotus dayes they had none: which grew afterwards in vse, as a forraigne rite brought in among the Persians after the Macedonians had conquered them: or else that there were differing Sects among their Magi, some (as these in Cappadocia) embracing Altars, Images, and Temples, some refusing some or all these. For otherwise Strabo disagreeth not onely from Herodotus, but from himselfe, before denying them the vse of Altars and Images, and here affirming it of the Cappadocian Magi (in other things) of the Persian Religion. Perhaps the burning of the Græcian Temples purchased to them that conceit with the vulgar: we know they honoured the Temple and Altar at Ierusalem. And lesse matters set on the Friers last, make leely Papists beleue now, that Protestants haue no Churches nor Religion, nor scarcely the shape of men.

- Iulius Firmicus* in his Treatise of the mysteries and errors of prophane Religions to Constantine and Constant Emperours, speaketh of the Assyrians and Persians: that the Assyrians ascribed the principallitie of the elements to the ayre, the Image whereof they worshipped, styling it with the name of Iuno, or Venus the Virgin, whom the Quires of their Priests worshipped with effeminate voyces and geitures, their skin polished, and attire fashioned like women. Yea their Priests became impure Ganymedes, and sustained the Sodomitical lusts of others in the Temples, not shaming, but glorying of such deuotions, and composing themselves to all delicate, lasciuious, filthy behauiour: and thus wantonly dressed, with much minfresle call vpon the Goddesse to infuse into them a diuining and prophetical spirit. Easily may that Impure spirit finde access and entertainment in such impure bodie. But the Persians and all the Magi preferre the fire. These diuide Iupiter into two powers, metamorphosing his nature into both sexes. They make the woman with a three formed countenance, wound about with monstrous Serpents (fit ensignes for the Devils worship:) and worship a man which had driuen away kine, applying his holies to the power of the Fire: him they call Mithra, whose blinde deuotions were done in places answerable, namely in hidden Caves.

§. III.

Of the same out of Christian and other Authors.

ESYCHIVS saith, that Mithras, or the Sun was chiefe god with the Persians: and therefore the most religious and inuiolable oath of the King was by Mithra.

And this is confirmed by Firmicus also, who saith, that the Persians preferre the Fire before all the other Elements, and that they call the same Mithra. (The reason is, because they held, as in the beginning of this worke we noted out of Zoroaster, that the Sun and all the Stars are celestiall fires.) They performed their deuotions to the same in dark Caves, where they could not see the brightnesse of that light. This Herone calls Mithras Den: and Tertullian affirmeth that Mithras Knights or Soldiours were initiated in the same.

- To whatsoever god they sacrificed, they first called vpon the Fire, and poured out their praises thereto. To this Fire they dedicated certaine Chappels or Oratories, wherein to keepe it alway burning; these were called Pyria: of which Claudian: penetrabilis Igneum Sacrum rapere aditus. They supposed that it came downe from heauen. They worshipped all whatsoeuer had any resemblance of fire, as the Carbuncle stone. They obserued differing ceremonies in their Fire and Water deuotions. To the Fire they vsed these set words: when they added fewell thereto, Lord Fire eat. They offered wine in a cup, which they called Cady. The costly sacrifices of their Kings wee haue already mentioned. Plutarch kels that Artaxerxes married his owne daughter Atossa (Heraclides addeth his other daughter Amestris.) And when Atossa was leprous, his loue notwithstanding continued, and he beought Iuno for her, touching the ground with his hands, replenishing the way between the Temple and Palace (which was sixtene furlongs) with offering of gold, silver, purple, horses. Plutarch bewiltech that Amestris the wife of Xerxes, in sacrifice to Pluto for her health, buried twelue men quicke in the earth. To Mithra, saith Plotinus, they offered men, women, and children. And as they tell of Molochs seven ambries, so also is related of Mithra ^d according to the number of the seven Planets.

We may further adde (from Gramay e his Collections out of diuers Authors, and from others, concerning the Persian Religion) that they sometimes observed the Græcians Deities, calling Iupiter, Bel; Hercules, Sander; Venus, Anaitis. To Iupiter was sacred a Chariot with a beame of gold. They Sunne the worshipped (by the name of Mithra, and Elditus) at Sun-rising; and adored also the painted Image thereof. They accounted the Horse the Suns peculiar beast, and offered vnto him white Horses.ouer Darius his Tabernacle, the Image of the Sunne, enclosed in the Christall, shone forth so that it might bee seene of all. The order also of Darius his march, when he warred against Alexander, had in their first place their 10 Fire, which they called Sacred and Eternall, carried on silver Altars. Next hereunto the Magi singing their country-Hymnes, followed by three hundred fixtie five young men, (so many as their yeete had dayes) clothed in bright red, then came Iupiters Chariot, drawne by white Horses: after whom followed a horse of exceeding greatnesse, consecrated to the Sun. Their tidings had white garments and golden rods. Likewise both sides of the Kings Chariot were adorned with Images of gold and silver: two being most eminent among them; the one of Peace, the other of Warre.

That Souldier, which was initiated in Mithras hollowed orders, was first proued by eightie severall kindes of punishment; and if he continued steadfast, he was washed, putting 20 on his head a ^f crowne with a sword interposed. Chaste Virgins were hallowed the Sunnes Priests or Nuns. They worshipped Diana, whom they called Nannea (as some will haue it) in that History of Antiochus. They solemnized certaine Feasts, the chiefe whereof was that of Mithra. Another holy day they called the Destruction of vices, in which the Magi killed venomous things, and offered; and the seruants lorded it five dayes together, ruling both the Family and their Masters. Magophonia they celebrated in memory of the Magi slaine by Darius Hystaspis, and his Colleagues. Of their holy-day Sacra before is spoken: in which (some report, that) the seruants changed offices and garments with the masters. Minutius Felix ^f obiection against them their incestuous copulation with their mothers. Arnobius derideth their worshipping of Riuer. The Christian Fathers, and Heathen Authors ^g are plentifull in the narration of the Persian vanities. Eusebius ^h cieth a saying of Bardeanes Syrus; Among the Persians there was a law to marry their sisters, daughters, and mothers: which custome the Persians observed also in other Countries, and therefore other Nations hating them, called them Magnesi; of which are many in Egypt, Phrygia, and Galatia, whose posteritie succedeth them in the same wickednes. This name Magnesi is deriued of Magi.

Of the Persian Education and Schooles.

BVt of all other things this is most commendable and admirable, which the Persians observed for learning and practise of vertue, if we giue like credite to ¹ Xenophon herein, as others haue done. They had a kinde of publike Schoole, called the Free or liberall Market, not for the sale of merchandize (which kinde of Markets the ancient Persians wanted) but the learning of ingenuous, liberall, and vertuous conditions. This was diuided into four parts, one for children till seuentene yeeres of age, the second for youths to seuen and twentie, the third for men till fiftie, the fourth for old men. In this liberall Market or Colledge was a Palace, and Iudgement-place. Early in the morning the children resort hither: here also were the striplings, and the riper-aged men, daily: the old men often. The striplings boarded and lodged there (except they were married) and presented themselves to the Magistrates in Armour. Each Court had twelue Prefects, according to the number of the Persian Tribes. To the children are old graue men appointed, like wise to the youths men of riper age, as Valerius Maximus ^a hath, till seuen, and especially learne truth: they were taught by these Prefects the rules of Iustice, not by bare rules, but by examples (for which cause also, Augustus ^b would haue the Senators children present in the Court.) Yea a good part of the day was to this end spent by those Prefects, in hearing and deciding such cases as fell out amongst these their schollers, about theis, reproaches, or other wrongs. Next to Truth and Iustice, they learned Sobriety, Abstinence, Coniunction, and Temperance, wherein they were well furthered by the examples of their Masters: neither might they eat but in their presence and with their leaue, and that not of the choicest fare, but bread and cresses, whereto they added drinke from the next riuer. They planted in them a hatred of vices, vices, especially of lying, and in the next place of debt, which cannot but bee attended with much discontent: and therefore wisely did Augustus command to buy him the pillow of a Roman Gentleman, that died incredibly indebted, as if there had therein rested some sleeping power, whereon, one so much indebted could take any rest. Ingratitude was as little grateful as the former, and by the Persian lawes, ingratefull persons were subiect to accusation and punishment, as not Xenophon onely, but Marcellinus also hath marked, howeuer Seneca findes such a law onely amongst the Macedonians, which perhaps was hence borrowed. They hated such as forsooke their friends and country-men in need. Their awfull respect to their parents was such, that they might not sit in the mothers presence without her leave: the father had tyrannicall power over his children, for life and death. That which was vnto them vnlawfull in deed, was not permitted in obscene and filthy words to bee spoken. Thus were the Noble-mens children brought vp neete the Palace gates; and in the Prouinces neere the gates of the Deputies or Gouvernours.

For bodily exercise, they learned to shoot, to cast darts, to ride and manage vnruely horses, and to fight on horse-backe. And this was their education till seuentene yeeres of age: at which time they were of the second ranke of Springalls and youths, and for ten yeeres after did not repaire home at nights, but lay and abode in this Court or Colledge. When the King went on hunting, halfe of them attended him in armour. Their dyet was the same, but somewhat larger, as is before related of the children: and in hunting, if it continued two dayes, had but one dayes allowance. They vsed to run long races, of thirtie or fortie furlongs: they exercised the sling, leaping and wrestling, the King propounding rewards to the Victor. The helpe of these were vsed by the Magistrates against robbers, murderers, and the like wicked persons: as also of the Men, which was the third order, the Seminary of Magistrates and Souldierie of the Persians, till they were fiftie yeeres old or somewhat more, at which age they were freed from musters and forraine employments, but at home were employed in publike and priuate iudgements. None might attaine this honour in Age, but by those degrees before expressed: nor might any haue that education but the children of the rich, which were able to beare the charge. It was vnlawfull amongst the Persians to laugh in loud manner openly, or openly, or by the way to doe the easements of nature by siege, vrine, or vomit: or to make water standing.

Of the Persian Luxurie, and Marriages, Funerals, &c.

BUT this ancient Persian discipline and sobriety, with wealth and loosefence were afterwards corrupted, especially in drinking: to repress which, the Kings made an order, Estr. 1. that none should bee compelled to forget their health, in remembering of healths, or other Bacchanal denices, whereof would God we had lesse cause to complaine. The vse of Harlots were also added to their drinkings, which when the Embassadors sent to Amyntus King of Macedon, to demand Earth and Water (which was the Persian custome when they exacted full subiection and possession) extended to Matrons. Alexander his sonne sent young men armed in womens habite amongst them, which quenched their hot flames of lust with their blood. Hence haply it was, that Asterius would needs make shew of Valeria the Queene in his magnificent Feast, which occasioned her deprivation, and Esters succession. Amidst their cups they consulted of waite and weightie affaires; but some say, they decreed not till afterwards. The Persians vsed banquettings vnder Arras hangings, before the time of Attalus, from whom the Romans first borrowed the vse of them, of his aula or hall hanged therewith, calling them aulae. But the wals of the richer Persians were hanged with them, the floures spread with costly carpets, their cupboards furnished with rich plate, their bodies shining with curious & costly ointments, their kitchen stord with garlick, as a preseruatiue against serpents and venomous creatures, their chambers swarming with Concubines; yea, mothers, daughters, and sisters wedded and bedded with them: their second seruices called in Scripture, The banquet of fowles, when after the belly full faced with meats, with which they dranke water, they had other tables set with wine, on which they gaue a new onset, as a fresh enemy: these and the like excesses would glut our Reader. Loth were I to bring him to their mourning rites, in like excesses would glut our Reader. Loth were I to bring him to their mourning rites, in which they shaued themselves, their Horses, and Mules; they vsed sackcloth, and entered not the Court: they conered the face of such as incurred the Kings anger, as we read of Haman. Their executions were slaying, crucifying, burning, burying alive, stoning, cutting off, &c. This pertaineth to their religion, their diuination by lots, as before Haman, they perhaps the Magi, cast Pour, that is, a lot, from day to day, and from month to month, to see which would be the most lucky and fatal time for his mischievous plot against the Iewes. Their marriages they celebrated in the Spring; and on their marriage day the husbands care nothing but an Apple, or the marrow of a Camel. The Persians are accounted authors of making Eunuchs ^a, which Petrus Arbiter and M. Seneca impute to the curiosity of their lust, which might thus be longer served of them. They used in salutation to vacouer ^b or put off the Tiara. Here I might lade you with the Persian wardrobe, the length and varietie of their garments; and I might tell you of their earrings and Jewels, painting of their faces, long haire: of their kissing salutations, if they were equal, and of the knee of the superior by the inferior, and adoration of the chiefe: of their womans womanly detestation in the ^c eagerest degree of hatred and indignation, the fingering of wooll: of their inhumane cruelty to the kindred of those which had committed some grievous crime, to punish all for the offence of one. The Persians made banquets to their gods, and gave them the first fruits thereof. But it is time to leaue their gods and them; and let mee obtaine pardon, that this great Monarchie, sometime stretching from India to Ethiopia in one hundred twentie Iewen Provinces, hath stretched so farr, and commanded mee so long attendance in this Discourse. Let mee now looke vpon the Mahumetan face thereof.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the alterations of the State and Religion in Persia,

§. I.

Of the Saracenicall Conquest and Schisme in Persia: the third Dynastie.

He Saracens (as is already shewed) a people bred, as it were of purification in that corrupt estate of the world, dispossessed of his state and life Ormsidas, the last Persian King. Their Religion had sustained small alteration in Persia before this time, for ought I finde, saving what the Christian had in these parts prevailed, (which belongeth to another taske.) But from that time that the Saracens were Conquerours, the soules of the Persians haue no lesse been subiect to those foolish Mahumetan superstitions, then their bodies too cruel slavery: yea, the ^e name of Persian was drowned in the title of Saracens. Homay was then Caliph. But when Lezid the sonne of Musavi was Priest and King (such are the Caliphs) of the Saracens; Mutar, the Deputie or Governour of Persia, proclaimed himselfe a Prophet, and seized on the State: from him the Persian Sophi deriueh his originall. When Lezid was dead, the Inhabitants of Cu'ia in Atabia proclaimed Hocem the sonne of Ali Caliph; but Abdallah ^f Carbala. This Hocem had twelue sonnes, Zeinal, Abadin, Zeinal, Muamed, Bagner, Muamed, Giasfar, Cadened, Ciasfar, Musa, Cax, in Masa, Holi, Macerat, Alle, Muamed, Tagnin, Muamed, Halmaguin, Alle, Hacem, Asquerin, Hacem, Muamed, Mahadin: This last, ^g the Persians say that hee is not yet dead, but that he shall come sitting on a Horse, to preach their Law to all Nations: beginning in Masfadaile, where Ali his grandfather lieth buried. And therefore they haue there alway a Horse prepared ready, which in time of Diuine Seruice, on a certaine festiual day, they bring with Lights burning to the Temple, in which Ali is buried, praying him to send his nephew quickly. That day is solemnly celebrated, with so great concourse of people, as a Portugal th. re present, said, he had neuer seen the like. The other eleuen brethren were buried in diuers places. To returne to Mutar; Abdamelec one of the following Caliphs, sent Cisfa against him, by whose ouerthrow that new Prophet was new and greater estimation then before. But another Tyrant Abdalla Zubir, arising amongst the Saracens, sent his brother Musub against Mutar, who slew Mutar, and was soone after slaine himselfe of Abdimelec, who recovered againe the Prouince of Persia. Abdimelec being dead, in the yeere fene hundred and two and twenty, Gizad his sonne ^h succeeded, and another Gizad usurped the Scepter in Persia, but was ouerthrowne by Masabner the Captaine of Abdamelec sonne.

In the raigne of Marnan, Amulm tooke on him the protection of Mutar; Sech, affirming Ali to be greater then Mahumet: hee was Prince of the Corasens in Persia, and by one Carabanus his counsaile incited the seruants, by force or treacherie to kill their Masters: and these being growne great by their Masters wealth, were diuided into two factions, the Casime, Cassini, and the Lamonites. Asmulin Captayne of the Lamonites, destroyed the Cassini: and with his Lamonites, and Catabanus invaded Persia, and were there encountered by Ishmus the Lieutenant, with an Army of an hundred thousand men; but the Lamonites, by the encouragement of Asmulin and Catabanus, (whom they reckoned Holy men) discomfited him and his; and afterward encountered Maruan himselfe with three hundred thousand men, and made him to flee with foure thousand into Egypt, where Salin the sonne of Asmulin overthrew him. Thus the Maruanian race being expelled (the reliques wherof settled themselves in Fesse and Spayne) Asmulin, from whom the family of the Sophi descendeth, with Catabanus, reigned over the Saracens. But let the Reader observe what in the former Booke and second Chapters we have writen of the diuisions and schismes often happening in Persia, following the relations of Mirkond a Persian Authour; and therefore more to be observed then the more vncertaine relations of Christian Authors.

By all which hath bene said, appeareth a continuall difference betwixt the Persians and other Saracens about their Religion; either (as some affirme) for that the Persians preferred Ali before Mahomet, or for that (which is more likely) they accounted Ali, and not any of the other three (Eubocar, Ofmen, or Homar) to be the true successor of Mahomet. The Sultans or Deputies of Persia, which governed there vnder the Caliph, vied that their Schismaticall fancy, as they saw occasion to their owne ambitious designs, vnder colour of Religion. Some say that the Turkes obtaining Persia, stripped the Chalifa of Bagader of his temporality, which (the sword being decider of controuersies in their Religion) was no new thing. Nor did it become old or continue long. For by the relations of Beniamin Tuielen, and others, it appeareth that the Caliph of Bagader recovered their state, till the Tartar dispossest both the Tuike and them, as we haue already shewed out of Zachuthi, and Mirkond in our History of the Saracens.

§. II.

Of the Tartars ruling in Persia, which was the Fourth Dynastie.

WE are to speake more fully of the Tartars afterwards; heere yet we are enforced by necessity of the Persian story to mention them. Mirkond writes, that Chingis Kan great founder of the greatest Empire the Sunne hath scene, in the yeare 1219. invaded Maurenahar (which is to the North of Persia) and chased Mahomet Kourazmcha into Karafon. The Tartar put all he found to the sword; the like he did at Balk; and thence sent 30000. men after Mahomet, which ouer-tooke and slew him in Gueylon, and put the Countrey to fire and sword. In Rey and the Countrey about, the Tartars are said to haue slaine 600000. persons (some say 1600000.) and in the Prouince of Nichabur 1150000. men, besides women and children, committing the like spoyle during a whole yeire throughout all the Prouinces of Persia. Alnoftancher Byla the Chalife forced them to retire into Maurenahar. But Oktaikabon or Occoda Can his successeur both subdued Persia, and rooted out the whole Family of Mahomet Kourazmcha, Gelaladin his sonne being vanquished neere Multon in India, whither had retired himselfe. Mauco Chan gaue Persia to Viab Kukhan or Halaon, who ouerthrew the Saracens, rooke Bagdet, staying therein and in the Countries about 1600000. persons. In the yeare 1261. he subdued Alep and Dams. Hee dyed in Persia and gaue his Countreies to his three sonnes; to Habkakabon (Haiton calls him Abaga) Hierak, Mozandaron and Karafon; to Hyschemet, Aton or Armen; and Aderbazon: to Taudon, Diarbek and Rabyah. To others other parts, as Bagader to Atalmok Isanmy to repayre it, which he did. Habkakabon the eldest reigned in Persia seuentene yeares, and then his fourth brother Nicudar Oglan (Haiton calls him Tangador) succeeded him, who made himselfe a Mahumetan and called himselfe Hamed. After whose short raigne Argonkhan, Genistukhan, Badakhan, Gazan (he made Casbin his Imperiall Citie) Alyapin, succeeded in order. This last made himselfe Mahumetan, kept his Court at Tauris, and first brought in the custome of tribute children, which he tooke from their parents (Christians and Iewes) to frame to his seruice. Hee built Sultania. His sonne and successeur Abusayd spent his summer at Sultania, and his winter at Bagader: after whose death, which happened A. H. 736. the Tartarians were diuided into Persia, euery one making himselfe King of that which he held, which continued till the time of Tamerlane. Thus haue I out of Mirkond related these Tartar-Persian affaires. But if I adde somewhat out of Haiton, which liued in the midst of these times, let it not seeme tedious: first of a Paradise destroyed by the Tartar Haalon: and then of the successors till his time, not mentioning some which ruled but a little while in Persia.

a Cassite.

In the North-East parts of Persia (which of this new Heretic they called Mulchet) there was an old man, named Aloudin, a Mahumetan (as all those parts then were) which had inclosed a goodly b Valley, situate between two Hills, and furnished it with all variety, which Nature and Art could yeeld, as Fruits, Pictures, rills of Milke, Wine, Honny, Water, Palaces, and beautifull Damocells richly attyred, and called it Paradise; to which was no passage, but by an impregnable Castell. And daily preaching the pleasures of this Paradise to the youths which he kept in his Court, sometimes he would minister a sleepe drinke to some of them, and then comenigh them thither; where being entertained with these pleasures foure or five dayes, they supposed themselves rapt into Paradise. And then being againe cast into a trance by the said drinke, hee caused them to be carryed forth; and after would examine them of what they had sene, and by this delusion would make them resolute for any enterprise, which he should appoint them; as to murther any Prince his enemy. For they feared not death, in hope of their Mahumetall Paradise. But this a Haolon or Plan, after three yeeres siege, destroyed him, and this his Fooles Paradise. Some tell c this of Aladenuler, in the time of Zeilm the first. Abaga succeeded him in the gouernement of these parts, Anno 1264. but not in the Christian Religion: Tangodor the next, became a Saracen, and called himselfe Mahomet, and at Tauris and other places destroyed the Churches of the Christians, as Haolon had done of the Saracens; he banished the Christians: and peruered as many Tartars as he could to Mahumetisme. But Argonus the sonne of Abaga rebelled, and taking him, cut him asunder in the middle, succeeding in his place, Anno 1285. After him Regyzo, whom the Tartars slew, placing in his stead Baydo a Christian, who forbad the preaching of Mahumetisme among the Tartars, and reedified the Churches of the Christians: Casan succeeded in his Dominion and Deuotion: and after his death Carbaganda, who in his childhood had bene baptized, and named Nicholas, but when his Christian Mother was dead, he became a Saracen.

Thus farre out of Haitbonus; in which History appeareth the vicissitude of diuers Religions, sometime Tartarian, sometime Christian, sometime Mahumetan, as in the Princes who gouerned these Countries vnder the great Chans or Cans of the Tartars: so also no doubt in a great part of the Countries themselves, which vssually are of the Kings Religion. This Carbaganda reigning about 1305. is the last Tartar Prince which ruled in the parts of Syria: and in Persia the stire was soone after diuided into many Souerainities. For as their Religion, so also their Empire fayled; the Egyptian Soldans preuailing in Syria; the Ottoman Turkes, in Asia; and Gempas, in Persia. This Gempas was Soldan of the Parthians; and about the yeere 1350. restored that Persian Kingdome to the Parthians; thus our Christian b Historiographers. Mirkond mentions him not. Likely it is, when all fell to sharing, he got his part. O Tamerlan, Mirkond relates, that when Chingis sent Oecodain into Maurenahar, Caracher Nigon was made his first Visier, in which dignity hee and his posterity continued there, till Teymur or Tamerlan the fifth from him, with other great gouernments. Teymur being Visier and Captayne Generall to Sciorgat Meckhom, which reigned in Chagty, and dyed A. 1370. was proclaimed King in his stead. He by his prosperous armes subdued Maurenahar, Turqueslan, Kourazm, Karason, Sistom, Industan, Hyerakhen, Parc, Kerman, Mazandaron, Aderbaion and Kussistan, Bagadet, Alap, Damascus: defeated Sultan Farrache King of Egypt, and after tooke Baiazet the great Turke prisoner. He dyed, Anno 1405. His victories are by others enlarged to Russia and China; and the great Chans stare fertle on him. Mirzab. Charok his fourth sonne succeeded him in the Empire: and after him, Anno 1447. his sonne Mirzab Olegbek; but as after Alexander, so after Tamerlan, their hastic gotten Empire was much distracted among the great Souldiers his followers, which held great shares to themselves, making warre on their Masters sonnes. And one of the descendants of them. Abtelaisif slew Olegbek in the field, Anno 1450. and was slaine of his Souldiers fixe months after. Sultan Abusfayd, grand-child to Miromcha, the third sonne of Tamerlan succeeded, slaying Abdulah the brother of Abtelaisif. But he also was slaine by Mirzab Tadigar Mahamed, one of Acembec or Usuncassan partakers, who had before slaine Isench (Contarin) and Barbara, which were in Persia with Usuncassan, call him lausa, others, I know not why, Malaonchres, others Demin after whose death Abusfayd was called to the gouernment of Kerman, Hierak and Aderbaion, and being solicited for peace by Asembeins, Acembec or Usuncassan afore said, reiected it, and so lost himselfe, and left those parts of the Persian Empire to the Conqueror. But in Maurenahar Sultan Hamed his sonne succeeded 28. yeeres: and after him his nephew Babar, the last of Tamerlans bloud there reigning, Ichaybekan coming from VLbek, Anno 1500. and dispossessing him. Yet did Babar possesse Gaznehen, and some part of India, till his death 1532. where his sonne Hemagan succeeded him, and to him his sonne Gelaladin Akbar, commonly called Melabdim Eckbar the Great Mogol, Father of him which now reigneth, of whom in the next booke. Tadigar that slew Abusfayd was also of Tamerlans race, race the sonne of Mabamed, sonne of Bayfanger, sonne of Mirzab Charok. He by Acembes helpe chased Ocem, another of Tamerlans posterity, by Hamar Cheque his third sonne, King in Karafen and Strabat, out of those parts into Faryab and Mayman neere Balk, whence hee suddenly reuniting with a small force, by advantage of Tadigar or Hadigar his negligence, slew him, and recovered his Realme. He dyed, Anno 1506. Two of his sonnes succeeded him, Bahady and Mufassar, whom Chaybee Visok chased out of their Kingdomes. Bahady fled to Ismael Sophy who gave him the lands of Chambe Gazon in Tauris, and tenne Serafs of gold by the day; thence hee was after carryed prisoner by the Turke to Constantinople, where hee dyed.

i A Seraf is eight shillings.

- 10 Besides these of the posterity of Tamerlan there were other Princes in Perfia, and the parts adjoining, as those of the factions of Blacke Sheepe, and White Sheepe. Of the former was Kara Issuf, which conquered Tauris, Sultania, Casbin, and the countries of Seruan and Diarbech; but dying was spoyle to his shirr of his Souldiers: yea, they cut off his cares for his jewells, and left him in the open field. Charrok held long warres with Scander, and Jooneha his sonnes, the latter of which after many conquests was slaine by Acembes, and Acen Aly his sonne and successeur: and thus the White Sheepe faction preyed, Ozan Acembes or Vasun-Cusan the head thereof, of the Tarcoman Nation, heire of Diarbech, and Lord of many Prouinces which hee conquered (as before is noted) but defeated by Mahmmet the great Turke, He dyed Anno, 1471. His sonne Calil succeeded, who was slaine by his brother Iacob or Tacw, whose wife bearing dishonest affection to one of the Court, sought by the murder of her husband to aduance this Courtier to her husbands bed and Empire. And k hauing conueyed venome into a golden cup, presents her husband the same to drinke, who somewhat suspecting her, caused her to begin himselfe and his sonne following her both in drinking and dying. And thus was Perfia, by the wickednesse of one woman, made the stage of ciuill warres, whiles the chiefe Nobles fought each to possess himselfe of the State, which at last after five or sixe yeeres war, befell to Alumni or Elnan-beg, then being but fourteene yeere old, who was slaine by Ismael in the yeere 1499.

- 30 And thus yee haue had the succession of the Persian Kings in the first and second Dynastie: of the Saracens you heard in the former Booke: next after whom, the Tartars and these here mentioned, till Ismael obtayned the State, whose posterity still hold it.

Beniamin Tudelensis telleth that Senigar then King of Perfia, had two and fortie Kingdomes subiect to him, and that his Dominion extended foure moneths iourney, and speaketh as though hee were not subiect to the Caliph in his temporalities: Master Palo reckons eight Kingdomes of Perfia, Casbin, Curdistan, Lor, Sualistan, Spaan, Siras, Soncaia, Timocsim; not reckoning Hirak, the chiefe Citie wherof was Tauris, and diuers other Countries, now and before his time subiect to the Persian. And by most Historians it appeareth that Perfia had before the dayes of Tangrolap, and till the Tartars conquest, Sultans, which yielded small subiection to the Chaliphis.

k Viaggi di mercantia, and Ramus i Milford reckons of this Emly Kings after Iacob, Bayfanger, Rollan, Hagmet, Alman and Morai.

m In this discourse we haue reckoned many of the Regions, in regard of subiection, Persian.

§. III.

Of Ismael Sophy, first founder of the present Persian Empire, or fifth Dynastie.

- The Historie of Ismael, because it giueth much light both into the State and Religion of Perfia, is more fully to be reported. After that Mustacen Mumbila, or Al-mustacebila Abdul, the Caliph of Bagdet, had bin by the Tartars done to death in the yeere after Haitonius account 1258. about the yeere 1269. there arose in Perfia a Nobleman called Sophy, Lord of the Citie Ardouil, reporting himselfe to be of the blood of Alle or Hals, descended from Musa Cazin, or Cersin, one of the twelve sonnes (as is said) of Hoem, thirteenth descents distant. This Sophy, or (as our Tarik Markand aforesaid call him Cheque Saff) had issue Cheque Mucha, the father of Cheque Ali, who begate Cheque Ebrahem, and he Sultan Iunejd, father of Cheque Aydar, who begate Ismael. These continued their Hals-holies. Our Authors mention none from Sophy to Iunejd, whom they make his sonne, calling him Guinnie, otherwise written, Guini, Gume, and Gumet. Minadoi saith, That Sexchimus, or more distantly, Siee Giumet, was Author of the Persian sect, who vnder the name of Y So, and of Slee (that is, of a wile man, and an Author of Religion) or rather vnder the pretence of holinesse, began to perswade the people, that the three first successors of Al-m were usurpers, onely Alto ought to be named lawfull successor, and ought to be called vpon in their prayers, and by all means to be honoured. From this time forward the Sepulchre of Ali and his sonnes in Cafe grew in great credit, and was visited euery yeere after the same same sort that the Turks visit the Sepulchre of the other three : and the Kings of Persia vied there to be crown'd, and girt with their sword, and their great Calife there kept his residence. Because this Cate was neere Babylon, hence grew the common error, that these things were done at Babylon or Bagdet. Ionus also is deceiued, where he maketh Arduelle or Aidre, author of the Persian faction. Sofis by Minadoi deriued of Sofis, a people subdued by Alexander : but Scaliger more fitly Tsophi, which in Arabike signifieth a man of pure Religion. In this respect there is no lesse contention betweene these & other Muhammedans, then betweene the Samaritans and the Iewes : so that the Persians are a kinde of Catharists or Puritans in their impure Muhammedrie. Claudei Duret mentioneth another Etymologie, that Sophi signifieth Wooll, and that this profession in token of humilitie, wearing nothing on their heads more precious then wooll, were so called. But the former deriuation is more probable. Nic. Nicolai in his third Booke hath also that woollen deriuation : and Geffrey Duc- ket saith, that Sophi signifieth a Begger, and that the King is not there in Persia so called, but Shangh ; which agreeth with their report, which say that Ismael renewed or continued the name Sofi or Sofis : but his successors leauing that, and the name of Siec, haue retayned only the Title of Saba, which some write Shangh, some Xa, a Royall title communicated by the head of this superstition to those Kings which participate with them therein. Isa Scalliger p saith, that Sa or Seba is the same with Monsieur among the French, and Don among the Spaniards. The Iewes and Arabians write it ~~seba~~ and the Grecians ~~seba~~. It is sometimes set before the name, as in the present King Seba Habus ; sometime comes after, as Melixa for Mel- lic-seba. Barrin begins this pedigree at the father of Gimet, or Guine (so he calls him) and not as Minadoi, with Gumet himselfe. He addeth, That for the Ensigne, Character, or Cogni- fance of his Sect, he ordayne, that in the midst of their Turbant (which they weare with many folds) there should arise a shaple top, in manner of a Pyramis, diuided into twelue parts (in remembrance of Ali his twelue sonnes) from the top to the bottom. They vied the colour Red on their heads (saith Minadoi) by ordinance of Arduelle, and therefore were called Chefshas, that is, Red-heads ; some write it Cushebas. Sophi, as Mirkond affirmeth, was holden in such reputation of holinesse by Tamerlane, that he came to visit him as a Saint ; and at his request, set free 30000. slaues, which he had taken in the warres against Babacat, to whom Cheque Sophi gaue apparell and other necessities, and sent them home to their houles : 30 wherby hee was great fame and affection. Barrin and others attribute this to Guine, and say that these slaues became his disciples first, and after Souldiers to his sonne Aidar against the Christian Georgians.

Deu. ad. loc. 6.

This A der Erdebil (or after Ionus, Harduelles) forsaking (as some say) the world, led a streight life in continency and austeritie, and was therefore admired as a Prophet, and reformed to, out of all parts of Armenia and Persia, comming to Tauris to see him : Hee inuigiled against the common opinion concerning Mahomets successors, as Guine and Sophi had done, shutting vp heauen to all, sauing Hali his followers. For so the Persians vse to say in their prayers ; Cursed be Ebnubeker, Omar, and Osman ; God be fauourable to Hali, and well pleased with him. Vjuncassan moued with his fame, gaue him in marriage his daughter Mart- tha begot of the Christian Lady Desfina, daughter of Cala Ioannes Emperour of Trapezond ; 46 both of them by this alliance strengthening themselves against the Turke. Aidar had by this Martiba, Ismael, whom she trayned vp in the principles of Christian Religion. Jacob successor of Vjuncassan, ialous of the multitude of Aidars disciples, and the greatnesse of his fame, caused him to be secretly murder'd ; persecuting all his professed followers with fire and sword. Ismael then a child, fled into Hyrcania to one Pyrcbaler, a friend of his fathers, who afterwards ayded him to the recovering of his patrimonie. Batarn saith, that Jacob, after the murder of Aidar, committed his two sonnes, Ismael and Salyman, to Amanazar (a Captayne of his) to be conueyed to Zalga, a strong mountayn place : but he brought them vp liberally with his owne children, and in his last sicknesse, gaue them horse and two hundred Ducats, 51 with aduice to repaire to their mother ; where taking vpon him the protection of the sect of Hali, and the reuenge of his fathers death, his enterprises succeeded prosperously. Ginnan Maria Angielelio saith, that Jacob being poisoned 1485. the Signiorie was possessed by a kinsman of Jacobs called Iulauer, after whose three yeeres raigne succeeded Baygingir two yeeres ; after Rustan seuen yeeres, who sent Solimanbec against Sachaidar the father of Ismael, who made challenge to the State in right of his wife the daughter of Vjuncassan, who slew him in the field. Rustan would also haue killed the mother and her sonnes, had not entreatie of his Nobles preuented it. He committeth them to ward in the Iland of the Armenians in the Lake Aitumar ; whither he sent for them againe after three yeeres, but they for feare fled to Ardouil, & there liued closely for a time. Rustan was slaine by Agmat through his mothers procurement, who loued that Agmat, who abode Sultan five months, & was slaine by Rustans Souldiers. And Aluan the kinsman of Vjuncassan was Signior, whom Ismael slew.

- A certaine * Merchant (who abode a long time in Tauris, and travelled thorow the most part of Persia; skillfull of the Turkish, Persian, and Arabian languages, either seeing himselfe, or learning of them which did see, in the storie of Ismael) relates this history somewhat otherwise, whom, as learning of the Persians themselves the Persian affaires, we may reckon worthy to be followed. Hee saith, that this Sachadar in Ardouil was this head of the Sophian Sect, and had three sonnes; and three daughters by the daughter of Vsancesan. He was a zealous enemy against the Christians, oftentimes with his followers repaying into Circassia; doing the people much damage, which when in the daies of Saltra Alumut hee attempted as before times, he was by Alumut order forbidden at Darbent further passage: but seeking 10 to make way by force, he was by the forces of Alumut taken, and his head, on the top of a Lance, presented to Alumut, and by his command, given to the Dogges to bee eaten; the cause why the Sophians are such enemies vnto Dogs, killing all they finde. This newes coming to Ardouil, his three sonnes fled, one into Natolia, another to Aleppo, Ismael the third to an Island in the Lake of Van, in which is a Citie of Christian Armenians, where he abode foure yeeres in the house of an Armenian Priest, being then about thirteene yeeres old, who vsed him courteously, and instructed him in the rudiments of Christian Religion. A yeere after he went from Arminig to Chillian, where he kept with a Gold-smith his fathers friend. In this time hee had intelligence, by mutuall writing, with his friends at Ardouil: and with 20 this Gold-smith having gathered together eightene or twentie men of their Sect secretly to take a strong Castle, called Maumutaga, and hidden in ambush two hundred horse-men of his friends in Ardouil, suddenly slaying the Guard, and possessing himselfe of the Castle, he entered a Towne not farre from the Castle, killing the Inhabitants, and carrying the spoile to the Castle. This Castle was verie rich, because it was a principall Haue of the Caspian Sea; and so strong, that when Alumut had newes hereof, hee was dissuaded from sending any power thither to besiege him. Two daies iourney from hence is Sumachi: which with his power, now encreased, he also took, and diuided the spoiles euery where to his Souldiers, which with fame of this liberalitie came from all parts vnto him. He sent also into Hiberia, 30 three or foure daies iourney from thence, which was then governed by seuen great Lords; three of which, Alexander Sirc, Gorgurambec, and Mirzanbec, with many promises of present spoiles and future exemptions from tribute, hee won to his side, receiuing from each of them three thousand horse, so that he was now growne fiftene or sixteene thousand strong. Alumut with thirtie thousand valiant Souldiers went to meet him between Tauris & Sumachia, and having passed a great Riuer, ouer which were two Bridges, he presently caused them to be broken: Ismael arriuing there the next day, with great diligence found a passage thorow the streame, and with his whole forces, in front, in the breake of the day, assailed Alumut his armie, little suspecting such a good morrow, that Alumut with a few companions hardly escaped. The pavilions, horses, and other bootie, Ismael bestowed on his Souldiers: and then 40 passed to Tauris, where entering without resistance, hee made great slaughter, killing all the race of Iacob, opening his Sepulchre, and the Graues of other Noble men, which had been at the battaile of Darbent, against his father, and burning their bones; three hundred harlots hee caused to be cut asunder in the middle: hee killed all the Dogs in Tauris, and because his mother had married to one of those Nobles, which were in the battaile of Darbent, hee caused her head to bee stricken off in his presence. In this while many Townes, Cities, Castles, and Lords submitted themselves to him, and wearie his red-coloured Turbant: but the Castle Alangiacana (whereto were subiect eightene Villages of Christians, which vsed yeerely to send to Rome two men from the Patriarch to the Pope, of whose faith they were, speaking Armenian, having some bookes, but quite lost the vse of the Italian language) this Castle (I say) held out for Alumut vntill his death.
- While Ismael was Sultan in Tauris, the Sultan in Bagadet Murat Can son of Iacob, with an 50 army of 30000. marched against him, and in a plaine, meeting with Ismael was there overthrowen not fewentie persons escaping to Bagadet with Murat Can: the place bearing witness of the slaughter, buried vnder many new hills of bones. All these things were done An. 1499. And while I was in Tauris, many came from Natolia, Caramania, and Turkie to serue him; of whom they were graciously entertained. An. 1507. our Author being then in Malacia, saw with his eyes, the Sultan Alumut conveyed prisoner by Amirbec, who with foure thousand men going from Mosull (neere to the sometime Ninie) to Amit, where the Sultan kept, with promise and profession of his succour, being admitted the Citie, took him, and cast a chaine about his necke, whose head Ismael smote off with his owne hands. He was presented 60 to him by Amirbec in the Countrey of Aladuli, against whom Ismael was now warning: where taking the Citie Cartibirt, he cut off the head of Becarbec sonne of Aladuli, Lord thereof, with his owne hands. From thence returning to Tauris, hee had almost done as much to his two brethren, whom hee had left Governours in his absence, for transgressing their Commission: but with much intreatie of his Lords, spared their lives, yet confined them to Ardouil, not to depart from thence. The next yeere hee pursued Murat Can, who was come to Syraz, a Citie not inferior to Cairo in Egypt, with thirtie sixe thousand men, but male-content, and therefore many of them flying vnto Ismael. Whereupon Murat Can sent two Embassadors with five hundred followers, with offer of Vassallage vnto him. Ismael cut them all in pieces, saying, That if Murat Can would be his Vassall, hee should come in person, not by Embassage. Murat Can had closely sent Spies to observe the sequell of his business, and being hereof by them aduertised, fled: For many of his Nobles had already put on the red Turbant, of whom hee feared to bee taken, as Alumut had bene; and therefore with three thousand of his most faithfull he fled vnto Aleppo: but the Soldan of Cairo nor admitting him, he went to Adulst, who entertained him honourably, and gaue him his daughter to wife.

Ismael, after great slaughter in Siras and Bagader, was forced to returne to Spain with his Armie. For Iselbas the Tattar had taken all the Countie of Corasan, and the great Citie of Eri, which is in compasse betwixt fortie and fiftie miles, well peopled, and full of Merchandize; He had taken also Straus, Amixandaran, and Sari, on the Caspian shore, and with intent to beguile Ismael, desired leaue to passe thorow his Countrey to Mecca on Pilgrimage. Ismael with deniall, and other sharpe words repelled his suit, and abode a yeere in Spain, to withstand his enterprises. After he returned to Tauris, where were great triumphs solemized in his honour. This Sophi is so loued and feared (saith this Merchant) that they hold him as a God, especially his Souldiers: of which some goe into the warres without Armour, holding it sufficient, that Ismael will succour them: others, because they content themselves to die for Ismael, goe into battaile with naked breast, crying, Schiak, Schiak, that is, God, God. And they forget the name of God, alway naming Ismael: they hold, That hee shall not die, but liue euer. And where other Mosulmans say, La ylla yllala, Mahamet refullala, the Persians say, La ylla yllala, Ismael vellallala, reputing him a God and a Prophet. I haue learned, that Ismael is not contented to be called or worshipped as god. Their custome is to weare red Bonnets, with a certaine thing like a girdle, large below, and straighter vpwards, made with twelue fold; a finger thick, signifying the twelue Sacraments of their sect, or those twelue brethren, nephewes of Ali. Ismael was of faire countenance, of reasonable stature, thicke and large in the shoulders, shauen all but the mustaches; left-handed, stronger then any of his Nobles, but giuen to Sodomie. At his second comming to Tauris, hee caused to take twelue of the fairest boyes in the City to serue his lust, and after gaue to each of his Nobles one for the like purpose, & before tooke ten of the best mens sonnes for the same intent.

Oferius de Reb. Emman. lib. 10. l. Bot. Ben.

Thus farre haue wee had commerce with this namelesse Persian Merchant in Kamufus his shop, who sometime attended on his Court and Campe. Others adde hereunto, that hee sent Embassadors to all the Mahumetan Princes of the East, to receiue that Red-hat Ensigne, together with his Sect; as did his sonne Tammas after him, when Niz-zamallucco onely accepted thereof. But it is the common opinion, that the greatest part of the Mahumetans in Soria and of Asia Minor are secretly of that Sect. Ismael alter this warded, and wonne, vpon the Zagatai Tartars, and other adiacent Nations, that hee left vnto his successors a verie great estate, reaching from the Caspian Sea to the Persian, and betweene the Lake Iocco and Tygris, the Riuer Abbian, and the Kingdome of Cambaya, more then twentie Degrees from East to West, and eightene from North to South. Hee ordained a new Lyurgie, and forme of Praier differing from the ancient. Such was his authoritie, that they would sweare, By the Head of Ismael, and blest his name, saying, Ismael grant thee thy desire. Vpon his Coyne, on the one side, was written, La illah ilallahu Mahamedun refullallalabe: And on the other, Ismael balsef lullabe, that is, Ismael the Vicar of God. The Tewes, at the first, had this Ismael in such admiration, that they foolishly reckoned Ismael to be their promised Messias, gratulating themselves in this conceit, thorowout the most part of Europe, so celebrating festiuall Solemnities, with mutuall Presents, in testimonie of their ioy; which yet was soone dashed, none hating the Tewes more then Ismael. He lieth buried at Ardouil, in a faire Meskit, with a sumptuous Sepulchre made by himselfe in his life time; where is a faire Stone Hospitall erected by him for strangers, allowing to all trauellers three dayes reliefe for horse and man freely. Ardouil is in latitude thirtie eight degrees.

The life of Ismael had bene answerable in his bloudie prefaces in his ominous birth; for hee came forth of his mothers wombe with both his hands shut, and full of blood; for which cause his father would not haue brought him vp, but commanded him to be laine; but they which carried him away, moued with compassion, secretly nourished him three yeeres, and after presented him to his father, who then acknowledged and receiued him with loue and kindeuess: for this his bloudie and warre-like spirit dwelt in a louely and amiable bodie, adorned with all the Ensignes of beautie. Hee died Anno 1524.

of SHAUGH TAMAS the Persian troubles after his death.

SCHIACH THEOMES, or Shaugh Tamas, succeeded, and reigned above fiftie yeeres. Hee liued denotely, and yet (for their Law reconcileth both) verie voluptuously, inheriting his fathers Throne, but a nor his valour, and spending the greatest part of his time amongst his women. So zealous hee was of their superstition, that when M. Lenkifson came to his Court with the Queenes Letters, to treat with him of Traffique and Commerce for our English Merchants, before his feet touched the ground, a paire of the Sophies owne Shooes or Balmackes (such as himself vsed to weare, when he arose in the night to pray) were put upon his feet, lest their holy ground should be polluted with Christian steps. And being admitted into his presence, and asked of his Religion, whether he were a Gower, that is, an Vnbeleueur, or a Muselman, (so they call them of their owne profession) having answered, that he was a Christian, beleueing Christi to be the greatest Prophet: Oh thou vnbeleueur (said hee) wee haue no need to haue friendship with the vnbeleueurs, and so willed him to depart: which he did, and after him followed a man with a Basanet of Sand: sifting all the the way that he had gone within the said Palace, even from the Sophies sight vnto the Court-gate.

In his time Solyman (as our Turkish Relations before is shewed) much endamaged the Persians, and tooke Babylonia, Tauris, and other parts of their dominions: yet did Tamas recouer some part thereof againe, and draue Solyman out of Tauris, (or Ecbatana, as Mirandol interpreteth, and by a composition, caus'd him to raise the Fort of Chars, erected by the Turkes in his frontiers. Hee dyed the eleuenth of May, 1576. leauing behind him eleven children: Mahammet the eldest, who had liued a while in Hen (sometime called Asia)

Hee appointed his second sonne Ismael his succellour, esteeming him more worthy then Mahomet Codabanda (this surname was given him for his diseased eyes^b) as being giuen to a studious and quiet life, and contenting himselfe, that Abu Mirza (which now reigneth) was confirmed in the Citie of Heri, and honoured with the title of the Visier of that Countrey.

Persaconna, the daughter of Tamas, and elder then any of the brethren, being in Commiſſion with other Counsellors of State to see her fathers Will executed, whiles the Posts to ranne with aduertisements to Ismael, was attempted by Aidere with earpest sollicitation for the Crowne: whose ambitious desire she so farre satisfied, as that shee caused him to bee inuested in Regall apparell, and settled in the great Gallerie, attending the acclamation of the people; being publickly installed, as though hee were elected King. But meane while shee set sure guards of men, deuoted to Ismael, at the gates of the Palace; thus purposing to entertaine him (with dreames of dangerous honours) till Ismael arrived at Casbin. But whiles hee (suspecting the deceit) fought to flee, hee left his head behinde in the hand of Sabamal his vnkle, which he cast, all bloudie, in the midst of his conspiring partakers. Ismael soone after came, and receiued with publick applause the desired Soueraigntie: and as he had before adicted himselfe to the studie of the Turkish Law; (enough, if it had bene knowne, to haue barred his succession) so now, after the Turkish manner, he founded his Throne (a foundation to slipperie to stand) in bloud, causing the heads of his eight younger brethren to be cut off, together with all such as were neere them in bloud or affinitie, and all the fauourites of the late slaine Aidere. Thus is Casbin dyed in the bloud of her hopefull Gallants, and entertaines her beholders eyes with streames of bloud running from the slaine, which cause another streame of teares to issue from their liuing friends; who filling the ayre with mournfull complaints (which returning answer by echoes, seemed to sympathize with their griefe) and in compassion of those dying bodies, then gasping their fatal breaths, imitating (with true affection, and not affected imitation) the same in deepe and broken sighes: viewing also their owne dangers in the present ruine of their neerest and dearest, some-time allies & acquaintances: tossed with this variety of turbulent passions, conceiue, in this confusion of thoughts (that which is truly the daughter and mother also of confusion) Treacherous Disloyaltie to the Author of these their forrowes. Ismael posſing on to his owne destruction, had now forbidden the deuotions of Ally the Persian Prophet, and enioyned the Turkish Rites of Abubacher, and other the followers of Mahomet, by imprisoning, rayling, pulling out the eyes, and killing Ally his obseruants, establishing his Decree, not sparing, in this persecution, to torment the tender Ladies (some of them of his owne bloud) not reuerencing age or profession, depriving euen the Califfe of Casbin (the eye of their blindness) of both his eyes, because he would not see equitie in this noueltie; and purposing (as the same went) to goe to Bagdat, there to receiue the Crowne from him whomsoever hee should find the succellour of the great Califfe. In the midst of his cruelties hee was (with like crueltie) murdered by Persaconna. The Executioner of her fathers Will is thus made an Executioner of her fathers sonne, hauing brought in the conspirators, appaured in womens weeds, to strangle him among his Paramours. This was done the twentie foure of Nouember, 1577. after he had reigned one yeere, seuen moneths, and fixe dayes.

c Lib. 3. cap. 8.
i. Sineest. in Du Baccho usaq.

MAHOMET CODABANDA thought it now time for him to looke to his right, which by meanes of Mirza Salmas, the chiefe of the Sultans, hee obtained. This Sultan presented him with the head of that Virago Persaconna, vpon the top of a Lance, with the disheuelled haire, gaily lookes, and bloudy impressions, yielding an vnouth (though not vndesired) spectacle to the beholders: which (iflike Banner of Megara) seemed to display new quartels, kindling inward hatreds, tumultuous seditions, and ciuill broyles, which exposed them to Amuraths forces, who thought it fit time for him to fish with his Turkish nets in this troubled Persian streame. Of these warres is already spoken. Much losse did the Persians by this meanes sustaine, and much more had followed, had not Emir Hamza, *Mahomet*s eldest sonne, with his valorous attempts, stopped the Turk ish proceedings, and like the Easterne Sun, with his greater brightnesse dispersed those weaker beames of The Moone Standards of proud OTTOMAN.

But soone was this Sunne eclipsed, not by the Moones interposition (for that is naturall, if wee understand it of the heavenly; and ordinary, if of the earthly and Turkish) but by extraordinary and unnatural procurement (as was thought) of his ambitious brother Abas, or (of others suspected) of his father; effected by a treacherous Eunuch that guarded him, which suddenly stricke him thorow the bodie and slew him. Abas his brother, by solemn oath cleared himselfe of this odious imputation. And yet hee is no lesse suspected of a more monstrous and unnatural treacherie against his owne father, who is thought ^d to bee poisoned by his meanes, that by these bloudie steps hee might ascend to that Throne, which now he enjoyeth. But (all this notwithstanding) he hath since so subtilly handled the matter, that hee is both beloued of his owne, and feared of his enimie: his subiects sweare and blesse in his name. ^e He hath recovered from the Turke both Tauris, and other Regions of Seruania and Georgia, which the Turke had before taken from the Persians. Hee was reported also to haue taken Bagdat, but (it seemeth) not truly. Ianfonius ^f in his Newes 1610. reporteth of diuers victories obtained by him against the Turke (which caused publike Fasts and supplications to be appointed at Constantinople:) and of the Persian Embassage, with rich Presents and holy Reliques to the Emperour at Prague. Gotardus Arisba likewise in his Gallabegici, relateth of Abas his Embassage to Constantinople about a Peace: but when his Embassadour returned with Articles, whereby the Persian was bound, vnder shew of gifts, to pay an annual tribute to the Sultan, he therefore put him to death; putting out the eyes also, and cutting off the hands of the Turkish Embassadour which was sent with him. Of Bagdat and old Babylon wee haue spoken elsewhere: let this be here added out of Balbi, ^h that traueilling from Felugia to Bagdat, which hee reckoneth a dayes iourney and a halfe, one whole dayes iourney thereof, was by one side of the ruines of Babylon, which hee left on the left hand.

As for Tauris, in the yeere 1514. Selim tooke it (as some say) on composition, which hee ³⁰ brake, and carried thence three thousand of the best Artificers to Constantinople. Ano 1535. Solyman gaue it for a prey to his foildiers; Ano 1515. Osman spoiled it with vncouth and inhumane cruelties; whatsoever the insulting Conqueror, in the vtmost extence of lawlesse lust, could inflict, or the afflicted condition of the conquered could in the most dejected state of miserie sustaine, was there executed. Abas in recouerie thereof vied the Canon, an Instrument which before they had, to their owne losse, scorned. The Prince is (saith our ⁱ Author) excellent both of composition of bodie, and disposition of minde, of indifferent stature, sterner countenance, piercing eyes, swart colour, his mustaches on the vpper lip long, his beard cut close to the chin. Hee delights in Hunting and Hawking, Running, Leaping, and trying of Masteries; He is an excellent Horse-man and Archer. In the morning he vish to visit his stables of great Horses, and hauing there spent most of the fore-noone, hee returns to his Palace: About three of the clocke in the after-noon, he goeth to the At-Maiden, which is the high street of Hispania, the Citie of his residence, round about which are scaffolds for the people, to sit and behold the King and his Nobles at their Exercises of Shooting, Running, Playing at Tennis, &c. all on horse-backe. In this place very often, in his owne person, he heareth causes, and pronounceth sentence, executing iustice severely.

Now that we may mention some of the chiefe Cities of Persia (vnder which name I here comprehend, as usually in this Historie, their ^k Dominion, not as it is measured by the Pens of Geographers, but by the Swords of their Princes.) In Sumachia, Master Cartwright saith, They saw the ruines of a cruell spectacle, which was a Turret erected with Free-stone and Flints, in the midst whereof were placed the heads of all the Nobilitie and Gentie of the Countie. A mile from this Towne was a Nunnerie, wherein was buried the bodie of Amaleke Cana, the Kings daughter, who slew her selfe with a knife, for that her father would haue forced her to marrie a Tartarian Prince: the Virgins of the Countrey resort thither once a yeere to lament her death. Sechi is foure dayes iourney thence, not farr from which is Eres, which, because they yielded to the Turke, were by Emir Hamze vtterly destroyed, man, woman, and child. Atasse is the chiefe Citie of Merchandize in all Seruania, especially for raw Silks. Tauris hath out-liued many deaths, and is very rich by reason of continuall Trade, nourishing almost two hundred thousand people within her compasse; for walk in hath I not. This was sometime the Seat Royall, and after that, Casbin, which is situate in a fertile Plaine, foure dayes iourney in length, wherein are two thousand Villages. The buildings are of Bricke dried in the Sunne, as in Persia is most vsuall: The At-Maidan, or chiefe street, is foure square, almost a mile in circuit. Neere to it is Ardouil, of chiefe note for beginning of the Sophian Superstition. Geilan is foure dayes iourney from Casbin, and stands neere to the Caspian Sea, Neere to Bachu is a Fontaine of black oyle; which serueth all Hispasi is thought by some to be Hecatropolis: the walls are a dayes journey about on horse-backe; before the greatest, now the Royall Citie of the Persians. It hath a strong Fort, two Seraglio's, the walls whereof glister with red Marble and Parget of diuers colours, paved all with Mosaique worke, all things else combining Maiestie and Louelineffe, Magnificence and Beautie. The inhabitants, as did the ancient Parthians (whose chiefe Citie it sometime hath bene) buy, sell, talke, and performe all their publike and priuate affaires on horse-backe: the Gentlemen neuer goe on foot. An Appendix touching the present Persian King, out of Sir ANTHONY SHERLEY.

Having thus followed the currant of Authors in these Relations of Persia; there hath since the first Edition been published the Trauels of Sir Anthony Sherley into these parts (with Sir Robert Sherley his brother) penned by himselfe; with some extracts whereof to furnish this Chapter (alreadie tedious) as with a second seruice after a full Romacke, will (I hope) renew appetite, with the varietie (so farte fetched and so deare bought) howsoever before cloyed with fulnes: To let passe therefore those worthy Brethren (Worthies indeed in this kinde, beyond the reach & worth of my blurring praise, and clipping commendations) and to come to their Trauell and obseruation. Having passed not without manifold dangers to Aleppo: and thence to Birr, and so downe Euphrates; by the way they aduentured to see the Campe of Aborisfi King of the Arabs, inhabiting the desarts of Melopotamia, a poore King with ten or twelue thousand beggerly subiects, liuing in tents of blacke haire-cloth, well gourned. They came to Bagdat, which is wholly on the other side of Tygris, except one Suburb in the Peninsula, to which men passe by a bridge of boats, euery night dissolved for feare of the Arabs, or stormes: whence, through the bountie of an Italian Merchant, Sir Vistorio Spectro, they escaped (for they were not vn suspected) with a Carauan of Persian Pilgrims which came from Mecca. Thirtie dayes they were on the way to the Confinis: and fiftene from thence to Casbin, where they staid a moneth attending the Kings arriual; being in the meane time well vsed, vpon conceit that the King would like well of their comming: the people otherwise are ill in themselves, and onely good by example of their King, and strict obedience to him. For of the ancient Persians there are few, these being the posteritie of those which haue been here seated by the transplantations of Tamurlane and Ismael (not to mention any more ancient) out of other Countries.

n This King was a Saniack of the Turke, whereas they on the West-side of the Ruer in an huge extent, and infinite numbers rouse, and rob all: the Turke keeping against them fiftene hundred Janizaries at Damasco, and twelue thousand at Cairo. Old Babylon is North from Bagdat about foue and twentie miles. In Newburp, O. Courdi, is Tartan, Turkman, &c. p Some haue toothfully beleered as Historie, those things which Xenophon writ as a Philosophicall Poem, &c.

The King himselfe, by our Authors Relation, in his vertues and gouernment, is, as if some Philosopher should discourse of what should be, rather then an Historian declare what is: as did Xenophon of his Cyrus: Of those imputations of Paricide and ambition, not a word. His order of attaining the Crowne, is thus reported.

The Persian custome, being that onely the elder brother toleth, the rest are made blinde by burning balons, hauing otherwise all contentments fit for Princes children: when Xa-Tamur was dead without issue, his brother (so hee calleth him, contrary to our former relations, and to that of Mirkond the Persian, which I more maruell at) Xa-Conabent, was called, Blind to the Kingdome. He had issue Sultan Hamzire Mirza the eldest, who succeeded him, and this present King called Abas. The eldest in his fathers life time administered all things, so which blindness made the other vnfit for: but Abas at twelue yeeres of age, vnder the gouernment of Tutors held the Prouince of Yafse, where the loue of the people made him suspected to his Father, who secretly resolued his death. Abas by his friends hearing it, fled to Corasan a Tartar people on the East of Persia, both by their religion and dependance, Turkish, and of themselves otherwise vnquie, and addicted to spoyle. This King honoured Abas as his sonne. His father soone after dying, Sultan Hamzire succeeded, who was forced to renew his truce with the Turke, by reason of the rebellion of the Turcomans, whom by force he subdued, beheaded their Princes, &c. for his securitie slew twentie thousand of the ablest amongst them for the wars. And then wholly bending his thoughts against the Turke, was by treason slaine by his Barber. His Princes, Authors of this fact, shared his State amongst them, euery one making himselfe Lord of that Prouince which he gouerned: waiting their resolutions against Abas, whom also the Turke (which had his hand in the businesse) had had vnderaken should bee kept still in Corazan, Abus neuertheless so wrought, that the King of Corazan dismissed him, with three thousand horsemen, to winne possession of that State, which since hath deuoured the Tartars, and is growne terrible to the Turke, being no lesse in Extent then the Turke hath in Asia, and better both peopled, gouerned, and deuoted to their Soueraigne. But it was not easily atchieued. In Sistan one of the neerest Prouinces, hee was encountered with twenty thousand, his troupes cut in pieces, himselfe forced to flee to the mountaines, where he liued three moneths vnknown amongst the heardmen, sitting vp and downe with tenne or twelue followers. Wearie of this life, hee determined to shew himselfe in Yald, his quondam Prouince, which so well succeeded, that numbers come flocking to him, and Ferrat Can also a great Prince (discontent with the present State, no part of which had salne to him, hauing at that time no Prouince in his gouernement, when the King was slaine) resorted to him with his brother, and tenne thousand followers. They were welcome, but hee much more, as a great Souldier and a wise Prince. With these forces hee ouerthrew his neerest enemies, which caused those of Shyras, Alphaan, Cassan, assisted by the Kings of Gheylyan and Mazandran, to gather mighty forces. In the meane time, the Turkes armed at Tauris, and the Prince of Hamadan, hauing called in a strength of the Courdines, was marching towards Casbin. Thus beset with Armies, hee leaueth Ferrat Can with Zulpher his brother and five thousand men in Casbin; & himselfe with the rest of his power, marched towards the Can of Hamadan. Now did Ferrat Can (according to former agreement betweene the King and him) profess himselfe altered from the Kings part, and writeth to the Rebels, offering to ioyne his strength with theirs, and to mutinie the Kings Armie also, which was lodged in the Mountaynes, in shew to keepe the straits, indecde to expect the euents. Thus the Cans assembled at Casbin, and after long deliberation, concluded, that it was needefull and not safe to call in the Turkes forces, and dispatched a messenger and present to the Basia of Tauris, to reuerse his fauour till a time more needfull. Hereof Ferrat sent word closely to the King, and of a banquet which should bee at his house a few nights after, where the Principalls of the Army should meet. Hither Abus bid himselfe a guest, posting thither with five thousand of his best horse, which he disposed in the mountaine, couered with Ferrats troupe, expecting the appointed signe: which being giuen late in the night when the whole company was heauie with wine and sleepe, the King was receiued in to the house with three hundred men, where without any vproche he slew seuentie. And at the breake of the day the Kings people made as great shouts & noyse, as if all the Army had bin there, whereat the Alarme being giuen, all tooke them to their armes, repairing to Ferrats lodging to their Princes; whose heads laced vpon a string, were there presented to them out of a Tarras, vpon which the King presently shewed himselfe with Ferrat Can; Zulpher hauing his five thousand men ready in a troupe in the great place. All these things together so amazed them, that they thought the Kings pardon a high preferment, which he freely granted both them, and the succours sent thither by the Kings of Cheylan and Mazandran. The reports hereof made Hamadans Armie to vanish, and the King tooke order presently by new Cans for the gouernment of those parts. Hee led his souldiers to Hisphaan, giuing out that the treasures of the Kingdome were there layd vp by the Rebels; a good policie to winne it, which with as much pretended indignation he rased, for sayling of his seeming hopes. To satisfie his Souldiers better, he led them against the Kings of Gheylyan and Mazandran, where the entrances by Nature difficult, thorow the vnpassable woods and hilles, were made easie by the reuolt of those to whom the charge of keeping the Straits was giuen, whose liues Abus had before spared at Casbin. The successe was, the two Kings were slaine, and the souldiers enriched with the spoyle of a Countrey exceeding fertile, thus subdued to his Seepier. The people he remoued into other parts of his Dominion, sending the former inhabitants into Cheylan and Mazandran.

Not long after the brother of that King of Corassan, which had bene Tutor to Abus, rebelled against his brother, and slew him and all his children, except one with whom his Tutors fled into the Mountaynes. This occasion Abus apprehended for the subduing of that Countrey in the Infants right, which (notwithstanding the treasons of Ferrat, now weary of his former loyalty, and conspiring with the Turke and Tartar to betray his Masters to them) hee effected. These things with larger circumstances Abus himselfe related to Sir Anthony and Sir Robert. As for his gouernment, the same is there also described, but I haue bene too long in the former. Hee hath Poits once a weeke from all parts. The Visire sitteth in counsell with the Kings counsell euery morning, and the King himselfe euery Wednesday. The poorest may offer him any supplication, which he readeth, registreth, ordereth. One example of Iustice is admirable, which he senenced on the Gouernour of Casbin, conuict of many extortions, briberies, and other crimes: That all his goods and lands should be sold for satisfaction to those whom hee had spoyled; and if any thing wanted, since the King

King by giuing him that authoritie, was partly the cause of those excesses, hee condemned himselfe to pay the residue out of his treasure. If any thing advanced, it should bee giuen to his children, with a grievous Edict, that no succour should be ministred to himselfe. Neither should hee at once end his punishment by death, but during his life wear a Yoke like a Hogs-yoke, and haue his eares and nose cut off: nor might any relieue him; but hee should get his liuing with his owne hands, that hee might feelee in himselfe the miserie of povertie. This made the Turks Embassador there present iwear, that such fortune & such vertue must needs bee his Masters ruine. His bountie to our Author, his magnificence otherwise, lett the Reader there learne, as likewise his priuate disports and exercises. At his entrance into Hisphian, the wayes were couered two English miles with Veluet, Satin, and Cloth of Gold, where his horse should passe. He feasted Sir Anthony, before his employment in that honorable Embassage to the Princes Christian (after the maner^m of the ancient feasting vsed by the Persians) thirty dayes together, in a Garden of two miles compasse, vnder Tents pitched by small rills of water; where euery man that would come, was placed according to his degree, vnder one or other Tent, prouided abundantly with meate, fruit, and wine, drinking as they would without compulsion. The ioy of which feast was augmented by the Tartars of Buckhawd, yielding themselves to his subiection, and by the great Mogors great offer with his eldest sonnes daughter, to the young sonne of King Abas in marriage. But I referre the more delicious to Sir Anthones owne booke; hauing thence gathered this, because it differeth so much in some things from others; then whom, he had farre better meanes of intelligence.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Sophian Sect, or Persian Religion, as it is at this present.

§. I.

The differences betwixt the Turke and Persian, with the zeale of both parts.

That hath bene already shewed, how the Saracens had one Calysa, or Caliph, whom they esteemed the Head of their Religion and Empire, in right vnto both succeeding their grand Seducer, Mahomet: and how the foure Capitaines or Doctors, each ayming, vnder colour of Religion, to further his ambitious Projects, made way to difference of Sects in the beginning, and in succeeding Ages the Sword decided, who was rightfull successor, the postenty of each challenging to himselfe that right, according as they were able in the Fielde to maintaine it. These Persians affected Hali, as truest interpreter of their Law, and Lord of the State, to whom Mahomet gaue his daughter in his life time, and his Alcoran at his death, being his kinsman also by birth; and although, by the violence of the contradicting Caliphs, they did not alway make hereof open profession, yet euer and anon, as occasion was offered, this fire brake out, yet neuer into so great a flame, as after the yeere 1369. by Sophi, Guine, Aider, Ismael, and their successors, vnto this day: their Sect being that onely, of the seuenty two Saracenicall (so many some^a account) which shall in the Persian estimation haue a dismissal into Paradise, all the rest (and why not this also?) leading to hell.

From that diuision betwixt the Persians and Arabians, about the successor of Mahomet (it is Barrini his Relation; in which the Persians call themselves Sia, which signifieth the vniou of one body, but the Arabians call them Rassadin, that is, vnreasonable, and themselves Cunin) proceeded other Sects amongst the Mahometans; and amongst the Persians, two called Camara and Mutaeli, which follow little the saying of the Prophets, but would haue allproued to them by naturall reason, not allowing Maser or Mahomet any further. There is one Sect amongst them called Malabeda, which subiecteth all things to Chance, and to the Stars; not to Diuine Prouidence. There are other called Emocaidi, which reiect many things in the Alcoran, and follow the doctrine of Zaidi, the Nephew of Hocem, second sonne of Ali, these inhabit on the confines of Trester Iohn, and in Meline.

But to come to the common Persians, and to obserue out of Barrini the diuersity of opinion betwixt them and the Arabians; their Doctors reduce these differences into seuenteen conclusions. The Persians say, That God is the Author and worker of euery good, and that euill cometh from the Deuill: The Arabians say, That would bring in two Gods, one one of good, the other of euill: the Persians say, that God is eternall, and that the law and creation of men had a beginning: the Arabians answer, That all the words of the law are prayes of the works of God, and therefore eternall, like himselfe: the Persians say, That the soules of the blessed in the other world cannot see the essence of God, because he is a Spirit of Diuinity: onely they shall see his greatnesse, mercy, pity, & all other good things which he works in the creatures: the Arabians answer, That they shall see him with their eyes, euen as he is; the Persians say, That when Mahomet receiued the Law, his soule was carried by the Angel Gabriel into the presence of God: the Arabians affirme it of his body also: the Persians say, That the children of Ab, or Alle, and Fatema: and their twelve Nephewes, haue preheminence aboue all Prophets: the Arabians grant it aboue all other men, but not aboue the Prophets: the Persians say, that it is sufficient to pray thrice a day vnto God; in the morning when the Sunne riseth, which is called Sob; the second (Dor) at noone: the third (Magareh) before Sunne-set, because these three containe all the parts of the day: the Arabians require twice besides, according to their law, called Hacer, and Assa. The rest of their seuentene Articles of difference, mine Author hath not exprest, These are sufficient, to shew that they not onely differ about the successors of Mahomet, as Minadai affirmeth, but about Dogmatical points also in their ridiculous Theologie, and interpretation of their law.

- 10 These differences haue continued of old and long continuance; what hath in latter times accrewed hereunto by the Sophian additions of Guine and his followers, is in part touched in the former Chapter. Let vs now take view thereof, as the same at this present hath infected Persia and the neighbouring Regions.

There is resident in Casbin their profane Priest, called Muslaed-Dini, that is to say, the chiefe of the law, who is as the Masir among the Turkes; and in the other subiect Cities are certaine peculiar heads obedient to this chiefe Priest, who notwithstanding are not chosen or displaced at his pleasure, but by the King himselfe, who should not onely be a King, but a Priest, as Ali and Mahomet were; from whom hee challengeth succession. And we haue

- 30 shewed before that Ismael was called Halse, or Chalse, that is, the Vicar of God. Howbeit, for auoyding of greater trouble, he granteth that saour, and putteth ouer that burthen from himselfe vnto others; to whose iudgements he also referreth himselfe, whensoever there is any Consultation or Treatie touching their law and religion. Vnder the Muslaed-Dini are the Califs (sayth Minadai) and these are they that execute their dayly Seruice in their Mosches or Temples. The chiefe of these Califs is hee that putteth the Horn vpon the Kings head, when he is first enthronized: a ceremonie now performed in Casbin, because the Turkes forbade it to be performed in Cafe, neere vnto Babylon, according to the ancient wont. Other Cities also haue a Muslaed-Dini and Calif, although inferiour to them of Casbin. These inferiour Califs seeme to be Vicars (so the word signifieth) of the Muslaed-Dini.

- 10 The difference betweene the Turke and Persian (as commonly it happeneth in case of Religion) is so hotly pursued on both sides betwixt them, that they neither v^e mutual marriage, nor Merchandize, as some affirme: there can be no certaine Peace, or continuing Truce. And if one altars his Religion and turnes to the other side, hee is not receiued without a new Circumcision. Baiazet the great Turke burnt two hundred Houses in Constantinople, infected with this Sect, together with the inhabitants, and set forth a publike Edict against it. Ismael is sayd, in like hatred of the Turkes to haue caused a Swine to be nourished, which, in despite of the Ottoman he named Baiazet. Solyman returning from Amalia, was entertained in the house of one of this Sect, who therefore, after the departure of his Prince, purified his house with washings, perfumes and other ceremonies; as if it had bene polluted with a Turkish guest; for which cause himselfe was slaine, and his house rased. But let vs take a further view of this Sect in other Countries.

§. II. Of the spreading of the Persian Opinion.

NEITHER could it containe it selfe in the limits of the Persian Kingdome, but was spread further, and receiued euen in the heart of Turkie, and skirts of India. For amongst other the Disciples of Aidar, Chusan Sbelsie, and Schach Culi, afterwards surnamed Cusfelbai, fleeing the fury of the Persian King, who had slaine their Father, and persecuted his followers, came into Armenia Minor, and there tooke vp their dwelling at the great Mountain Antiaurus, at the foot whereof the broken Rocks haue many darke Caves, the worke of Art partly, partly of Nature; which place of the inhabitants is called Tek-el, whereof Schach Culi was after called Tebellu. Here these two gining themselves selues wholly to a contemplative life, in a strict austerity contenting themselves with such things as the earth voluntarily afforded, began to grow in knowledge, first of the Heardsmen and Shepheards; after, of the Husbandmen and Countrey people, admiring their new holiness. Yea, Baiasaz himselfe, then Emperor of the Turkes, moued with zeale of their deuotion, sent them yeerely fixe or seuen thousand Aspers. Afterwards becoming Fortunes-tellers, and prognosticating things to come, they were by the superstitious people drawne into Villages and Cities, where they preached Hali, according to Adams doctrine, enuoyning their Disciples the red Band on their Turbants; of which the Turkes rearme them Cusibai, that is, Red-heads, with which, in short time, the Cities and Townes were filled.

When they were thus multiplied, there met ten thousand of them at a Fayre at Tascia, or Attalia, where they executed the chiefe Magistrate; and being perswaded by these new Masters, they sware neuer to forsake their Captaines, or refuse any labour for their most holy Religion, vowing their soules and bodies in defence thereof. These Captaines not hauing otherwise to maintain their followers, gaue them leaue to forrage the Countrey aduoyning, and to liue vpon the spoyle of them that would not receiue their new doctrine, which they in many troupes, and with many preyes accordingly performed. They entred into Lycaonia, and the people fled out of the Countrey into Iconium. These two Prophets set vp Proclamations of blessings to all such as would receiue their Sect, and of destructions to the gainesayers. Ismael also, to encrease their strength, had sent them some troupes of horsemen. In the Politicke Historie which Crusius hath giuen vs, in the first booke of his Turcogracia, it is sayd, that two hundred thousand followed Sach Cules: In this war Baiasaz two Nephewes, with the forces of the Countrey, encountering them in battell, receiued the ouerthrow: Corcutus, the sonne of Baiasaz, with his Armie durst not assayle them. Thus marched they into Bitunia, where nere vnto the Riuer Sangarius, Caragezes Bassa, Viceroy of Asia, affronted them, hauing before commanded Achmetes, the eldest sonne of Baiasaz, to leaue forces in his gouernment of Cappadocia and Pontus, to shut them in at their back. But Techellus, after the losse of seuen thousand men, and all his Ensignes, chased him out of the field into Cutiae the seat of the Viceroy, where he besieged and tooke him with his wiues and children: and after being pursued by Alis Bassa, with forces out of Europe, hee impaled this Caragezes in the way on a thurst stake fastened in the ground. Here was hee forced to fight, and his fellow Chusan Sheltse slaine; but Techellus recovering the battell almost lost, left Alis Bassa slaine in the place; the Turkes fleeing before him. Ionuses Bassa was sent against him, when hauing lost a great part of his strength, hee had retired his weakened forces into Antitaurus, out of the Woods and Mountaines, often assailing the Turkes; whence at last he fled into Peria. Ionuses caused strait inquisition to be made for these new Sectaries, doing such to death with exquisite torments, as had borne armes in the late rebellion, and burned the rest in the forehead with an hot yron: and after transported them, together with the friends and kinsmen of such as had bene executed, into Europe, there to bee dispersed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponnesus, for feare of a second returne of Techellus. The remainder of Techellus his power, as they fled into Persia, robbed a Carauan of Merchants; for which outrage, coming to Tauris, their Captaines were by Ismaels command executed, and Techellus himselfe burnt alive; but yet is this Sect closely fauoured in Asia.

§. III.

Of their Rites, Persons, Places, and Opinions, Religious.

Gef. Duck. Hist.
tom. 1.

They haue now scene the Proceedings of this Sophian Sect, both in Persia and Turkie, both here kept downe, and there established by force. To weare red on the lower parts of their body, were to these Red-heads scarcely piacular. Touching Hali, they haue diuers dreames: as that when they doubted of Mahomets successor, a little Lizard came into a Councell assembled to decide the controuersie, and declared that it was Mahomets pleasure, that Mortius Ali (or Moris Ali) should be the man. He had a sword wherewith hee killed as many as hee stroke. At his death he told them that a white Camell would come for his body, which accordingly came, and carried his dead body and the sword, and was therewith taken vp into heauen; for whose returne they haue long looked in Persia. For this cause the King kept a horse ready saddled, and kept for him also a daughter of his to be his wife; but she died in the yeere, 1573. And they say further, that if he come not shortly, they shall be of our beleefe.

Nephewes.

They haue few bookes, and lesse learning. There is often great contention and mutinie in great Townes, which of Mortius Ali his sonnes was greatest; sometime two or three thousand sand people being together by the cares about the same; as I haue seene (sayth Master Ducker) in Shamaky, and Ardouill, and Tauris; where I haue seene a man coming from fighting, and in a bravery bringing in his hand foure or five mens heads, carrying them by the hayre of the crowne. For alibough they haue their heads commonly twice a weeke, yet leave they a tuft of hayre vpon their heads about two foot long, whercof, when I enquired the cause, They answered that thereby they may bee the easier carried vp into heauen when they are dead. In praying they turne to the South; because Mecca lyeth that way from them. When they be on trauell in the way, many of them will as soone as the Sunne riseth, light from their horses, turning themselves to the South, and will lay their gownes before them, with their swords and beads, and so standing vpright doe their holy things, many times in their prayers kneeling downe, and kissing their beads; or somewhat else that lieth before them.

When they earnestly asseire a matter, they sweare by God, Mahomet, and Mortu Ali, and sometime by all at once, saying, Olla Mahomet Ali, and sometime Shaugham beshie, that is, by the Shaugham head, Abas the young Prince of Persia charged with imputation of treason, after other Purgatorie speeches, sware by the Creator that spread out the ayre; that founded the earth vpon the deepes; that adorned the heauen with Starres; that powred abroad the water; that made the fir; and briefly of nothing brought forth all things: by the head of Ali, and by the Religion of their Prophet Mahomet, that hee was cleare. If any Christian will become a Bosarman, or one of their superstition, they giue him many gifts: the Gouernor of the Towne appointeth him a horse, and one to ride before him on another horse, bearing a sword in his hand, and the Bosarman bearing an arrow in his hand, rideth in the City curling his father and mother. The sword signifyeth death, if hee reuolt againe. Before the Shaugham seemed to fauour our Nation, the people abused them very much, and so hated them that they would not touch them, reuiling them by the names of Casars and Gawars, that is, Infidels or Mis-believers. Afterwards they would kisse their hands, and vse them gently and reuerently. Drunkards and riotous persons they hate; for which cause Richard Iohnson caused the English, by his vicious liuing, to be worse accounted of then the Russes.

Their opinions and rites most what agree with the Turkish and Saracenicall. Their Priests are apparelled like other men: they vse euery morning, and afternoon to goe vp to the toppes of their Churches, and tell there a great tale of Mahomet and Mortu Ali. They haue also among them certaine holy-men called Setes; accounted therefore holy, because they, or some of their ancestors, haue bene on pilgrimage at Mecca; these must be beleued for this Saint-ship, although they lie neuer so shamefully. These Setes vse to shau their heads all ouer, sauing on the sides a litle about the Temples, which they leaue vnshauen, and vse to braid the same as women doe their hayre, and wear it as long as it will grow. Iosafa Barsare at Sammach lodged in an Hospitall, wherein was a graue vnder a vault of stone, and neere vnto that a man, with his beard and hayre long; naked, sauing that a litle before and behind, he was couered with a skinned, sitting on a peece of a matre on the ground; I (sayth hee) saluted him, and demanded what hee did: he told mee hee watched his father: I asked who was his father; He, quoth he, that doth good to his neighbour; with this man in this Sepulchre I haue liued thirty yeeres: and will now accompany him after death; and being dead, be buried with him; I haue seene of the world sufficient, and now haue determined to abide thus till death.

Another I found at Tauris on all-Soules day, in the which they also vse a commemoration of Soules departed, neere to the Sepulchre in a Church-yard, hauing about him many birds, especially R.uens and Crows: I thought it had bene a dead corpse, but was told it was a liuing Saint, at whose call the birds resorted to him, and he gaue them meat.

Another I saw, when Assambai was in Armenia, marching into Persia against Signior Saafa, Lord of Persia and Zagatal, vnto the City of Herem; who drew his staffe in the dishes wherein they are, and sayd certaine words, and brake them all: the Sultan demanded what he had sayd: they which heard him answered, that he said hee should be victorious, and brake his enemies forces, as hee had done those dishes: whereupon he commanded him to brake till his returne; and finding the euent according, he vse him honourably. When the Sultan rode thorow the fields, he was set on a Mule and his hands bound before him, because he was sometime accustomed to doe some dangerous folly: at his feet there attended him many of their religious persons, called Daruis. These mad trickes he vse according to the course of the Moone, sometimes in two or three dayes not eating any thing, busied in such fooleries, that they were faine to bind him: Hee had great allowance for his expences.

One of those holy men there was, which went naked like to the beasts, preaching their faith: and hauing obtained great reputation; hee caused himselfe to bee immured in a wall forty dayes, there to abide without any sustenance: but when this time was expired, some some wondered, one more wise than the rest, scolded the sent of flesh: the Sultan hearing it, committed him and his disciple to the Gadfisher, who by tortments caused them to confesse the coozenage; for, thorow a hole which was made in the wall by a caue, he had broth conueyed to him, and therefore they were both put to death: In the yeere 1498. Chozamirech, an Armenian, being in his shop in Tauris, an Azi or Saint of theirs came to him, and willed him to deny his Christian faith: he answered him courteously, and prayed him not to trouble him; but when he persisted, hee offered him money; the Saint would not haue the money, but importuned his first lute: Chozamirech sayd hee would not deny his Christian faith: whereupon the other plucked a sword out of a mans scabbard which stood by, and with a wound which hee gaue the Armenian in the head, killed him, and ranne away. But the Armenians sonne complayning to the Sultan, procured his apprehension at Merin, two dayes journey from Tauris: and, being brought before him, he with a knife killed him with his owne hands, and caused him to be cast on a dung-hill for the dogges to eate; saying, Is this the way to encrease the faith of Mahomet? But when some of the more zealous people went to one Daruscaffan, which was in guarding of the sepulchre of Assambei the former Sultan, and (as it were) Prior of the Hospitall, and requesting of him, obayn'd the body to burie it: the Sultan hearing it, sent for him, and sayde to him, Darest thou countermand my commands? Away and kill him; which was suddenly dispatched. Hee further to be reuenged of the people, committed the Towne to the sick, which for the space of thre or foure houres was done. And then hee forbad further spoyle, and fined the Towne in a great summe of gold. Lastly, hee caused the Armenians sonne to come before him, and with many kind words comforted him. This long history I haue inserted, to shew the extremity of blind zeale, and religious fury in the seculars and votaries of these Persians, if iustice should not withstand their rage.

Before is mentioned the commemoration of their dead, which is thus performed ouer their Sepulchres. Thither resort great multitudes of men and women, olde and yong, which sit on hepes with their Priests, and with their candles lighted: the Priests eyther read or pray in their language; and after cause to bee brought somewhat to eate in the place: the place containeth betwene foue and fye miles; the pathes which leade thither are full of poore people, which beg almes, some of whom offer to say some prayer for their benefactors. The sepulchres haue stones vpon them engrauen with the names of the buried parties; and some haue a Chippell of stone thereon.

Inf. Bur.

At Merdin he saw a naked man, which came and saie by him, and pulling forth a booke, read thereon, and after drew neere and asked him, whence he was; hee answered, a stranger: I also am a stranger, saith he, of this world, and so are we all; and therefore I haue left it, with purpose to goe thus vnto mine end; with many words besides touching meekenesse, and the deniall of the world. He said, I haue scene a great part thereof, and finde nothing therein that contents me, and therefore haue determined to abandon it altogether. To this Merdin a man cannot passe, but by a way made of stone, continuing a mile: at the head thereof is a gate and way to the Towne; and within the Towne is another hill with a like way of fye hundred pases in height. There is an Hospitall for entertainment of all strangers, made by Zian-girboi, the brother of Vnucassan: and if they be of better sort, they are entertained with carpets spread for them, worth an hundred ducats a peece: and victuals for all commers.

We might heere take further view of their stately Temples, their great and populous Cities, and other things worthy obseruation, if that our Turkish History had not related the like also among them, especially touching the persons and places religious. For the rest I referre the Reader to other Authors.

Sir Ant. Sher.

The present King Abas (more, as it seemeth, in policie, to secure himselfe of factions, and against the Turke, then conscience) is a great persecutor of that sect of Mahomet which followeth the interpretation of Vffen and Omar. This hee labours to extirpate and make odious: hauing in vfe, once a yeere with great solemnitie to burne publicly (as maine heretikes) the images of Vffen and Omar. Then doth hee cause his great men publicly, in forme of their intinction, to goe with a Baggon of wine, carried by a footman, and at euery village, or where they see any assembly of people, to drinke: which himselfe also vseth, not for leue of the wine, but to scandalize the contrarie religion. Yet are there of the greatest, exceeding precise Turkes, if they durst shew it.

J. Ward
M. Heywood.

In a Letter of John Ward, written in Tauris, May 14. 1605, this King is blamed for making slaues of poore Armenians, and forcing many to Mahumetisme, pulling downe Churches, and vsing more rigour then the Turke.

III.

Of Natures wonders, and the Iesuits lyes of Persia.

He f wonders of Nature in these parts are: neere Bachu, a fontaine of oyle continually running, and fetched into the farthest parts of Persia: and another neere Shamake, of Tarre, whereof we had good use and proove in our ship. Hereabouts you shall haue in the fields, neere to any Village in the night, two or three hundred Foxes howling. Kine they haue like ours, and another sort great boned and leane, as hard fauoured as those which Pharaoh dreamed of. In Persia groweth great abundance of Bombasin cotton: this groweth on a certaine tree or brier, not past the height of a mans waste, with a slender stalk like to a biter or carnation lily-flower, with very many branches bearing on euery brinck a fruit or cod round, which when it commeth to the bignesse of a Wall-nut, openeth and sheweth forth the cotton, which groweth still like a fleece of wooll, to the bignesse of a mans fist, and then being loose is gathered: the seeds are flat, and blacke, as big as pease, which they sow in their fields, and plowd ground in great abundance.

I had thought I had ended this Chapter and our Persian Expedition; but our good friends the Iesuites would needs entertaine your wearie eyes, with reading an exploit of theirs, related by one, sometimes their fellow Catholike, now (I hope) our fellow Christian. For the credit of this honest and loyall (of their honest returne not with a non est, and loyall with a lie-all) Societie, was a French pamphlet by them dispersed (a little before the Powder-treason) amongst their Catholike friends in England, reporting the miraculous conuersion of the King of Persia, by one Campion a Iesuite, an English-man, that had expelled a Deuill out of a possessed partie; and commended the Deuill at his departure to giue a signe thereof, by striking downe the top of a steeple. Which being effected, the Kings conuersion followed, together with many of the Nobilitie, to the Roman faith; libertie also being granted to preach openly, and to build Churches and Monasteries thorowout the Kingdom. This was belueued in England, especially by a friend of our Authors, vnto whom that Pamphlet was sent, who requested him to say Masse in thanksgiving to God for so great a benefit. But in the end, that Iesuite who sent the Pamphlet gaue out, that it was but a thing deuised by French Hugonots, to disgrace their societie. Gracious societie! that can sometime cure their lies with a distinction of fraudes, sometime couet them with a robe of the new fashion, Equivocation: sometimes can expose their ballards at other mens doores; to shield themselves from shame, with laying the blame on others; and haue a mint in their pragmaticall beads of such super-subtle inuentions: what are they now disgraced? and that by Hugonots? Euen as truly as the Parliament-houle should haue bene blowne vp by Puritans! (this also was the Ignatians device) or like to that newe or the late Queene whose Ambassadors were at Rome for the Popes Absolution: or that of Bezaes recantation, and Geneueus submission to the Pope. Blessed Ignatius (let mee alio inuocate, or let him deigne to reade in that all-seeing glasse! this poore supplication) insufe some better spirit, or some clearer and more witty conueyance at least, into thy new progenie, lest the Protestants growler wits sent, see, feele the palpableness, and impute the Iesuitical courses to that Author which said, he would goe out and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all Academiists Prophets, which, when he speaketh a lie, speaketh of his owne, because he is a liar, and the father thereof. Hitherto wee tooke Ignatius for their father, but now we find a New, of whom they borrow Bankrupty shifts, becomming only the Merchants of Babylon, disgracing humanitie, defacing diuinitie, worthily rauwged amongst the poore policies of the Hospitall of the desperate. Since alio, Sanctus in his Mercurius Gallobelgicus hath told vs newes of the Kings graunt to build a Temple and Monasterie for Christians, himselfe, as hee saith, much inclining to that religion: whereupon many haue ben baptized, and not a few through the power of holy-water, p haue bene cured. The King hath further sent to the Georgians to vnite them to the Romish Church: and the Armenians alio, by an embassage to Rome haue protested all obedience to that Sea; and they before had done in the Couent of Saint Augustine, which is in the chiefe Citie of Persia. He setteth downe the copie of King Ahu his Letter to the Pope, wherein he requested him to send a Prelate to gouerne at Tres Ecclesia, where the chiefe of the Armenian Christians vsed to reside. The like he writeth in another letter to the King of Spaine: which, if it be so, argueth rather his policie, to obtaine good will and helpe of the Christians against the Turke, then any loue to Christian Religion.

Under the name Scythia, is contained a verie great part of the world: It was diuided into Scythia, Europa, and Asia. Pliny saith, That this name reacheth vnto the Sarmatians and Germans, and to those farthest Nations, which were vnknowne to other men. And Strabo in his first booke saith, That all knowne Regions towards the North were called Scythians or Nomades; and in his eleuenth booke he affirmeth, that the Greeces called all those Northerne Nations, Scythians, and Celoscythians. Those beyond the Adriatique and Pontrike Seas, and the River Ister or Danubius, were called Hyperborei, Sauromatz, and Arimaspi: those beyond the Caspian Sea, Sacæ and Massagetæ. Some will haue this name to be given them αὐτοὶ ἐκ τοῦ σκοτεινοῦ, which signifieth to be angrie: Others of their Shooting, called still of some of those Nations, and in some other languages, Scieten, of which our word Shoot is deriued: Mela in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, calleth them all Sager; and in the fragment which beareth the name of Caro de Originebus, is mentioned Scythia Saga: this word Saga, Berosus interpreteth a Priest: saying, that Noah left the Scythian Armenians his ritwall bookes, which onely Priests, and that onely among Priests, might reade, who were therefore called Saga, as Noah himselfe had been. These peopled the Countries from Armenia to the Baſſians, all which place was called Scythia Saga: ouer which Sabastus reigning in the time of Iupiter Belus; Araxa with his sonne Scythia possessed all from Armenia Westward, to Samatia in Europe. The Grecians fable, Hercules to be the father of these Nations, begetting Scythies on a monster, whose vpper halfe resembled a Woman, the nether part a Viper. It were an endlesse and boundlesse worke, to seeke and set out the true and proper beginnings and bounds of this so large a Tract of the world, called Scythia: the particular Nations of them would be but harsh to recite out of Pliny, Mela, Strabo, and others: the multitude whereof he that will may find in Ortelius his Theſaurus collected together. The Sarmatz, or Sauromatz, are sometime made one peculiar people of the Scythians: and sometimes the names are confounded, Sarmatia also being diuided into Europa and Asia, whereof the one is interpreted by Olinerus, Polonia, by Ortelius, Russia, and the other Tartaria.

Coropius in his Beceſelana admiring his owne language, coniectureth that while Nimrod and his company fell to babel, or after our pronuniation, babbled at Babel, others, namely, the Cymbrians, or posteritie of Gomer staid still in Margiana, a Countrie fruitfull of Vines; whither hee imagineth Noah descended out of the Arke, and there abode after the Flood. These he supposeth, being not at Babel, retained their old and first vniuersall language. But Margiana growing too little for their multiplied numbers, they were forced to send out Colonies. And thus the Saxons, Teſſoſages, Sauromatz, Geres or Gothes, the Danes, Gallies, and other Scythian Nations, the true posteritie of Gomer, and keepers of the first language, as he by Dutch Etymologies gathereth, peopled both Scythia and Sarmatia in Asia, and Europe, together with all Germanie, France, England, Norway, Denmarke, and some parts of Asia Minor. Hee that will bee further informed of his Reasons, let him reade his Saxonica, Gotadonica, and other Treatises of his Beceſelanian Antiquities.

Protopius distinguishing Scythia from Samatia: hee confineth Sarmatia Europa, with the Sarmatian Ocean, and the land vnknowne on the North: with Vistula on the West: the Easterne border is Iani: from whence vnto the Hircanian Sea Eastward, is Sarmatia Africa, on the North abutting on the vnknown parts of the earth, on the South with the Euxine Sea, and a line drawne right from thence to the Caspian Sea. Scythia is by him placed to the East of Sarmatia, diuided by the hill Imaus, extending vnto the Region called Serica, hauing on the North vnknowne places: on the South, the Sacæ, Sogdiana, Margiana and India. But our purpose is to take them here in their more generall sense, vnderstanding all the North parts of Asia, now Tartaria Afratica (for Europe, sauing wherein the European Scythians agree with the Asian we are not now to speake.) And of these, first to consider their ancient Scythian Rites, and in the next place their later Tartarian appellation and Religion.

Inſtit m out of Tragou relateth the arguments vsed of the Egyptians and Scythians, each seeking seeking to challenge to themselves, to bee the ancientest of Nations: in which quarrell the Scythians prevailed. Their manners and customes hee thus reporteth. They have no limitation of lands, nor tillage, nor house, but alwaies wander thorow places not inhabited, feeding their Herds & Flocks. They carrie their wiues and children with them on Carcs, which also being couered with hides, they vse for houses. No offence is more hainous amongst them then theft: gold and silver they as much contemne, as others desire. Milke and hony is their food; their clothes, skinnies of beasts, for the vse of wooll they know not. They haue three times sought the Empire of Asia, neuer conquered of others. They chased Darius the Persian King out of their coasts: they slew Cyrus with all his armie: they ouerthrew Zopyrus a Captaine of Alexander the Great, with all his forces. They onely heard of, neuer felt the Roman armes, and themselves founded the Parthian Empire.

That which credulous and fabulous antiquitie hath reported, of the monstrous peoples inhabiting the Northerly and vnknown parts of Scythia, is not here to be recited, the Countiees being at this time discovered, and knowne to haue no such men, as either by nature are bald and flat nosed, with huge chins; or haue but one eye, where there are also Gryphons, keepers of their treasures; or men with Goats feet: or other monsters of men, which Pliny, Herodotus, and others, haue rather mentioned then beleued; Manduil and Alanus following them in like Relations. Next to these both in place and credit, wee may reckon the Hyperboreans, of whom the Delians report that they sent to Delos Virgins, with sacrifice to Lucina, bound vp in wheat-straw: through to many Nations inhabiting betwene. Of the Issedones is reported, that when one dieth, his kindred bring thither beasts, which they kill, and cut, and dresse, and eat together with the flesh of the dead man, whose skull also they keepe and glide, vsing it as an Idoll, to which they performe yeerely ceremonies: these exequies doth the Sonne there performe to his dead father.

§. II.

Of the Religion, Diuination, and other Scythian Rites.

Generally of the Scythian Religion thus. Of the gods, they worship first Vesta, whom they call in their language Tabui: next of all Iupiter, in their speech Papaeus, and the Earth, supposing her to bee the wife of Iupiter, and call her Apia. In the next place they worship Apollo and Venus, by the names of Orosiris, and Arimaspa, and Mari, and Hercules. Some of them sacrifice also to Neptune, or Thammasfader, Images, Altars, and Temples, they thinke ought not to bee made, except to Mari. Their manner of sacrificing is generally this: The sacrifice is presented with the fore-feet bound, the Sacrificer at his back hauing laid aside his holy vestment, woundeth the same, and while it falleth, calls vpon that god to whom he sacrificeth; and then putteth a halter about the necke, and strangeth it, without kindling any fire, or vowing, or other ceremonie, and slayeth it: the flesh plucked from the bones, hee casteth into a great Caldron, the bones hee vseth for sawell to seeth the same (for wood the Countiee doth not yeeld:) And if they haue not any such vessell, they put all the flesh with water into the paunch, and so the beast doth seeth it selfe. After it is boyled, he which sacrificed offereth the libaments, or offerings of the flesh and inwards: their sacrifices are, besides other beasts, especially of horses.

Their Temples to Mari they build on this manner. They heape together bundles of twigges, three furlongs in length and breadth, and aboue on them is made a square plaine, three sides thereof are vpright, the fourth is made slope, and the bending-wife, theie by to get vp: thither they bring euerie yeere an hundred and fiftie Waines of twigges to supply the waste of them. Vnderneath this worke is erected an old iron sword, and this is their Image of Mari, to which they offer yeerely sacrifices, both of other cattell and of horses: and more to this blade then to other gods. Of their captiues they offer one of an hundred, but after another manner. For after they haue offered wine on their heads, they kill them by a certaine vessell, and after lifting them vpon that their heape or Temple, they embrew the Sword-god with the blood. This they doe aboue: beneath in the Temple they cut off all the right shoulders of the slaine men, and hurle them vp in the aire together with the hands; wherefoeuer the hand shall fall, there it lieth, and the dead bodie apart. When they haue performed all their solemnities, they depart, Swine are io odious to them, that they will haue none of them nourished in their Countiee.

Scythian Temples.

There are among them Diuiners, whose Rites are these. They bring great bundles of willow twigs, which they lay on the ground, and vntie, and laying them asunder one by one, diuine. Some of them practise diuination with the leaues of the Tei-tree, which they fold

and vnfold in their hands. The King, when at any time hee falleth sicke, sendeth for three choice men of those Diuiners; who for the most part name some man vnto him, which hath forsworne himselfe, hauing sworne by the Kings Throne, an oath vsed of the Scythians: presently the man is brought forth, who, if he denieth what their art hath accused him of, the King sendeth for twice the number of Diuiners: and if they by new practise of their art find him guiltie, his head is cut off, and the first Diuiners share his goods: but if they shall absolue him, more Diuiners are sent for; and if the most of them doe absolue him, then those three first are thus done to death. They lade a waine with twigs, and binding the Diuiners hand and foot, and stopping their mouthes, cast them into the waines, and set all on fire, burning Oxen; waine, and men together, vnlesse some of the Oxen by the burning of their harness escape. This punishment inflict they on their false prophets. They make their leagues with other Nations in this sort. They powre wine into a great bowle, mixing therewith the blood of them which ioine in league, cutting some part of the body with a knife or sword; and then dip in that bowle or mazer a sword, arrowes, an axe, a dart, and after curse themselves with many words, last of all drinking the wine. Nicephorus & Gregoras relateth the Scythian Customes and Expeditions, and their contempt of gold and ignorance of the vse of it. These on the one side, and the Christians on the other, forced the Turkes, which were also a kind of Scythians, to settle themselves as they could, in the parts of Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Assyria, where they left there owne, and learned the Rites and Customes of the Mahumetans. The Kings are buried amongst the Gerrbi, with many ceremonies, carrying the dead bodie through all the Countries ouer which hee reigned, which cut and shauet themselves; and with him is buried his best beloued Paramour, his Cup-bearer, Cooke, Master of his horse, Waiter, Messenger, Horses, and the first fruits of all other things, and also golden Cups: and then they cast on earth, making a verie great hill.

When the yeere is gone about, they take fiftie of his principall attendants, which are not slaues, but freeborne Scythians, and strangle them with so many horses of the best, and fasten the dead men on the dead horses with much solemnitie. But to relate all the particulars hereof, and their burials also of priuate men (whose dead bodies are carried about fortie daies, from one friend to another, entertained euerie where with feasts, &c.) would be too tedious. He that would haue a sight of these things, let him resort to Thomas Porcacchi his Euerall Amichei, where these things are not onely discoursed in words, but described in artificiall pictures.

The Scythians so faine hate forraine Rites and Religions, that Anacharsis, a Scythian Philosopher, hauing travelled through a great part of the world, and vowed to the mother of the gods, if he returned home in safetie, that he would sacrifice to her, with such Rites as hee had seene obserued in Cyzicus: in the performance of his vow, was slaine by King Saulius.

Soyles also being King of the Scythians, when he brought in forraine Rites, and obserued the mad Bacchanal solemnities, which hee had seene among the Greekes, lost both his Kingdome and life. They cut off the noses of men, and imprinted pictures in the flesh of women, whom they ouercame: and generally their Customes of war were bloudie: what man couer the Scythian first taketh, he drinketh his blood: hee offereth to the King all the heads of the men he hath slaine in battaile: otherwise he may not share in the spoiles: the skins of their crownes slayed off, they hang at their horse-bridles: their skins they vse to flay for napkins and other vses, and some, for cloathing. Once a yeere the chiefe men haue a solemnitie amongst them, in which they powre wine into a Mazer, of which none may drinke, which hath not slaine an enemy.

These Customes were generall to the Scythians in Europe and Asia (for which cause Scythianum facinora patrare, grew into a Prouerbe of immane crueltie, and their Land was iustly called Barbarous): others were more speciall and peculiar to particular Nations Scythian.

§. III.

Of particular Nations in Scythia, their Acts and Rites.

THE barbarous & crueltie of the Scythians, the sea confining was called Euxinum by the contrarie, as the furies were called Eumenides, saith Ammianus, because they sacrificed strangers to Diana, whom they worshipped vnder the name of Orfioche, and hanged vp their heads on the walles of their Temples. The Ile Lenae, neere to Taurica, was dedicated to Achilles, where none of his deuout worshippers durst abide in the night-time; for none might spend the night on shoare without danger of his life. Arriannus in his Periplus (or sailing about) of the Euxine Sea, speaketh of this land, and the deuotions therein performed to Achilles and Patroclus: that certaine birds keepe the Temple watering and sweeping the same with their wings, and the Goats which feed in the Ile there present themselves for sacrifice, when the price is first paid at the Altar to the contentment of that Deitie, or Diuell, whose illusion (if not others collusion) it must needs bee: But because this land adioyneth to Europe, I must forbear these things till another time. He also describeth the Nations, both in Asia and Europe, which about round about that Sea. Jornandes bringeth these Scythians bordering from Scanzia (so hee calleth that Peninsula, which others name, Basilis, Scandia, Scandinauia, &c. Wherein are the Kingdomes of Sweden, Gothland and Norway) and attributeth to the Goths those warres, which the Egyptians and Persians are said to haue made against the Scythians. Neere to Mæotis King Filimer planted himselfe and his followers; in Dacia, Thracia and Mæzia Zamolxes, who was also a great Philosopher. These and the rest were not only a terrour to the skirts of Asia, but to the heart of Africa and Europa, in proceesse of time sacking Rome, and shaking that Roman Monarchy almost to the ground. Simocatta in his Mauritan History giueth the preeminence of Martiall valour, amongst the many many Scythian Nations to the ABARES. Chaganus the Scythian King, sent Embassadors to Mauritius, with an Epistle, wherein he sheweth himselfe Governour of seuen Nations, and Lord of the seuen Climates of the world. He conquered the Abdels or Nepthalites, the Abares (some of which fled to Tangast to the Turkes) and the Ogor-Nation which dwell by the Riuer Til (or Volga) whose ancient Princes were called War, and Chunnai. He conquered also the Prince of Colch, in which wee hee slew three hundred thousand people, their carcases lying scattered foure daies iourney. Hee subdued also the Turkes at the hill Icar, which is foure hundred miles distant from the golden Mountaine: so they call a mountaine in the East, because of the fertilitie and store of cattell therein: which alwayes the greatest Chagan amongst the Turkes possesseth. For Chagan is nota proper name, but a Princely title, which in those parts, and the Countries adioyning is still continued: the Tartars calling their Princes Chan (which some perhaps falsely, write Cham) and the Persians and Turkes still vsing that title. These Turkes vaunted themselves neuer subiect to Earth-quakes or Pestilence. They call their Priest Tasfar, that is, the Sonne of God. Their Religion I haue before mentioned. They haue a custome that the males neuer weare gold. This Citie was diuided by a streame, which sometimes separated two disagreeing Nations, no lesse distinguished by their disioyned mindes and differing habites, the one wearing blacke, the other red. This Citie, they say, was built by Alexander, when hee had overcome the Sogdians and Bactrians. The Kings wiues shining with Jewels, are carryed in golden Chariots, each drawne with one Bull, the bridles embossed with gold. The Prince (as is said elsewhere) spent the night with seuen hundred women. Fame attributeth another Citie, nor faire hence, to Alexander, called Chubdan. The Prince thereof being dead, his wiues in blacke, with shau'n heads, continually mourne, and may neuer forsake the Sepulchre. These haue many Elephants, and traffique with the Indians which dwell Northwards, and make Silke. Thus much I thought worth the adding out of Simocatta, for better knowledge both of the Turkish and of the Tartarian Historie, as well as of the Scythian.

The MASSAGETAE, famous for the ouerthrow of Cyrus, esteeme the Sunne alone for God, and offer vnto him a horse. They haue one wife to each man, and yet euerie one vseth also his Neighbors wife openly, hanging meane while his quieter on the Waine or Cart: The best death, and most happy amongst them is, when they are become old, to be cut in pieces, and to be eaten together with sheeps flesh: if hee dye naturally, they burie him in the earth, as dying a base and beastly death. Their weapons are of brasse, their furniture of gold, of both which they haue much store, little of yron and siluer. The BACTRIANS, when they were old or worne with sicknesse, cast their Parents to Dogs, which they kept for this purpose, and called Beryll Dogs. The Bactrian women are pompous, riding in great state, and lye with their seruants, and with strangers. They haue among them Brachmanes; Zoroastres the Bactrian is accounted first author of the Magi, and of liberal Arts: hee liued twenty yeeres in a wilderness with cheefe: but others account this another Zoroastres.

The SACAE sometimes made neerer, sometimes further inuasions: they possessed Bactria, and a great part of Armenia, which after of them was called Sacafena, and proceeded vnto Cappadocia, where, in the midst of their feastings, being in the night surprised by the Persians, and slaine, they left their name Saca or Sacca, to a yeerely solemnitie among the Persians, in memory of this victory. Of the Saca, some hold our Saxons to be descended. Dionysius in his Greeke verses giueth them the highest praise for shooting of all others.

The AMAZONS, of whom is before related, are said to be descended of the Scythians, who vnder the conduct of Phisus and Scolopribus, settled themselves by the Riuer Thermodon, and possessed the field of Themisocra: But when they continued to spoile the adioyning Countrey, Countries, they were by secret conspiacie of those people destroyed. Their wives became Warriors both in defence and offence, and did great acts vnder their two Queenes, Marthesia and Lampedo: after, Obera and Antiope the daughter of Marthesia, in the time of Hercules, reigned: then Penthesilea, who in the Trojan warres was slaine. Yet the reliques of that Nation continued vntill Antibia or Thalestris, in Alexanders time; and by degrees ware out altogether. One of their Queenes instituted the sacrifice to Mars and Diana, called Tauropotamus, saith Diadorus ¹, who addeth that they liued not without men, but that they put the men to domestike drudgeries, and exercised the women in the field. Yet doth hee no lesse then Strabo make doubt of these Amazonian, or Vnimammian Nation ²; and no lesse of the HYPERBOREAN, which hee thus relateth out of Hecateus, that they dwell in an Iland in the Ocean neere vnto the Pole, in which Latona was borne, and Apollo was most of all worshipped; and that the Ilanders generally are Apolloes Priests, euery day chanting Hymnes in his praise: they haue also a huge Grove, and a round Temple dedicated to Apollo, to whom their Citie is sacred. These and other things fable they of the Hyperborei, to which Salinus ³ addeth many other, of the clemencie of the ayre, of the innocencie of the men, of their freedome from sicknes, and voluntarie seeking for death in the fumes of daies (after they haue made metrie, casting themselves from a certaine Rocke into the Sea) all these pleasures concurring notwithstanding; things contrarie both to Truth and Nature, except with Gorgopis ⁴ wee turned some parts, at least of this Historie into an Allegorie. He yet historically interpreteth, that they which placed the Hyperborei beyond the Armaspi, these beyond the Issedones, and those also beyond the Scythians, and these againe beyond the Cimmerians, intended the European Scythians, or inhabitants about Mauris, the Liunionians and Muscouites, the Issedones to be in Scandia, and all alongst those frozen or Icy Seas, as hee prooueth by Etymologie of the word: North-East, and East wards from these in the continent of Asia hee placeth the Armaspi, and in the continent of America Mexicana hee seateth the Hyperborei: They which list to haue recoutse to his learned discourses of this argument, Porcacchi ⁵ telleth of some Scythians, which hanged their dead on trees (as the Colchi of old, and some Tartarians are still reported to do) esteeming it a disgrace to be buried in the earth. The Taurici buried with their Kings some of their best friends. The Darbices ⁶ feasted with the flesh of their kinsmen, which were seuentie yeeres old: the women at that age they strangled, and after buried. The Caspians straitly imprisoned such as attained to that age, and their famished them. Some say they laid them amongst the woods, and obserued what became of them; esteeming them (as is said before of the Persians) highly honoured, and next to a canonizing, whom the Birds tare with their talons. In the next degree of happinesse, whom Dogs or wilde beasts praied on: but beneath all disasters and disaduentures, which could find neither the one nor the other, to become vnto them such enemies. The Tibareni crucifie those old men, which they haue best loued. The Hervies being sicke or old, were placed by their kindred on a pile of wood, and there by another, which was not of that kinne, slaine with a dagger, who being descended, the pile was fired. His wife was forced to hang her selfe, or else to abide perpetuall infamie. But I am loth to burie you in these buriall Rites.

The Scythians punished no fault more seuerely then theft. They would make themselves drunken with the Imoake of hearbs burnt in the fire. They sware by the Kings Throne, by their Sword, and by the Wind. When they had sacked Athens, and piled a heape of bookes to the fire, which others had compiled with tedious paines, one of the companie disswaded burning of them lest that the Greekes neglecting the Muses, would become Marriall. They doubled their numbers at foure, as we doe at ten, through vnskillfulnesse in numbring.

Of the Seres.

WE might proceed further in these cold Scythian narrations, if the deepe Snowes, long Desarts, beastly Men, and man-kind beasts, Men-eaters, and other monstrous aduentures in the way, did not make it both perplexed and dangerous. Leaving therefore these horrid and vnknown Nations: the first ciuill Countie Eastward is the Seres, the quietest and mildest of men, fleeing the commerce and traffique with other Nations; bartering yet with such Nations as resort to them, not valuing wares by words, but by their eyes. Among them is reported to be neither Thiefe nor Whore, nor in her purgation, nor Hailes, nor Pestilence, nor such like plagues. A woman after conception, or euerie one is iudge to himselfe of that which is right. They tell, that they liue two hundred

with their Pristine Rights.

He names of Scythia and Sarmatia, are now together with those Nations swallowed vp and drowned in that Tartarian deluge, which about foure hundred yeeres since, with a sudden torrent ouerwhelmed the greatest part of Asia; that we speake not of Europe, the heart whereof, quaked and trembled with feare of this Tempest. From Rome did Pope * Innocent the fourth send Embassadors, by entreaties to preuent their Armes, when as they had already ouerrunne (besides those Countreys which still beare their name) Russia, Polonia, Silesia, Morauia, Hungaria, euen as farre as Austria. So farre was the huge vnwealdie Empire of Alexander, or of the Romans, short of the Tartarian greatnesse, that the expedition of some one of the Subiects of this Empire, hath pierced as farre into the West, as euer Alexander into the East, and that happily among more resolute courages, then the Persians or Indians, effeminated with wealth and Peace, could afford: and Tamerlane alone some ages after (if we credit that Historie of his life, translated out of the Arabike) subdued and obtayned more (besides his owne inheritance) then all that which the Romanes had atchieued in that eight hundred yeeres and vpwards, wherein their Empire was growing to the full: but of him afterwards.

Of the beginning of the Tartarian Nation.

He name Tartar is proper to a Riuer in Mongull, from whence it was deriued to the people inhabiting nere the same, which after gaue both name and lawes to lo great a part of the world. For thus writeth Ioannes de Plano Carpini, which was sent Embassador to the Tartarian Court, from Pope Innocent, Anno 1246. There is a Countrey in the East part of the world called Mongol; which had sometimes foure sort of Inhabitants: Teka-Mongol, that is, the great Mongols; Sumorgul, that is, water-Mongols; these called themselves * Tartars, of a Riuer which runneth thorow their Countrey, named Tartar: the third Merkas, the fourth Meitris. These all were alike in person and language, but diuided amongst themselves into feuerall Prouinces, and vnto feuerall Princes. In the land of Teka-Mongol, was * Cingis, who began to bee a mightie hunter before the Lord: for he learned to steale men. He ranged into other Countreys, taking as many captiues as he could, and ioyned them vnto himselfe. Also he allured the men of his owne Countrey vnto him, who followed him as their Ring-leader to doe mischief. Then began he to warre vpon the Sumorgols or Tartars, and slew their Captayne, and after many conflicts subdued them to himselfe, and brought them all into bondage. Afterward he vled their helpe against the Merkas, whom also he vanquished in battell. Proceeding from thence, hee fought against the Meitris, and vanquished them also. Naimani hearing that Cingis was thus exalted, greatly disdayned thereat: for they had a great and mighty Emperour, vnto whom all the fore-

Howbeit, being yong and foolish, they knew not how to gouerne the people; but were diuided, and fell at variance among themselves. These inuaded Cingis his Countrey, putting the Inhabitants to the sword, but were after ouerthrowne by the Mongols, and either slaine or made captiues.

Some fetch the Tartarian pedigree from the ten Tribes of Israel, which Salmanasar carryed captiues: and in their Maps place hords of Danites, Nephthalites, &c. in the furrhest Northerly and Easterly bounds of Asia; which yecare a great part of the world, not only from Media (whither those people were conueyed) but from any part of the Assyrian Empire. (The King of Tabor, or Tybur, in these parts, is said to haue come into France, to Francis the French King about the yere 1540. and was after at Mantua by Charles the Emperor burned, for secret sollicitation of him and other Christian Princes to Iudasme.) And Oymecrus reporteth of that their journey passing therow Euphrates, miraculously staying his streame (to wonder at the vanitie of Writers) when they went into a Region called Asiarich, which was a yecare and a halfes trauell, there to keepe their Law; where neuer before had bene any habitation. But these things haue small probabilitie.

M. Paulus (who with his Father and Vncle liued many yeceres in the Court of the great Chan, about three hundred yeceres since) saith, that they dwelled at fist (if such wandering may be so called) in the North, where they had no Lord ouer them, but payed tribute to a great Signor (these called Uncam, and here in these Countries Presbyter Iohn) to whom they payed the tenth of their beasts. But this Uncam, or Presbyter Iohn fearing their numbers eury where multiplying, deuised to disperse them through the World: which the Tartars perceiuing, with ioynt consent forsooke their former habitation, and departed thence farre off into the North, denying further tribute vnto Uncam.

After they had there continued a certayne time, they chose to their King about the yere 1162. one which was called Cingis Can, who ruled them with such modestie and iustice, that they loued and feared him as a god, his fame reducing all the other Tartars in other parts vnder his obedience. He thus strengthened, wearie of those desarts, commanded them to arme themselves with bowes, and other weapons, and began to inuade and conquer Cities and Prouinces to his subiection, the principall inhabitants whereof hee carryed with him, kindly entercaying them, leauing such discrette Gouvernours in the same, that the people were secured in their persons and goods. When he had thus subdued about nine Prouinces, he sent his Embassador to Uncam, to demand his daughter in marriage: which Uncam with much indignation and many threatnings denying, Cingis assembling his forces, marched against him, and by the way enquired of his Astrologers and Diuiners touching his successe. They taking a greene reed, cleft it a funder, placing the parts thereof a good distance one from another, and writ vpon the one the name of Uncam, and Cingis on the other; telling the King, that whiles they were reading their coniuring charmes, these reeds would fight together, and the victory should remaine with him whose reede got the better: which accordingly came to passe in the fight of the Armie: Cingis his reed overcoming the other, as after Cingis himselfe did Uncam, whom he slew in the field, and possessed his daughter and state, wherein he continued fixe yeceres conquering Cities and Kingdomes, and at last was wounded at a Castle called Thaigin, in the knee, whereof he dyed, and was buried in Mount Altay.

The next Emperour (after his account) was Cin Can; the third, Baythm Can; the fourth, Allan the brother of Mangu; Esfu Can, the fifth; Mongu Can, the sixth; the seauenth Cublai Can, who not only inherited what the former had conquered; but in the sixtieth yecere of his raigne subdued in a manner the rest of (those parts of) the World. The word Can signifies Emperour. Wherefoewer these Emperours dye, they are buried in Altay aforesayd; they which carry him killing all they meete within the way, bidding them goe to the other world to serue their Emperour. For this end they also slay the best horses, to serue their dead Lord in another world. When Mangu Can was buried, there were more then ten thousand men slaine by the Souldiers which conueyed him. In this Historie of M. Paul, obserue that this Catalogue of Emperours is vnfound: for W. de Rubrquis in Bathy time, was at the Court of Mangu Can, to whom Bathy was subiect. Occoday is left out, and Esfu put in. The cause of this error seemeth to bee, the giuing of this name Can to the chiefe Dukes, as Bathy, &c. and the want of exact written Chronicles in those times amongst them.

P. II.

The great Exploits of CINGIS or CANGIVS the first Tartarian Emperor.

E Or further light into this Historie, I thinke it not amisse to set downe what Haithon or Anthony the Armenian hath written of the Tartarian beginnings. This our Author was Royally descended in Armenia, where hee liued about three hundred yeeres since, and at the request of Pope Clement the first, writ the History of the Tartars, from Cingis or Cangius till Mango Can, taken out of the Tartarian Histories: the rest he partly saw with his eyes, and partly learned of his Vnckle, an eye-witnesse of the same, who had attended on Haithon the Armenian King, in the great Can Court. The Country where the Tartars first dwelt (saith m Haithon) is 'beyond the Mount Belgian, where they liued like beasts, hauing neither letters, nor Faith, nor Habitation, nor Souldierie, nor reputation among their Neighbour-Nations. There were of them diuers Nations, called by one common name Mogls, which were diuided into seuen principall Tribes, whose names were Tartar, Tangut, Cunat, Talair, Sonie, Monghi, Tebeth. These all being subiects to their Neighbours, a poore old man being a Smith (who, as they beleue, was ingendred of the Sun beames) saw in his sleepe an armed man on a white horse, which said vnto him, O Cangius, The will of the Immortall God is, that thou bee the Gouverneur of the Tartarians, and Ruler of the seuen Nations, to free them from their bondage and tribute. This his vision, when he reported to others, they would not beleue him, vntill that the night following, the chiefe men amongst themselves saw the same man, with command from the immortall God, to yeeld obedience vnto Cangius. This they performed with all reuerence, and spred in the midst of them a black felt, with a seat thereon, on which the seuen Princes or chiefe men placed Cangius, calling him Can, that is, Emperor, and kneeled before him. This happily was then the most sumptuous Throne their State could afford, but continued in the Royall inuelture of their succeeding Soueraignes, their exceeding Riches and Conquests notwithstanding; at two of which solemnities (saith our Author) I my selfe haue bene present. Cangius thus intronized on his felt, commanded them many things: first, to beleue the immortall God; and from thence forwards, the Tartars began to call vpon the name of the immortall God, seeking for his ayde in all their enterprises: secondly, hee commanded to make a generall view of all such as were able to beare armes, appointing Captaines ouer tens, ouer thousands, and ouer ten thousands, which made a full Regiment. Hee commanded also those seuen principall heads of their Tribe, to becaue themselves of their dignities; and for further triall of their obedience, each of them to bring thither his eldest sonne, and to cut off his head, each with his owne hand: which they refused not to doe, in reuerence to that diuine ordinance, whereby hee was made their Soueraigne. Cangius hauing thus made tryall of their fidelitie, subdued many Nations: and one day hauing his horse slaine in battell vnder him, was forsaken of his Tartars, dispayring his recoverie after they saw him fall, and might easily haue bene slaine, had not his enemies through ignorance neglected him, to pursue the rest: which Cangius perceiuing, conueyed himselfe into a thicket of shrubs; and when his enemies returned to despoile the dead, an Owle came and sate on the shrub, vnder which Cangius was hidden, which caused them not to suspect any to lurke there, and so they departed. He the next night fled to his people; who seeing him, and hearing the order of his escape, gaue thanks to the immortall God, who by means of that Bird had preserved him. They also had (after this) that Owle in such reuerence, that it is accounted a happy thing to weare one of her feathers on their heads. Cangius afterwards assaulling his enemies, brought vnder, both them, and all the Countries on that side of Belgian. The exact time of these things Haithon could not learne, notwithstanding his much enquiry: which he imputeth to their want of letters at that time.

These Countries thus conquered, the armed man appeared to him the second time, and commanded him in the name of the immortall God to passe the Mountayne Belgian, and goe towards the West, where he should conquer Kingdomes, Signories and Lands. And that thou mayest be assured that this is the will of God, arise and goe with thy people towards the Mountayne, to that part which ioyneth on the Sea: There thou shalt dismount, and turne thee toward the East, and kneeling downe nine times, shalt worship the immortall God, and he which is Almighty shall shew thee the way by which thou mayest commodiously passe. Cangius presently commands his people with their wives and families to accompany him in this enterprise; and when they were come to the Sea, forgot not with his followers to performe those nine worshippes, and staying there that night in his prayers, the next day day hee saw that the Sea had gone nine foot backe from the Mountayne, and left a spacious way, by which they all their substance passed Westward. Hence it is that the Tartars ascribe some happinesse to the number of nine, and hee that will offer a present to any Tartarian Signor, must offer nine things, which custome they vse in their tributes vnto this day, as Master lenkinson found by experience to his cost. Cingis after many adventures, and many lawes which of him were called Iasack Cangus Can, hauing stift perswaded his twelue sons (wherein I thinke his nephewes were also reckoned) to concord, bidding each of them to bring him an arrow, which together, none of them, a slander, the least of them might easily breake; hee dyed.

This Historie of Cingis or Cangis, I haue thus fully related, for knowledge both of the beginnings of their State and Religion: and if these Visions seeme fabulous, yet might Cingis in his subtilty deale with them, as Mabomet with his Arabians, or Numa with the Romans; the one making Gabriel, the other Ageria, Authors of their policies: and what hee in past pretended, might by Fame and Time be augmented. Although I see not, but that this History of Cingis may as well be credited, as that of Alexander in Iosephus, to whom appeared once in the habite of the Iewish High Priest, commanding him to vndertake that enterprise, with promise of assistance; for which cause, he whom the World worshipped as a King, and as a God, did worship, & himseife prostrate before Iadus the High Priest. And the same Author also saith, that the Pamphylian Sea did ded it selfe to giue way vnto his Macedonian Souldiers, hauing no other way to destroy the Empire of the Persians.

Religion.

To retorne to our Fryer with whom we began; he reporteth that Cingis, after his victory against the Naimani, waited vpon the Kyrtayans, where hee was ouerthrowne, and all the Nobles, except Ieu, flaine. Hauing breathed himselfe a while at home, hee inuaded the Huyri, a Christian people of the Nestorian Sect, whom they ouer-came, and receiued of them Letters, of which before they were ignorant. After them, he subdued the Satour, Karanites, and Hudait. This done, hee waged warre against the Kyrtayans or Cathayans, whose Emperour he shut vp into his chiefe Citie, where Cingis besieged him, till that Victuall fayling in his Campe, hee commanded that they should eat euery tenth man of the Atmie. They of the Citie fought valiantly with Engines, Darts, Arrowes: and when Stones wanted, they threw Siluer, especially molten siluer. But by vnder-mining the Tartars made way from the Arme into the midst of the Citie, where they issued vp, and opened the gates by force, and slew the Citizens. This is the first time that the Emperour of the Kathayans being vanquished, Cingis Chans obtained the Empire. The men of Kaytay are Pagens, hauing a speciall kind of writing by themselves, and, as it is reported, the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament. They haue also recorded in Histories the liues of their fore-fathers, and they haue Eremites, and certayne houses made after the maner of our Churches, which in those dayes they greatly resorted vnto. They say, that they haue diuers Saints also, and they worship one God. They adore and reuerence Christ Iesus our Lord, and beleue the Article of eternall life, but are not baptiz'd. They doe also honorably esteeme and reuerence our Scriptures. They loue Christians, and bestow much almes, and are a very courteous and gentle people. They haue no beards, and they agree partly with the Mongals in the disposition of their countenance. There are not better Artificers in the world. Their Countrey is exceeding rich in Corne, Wine, Gold, Silke, and other commodities. Of their writing, Fryer Bacon, from the Relations of W. Rubruguis, which liued in his time, and Rubruguis himselfe (as in the Manuscript thereof appeareth) testifie that it was done with pencils and in characters: as the Chinois and Iaponites still vse. The Iugres write from the top to the bottome of the page, and from the left hand to the right: the men of Tebeth as wee doe: those of Tangut from the right hand to the left, but multiply their lines vpwards. The Cathayans (saith Rubruguis) are little men, and speake thorow the nose. They are good artificers, the sonne succeeding in the fathers trade. Their Physicians deale with hearbes, but not with vinctes. There were amongst them Nestorians, who had a Bishop residing in Segni. Their bookes were in Syriack: themselves ignorant of that tongue. They were drunkards, vsurers, and some of them had many wiues. They washed their lower parts when they entred their Churches: they feast and eat flesh on Fridayes, as the Saracens. Their Bishop visits them scarce once in fiftie yeeres. And then all their Males, euen infants also, are ordred Priests. The Idolaters amongst them are more moderate, some of which wear yellow broad cowles: some are Eremites, and leade an austere life in woods and hills. Cathaya had not then any vines, but they made drinke of Rife, where with they also tooke a kinde of Apes, which would drinke themselves drunken with that pleasant liquor: out of whose neckes they tooke the blood where with they died purple.

After the cor quell of Cathay, Cyngis sent his sonne Thossut Can (for so they termed him also) against the people of Comania, whom hee vanquished. Another sonne he sent against the

the Indians, who subdued India Minor. These Indians are the blacke Saracens^u, which are also called Æthiopiens. Thence hee marched to fight against Christians, dwelling in India Maior, whose King was commonly called Presbyter Iohn, who by a stratageme repelled them out of his dominion. In travelling homewards, the said Armie of the Mongals came vnto the Land of Buihathbeth, the inhabitants whereof are Pagans, and conquered the people in battaile. This people haue a strange custome: When any mans father dieth, hee assemblith all his kindred, and they eat him. They haue no beards, but with an iron instrument plucke out the haire, if any grow. Cyngis himselfe went vnto the Land of Kergis, which they then conquered not. And in his returne home his people suffered extreme famine: and by chance finding the fresh entrailles of a beast, they cast away the dung, sod it; and brought it before Cyngis, and did eate thereof. Hereupon Cyngis enacted, That neither the blood, nor the entrailles, nor any other part of a beast, which might bee eaten, should be cast away, saue onely the dung. Hee was afterward slaine by a thunderclap, leaving behind him foure sonnes; the first Occoday, the second Thosius Can, the third Thinday, the name of the fourth is not knowne.

of OCCODAY the next Emperour, and CVINE CAN.

CYNGIS being dead, Occoday was chosen Emperour. He sent Duke Bathy his nephew, the sonne of Thosius Can, against the Countrey of Altisoldan, and the people called Bisermi, who were Saracens, but spake the Language of Comania, whom hee subdued. Thence they marched against Orna, a Port Towne on the River Don, where were many Gazarians, Alsiens, Russians, and Saracens, which he drowned with the River running thorow the Citie, turning it out of the channell. Thence they passed into Russia, and made foule haucke there, destroying Kiou, the chiefe Citie. They proceeded against the Hungarians and Polonians, and in their returne invaded the Mordians, being Pagans, and conquered them in battaile. Then they marched against the people called Bykri, or Bulgaria magna, and viterly wasted the Countrey. From hence they proceeded towards the North against the people called Bisurci, or Hungaria magna, and having conquered them, subdued also the Parositz and Samogetæ, thence proceeding vnto the Ocean Sea.

Tut. imp.

At the same time Occoday sent Cerpodan against Kergis, who subdued them in battaile. These are Pagans, having no beards at all. They haue a custome, when any of their fathers die, in token of lamentation, to draw (as it were) a Leather thong ouerthwart their faces, from one eare to the other. Hence hee marched with his forces Southward against the Armenians, which they conquered, with part of Georgia, receiuing tribute of the other part; and from thence into the Dominions of the mightie Soldan, called Deurum, whom they vanquished in fight. And to be short, they went on further, sackng and conquering euen vnto the Soldan of Aleppo, whose Countreies they subdued. They marched against the Caliph of Baldach, and exacted at his hands the daily tribute of foure hundred Byzantines, besides Baldakines, and other gifts. Thus farre of their Conquests out of Frier Iohn aforesaid, who was in person with Bathy, or Baydo, and at the Court of Cvine the Emperour.

The Kergis.

Haitbon calleth Baydo the second sonne of Occoday, or Hoecota Can, affirming, That hee sent his three sonnes, Iochi into the West, as farre as Tygris; Baydo towards the North: and Chagenday towards the South. Hee sent also one Baydo (whither the same, or another) with thirte thousand horse, against the Soldan of the Turks, whose Realme hee subdued in the yeere 1244. He adde, That Baydo having conquered Cumania, (which hee conqueit on the East with the Corsimians, on the West with the Euxine, on the North with Cassia, haply Casan, on the South with the Riuer Etel) he subdued Russia, Gazaria, Bulgaria, and so passing into Austria, following the streame of his victories, in the passage of a great streame was there drowned. His heires succeeded him in the places which he had conquered; which Seignorie Tochay possessed in Haitbons time. This Historie of Baydo his death is not likely: For Tuo of Narbona, in an Epistle to the Archbishop of Burdeaux, recorded by Math. Paris in the yeere 1243. saith, That in the same present summer they had departed out of Hungarie, and laid siege to Neustar, wherein this Tuo then was; and in the yeere 1246. Frier Iohn was with the said Baydo, who also rehearseth that Hungarian Expedition, and his returne vnto those parts about Volga, or Etil. Likewise William de Rubruquis, a Frier Minorite, was sent to Baith (so he calleth him) from Leues the French King, in Anno 1253.

And to this agreeeth Marbrian & Muchou in his Sarmatian Historie, who witnesseth, That in the yeere 1241. the Tartars, vader Bathu, came into Russia, and destroyed Kiou, a Citie be- fore stately and beautifull, having in it three hundred Churches and more, very faire, of which some remaine to this day among the shrubs and briars, receptacles for wilde beasts. It was the Seat of the Metropolitian, who had vader him many Bishops thorow Moldavia, Valachia, Russia, and Muscovia. Hee sent Peta into Polonia, who destroyed the Countrey, and on Ashwednesday turned Cracovia into ashes, abandoned before both of the Prince and People; and after ouerthrew Duke Henrie, and other Noblemen, with the forces of the Countrie assembled against them, together with Pompo, the great Master of the Dutch Order in Prussia: in which battaile, a certaine Tartarian Standard-bearer, carrying in a great Standard the Greeke letter X, and on the top of the staffe a blacke and terrible Image, with a long beard, began^b with incantment strongly to shake the head of the Image: whereupon a smoake and cloud of intolerable stinke was presently dispersed over the Polonians, and they became hardesse and vnable to fight. Duke Henrie, and Duke Boleslaus, and Pompo, with the flower of their Nobility, were heere slaine, and the Countrie miserably spoiled. From hence they went into Moravia, where they put all to fire and sword more then a moneth to- gether: and thence to Hungary to Bathy, who entered Hungarie with 50000. souldiers; where first ouerthrowing those forces which King Bela had sent to prohibite them passage, they ster chased the King himselfe, with the power of his Kingdome opposing himselfe against them, out of the field, who fled into Austria, and after into Sclauonia, leaving his Countrey a prey to the Tartars: who making spoile on that side of Danubius, the next Winter passed over the River, then frozen, and filled all with blood and slaughter; Bathy sent Cadan to pursue the King into Sclauonia, still fleeing before him, who wasted Bosnia, Sceria, and Bulgaria. And after two yeeres sackage in Hungarie, they passed by the fennes of Mæotis into Tartaria, and happily had returned to make fresh spoiles in Europe, if the Embassage of Pope Innocent had not diuerted their purpose: or rather, that Oecaday their great Chan being about that time poisoned, they were to expect a new Commission from his successor, who was Guine; who when he was installed, even in the presence of Fryer Lohn, the Popes Legat, erected a Banner against all Kingdomes of the Christians, except they would bee sub- ject to him: for their intent was to subdue all the world, as Cynus Chan had ordained; and the superscription of his Seale was God in Heauen, and Guine Chan upon Earth, the strength of God, the Seale of the Emperour of all men. Hee kept his Court vually in the land of Nays- mans, the plaines whereof were extended like to the Sea, without the rising of any hill. The cold most eager and sharpe till March, little winde, nor snow, except in the end of Aprill. At Caracorum Rubrugus met with an English man borne in Hungaria, which was expert in many languages; his name was Basilus. Heere hee found two Mosches and one Church.

BUT Guine in short time after died; and left the Empire to Mangu Can; to whom Aytous the Armenian King went voluntarily in person, about the yeere 1257. and receiuing gracious entertainment, made vnto him seuen petitionous: first, That he and his people should become Christians; secondly, That there should be perpetual peace betwene the Tartars and Christians; thirdly, That in all Countreies conquered by the Tartars, the Churches and Clergie-men of the Christians should bee free from tribute and tribute: fourthly, That hee would redeeme the Holy Sepulchre and the Holy Land from the Saracens: fifthly, That hee would destroy the Caliph of Baldack: sixthly, That himselfe might haue aid, as neede should require, in his defence, of such Tartars as were neere vnto Armenia: seventhly, That such parts of Armenia as the Saracens now possessed, and the Tartars should recover from them, might returne to the Crowne of Armenia. Mangu Can answered, after deliberation with his Nobles, to the first, That himselfe would bee a Christian, and perswade other his subiects, but force none thereunto: and to the rest in order, that his requests in all should be fulfilled, and to that end hee would send his brother Haslan Chanceller of Armenia, and all his household, and many Nobles of both sexes. But before Ierusalem could be recovered, Mangu died, and Cobila, or Cublai Can succeeded, in whole time *M. Of the Tartarian Succession to our dayes.

Fier ^a Cublai Can succeeded Tamor Can, sonne to Cingis, the eldest sonne of Cublai : in whose time Hauibon (which then liued) saith, That there were besides, three great Tartarian Princes, but subiect to the great Can : Chapar, which ruled in Turkestan, who was able to bring into the field foure hundred thousand Horsemen armed : Hotchray, in the Kingdome of Cumania, who was able to arme six hundred thousand horsemen to the wars, but not so resolute as the former, Carbanda, the third, ruled in Tauris, able to assemble an Army of three hundred thousand Horse, well provided. And all these liued in the Westerne bounds of the Tartarian Empire, euerie way inferior in wealth and numbers to the Southerly and Easterly parts thereof.

Tarik Mercond a Persian, in his Catalogue of the Cans or Tartarian Emperours, calleth Cublai, by a transposition of the syllables, Ulaku. For thus doth hee recite their names, with the yeeres of their coronations. Chinguis in the yeere of the Hegira 602. Otkay Khaon 626. Gayuk Khaon 643. Manchu Khaon 644. Ulaky Khaon 657. Haykay Khaon 663. Hamed Khan or Nicudar Oglan 680. Argon Khan 683. Ganiyar Khan 690. Edukhay Khan 693. Gazankhan 694. Alyaptukhan 703. Sulton Aburayd Babader Khan 716. These from Cublai or Ulaky, are the Cans or Vice-royes of Persia and those parts adioyning, and not the great Cans themselves. But of these and of Tamerlane and his issue, wee haue before related at large, in the fourth Persian Dynastie. I haue seene the transcript of a letter sent by King Edward the Second, written 1307. in the first yeere of his reigne, October 16. to Dionysius King of the Tartars, against Mahomet, and in behalfe of William Liddesstis Episcopus and others to preach to his people. But these Tartars it seemeth were of the neerer Mahumetans, and not the great Can of Cathay.

Since Tamor Can, we haue not so continued a Historie of their Empire and Emperours as before, and yet wee haue had succeeding testimonies a long time of their State and Magnificence, but neither so diligent obseruers, nor so exact Writers as the former : besides that, their Histories seeme in some things more fabulous. Of this later sort are Odoricus ^b, a Friar, which liued three yeeres in the Emperours Court, and travelled as farre as Quinfa, who died in the yeere 1331. Sir Iohn Mandeuille ^c our Country-man spent many yeere in those Countries, a few yeeres after Odoricus, and writ the Historie of his Trauels, in the reigne of Edward the third of England ; Echians Can being then Emperour of the Tartars in which, if many things seeme not worthy credit, yet are they such as Odoricus, or some others, not of the worst Authors had before committed to writing, and haply by others after his time, in those dayes when Printing wanted, fished into his booke. Once, hee setteth downe the distances, and passages of Countries so exactly, as I thinke he could not then haue learned, but by his owne Trauels. After his time ^d Nicholo di Conis, a Venetian, travelled thorow India and Cathay, after twentie five yeeres returning home : and going to Eugenius the fourth, then Pope, to bee absolved, because hee had denied the Christian Faith to save his life, his enioyned penance was, truly to relate to Poggius the Popes Secretarie his long peregrination : This was in the yeere 1444. About the same time ^e Iosafa Barbara, a Venetian, in the yeere 1436. had learned of a Tartarian Embassadour (which had bene at Cambalu, and returning by Tana, was entertained of the said Iosafa) some particulars touching the great Cham and Cathay, some part whereof he heard after confirmed by the mouth of Uspan-cas-fau, the mightie Persian King, in the yeere 1474. So that from the yeere 1446. thus farre we haue continued succession of the Cathayan Historie, besides that which an Arabian ^f hath written in this Historie of Tamerlane, now extant in English.

§. II.

The question discussed whether Cathay be the same with China.

ARE the more curious in naming these Authors, lest any should thinke that which is written of this people to bee fabulous (all these, in a manner, concurring in the most substantiall things) and because many confound the Countries and affaires of China and Cathay. The cause of both which opinions may bee, because that in these last hundred yeeres and more, in which more of the World, then euer before hath been discovered, yet nothing of moment is found out of this Countre or People. Whereunto may bee answered, That since, diuers of the great Tartarian Lords, before subiects to the great Cham, hauing made themselves absolute Lords of their feuerall States, the way hath not bin so open to passe, being otherwise of it selfe exceedingly both long, difficult, and dangerous: and the adioyning Princes recouering themselves from Tartarian seruitude, will neither suffer their owne to goe out, nor others freely to enter their Dominions; as the Muscouite, the King of China, and others. Master Ant. I. Senkison, which went as farre thither ward as Bogharre, could not passe further for warres in those parts. Neither haue any gone thither by Sea. And yet euen in this time wee haue not altogether wanted witnesses. Ludovicus Verulamianus, an hundred yeeres since, in Bengala, met with diuers Christians, who affirmed, That there were in their Countrie diuers Signiors, Christians, subiect to the great Cham. These were whitemen, of a Citie called Satsau. In M. Hakluyts 1 painefull labours we may reade of diuers passages out of Russia and Persia by Carauans into Cathay. Ramusius also, in his Annotations before M. Paulus, telleth of one Chaggi Memet, a Persian Merchant, who had bene at Campion and Succur in Catay (Damircas then reigning) and had acquainted him with diuers particulars thereof.

Also in the Epistle of Emanuel Carnalus, a Iesuite, dated at Malacca in Ianuarie, 1599, is contained the transcript of Ierome Xauerius his letter from Lahor, the Citie Royall of the great Mogor, dated August. 1598. Wherein the Iesuit relateth, That whiles he was in conference with the Prince, there entred into the Palace an olde man of Mahomety Religion, threescore yeeres of age, who affirmed to the Prince, That hee had come from Xatai by the way of Mecca. Presently some which knew him, affirmed, That hee had distributed in almes an hundred thousand peeces of gold at Mecca. The Prince asking if it were so, hee affirmed, That hee did it because he was old, and could not long liue, nor carrie those things away with him. Being demanded of the State of Xatai, he answered, That hee had there liued threescore yeeres in the Citie Royall, Ximbalu, the King whereof was verie mightie, and had in his Empire a thousand and fiftie Cities, some of them verie populous. He said, hee had often sene the King, with whom no man speaketh but by a supplication, nor is answered but by an Eunuch. Being asked how hee had access thither, he answered, That hee sustained the person as well of the Embassadour of the King of Caygar, as of a Merchant; and being detained in the first City by the Magistrate, he shewed his Commission, and post was presently sent to the King who returned in a moeth, riding nintie or an hundred miles a day, with change of Horses, bringing him letters of admission. No man was troublesome to him in the way. They punish theues severely (which also is obserued of the Cathayans in Iosapha Barbaro, and in Marcus Paulus afore said.) The people hee affirmed were white, comely, long-bearded, and very personable. In Religion hee said they were Isauites (or Christians, professors of Iesus) and some among them Mulauites, or Iewes, and many Mahumetans, who hoped to draw the King, being a Christian, to their Sect. The Iesuit addeth, That hee further conferred with him another day about their Religion, who told him, that they had many Churches, and some very great many Images, both painted and carued, especially of the Crucifixe, which they religiously worship. Euerie Church hath his Priest much reuerenced. The Priests liued single, and kept Schooles, wherein they instructed the youth, which should after take Orders: they had also one among the Priests supereminent, and were all maintained at the Kings costs, as were the Churches also both built and repaired. They wore blacke clothes, and on Holy-dayes, red; with Caps much like the Iesuites, but greater. He added, That hee had often sene the King go to Church: That there were many of both Sexes, which in Cloysters liued a Monasticall life, some obseruing also a single life in their owne houses. He reported, That the Countrie was rich, and had in many Mines of Silver: the King had foure hundred Elephants, which they said were brought from Malacca. And from Pegu also hee said, that Merchants resorted thither, which voyage was halfe a yeere (it seemeth throw the Sea betweene China and Japan.) Xauerius addeth, That while he was at Caximir, he heard of many Christians in Rebat, a Kingdome ioyning to Xatai, who had Churches, Priests, and Bishops, to whom hee had written three wayes in the Portugall and the Persian Tongues.

The greatest objection against this History, that distinguisheth Cathay from China, is the report of Jacob Pantogia ^o, a I-fuite, in a letter dated in Paquin, the Seate Royall of China, in March 1602, in which hee blameth a double error of our Maps, both for making China larger then it is, and for adjoyning to the same this questioned Kingdome of Cathay, whereas (saith he) China, or Sina, is Cathay, and this Paquin, where now wee live, is Cambalu. This hee proueth by the incredible riches which he here saw, agreeing to that which is commonly reported of Cathay, and by the testimonie of certaine Moores and Mahumetans, whom he found in Paquin, which usually, euery fifth yeece, resort hither vnder shew of an Embassage, and paying of Tribute; indeed for gaine, by way of traffique: (their tribute meane while obtaining sufficient retribution out of the Kings Coffers, who sustineth them) and theirs, all the time of their abode in China, at his owne costs, besides other gifts.) Of these Merchants, which resorted hither out of Persia and the Countrie of the Mogores, the Iesuites by enquiry learned, that this Countrie of China was called Cathay, and had no other name in Persia, and among the Mogores, nor did they know any other Countrie so called. And asking further, how they called the Citie Paquin, they answered, Cambalu: hereupon the Iesuit concluded without all scruple, as is said. And againe, in the Chinian Epistles, dated 1607, it is reported, That Benedictus Goes (sent sixe yeeeres after of the Iesuites by the way Mogor to finde out Cathay) remained in the borders of China, in the Province of Xanti, from whence he writ, Anno 1606. That he could finde no other Catay, then the Kingdome of China. This report furthereth Pantogias opinion.

But if it be not sufficient to oppose the former report of Xavier, to these of Pantogia and Goes, and the different qualities of the Chinians and Cathayans (as in their proper place, shall follow) both in things priuate and publike, Diuine and Humane; I answer, That the name of Cambalu is by Marcus Paulus ^r and others interpreted, The Citie of the Prince, or Cam. And Perera ^f interpreteth Pachin, or Paquin, where the King of China alwaies resideth, to signify the Towne of the Kingdome; as he was there aduertised, the same signification (in manner) remaining to the diuers appellations in differing languages, as a common name to be applied to any Citie Royall.

Now for custome of both, whereas in China theues and malefactors are seldome executed (and none hath power to execute any, without speciall Commission from the King) but either they die by stripes, hunger, or imprisonment, except some few once in a yeece: Marcus Paulus and Iesusa Barbara, from the relation of eye-witnesses affirme, That in Cambalu was such sudden and rigorous execution of Iustice, that one taking a iatte of Milke from a womans head, and beginning to drinke, vpon the womans out-cry was apprehended, and presently with a sword cut in sunder, that the bloud and milke issued together; a Tartarian Embassador affirming both this, and that he had seene the like execution vpon another, for taking a peece of Bayes from a woman, so chopped in twaine. But the relation of the Chinian and Cathayan differing Rites will further yeeld scruples in this case. As for the name of Cathay, ascribed to China by the Moores, I answer, That William de Rubrignis ^x, who was in the Court of Mangu Can, supposeth Cathay to be Serica Regio described by Ptolemy farre more Northerly, then the Iesuite reporteth China to bee, by his owne Astronomicall obseruation. And to these Seres ^y Ptolemy ioyneth the Sina, or Chinois, on the South, and our later Geographers generally concur in this opinion. Hee also which readeth Joannes de Plano Carpini shall finde, that the Tartars conquered the Kara-Kitai, or blacke Cathayans, and then the Emperour of Kithai, be yndermining his Citie, as is said, in the daies of Cyngis; and yet a great part of Kitai remained still vnconquered, and withstood his forces; and namely that part which is neerest the Sea, and this wealthy countrie of great Cathay hath many Prouinces, the more part whereof doe yet withstand the Moals or Tartars (it is the last Printed period in William de Rubrignis). I hence gather that the name Kitai was applied to a great part of the North-East of Asia, happily no lesse generally to many Regions on that side, then India to the Southerly parts. And why may not the name of Cathay, as well by the Mogores and Persians, bee giuen to the North parts of China (one parcell of the North-East of Asia) as the name of India, not onely to so great a part of Asia, but to America also, which was called India, because the first Discoueuers thought they had encountered the Indian Continent? And these parts of China, may much sifter retain the name of Cathay, to which Empire it had so long been subiect, and by the Cathayan conquest was first knowne to our world. Since my first Edition I met with the other part of Rubrignis, which Master Hakluyt (then whom I know none in this kind more industrious) copied out of an entire booke in the Librarie of Bennet Colledge in Cambridge. Wee betwene Cataya and India he placeth a Sea; which fitly agreeth to the Chinian Map, made by the Chinois themselves, who paint a great Bay or Gulfe of the Sea betwixt the Northern parts of China, which we reckon to Cathai, and the Southerne which may be accounted to India.

India. Further, hee addeth, That all the Nations of Great Cathaya (which Epithete is not a little to bee observed) are situate amongst the Caucasian hills, on the North side, euen to the Easterne Sea.

But they knew no countrie else so named! True; for the Lawes of the Cathayans forbidding egress of the Natiues and ingresse of Aliens, and a more forcible law of Mountains and Delarts, wilde beasts, and wilder men; the manifold smaller and more beggerly Segnities betweene, euerie one challenging their ninth (if not themselves confiscating, or theirs robbing all) now in so long a space, may burie euen the name and knowledge of the Great Cen, whereas neither Armies of Princes, nor traffique of Subiects can open any new, or retaine the olde notice of Nations. What dreames did the Welt conceiue of the East in Asia, and South in Africke, till the Armies first, and Merchants after, of the Carthaginians, Macedonians, and Romanes discovered them? And yet how did those fouds of barbarous people afterwards drowne with barbarous ignorance the knowledge of all Atts, and this of Geographic amongst the rest? And till the Tartarians, like a terrible thunder-clap, with the lightning and noyle of their Armies, brought a more sudden then welcome knowledge of themselves to the world, who euer in Persia or Assyria had heard of their names, or of diuers people else (and these Cathayans among the rest) first knowne by their conquests? Further the Iesuite himselfe, to Paquin ascribeth iust fortie degrees: and Marcus Paulus his Father and Vncle went from Boghar (the altitude whereof Master Ienkyson ^d at his being there, obserued to be thirtie nine degrees and ten minutes: or as Abisfada Ismael ^c placeth it, thirtie nine and an halfe, North, and North-East to goe into Cathay. The like course did the same men hold going into Cathay, from Armenia afterwardest with Marcus ^e himselfe, f sempre alla volta di Graco & Tramontana; whereas a course directly East, or inclining to the South, must haue beene taken, if China had beene Cathay. Neither is it likely that their iourney would haue beene so much letted by Frosts and Snowes. The same may be gathered out of the discourses following in Marcus Paulus, ^g where he abuteth the countries in succeeding linkes to Cathay, from the East to the Northwards, and from the North-East declining Westward in reckoning from thence. And whereas Pantegia raiseth the most Northerly part of China but to fortie two degrees at the most, wherein, as to an eye-witnesse wee yeeld him credit: How can it stand with reason, how can it be likely that in those temperate climes, the world can yeeld but a few Nations, and those base Moores and Ethnikes, when as a good part of Spaine, halfe Italy, Greece, all France, Germanie, and Hungarie (to omit other worthy parts of the world) are subiect to the same parallels? And indeed herein Pantegia hath well helped vs, whereas our moderne Maps haue caused no small scruple to a diligent obseruer, in placing Cathay, a countrie reported to bee so fertile and ciuill in so Northerly a clime, very indiscreetly ^h raising Cambalu to the height of sixtie degrees, and paralelling Cathay with Norwey; which cannot stand with other things thereof reported, howsoever the Tartars themselves were happily of a more Northerly climate then this mentioned. Others go not so farre, yet they place Cambalu too farre within land, which Paulus saith is within two dayes iourney of the Sea. It seemeth that now this great Tartarian Prince (if there be any such) hath no strength at Sea, and therefore is lesse knowne. And herein participate other great and mightie Princes, Prester Iohn (so called) of Aethiopia in Africa, and the Sopis, and great Mogor, in Asia, ranked iustly amongst the greatest Emperours of the world: who hauing some part of their Dominion adioyning to the Sea, make little or no vse thereof. Abisfada Ismael a Syrian Prince, who wrote an exact Geographic in Arabike about ⁱ three hundred yeeres since, placeth Cambalu in 144. 8. Long, and 35. 25. Latit. it may happily bee 45. degrees in Latitude, one Figure being falsified, or else inuerred for 55. And as this Latitude disagreeeth from that of Paquin, so the Longitude a great deale more: this confirming this opinion further, that Chaggi Memet, Mar. Polo, Mandenic, Odoricus, Nicolo di Conti, and others, eye-witnesse, speake of China, or Mangi, and of Cathay, as diuers Countreies.

And Farfor King of Mangi ^k possessed his Countreies, now knowne by the name of China, in peace, till An. 1269. being counted a richer Countrey then Cathay it selfe, which was conquered before, if wee vnderstand it properly: and Cambalu seemeth to bee the Citie wherein Cingis the first Cham besieged and tooke the Cathayan Emperour. Paulus also mentioneth among the greatest Cities of Mangi, Panghin, and Nanghin, reporting further that Mangi alone had in it a thousand and two hundred great, rich, and illustrious Cities (as much as is reported of whole China, and more) and that after Cublai Can had conquered that State, he diuided it into nine tributarie Kingdomes, gouerned by so many Vice-royes vnder him: And these Cities bee fortified with Garriisons, not of the Naturall inhabitants, but of Cathay. And these things are reported by him, who long liued in these parts, & non interstus solum sed etiam presens, & quorum pars magna fuit, possessing the place of Gouernour

The names of China haue often altered, and so we may thinke of Cathay that sometimes more generally it is now restrained by the Satacens (the only travellers into these parts of China where they trade.

in those parts, Lord of great Cities, which are also rich and fortified, hauling Printing, Ordinance, and other ciuill Arts, as in China, may appeare by the Persian Chaghi Memar his journey into these Countries, related by himselfe to Ramusio. Goe from Casul in nine daies came to the Northerne parts, those famous walls of China: but Memar travelled from Casul fiftene daies to Succur; fise daies further to Gauta, and then fixe to Campion, not mentioning any wall or impediment from the Chinois. These Cities hee placeth in Tanguth, which Paulus also doth, more Northerly the China or Cathay: both of them mentioning the plentie of Rhenbarb, which draweth Merchants thither from farre. Marcus Paulus calleth Tanguth a great Prouince, containing many Prouinces and Cities; himselfe hauing liued at Campion a whole yeere. The Emperour raigning (about seuentie yeeres since) Memar calls Damircan, this last syllable vually being annexed to all Princes names in those parts: and calls him the Grand Can, affirming that Succur and Campion, were but the beginning of his Estate, and his frontire Townes towards the Mahumetans: his people being Idolaters: Now, Tanguth was neuer that I know, by any reckoned either to Cathay (in proper signification) or China. And therefore still wee may beleuee, that there is a Great Can (though little in comparision of those times, when all Asia was in manner subiect to them) still holding some Northerly and worse parts of Cathay, with Tanguth and other better Countries, and perhaps another Cambala too (this being a name appellatiue) though the King of China be Lord of the best parts of Cathay (of the world) which will be more apparrant by the Relation of this ensuing iourney, through a great part of the Tartarian Prouinces on the West of China, here for the Rudius Geographic inserted out of Ricci and Trigautius their Relations of China published Ann. 1615. touched before out of the Iesuites Epistles.

ð. III.

The long and dangerous Iourney from LAHOR, a Citie of the Great Mo go ð to CHINA, by BENEDICTVS GOES.

Xpon the Relations of that Mahometan, before mentioned out of Xauerus his Letter, Pimenta the Father Visitor of the Iesuites sent notice thereof into Europe to the Pope and Spaniard. They hearing of so mightie a Nation Christian, the Viceroy of India was commanded to follow Pimenta's directions, who employed Benedictus Goes a Portugall Iesuite in that Expedition, furnished as an Armenian Merchant, changing his name to Abdula Isar, this later appellation signifying a Christian. Thus obtaining the Great Mogol Achabar his Letters Patents to his Viceroyes and neighbour Princes, accompanied with one Isaac an Armenian, he departed from Lahor the sixth of January 1603. Buerie yeere there is a Carrauan of Merchants which passe out of these parts into the Kingdom of Cascar, about fise hundred together, for their better defence against Robbers. With these adioyning himselfe, in a moneths trauell hee came to Athee in the same Prouince of Lahor. After passage of a river and some stay, hee came after two moneths to Passar: thence travelling to a small Towne, they met with a certaine Heremite, who told them that thirte daies thence was the Citie Capheristum, in which no Saracen was permitted entrance, but Ethioikes may enter except in to their Temples. Hee tasted also of their wine, of which the countrie is fertile. They goe to their Temples in blacke. Here where they met this Heremite, they stayed twentie daies, and were faine to hire foure hundred Souldiers of the Gouernour for their defence. In twentie fise daies they trauelled from hence to Ghideli, the Merchants travelling armed on the toppes of hilles, the carriages at the bottome, to prevent thees who vie from those toppes to stone the Trauellers. They were yet assaulted and many wounded by these Robbers. After twenty dayes more, they came to Cabul where they stayed eight moneths. At this place there hapned into their compny the sister of Mahamet Can King of Cascar, by whose countrie they were to passe towards Cathay. Shee was called Agebare, Age being an honourable title annexed to her name for her Pilgrimage to Mecca (from which place shee had now returned) who being in some want borrowed six hundred Ducats in Merchandize of Goes, which shee repayed after in most fitting Marchandize for Cathay; namely, a kind of Marble (they call it Isasper, the Chinois Tusce) which is of two sorts, one taken out of the bottome of the River Cotan by such as Diue for it, as they doe for Pearles, it is like to great Flintes: the other manner, drawne forth of the Mountaine called Confangui Caslio. The solitariness of the place distant from Catan twentie dayes, and the hardness of the stone, which they mollifie with fire ouer the place, make it costly; the Merchants which buy this Priuiledge of the King, carrying with them a yeeres prouision for their Labourers. From Cabul they went to Cascar, where the Mogors Patents (which

After five dayes stay they passed in twentie dayes our exceeding high mountaines to the Region of Aingharan, and fiftene dayes after to Calcia, where the people resemble the Hollanders. Ten dayes being past, they came to Giallabath, where the Bramenes exact custome, granted them by King Bramarat. Fiftene dayes after they came to Talhan, where by ciuill broyles they were stayd a moneth, the Calcians being in rebellion. Thence they trauelled to Cheman, vnder Abdullahan King of Samorhan, Burgaulia, and Bacharate, and other confining Kingdomes, where the Calcians robbed them of great part of their goods: In eight dayes trouble-some trauell they came to Badascian, where they were againe fledged: neyther were they free at Ciarcianur their next resting, from whence in ten dayes they came to Serpanill, a desert place, and twentie dayes after to Sarcil a countrey full of villages. Two dayes iourney from this place they came to Ciecclith a hill couered with snow, where in sixe dayes trauell, many of the company perished with cold. Thence they attained to Tanghetar in the Kingdome of Cascar, and in fiftene dayes more to Iaconich; which iourney was so irksome that Goes lost five horses. He went from hence to Hiarchan the royall City of Cascar in Nouember, 1603, a Mart famous for concourse of Merchants and variety of Marchandize. He presented the King with a Watch, a looking glasse, and other European gifts, obtayning his letters patents for furtherance of his iourney.

From hence hee went with the Carauan Bassa or Captaine (which buyes this place at a deare rate of the King) about the middelt of Nouember 1604, to Iolci, Hancialix alceghet, Hagabateh Egriar, Mesetelec, Thalec, Horma, Thoanac, Mingrieda, Capetacol, Zilan, Sarc Gubedall, Canbasai, Aconferlec, Ciacor. Aclu, in twentie five dayes, a very tedious way by stones and sands. In this iourney they passed the desert of Caracathay. Thence they trauelled to Otograch Gazo, Caschani, Delsai, Sargabedal, Vgan, and Cucia. And after a moneths stay here, in twentie five dayes more to Calis, gouerned by the King of Cascars base sonne: with whom at first he had some difference about Religion, which with a gift was pacified. And in a disputation with the Mahumetan Doctors before him, the Viceroy tooke part with Goes, affirming that the Christians were the true Musermans, and that their Ancesters professed that law: a thing worthy by the way to be obserued. Here hee met with some Merchants returning from Cathay, which could tell him of Reesi and the other Iesuites at Paquin, as before you heard out of Pantogia. And here first did he learne, that China was Carhay. At his departing from Calis, the Viceroy gaue him his letters of passe, and inscribed him a Christian according to his desire, whereat a Mahumetan Priest much wondered, affirming that theirs with the Region shifted also their Religion.

In twenty dayes they came to Pucian, thence to Turphan a fortified Citie: thence to Aramuth, and so to Camul, the last City of this Kingdome of Calis. In nine dayes they passed from Camul to the Northerne walles of China, where they stayed twenty five dayes, expecting the Viceroyes answer to their admission, at a place called Chicaucou. And then being entred the walles, they came in one dayes iourney to the Citie Socieh. All the space betwene Calis and the borders of China, is subiect to the out-rides of the Tartars; the cause that Merchants trauell in great feare, in the day time, looking not whether the coast be cleare, and traulling the night with great silence and secrecie. They found many Saracens slaine in the way. The countrey people they seldom kill, but rob of their cattell: as for corne and rice, they hold it food for beasts, and not for men, feeding on flesh, and liuing about an hundred yeeres. The Saracens in these parts are effeminate, and might easily be subdued by the Chinois if they would. On the West parts of China is that Wall before mentioned to exclude the Tartars: and two fortified Cities with strong Garrisons, hauing their proper Viceroy and other Magistrates, Canceu the head City of the Province Sencsi; and Socieh, which is diuided into two parts, one of which is inhabited by Saracens, which trade here for Merchandize, the other by Chinois, whom the Saracens heere call Cathayans. Euerie night the Saracens are enclosed in their owne Citie, in other things as the Chinois, subiect to the same Lawes and Magistrates. Neyther may any forrigner retune into his countrey which hath stayed there nine yeeres. Euerie sixth yeere, twenty two Legates come after an olde custome to pay a kind of tribute to the King: this but a shew; the intent being to enrich themselves (as is sayd) with Merchandize, being maintained in respect of that pretence at the Kings Charge. Into Socieh Goes came at the end of the yeere, 1605, and here met with other Saracens returning from Paquin, which told him of the Iesuites there residing, adding that the King did not tell, but powred out of a measure a dayly allowance of money to them; which I mention, to shew that a man must bee sparing of credite to Saracen Trauelers and Merchants. But Goes could not a long time certifie these his fellowes of this actual, being ignorant of their China names, and it was foure monethes iourney to Paquin from Socie;

ce; & the force of Winter is there very great: yet did they send in that vnseasonable season one of their Conuersers a Chinoise called Ioannes Ferdinandus, who, after a tedious iourney found Ozer then lying on his death-bed, when hee brought him the letters from the Societie. Eleuen dayes after, he dyed, not without suspition of poyson, giuen him by the Saracens, who had also before deuised by the way many shifts to make themselves Masters of his goods; they haue likewise a custome, that if any dye by the way, his goods are shared amongst the rest. Here did the Saracens offer to seize all into their hands; but Ferdinandus professed himselfe his Nephew, (borne of a Chins Mother) and with much a doe, eating Swines flesh together with the Armean, in token they were not Saracens, obtayned that little which was left of Ozer his substance, scarcely enough to pay charges: yet this and all the other tedious circumstances of this long Narration, I haue thus largely related, for the instruction of Geographers and Merchants of these parts, desirous to know or trade those Countreys, the knowledge whereof I thinke no European else hath learned by experience in some hundreds of yeeres last past. His Companion the Armean was sent from Paquin to Macao, and thence to India, and being taken by Hollanders in the way at Singapura, was redeemed by the Portugals, and returned to Caul, where he yet liues, as Trigantius our Authour affirmeth. But it is high time for vs to take view of our Tartarian Religion.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Religion of the Tartars, and Catbayans.

63. 47. Hist. 10. 13

They beleeeue that there is one God, the maker of all things visible and inuisible, the Authour of good things and punishments, yet do they not worship him with prayers, prayles, or any certaine rites. They haue also Idols of Felt, in the fashion of a man, and the same they set on both sides of their Tent-doores, and vnder them they put a thing of Felt fashioned like a Dogge. These they account the keepers of their Cattell, Authors of their Milke and young store, Others they make of Silke, and doe them much honour. Some place them in a faire Chariot couered, before the doore of their station; and whosoever stealeh any thing out of that Chariot is slaine without all pity. Their Captaines haue one away in the middelt of their Tent. To these Idols they offer the first fruits of their Milke: and the first morsels of their meate, and first draught of their drinke, at meales. And when they kill a beest, they offer the heart to their Idoll, leauing it before him till the morning, and then they take and eat it. They make an Idoll also to their chiefe Emperour, and offer thereunto with great solemnitie, as well other creatures as horses, which none after dare ride on till death. They breake not a bone of the beafts which they kill for meate, but burne them with fire. They bend themselves to this Idoll towards the South, as to a God. They worship the Sunne, Lights, and Fire; Water also, and the Earth, offering thereunto the first of their meates and drinkes, and in the morning before they eat or drinke. They haue no set rites prescribed by Law, nor doe they compell any to deny their Religion simply: although in some of their customes they are very rigorous. Thus they martyred Michael Duke of Russia, because he refused to doe reuerence to the Image of Cingis Can. which had beene their first Emperour: and compelled the younger brother of Anden Duke of Saruoglein Russia, to marrie his said brothers wife according to their custome, after that they had slaine her former Husband.

They haue certaine traditions, according to which they reckon these things following to bee sinnes. To thrust a knife into the fire, or any way touch the fire with a knife, or with their knife to take flesh out of the Cauldron, or to hew with an hatchet nere to the fire. For they thinke that they should so cut away the head of the fire. They account it sinne also to leane on the whip wherewith they beate their horses (for they ride not with spurs.) Also to touch arrows with a whip, to take or kill young Birds, to strike an horse with the zaine of their bridle, and to breake one bone against another. Likewise to powre out meate, milke, or any kinde of drinke, vpon the ground: or to make water within their Tabernacle, which whosoever doth willingly, is slaine: but otherwise he must pay a great summe of money to the Inchanter to bee purified: who causeth the Tabernacle, with all things therein, to passe betweene two fires. Besides, if any hath a morsell giuen him which hee is not able to swallow, and for that cause casteth it out of his mouth, there is an hole made vnder his Tabernacle, by which hee is drawne forth, and slaine without all compassion. Likewise whosoever treads vpon the threshold of any of the Dukes Tabernacles, hee is put to death. Thus are these Gnats strained, when as hostile inuasions, murder, and such other Camefts, are easily easily amongst them swallowed. They thinke that after death they shall live in another world, and there multiply their cattell, eat, drinke, and doe other actions of life. At a new Moone, or a full Moone, they begin all new enterprises. They call her the great Emperour, and bow their knees, and pray thereto. The Sunne they say is the Moones mother, because shee hath thence her light.

Their Sorceries.

They are giuen to Diuinations, Auguries, Sooth-sayings, Witchcrafts, Inchantments : and when they receiue answer from the Deuill, they attribute the same vnto God, whom they call Issga, and the Comanians call him Chan, that is, Emperour, whom they maruellously feare and reuerence, offering to him many Oblations, and the first fruits of their meate and drinke. According to his answere they dispose all things. They beleue that all things are purged by fire : therefore when any Embassadors, Princes, or other personages whatsoever, come vnto them, they and their gifts must passe betwene two fires to bee purified, lest peraduenture they haue practised some Witchcraft, or haue brought some poyson or other mischief with them. And if fire fall from heauen vpon men or beasts, which there often happeneth ; or if they thinke themselves any way defiled or vncleane, they thus are purified by their Inchantments. If any be sicke, a speare is set vp in his Tent with blacke felt welct about it, and from thenceforth, no stranger entereth therein. For none of them which are present at his death, may enter the hord of any Duke or Emperour, till a New-Moone. When he is dead, if he be a chiefe man, he is buried in the field where pleaseth him. And he is buried with his Tent, sitting in the midst thereof, with a Table set before him, and a platter full of meate, and a Cup of Mares-milke. There is also buried with him a Mare and Colt, a Horse with bridle and saddle : and they eat another Horse, whose bones the women burne for the soule of the dead, stuffing his hide with straw, setting it aloft on two or foure poles, that he may haue in the other world a Tabernacle and other things fitting for his vse. They burie his gold and siluer with him : the Chariot or Cart in which hee is carried forth is broken, his Tent is destroyed, neither is it lawful to name his name, till the third generation. They obserue also other Funerall Rites, too long to rehearse. They lament their dead thirte dayes, more or lesse. Their Parents, and those of their family are thus cleansed : They make two fires, and pitch neere thereunto two Speates, with a line from the top of the one to the other, fastening on the same line some pieces of Buckram, vnder which, and betwixt the fires, passe the Men, Beasts, and Tents. There stand also two women ; one on this side, the other on that, casting water, and repeating certaine charmes : if any thing fall, or be broken, the Iachauters haue it. And if any be slaine of Thunder, the men in the Tent must thus be cleansed, and all things in the Tent, being otherwise reputed vncleane, and not to be touched. No man more obedient to their Lords then the Tartars. They seldom contend in words, neuer in deeds. They are reasonably courteous one to another : their women are chaste ; adulterie is seldom heard of, and theft is rare, both punished by death. Drunkenesse common, but without brawles among themselves, or discredit among others. They are proud, greedie, deceitfull. They eat Dogs, Wolves, Foxes, Horses, and in necessitie, mans flesh, Mice, and other filth, and that in as filthy a manner, without Clothes, and Napkins (their Bootes and the Grasse can serue to wipe their greasie hands :) they haue no bread, Hearn, Wine, Meate, or Beere, nor doe they wash their dishes. It is a great sinne amongst them to suffer any of their food to be lost : and therefore they will not bestow a bone on a Dogge, till they haue eaten the marrow.

1st Vincent del. Spec. lib. 1. v. 4. c. 51. & 52.

Two Narbonensis in an Epistle recited by Mat. Paris Anno 1243, reporteth the confession of an Englishman, which was taken with other Tartars by the Christians. Hee saith, that they called by the Name of Gods, the ancient founders and fathers of their Tribes, and at set times did solemnize feasts vnto them, many of them being particular, and but foure onely general. They thinke that all things are created for themselves alone. They be hardy and strong in the breast, leane and pale-faced, rough and huf-shouldred, hauing flat and short noses, long and sharpe chimes, their vpper jawes low and declining, their teeth long and thin, their eye-browes extending from their foreheades downe to their noses, their eyes inconsistent and blacke, their thighs thicke, and legges short, yet equall to vs in stature. They are excellent Archers. Vnquished, they aske no fauour ; and vanquishing, they shew no compassion. They all perfit as one man in their purpose of subduing the whole world.

Their proud swelling titles appeare in the Copies of those Letters of Duke Baithmy and Cuin Can, expressed by Vincenius. One of them beginneth thus : By the precept of the liuing GOD, CINGIS CHAN, Sonne of the sweet and worshipfull GOD, saith, that GOD is high above all, the immortal GOD, and vpon Earth CINGIS CHAN onely Lord, &c. These Letters of the Emperour, the Tartars called the Letters of GOD : & so beginneth Duke Baithmy to the Pope, who had sent Frier Aselline, with Alexander, Abericus, & Simon, thither in Embassage. The word of BATO N O Y, sent by the diuine disposition of CHAN, know this O Pope, &c.

Frier

Frier Iohn, * saith he, stiles himselfe, The power of God, and Emperour of all men: and hath in his Scale ingrauen words of like effect, as is alreadie shewed. Mandevill y hath the same report.

Will. de Rubruguis * saith, that they haue diuided Scythia amongst them, from Danubius to the Sunne rising, euery Captaine knowing the bounds of his pastures which they feed: in the Winter descending Southwards, ascending in the Summer Northwards. Their houses are moueable, remoued on great Carts which containe twentie foot betwene the wheeles; their houses on each side ouer-reaching fise foot, drawne by about twenty Oxen. When they take them downe, they turne the doore alwaies to the South. Ouer the Masters head is an Image of Felt, called the Masters brothers; and another ouer the head of the good wife or Milkes, called her brother, fastened to the wall; and betwixt both of them is a little leane one, which is the keeper of the whole house. Shee hath also at her beds feet a Kids skin, filled with wooll, and a little Image looking towards the Maidens and Women. Next to the doore on the Womens side (which is the East, as the mans side is on the West) there is an Image with a Cowes Vdder for the Women, whose office it is to milke the Kine: on the other side another with a Mares Vdder for the Men. When they make merie, they sprinkle their drinke vpon these Images in order, beginning at the Masters. Then goeth a seruant out of the house with a cup full of drinke, sprinkling thrice toward the South, and bowing the knee at euery time: and this is done for the honour of the Fire. Then performeth he the like superstition toward the East for the honour of the Ayre: next to the West for the honour of Water; and lastly, to the North, in the behalfe of the Dead. When the Master holdeth a cup in his hand to drinke, before he tasteth thereof he poureth his part vpon the ground: if he drinketh sitting on horse-backe, he first poureth part thereof on the Mane of the Horse. After the seruant aforesaid hath discharged his cups to the foure quarters of the world, he returneth to the house: and two other seruants stand readie with two cups, and two Basons, to carry drinke vnto their Maister, and that Wife, which lay with him the last night, sitting together on a bed. Their Sooth-sayers or Inchanters are their Priests. To this may be added out of the Manuscript aboue mentioned, their Diuination by three bones, thorough which (being first burned blacke) the Diuiner looks; and if the sight passeth straight and right, it is a good token; but if it be inwardly crooked or broken, he then vpon this euill preeface caeleth from his enterprise. (Master Jankinson trauelled with certaine Tartars, which diuined by the blade-bones of sheepe, sod, and then burnt to powder, which being mingled with the blood of the sheepe, they writ therewith certaine Characters, with diuers words and Ceremonies, and thence diuined of their successe, which they found true to their cost.) They vsed Diuination also by foure swords. Mangu Can desired a conference betwixt the Christians, Saracens, and Idolaters, to see which of them could make best prooffe of his Religion. The Moat Tartars professed to belecue one onely God, the Author of life and death: but as the hand, which is one, hath diuers fingers, so thought he and they, that this one God was pleased with diuers waies of deuotion. Their Priests were diuiners: they were many, but had one Captaine or chiefe Bishop, who alwaies placed his house or tent before that of the great Can, about a stones cast distant. Hee had charge of the Waine which carried the Idols: the other Priests had their places appointed them. Some of them were Astrologers, specially that High-Priest, which foretold the Ecclesies of the Moone. All the people provided them their meat, that they might not go out of their Tents. When an Eclipse happens, they sound their Organs and Timbrels, and make a great noyse: and when it is past they make great feasting, drinking, and mirth. They foretell Holy-dajes, and those which are vnluckie for enterprises. No warres are begun or made without their word. They cause all presents which are sent to the Can to passe through the fire: they purifie the household of the dead by the like rite, which before may not be touched. On the ninth day of May they assemble all the white Mares, and hallow them; at which the Christians must be present with their Censers. They then cast on the ground new * Cosmos, and make a great feast. They foretell the destinies of Infants newly borne: and when one is sicke, they diuine by charmes whether the disease be naturall, or proceed of Sorcerie. They are themselves Witches, Sorcerers, Inuokers of the Deuill: this they doe in the night, setting flesh in the midst of the house readie boile d, vsing charmes, Timbrels, and falling into mad fits are bound. Then comes the Deuill and giues them answers. Thus much Rubruguis.

M. Paulus thus reporteth of their Religion: They say, ^b that there is a God on high in heauen, of whom liking vp their hands, & smiting their teeth three times together, euery day with Censer and Incense they desire health, and vnderstanding. They place a Table aloft in the wall of their house, in the which is written a name, that representeth this god. They haue another, which they call Natigay (or Irogay) of Felt or other stufte in cuerie house. They make him a wife and children, and set his wife on the left hand, and his children before him, which seeme to doe him reverence. This they call the God of earthly things, which keepe their children, beasts, and come: and when they eat they annoint his mouth with the fat, and the mouthe of his wife & children, and then cast out the broth out of the doore vnto other spirits. And when their God hath had his part, they take theirs. Of this Natiggy, they with like Ceremonies of lifting vp their hands, and smiting of their teeth, desire temperature of the ayre, fruits of the earth, children, and such like. Their wives are exceeding chaste and obseruant: and though they be many yet can Rachel and Leah, yea, ten or twentie of them, agree with a marvellous vnton, intent vnto their household, and other businesse, whereby they are gainefull, and not chargeable to their Husbands. When they marry, a Husband couenantheth with the Father of the Maide, who hauing giuen him power to take her wherefoerer he: shall find her, kee seeketh her among some of her friends, where shee hath then of purpose hidden her selfe, and by a kinde of force carrieth her away. They marry with any, except their owne Mother and Sister. Their Widdowes seldome marry, because of their seruice to their former Husbands in another world, except the sonne marrie his fathers wiues, or the brother his brothers, because they can there in the next world be content to resigne them to their former Husbands againe. The women buy, sell, and prouide all necessaries into the house, the men intending nothing but their Armes, Hunting, and Hawking. If one hath buried a Male-child, and another a Female, the Parents contract a marriage betwixt those two, and painting in papers Seruants, Horses, Clothes, and Household, and making writings for the confirmation of the Dower, burne these things in the fire, by the smoke whereof they (in their smokie conceits) imagine all these things to be carried and confirmed to their children in the other world: and the Parents of the two dead parties claime kindred each of other: as if they indeed had married their children while they liued.

In Xemdu did Cublai Can build a stately Palace, encompassing sixteene miles of plaine ground with a wall, wherein are fertile Meddowes, pleasant Springs, delightfull Streames, and all sorts of beasts of chase and game, and in the middelt thereof a sumptuous house of pleasure, which may be removed from place to place. Here hee doth abide in the moneths of Iune, Iuly, and August, on the eight and twentieth day whereof, hee departeth thence to another place to doe sacrifice on this manner: He hath a Heard or Droue of Horses and Mares, about ten thousand, as white as snow; of the milke whereof none may taste, except hee be of the blood of Cingir Can. Yea, the Tartars doe these beasts great reuerence, nor dare any crosse their way, or goe before them. According to the direction of his Astrologers or Magicians, he on the eight and twentieth of August aforelaid, spendeth and poureth forth with his owne hands, the milke of these Mares in the ayre, and on the earth, to giue drinke to the Spirits and Idols which they worship, that they may preserve the men, women, beasts, birds, come, and other things growing on the earth.

These Astrologers, or Necromancers, are in their Art marvellous. When the skie is cloudy and threatneth raine, they will ascend the roofof the Palace of the Grand Can, and cause the raine and tempests to fall round about, without touching the said Palace. These which thus doe, are called Teberb, and Chefmir, two sorts of Idolaters, which delude the people with opinion of their sanctitie, imputing these workes to their dissembled holinesse: and for this cause they goe in filthy and beastly manner, nor caring who seeth them, with dirt on their faces, neuer washing nor combing themselves. And if any bee condemned to death, they take, dresse, and eat him; which they doe not if any die naturally. They are also called Bachsf, that is, of such a Religion or Order; as if one should say a Friar-Precacher, or Minor, and are exceedingly expert in their diuillish Art. They cause that the Bottles in the Hall of the Great Can doe fill the Bowles of their owne accord, which also without mans helpe, passe then paces through the ayre, into the hands of the said Can; and when hee hath drunke, in like sort returne to their place. These Bachsf sometimes resort vnto the Officers, and threaten plagues or other misfortune from their Idols, which to prevent they desire so many Muttons with black heads, and so many pounds of Incense, and Legnum Aloet, to performe their due sacrifices. Which they accordingly receiue and offer on their Feast-day, sprinkling Broth before their Idols. There be of these, great Monasteries, which seeme like a small Citie, in some whereof are two thousand Monkes, which shane their heads and beards, and weare a religious habite, and hallow their Idols Feasts with great solemnitie of Hymnes and Lights. Some of these may bee married. Other there are, called Sensim, an Order which obserueth great abstinence and strictnesse of life, in all their life eating nothing but Bran, which they put in hot water, and let it stand till all the while of the meale beey taken away, and then eat it being thus washed. These worship the Fire, and are condemned of the other for Heretikes, because they worship not their Idols, and will not marry in any case. They are shauen, and weare hempen-garments of black or bright yellow, and al- though they were Silke, yet would they not alter the colour. They sleepe on great Mats, and liue the austere life in the world.

Of their Astrologers in Cambalu were not fewer then five thousand; Christians; Catayans, and Saracens, maintained with food and rayment at the Great Can: charge. These, by their Astrolobe foretell of the change of weather, mortalitie, warres, diseases, &c. And if any enterprise any great worke, he foretelleth vnto them; and telling the house of his Natunitie, by their Art is informed of the successe. They hold the soule to be Immortal, and according to every mans merites in his life, to passe into a more noble creature, till it be desired; or ignobles to a Pellant, and then to a Dogge, and so by degrees to the vilest. They shew much reverence to their Parents, to whom if any bee vngratefull in their necessitie, there is an Office and Officers appointed to trie and punish the offence. In the Emperours Hall none dare spee, but for this purpose carrieth a little vessell to spit in; nor dare any there make any noyse or loud talking. The Tartars were at first very vncharitable to the poore; and would curse them, saying, That if God had loved them, he would haue provided for them; but after the Idolatrous Bachs had commended Almes for a good worke, there was great prouision made for them, and every day at least twentie thousand dishes of Rice, Mill, and Panike, by certaine Officers distributed amongst them. And for this liberalitie they adore him as a God.

China amongst his first Lawes enacted (as saith Vincetius) the punishment of death to bee inflicted vpon offenders in those three vices; which before time had bene most rife amongst them, namely, lying, adulterie, and theft: of which yet towards other men that were not Tartars they made no conscience.

They are great Vsurers, taking ten in the hundred for a moneth, besides vse vpon vse: in so much, that a Souldier (in Georgia, which had borrowed five hundred pieces of coyne, called Tippers, retaining the same five yeeres, was constrained to repay seven thousand. And a Tartarian Lady for seven yeeres vse of fiftie sheepe, demanded seven thousand Tippers. They are so eurious, that though they abound in cattell, they will scarce allow any to their owne expence, while it is sound and good, but if it die, or be sicke. They are addicted to Sodomie or Buggerie. They eat sometimes for necessitie, mans flesh, sometimes to delight themselves, and sometimes to terrifie others, reckoning it a great glorie to haue flaine many, and that by varietie of euill etc. Their heads they shauo from eare to eare, in manner of a Horse's horne; wearing long lockes at their eates and neckes. There bee some of the Tartars, which when they see their fathers grow old and diseased, they giue them fat meates which may choke them; And when they are thus dead, they burne their bodies, reseruing the ashes as a precious Jewell, sprinkling their meates with that powder. But if any thinke not this enough (which I am afraid the most will deeme too much) let him resort to the large reports of Princedide in the three last Bookes, the Author's Testimonie, otherwise fabulous and monstrous; but herein to be beleued, as receiuing his Reports from the eye-witnesses.

Of the festiuall Solemnities, and of the Magnificence of the Grand Can.

We haue already spoken of the solemn sacrifice obserued on the eight and twentieth day of August: we reade in our Author Marcus Paulus, an eye-witness of these his Relations, of other the Grand Cans grand solemnities. Of which, two are principall; one, on his birth-day, which in Cubla Can time was the eight & twentieth of September. On which himselfe was royally clothed in cloth of gold, and twentie thousand of his Barons & Souldiers were all apparelled in one colour, and like (excepting the price) to himselfe; every one hauing a girdle wrought of gold and silver, and a paire of shooes, some of their garments richly set with pearles and jewels, which they wear on the thirteene solemnities, according to the thirteene Moones of the yeere. On this day all the Tartars, and severall Princes subiect, present him with rich gifts, and all sects of Religions pray vnto their gods for his health, and long life.

a Marcus Paulus.

But their chiefe feast is on the first day of their yeere, which they begin in February, celebrated by the Grand Can, and all the Countries subiect to him: in which they are all arrayed in white, a colour in their estimation portending good lucke. And then he is presented with many Clothes and Horses of white colour, and other rich presents, in the same religiously obseruing the number of nine; as nine times nine Horses, if they be able, and so of pieces of Gold, Cloth, and the rest. Then also the Elephants (which are about five thousand) are brought forth in sumptuous furniture; and Camels covered with Silke. And in the morning they present themselves in the Hall as many as can, the rest standing without in their due order. First, those of the Imperiall progenie; next, the Kings, Dukes, and others, in their due place. Then commeth forth a great man or Prelate, which cryeth out with a loud voyce: Bow downe your selves, and worship: which they presently doe, with their faces to the earth. This Prelate addeth, G o d saue and preserve our Lord, long to liue with loy and gladnesse. They all answer: G o d grant it. The Prelate againe: G o d increase his Dominion, and preserve in peace all his subiects, & prosper all things in all his Countreys. Whereunto they answer: as before. Thus doe they worship foure times. After this, the said Prelate goeth to an Altar there, richly adorned: on which is a Red Table, with the name of the Great Can written in it, and a Censer with Incense, which he incenseth in stead of them all, with great reuerence performed vnto the Table. This done, they returne to their places, and present their gifts, and after are feasted.

When Cublai had ouerthrowne Namien his vncle (as before is said), vnderstanding that the Christians obserued their yeerely solemnitie of Easter, hee caused them all to come vnto him, and to bring the Booke of the foure Gospels, which he incensed often with great Ceremonies, devoutly kissing it, and caused his Barons to doe the like. And this he obserueth alway in the principall Feasts of the Christians; as Christmasse and Easter. The like he did in the chiefe Feasts of the Saracens, Jewes, and Idolaters. The cause (he said) was because of those foure Prophets, to which all the world doth reuerence: Isa was of the Christians, Adamame of the Saracens, Moses of the Jewes, and Sogumambar Can the first Idoll of the Pagans; and I (saith he) doe honour to them all, and pray him which is the greatest in Heauen, and truest, to helpe me. Yet hee had best opinion of the Christian Faith, because it contained nothing but goodnesse: and would not suffer the Christians to carrie before them the Crosse, on which so great a man as Christ was crucified. Hee also sent Nicolo and Maschio, the Father and Vncle of Marco Paulo our Author, in Embassage to the Pope, to send him a hundred wise men which might conuince the Idolaters, that boasted of those there Magicall wonders, whereas the Christians that were there, were but simple men, not able to answer them; which if it had beene effected, he and his Barons would haue bene baptized. Thomas à Jesu, a Iesuite in his second booke of Proeving the conuersion of all Nations, reporteth, that Clement the fifth ordained Iohn à Monte Coruio, a Minorite, Archbishop of Cambalu, and nine other of the same Order he consecrated Bishops, and tooke order for the successe of the Archbishop, when he died. Whether these went or no, is vncertaine. Great pittie it is, that the Iesuites, men of so refined wits, and such mightie miracle-mongers, (our world must witness the one, and the East and West the other) were but of yesterdaies hatching, and that Ignatius had not broken his legge before those times. These had beene (if they then had beene) the onely men to haue remoued those obiected scandals of the simplicitie of Christians, and to haue confronted these Magicall Montebanks, as the Can here required. But these were referred to times more fatal to the Pope, to helpe at a dead list, by peruerstings here, and conuertings there, to hold vp the supposed sanctitie of the triple Diademe. But looke wee to our Tatars.

h Odoricus saith, that in his time the Can celebrated, besides the former, the Feasts of his Circumcision, Marriage, and Coronation. But before the Conquest of Cathay, they obserued not any day at all with festiual solemnities.

Cublai Can was of meane stature, of countenance white, red, and beautifull. He had foure wiues, which kept severall Courts, the least of which contained at least ten thousand persons; He had many Concubines; every second yeere hauing a new choice of the fairest Maidens in the Province of Vngur, most fertile (belike) of that commoditie: which passe a second election at the Court, and the fairest and fittest of them are committed to Ladies, to proue and to instruct them. Their parents hold it a great grace so to haue bestowed their children: and if any of them proue not, they impute it to their disastrous planet. They hold it for a great beautie, to haue their noses flat betweene the eyes.

In December, January, and February, hee abideth at Cambalu, in the North-East part of the Province of Cathay, in a Palace neere to the Citie builded on this manner. There is a circuit walled in, foure square, each square containing eight miles, hauing about them a deepe ditch, and in the middle a gate. A mile inwards is another wall, which hath fixe miles in each square; and in the South side three gates, and as many on the North. Betwixt those walls are Souldiers. In euery corner of this wall, and in the middell, is a stately Palace, eight in all, wherein are kept his Munitions. There is a third wall within this, containing foure miles square, each square taking vp one mile, hauing fixe Gates and eight Palaces, as the former, in which are kept the Grand Can's prouision. And betweene these two walls are many fixe Tices and Meadowes stored with many beasts. Within this is the Grand Can's Palace, the greatest that euer was seene, confining with the wall abovesaid, on the North and South. The matter and forme thereof is of such cost and Art, with such apparuncances of pleasure and state, as were too long heere to recite. Hee for a superstitious feare suggested by his Astrologers, of a rebellion which sometime should bee raised against him in Cambalu, built a new Citie neere thereunto called Taidu, f^{ty}ewentie foure miles in compasse, and yet not able to receiue the Inhabitants of the old Citie, whence hee remoued such as might moue suspition, hither. This Citie was built by line, in foure squares, each whereof contained fixe miles, and three gates, so streight, that vpon the wall of one gate one might see the gate right against it. In the miditt of the Citie is a great Bell, which is rung in the night, to warne men to keepe within doores. The Great Can hath 12000. Horse-men, vnder foure Capitaines to his Guard, He keepeth Leopards, Wolues, and Lions to hunt with, and with them to take wild Asse, Beares, Harts, &c. and one sort of Eagles able to catch Wolues. The two Masters of his hunting game had ten thousand men vnder each of them, the one part clothed in red, the other in skie-colour: and when the Emperour hunteth, one of these Capitaines goeth with his Men and Dogges on the right hand, the other on the left, compassing a great quantitie of ground, that not a Beast can escape them. From October to March, they are bound daily to fend in a thousand head of Beasts and Birds. He hath also when hee traueleth, ten thousand Falconers, diuided in diuers companies, himselfe abiding in a chamber, carryed vpon foure Elephants, whence he may see the game, hauing also his tents pitched for his folow neere thereby. None may carry Hawke or Hunting-dog out of his Dommon, nor may Hawke or Hunt neere the Court by many daies journeyes, nor at all, in their times of breeding, from March to October.

But hee that list to be more fully informed herein, let him reade M. Paulus and k others, which haue written of this Argument: It is Religion to vs, further to suspend our discourse of Religion.

CHAP. XV.

Of the alteration of Religion among the Tartars: and of the diuers Sorts, Sects, and Nations of them now remaining.

§. I.

Of the Precopite, or Crimme Tartars.

FTER so long narration of the Religion of the ancient Tartars, and of the Cathayans, where their Emperours fixed their abode: it followeth to consider of the times following, wherein they haue bene diuided both in Politie and Faith, Maginus ¹ diuideth them into five principall sorts; which may likewise be subdiuided into many inferiour branches of Hords. The first of these he calleth Tartaria Minor, or the lesse, which is in Europe betwixt Boristhenes and Tanais, comprehending Taurica Cherfoneus, inhabited by the Precopite Tartars, or as Bronisuius ² termeth them, Petecopenes of Petecopia, a Town and Castle in Taurica: they are called also Ossouenses and Crimis, of two Townes bearing those names. These are now subiect to the Turke both in State and Religion, hauing some Townes and Mahumetane Temples, and Monasteries, and Turkish Garrisons, and a few Temples and persons Christian, of the Armenian, Grecian, and Westerne profession. They liue in their homely Cortages in the Winter, but in the Summer wander in their Catts, as the other Tartars, then whom they are somewhat more ciuill. They pay three hundred Christians yearly to the Turke for tribute: of whom their Can, since the time of Zelim, receiueh a banner, and his approbation to the Empire, giuing his children or brethren in hostage. They elect also an heire apparent to their Empire, whom they call Galgas: and if the Can will preferre his sonne to that dignitie, he killeth all his brethren, as the Turkes also deale with theirs.

It should seeme that they deriue their pedigree from Cingis, descended (if I may conceiue, where certain Histories sayleth) of some of the sonnes of Bathy, the great Conqueror in those parts of the World. Leitchon Can was the first which ruled in Taurica: long since Bathy's time. They ³ vie the Chaldean and Arabian Letters: they haue their Cadetes to administer Religion and iustice, as haue the Turkes.

They count the Don or Riuier Tanais holy, in respect of the commodities which it yeeldeth them. These Tartars passing through the confines of Polonia and Podolia, to helpe the Turkes in the warres of Hungary, the wayes being secured and defended with the Garrisons, they vsed a new stratagem to make way, by driving a multitude of Bulls before them, which contrary to their expectation, affrighted with the Ordinance; recoiled vpon their driuers, treading them downe, and scattering them. was dead, sent his Embassadours to be elected their King; affirming, that their Pope should be his, their Luther his also: and for dainties, Horse-flesh would content him. His suit was rejected with laughter. William Bruffe a Scot, from the relation of Anthony Spinola, defended of that Family in Genoa, and then Embassador from Cassibere the Crim-Tartar into Polonia, affirmeth diuers things of the Tartarians, as namely, of threescore and ten diuers Kingdomes of them, the names whereof are scarce known to any Tartar; differing in language and manners, but all agreeing in the Tartarian appellation, warring, wandering, hard and spare diet; all sometimes subiect to the Great Cas, now inferiour in power (as the Crim say, which know nothing of him but by tradition) to the Crim or Precopite.

These Precopites abhor Drunkennesse, punish Adulterie with death; steale not from their Country-men, nor conceale any thing which they find, walke not with weapons, haue few Lawes, the Interpreters of which are their Priests, which they greatly reuerence, as they doe also those of the Christians: if any thing bee not exprest by Law, they reſerue it to that generall Head, whereon hang the Law and the Prophets, To doe as men would be done to. The Sar or Emperour siteth himselfe in Iudgement, with the Galsa, and Soldans (so they call the Princes children) and the Chancellour, with other Senators, whose sentences being first deliuered, hee determineth, and present execution followeth. All mettalls are the Sar prerogatiue (except gold, which is the Turkes peculiar) he hath also the tenths of the spoiles, and of euery Captiue a Chekine, and if he be of great estate, three. He receiueth 2 3500. Duckets a yeere from the Turke, for which hee is bound to warre vpon none but the Muscouite without his leaue. He brings into the field 150000. Horse-men (leauing at home but one man in a house) and when the Circassians and Altracans adioyne their forces, two hundred thousand. It is paine of death not to come. They bring with them three monthes victuall, which are dried Flesh, Cheefe, Garlick, Rootes, and a spare Horse for food, besides a better for seruice. Their haire tied to long poles, are their banners; onely the Prince receiueth from the Turke one of silke. Both Horse and Men are exceeding skillfull in swimming. In passing ouer large streames, they set their Saddles and Baggage on Reedes or Rushes, which they tye to diuers Horse-tails, themselves holding them by the Manes, and guiding them: sometimes they sit themselves on those Rushes, and sometimes they kill and slay 3 some of their Horses, and turning the inside outward, timbering them with the ribs of the Horse, and sowing them with the hayre, make Boates for transportation. They take off the wheeles of their Carts, and setting them on Rushes, as aforesaid, transport them. The spoile is diuided in common, and euery mans losse thence made good: to conceale any thing is death, whether pillaged from the enemy, or found of their owne people.

D. Fletcher
lib. 12.

In the yeere 1571, they came to Musco and fired the Suburbs, which being of wood, burned with such rage, that in foure houres space it consumed the greatest part of the Citie, being thirtie miles or more in compasse. The rufulnesse of this sight was seconded with a more dismall euent, the people burning in their houses, and streets, and whiles they sought to flye out of the Citie, they wedged themselves with multitude so fast in the Gate (which was furthest from the enemy) and the streets adioyning, as that three ranks walked one vpon the others heads, the vppermost treading downe those that were lower: so that there perished at that time, as was said, by the fire and the presse, the number of eight hundred thousand people or more. The Tartar sent the Russe a knife, (as vpbraiding him this losse and his desperate case) therewith to stab himselfe. The cause of this quarrell is, the Tartars title to Cazan, Altracan, and Mosco it selfe, which the Muscouite was wont to acknowledge with this homage yeerely in the Castle of Mosko, to giue the Cas or Crim Horse Oates out of his Cap, himselfe on foot, the Crim abiding on his Horse. This homage Baſilus changed into a tribute of Furs, which also by his sonne Iohn was denied. Hereupon once or twice euery yeere, sometime about Whitsonde, but oftner in haruest, hee inuadeth the Country: either in great numbers, if the Cas himselfe come, or otherwise in fewer, 50 with lighter border-skirmishes. Their common practise is to make diuers Armies, and drawing the Russe to one place, to inuade another: They are all Horse-men, carrying nothing but a Bow, a sheaf of Arrowes, and a Fauchion Sword: they are expert Riders, and shoot as readily backward as forward. The Morfes or Nobles haue Armour like the Turkes, the Common-people none other then their apparell, viz. a Black-sheeps skin, with the wooll-side outward in the day time, and inward in the night, with a cap of the same.

God help vs

They haue a rule, that Iustice is to be practised but towards their own: and therefore will promise any thing when they besiege a Citie, but being once possessed of the place, performe all manner of hostilitie. When their number is small, they make greater shew with counterfeited shapen men set on horse-backe. In giuing onset, they make a great shout, crying 60 together, Olla billa, Olla billa; they will dye rather then yeeld, contrary to the Turkes custome. The chiefe bootie they seeke for is store of Captiues, specially young boyes and girles: for for which purpose they haue bands intending nothing else, and baskets like Bakers Panniers, to carrie them tenderly. If they tyre or sicken on the way, they dash them against the ground or some tree, and so leaue them dead. The Russe borders being vsed to their insations, keepe few other cattell but Swine, which their Religion abhorreth to touch.

They differ herein from the Turkish Religion, that they haue certaine Idol puppets made of silke or like fluffe, of the fashion of a man, which they fasten to the doore of their walking-houses, to be as Lamesses or Keepers of their house. And these Idols are made not by all, but by certaine Religious women, which they haue among them for that and like vses. They haue besides, the Image of their King of an huge bignesse, which they erect at euerie Stage, when the Arme marcheth: to which euery one must bow as he passeth by, both Tartar and Seranger. They are much giuen to Witch-craft and ominous coniectures. In marriage they onely abstaine from the Mother, Sister, and Daughter: neither doe they account that woman a wife, which hath not honoured them with the name of a Father, and then beginneth time to take a dowrie of her friends of Horse, Sheepe, Kine, &c. If shee bee barren after a certaine time, he turneth her home againe.

Vnder the Emperour they haue certaine Dukes or Morleys, which rule ouer hords of ten, twentie, or fortie thousand, which are bound to serue the Emperour, with a certaine number of men double-horsed. They preferre horse-flesh before other meates, esteeming it stronger nourishment: this notwithstanding, they vsed to send thirtie or fortie thousand horse yearly to Musko, to exchange for other commodities. Their Herds of Kine, and Flocks of black Sheepe, they keepe rather for the Milke then the Flesh, though they sometime eate it. They drinke Milke or warme Bloud, and for the most part curde them both together: as they trauell they sometime let their horse bloud, and drinke it from his bodie. Townes they plant none nor standing Villages, but haue walking houses built vpon wheelles, like a Shepherds Cottage; which they moue in the Spring from the South to the North, and so with Winter returne Southwards; when they come to their Stage or standing Place, planting their houses in a rank, making the forme of a Towne and Streets. Gold and siluer they neglect, as they do also Tillage, which freeth their Countrey from inuasions.

For person and complexion, they haue broad and flat visages, of a tanned colour into yellow and blacke, fierce and cruell lookes, thin haired vpon the vpper lip and pit of the chin, light and nimble bodied with short legs, practising themselves to ride and shoot from their child-hood, their Parents not suffering their children to eate till they haue shot within a certaine scandling of the marke. Their speech is sudden and loud, as it were out of a deepe hollow throat, their singing like a Cowes lowing. In the description of these Crim I haue been thus long, because they are now the chiefe knowne Nation of the wandring Tartars, and the rest differ little from them, except in greater Barbarisme.

Master George Barkly, a friend of mine, a Merchant in London, hauing travelled Liuania, Russia, Lithuania, and Poland; went from Cracovia, with a Tartar Duke, (which had come thither to the Parliament to sue for his two Daughters, taken by the Polachs) and staid with him in his hords (which consisted of about a thousand households of a kindred) six moneths. These Tartars sowed a three square graine, called Totarka; they liued in great ease and pleasure, euery day hunting, that for worldly pleasure he neuer any where enjoyed such a life, with such loue and liking of his Tartar-Host, as if he had beene his sithne. These vsed to make sudden inroades vpon the Polachs: the Gentlemen of Poland not dying without their Peeces and Souldierly-seruing-men, readie to giue them entertainment. If the Christians make head against them, they know not where to find them. Resolute they are, and will ride with their Bowes in the face of a Pecee.

Of Tartaria Deserta.

THE second part in this diuision is attributed to Tartaria Deserta, so called of the Desert huge tract of the Countrey betwene Tanais, the Caspian Sea, and the Lake Kitey; sometime knowne by the name of Sarmatia Asatica. It containeth many Tribes: of which the principall are, Zamelzenski, called Burgar Tartars; of Volga; betwene which Riuer and Saich they haue their abode. This they called the great Hord; and the Emperour thereof Vincan, in the yeere 1506. subdued by the Crim-Tartars before mentioned; and after that by Basilim the Muscouite, to whose large stile Bulgaria is added, taking that name of Volga, as it were Vulgaria, or of Bulgar; a Towne vpon that Riuer, Cascan and Astracan, Hords of these Zamel-Tartars, haue bin subiect also many yeeres to the said Great Duke;

Duke, who caused the Prince of Cazan (being taken prisoner when hee was young) to be baptized. Neere vnto Cazan is Vachen, the people whereof are Gentiles; and the Chermizers halfe Gentiles, halfe Tartars, and Mungai, or Nagai, Mahometan Tartars, which in the yeere 1558, were thorow ciuill warres, famine, and pestilence, destroyed to the number of aboue a hundred thousand. These Nagaians haue their diuers Hords subiect to their severall Dukes, whom they call Murizers, having no vie of Money, Come, or Atts. They, in the time of their distresse, would for one Loafe of bread, worth sixe pence, haue sold Sonne or Daughtert to Master Jenkinson, if hee would haue bought a thousand, although other-whiles they desire the Christians, as liuing on the tops of weedes (so they call our Come.) This our Author and Country-man travelled downe the Riuer Volga to Astracan, which Riuer, after it had runne aboue two thousand English miles, hath threefcore and ten mouthes or falls into the Caspian Sea. Through this Sea hee passed to Mungustau, another part of the Desert Tartaria. The Prince whereof (Timor Solian) he found and saluted in a little round house, not hauing Towne or Castle, made of Reeds, covered without with Felt, within with carpets, accompanied with the great Metropolitan of their country, esteemed amongst that field-people, as the Bishop of Rome is in most parts of Europe. And had he not presented himselfe to him with the Great Dukes Letters, he had been spoiled of all that he had.

3 Regum, tur-

They passed thence with a Carauan of Merchants twentie dayes, not finding water, but as they drew out of old deepe Wells, brackish and salt: and passed sometimes two or three dayes without the same. After that, they came to a Gulfe of the Caspian Sea againe, where the water is fresh and sweet. Not so the people; for the Customers of the King of Turkeman tolled of every five and twentie, one; and seuen ninths for the said King and his brethren. Into this Gulfe the Riuer Oxus did sometimes fall, but is now intercepted by the Riuer Ardeck, which runneth toward the North: and (as it were) loath to view fo cold a Climate and barbarous Inhabitants, after he hath run with a swift race a thousand miles (as it were) in flight, hee hideth himselfe vnder ground for the space of five hundred miles, and then looking vp, and seeing little amendment, drowneth himselfe in the Lake of Kithay.

6 Minimo con-

Thence they had three dayes journey to Solizure, where finding Asim Can, to whom hee presented a ninth, hee reeclued there the like festiuall entertainment as before with Timor, that is, the flesh of a wilde Horse, and Mares milke without bread. Hee and his brethren ruled all from the Caspian Sea to Vigence, and had continuall warres with the Persians; which space is called Turkeman: for the other Hords of that huge Tartarian Desert, the Kirgessen, Melgomazau, Schanski, Thumen (which still is said to remaine vnder the obedience of the Grand Can) Bascheridi, Heseliti, harsh names of harsher people in those most harsh and horrid Desarts, will hasten my pen and your eares, to some more pleasing subiect. The Thumen and their Neighbours are great Enchanters, and by their Art (they say) raise tempests, and ouerthrow their Enemies. The Kirgessen obserue these stinking holies: their 1 Priest mixeth blood, milke, and Cow-dung together with earth, and putting them in a Vessell, therewith climeth a tree, and after his deuout exhortation to the people, hee besprinkleth them with this sacred mixture, which they account diuine. When any of them dye, they hang him on a tree in stead of buryall.

The Tartars in Turkeman vie so catch wilde Horses with Hawks, tamed to that purpose, which seising on the necke of the Horse, with his beating, and the Horses chasing, tyeth him, and maketh him an easie prey to his Master, who alwayes rideth with his Bow, Arrowes, and Sword. They eat their meate, and say their prayers sitting on the ground cross-legged, spending the time veridicly. As Master Jenkinson with his company travelled from hence towards Boghar, they were assailed with fortie theues, of whom they had intelligence some what before, and therefore certaine holy men (so for they account such as haue bene at Mecca) caused the Carauan to stay while they made their prayers and diuinations touching their successe. They tooke certaine sheepe and killed them, and rooke the blade-bones of the same, which they first sod, and then burnt, mingling the blood of the said sheepe, with this powder of their bones, with which blood they wrote certaine Characters, vsing many other Ceremonies and words, and thereby diuined that they should meete with enemies, which after much trouble they should overcome: which accordingly proued true. Of the faithfulness of these holy men he had good prooffe, both heere and elsewhere, they refusing not to expose themselves to danger, and (faithlessly-faithfull) to forswear themselves, rather then betray him and the Christians to their theuish Country-men. For these robbers would haue dismissed the Buzsarmans, so they call their Catholikes, if they would haue deliuered the Caphars, that is, Infidels, as they esteeme the Christians, vnto their power. One of their holy men (which the enemies had surprized) by no torments would confesse any thing to the prejudice of his fellows. But at last they were forced to agree, and giue the theues twentie ninths, ninth, that is, twentie times nine severall things, and a Camell to carry the same away. This Country of Turkeman or Turchestan, is the first habitation of the Turkes, and the people were called by that name, both in Haitbon time, and in the time of Mawritius, as in the Turkish Historie you have heard. Pliny nameth the Turkes neerer Mantis; but whether in devouring the people with their swords, as they did the pastures with their cattell, they came from hence, or thence from thence, or that Pliny might easily wander in so wandering a subiect, all auer, that from hence they went first into Persia, and in succeeding ages have made many fertile Countries, like their Turcomania, where Master Jenkinson saith, groweth no grasse, but heath whereon the cattell feed: The Orioman-horse blasting with his breath the ground he treads on (according to their owne Proverbe) there neuer groweth grasse more. The Turkeman Nation is (saith Haitbon) for the most part Mahumetan, and many of them without Law at all. They vse the Arabike Letters.

Of the Zagathayan Tartars.

Hese Defects and Theues have almost made vs forget our diuision, according to which wee should haue told you, that from the Caspian Sea hither, you must (according to Maginus) call the Tartars generally Zagathayans, = so called of Zagathay, the Great Cans brother, sometime their Prince. Which name = comprehendeth also diuers other Nations more ciuill then the former, possessing the Countries, sometime knowne by the names of Bactriana, Sogdiana, Margiana, now Iscabai, that is, Greene heads, of the colour of their Turbans: differing from the Persians, whom they call for like cause, Red-heads. These haue cruell warres continually with the Persians, whom they call Caphars (as they doe the Christians) for their supposed heresie, of which in the Persian relation hath beene shewed, and for that they will not cut the haire of their vpper lips, for which they are accounted of the Tartars great sinners. In Bogbar is the seat of their Metropolitane, who is there more obeyed then the King, and hath sometime deposed the King, and placed another at his pleasure. There is a little River running through the Citie, whose water breedeth in them that drinke thereof (especially strangers) a worme of an ell long, which lieth in the leg betwixt the flesh and the skin, and is plucked out about the ankle, with great Art of Surgeons well practised herein. And if it breake in plucking out, the partie dieth. They plunge out an Inch in a day, which is rolled vp, and so proceed till the be all out. And yet will not the Metropolitane suffer any drinke but water or Mates milke, hauing Officers to make search, and punish such as transgresse, with great seueritie. Zagatai liued the space of one hundred twentie and one yeeres before Marcus Paulus, and was (as hee saith) a Christian, but his sonne followed him in his Kingdome, not in his Religion.

Here in this Country is Samarcand, the Citie of Great Tamerlaine, (of some called Tamir Cuthbi, that is, as Mathias a Michou interpreteth it, Happy Sword) whose Armie contained twelue hundred thousand: whose Conquests exceed (if Histories exceed not) all the Great Alexanders, Pompeys, Cesars, or any other Worthies of the World. And one of the greatest Monarchs now of the Earth. The Great Mogore is said to descend of him.

Of him are many Histories written by some: that haue liued since his time, and could not well know his proceedings, it being generally deplored, that this Achilles wanted a Homer, which Alexander applauded in him, but wanted for himselfe: onely one Albacon (an Arabian which then liued) hath written largely thereof, and that (as he saith) by Tamerlaine command, which Jean du Bee, Abbot of Mortimer, in his voyage into the East Countrie, published in my Pilgrimes, Tom. 1. l. 1. Brassus also tel of his lme- nesses, with o- ther things of his booting in Carmania; where his fellow chollers, chose him their King, and other things not seeming credible.

loger, and accounted a holy man, encouraged him with prophecies of his good success. This Warte he made against Baiazer in behalfe of the Greeke Emperour, and others, whom the Turke oppressed. He went princely to Constantinople, and had sight of the Citie, with all kinde of the Emperour. He invaded Syria and Egypt, overthrew the Soldan, and won Cairo; destroyed Damascus, visited and honoured Jerusalem, and the holy Sepulchre, and granted great Priviledges therunto. The Princes of Lybia and barbarie, by their Embassages in Egypt, acknowledged his Soueraignie: In his returne by Persia he was encountered by Gimnes, who brought with him an infinite number of sundry kinds of beasts, which he made tame, and by which he taught men. As soone as he saw Tamerlan, he made his Prayers towards the Heavens for his health, and for the Religion of the Prophet, excommunicating the Ottomans, as enemies to the faithfull beleueers. Tamerlan gaue him fiftene or sixteen thousand of his " prisoners, which he instructed in his opinion: and after conquered Persia, and so returned to Samarcand, where he had vowed to erect a Church and Hospital, with all sumptuous Magnificence: thence he went to Mount Althay, to burie his vncke and father in law, the Great Chan, in whose State he succeeded. He enriched Samarcand with the spoiles gotten in his warres, and called the Temple which he there built, the Temple of Salomon, wherein he hanged vp Trophies and Monuments of his victories, and caused all his battailes there to be ingrauen, thereby (said he) to acknowledge the Goodnesse of God. His Religion was not pure Mahumetisme, for he thought God was delighted with varietie of 20 worshippes: yet he hated Polytheisme and Idols, only one God he acknowledged, and that with much deuotion, after this manner. Thus he deare downe all the Idols in China, but honoured the Christians, with great admiration at the strict life of some Votaries. When Aly his Counsellour was dead, he built a stately Tombe for him at Samarcand, and caused prayers to be said three dayes for his soule. Being neere his end, hee blessed his two sonnes, laying his hand on the head of Santoobio the elder, and pressing it downe, but lifting vp the chinne of Letrochio the younger, as it were prefiging vnto him the Empire, although the elder were proclaimed. But this Empire was too great, and too suddenly erected to continue. Of his success and successors in Persia, you haue heard before in the eight Chapter of this Booke.

x Lib. 1. Cap. 7.

These three sorts of Tartars which we haue hitherto mentioned, are all, for the most part, Mahumetans. There are some yet (as Meibomius * affirmeth) neere the Caspian Sea, which are not Mahumetans, nor haue their haire off their heads, after the Tartarian manner; and therefore they call them Calmuch, or Pagans.

§. IIII.

Of the Cathayan and Mogol Tartars, &c.

HE fourth are those which in greatnesse are first, namely, the Cathayans, called Carabus (that is Black-head) of their Turbants, as the former, Iesibus. But of their Religion, further then that which hath beene before expressed, we can say little. And it seemeth by the relations mentioned in the former Chapters, that they are Gentiles or Christians, and not of Mahomet's error. Chaghi Memet 1, a Persian Merchant, related (as in part is said before) to Ramusius, that he had beene at Campion, Damir Chan then reigning, and that vnto Camul, the Westerly part of Tanguth, they were Idolaters and Ethnikes: from thence Westwards, Musulmans, or Saracens. In the Epistle of Carolinus 2 the Iesuite, it is reported by a Mahumetane Merchant, that they were Christians, for those reasons (it seemes) yee haue heard before. By Benedictus Goer his obseruations yee haue seen them so deuoted to Mahomet, that a tender Lady of the weaker sexe (in the strength of sex) from the remote parts of Cascar, bordering on China, visited Mecca in Pilgrimage. And their zeale, or pretence thereof, put him into often perils, for his faith shall I say, or his goods? yet doth he make a difference between the Saracens and the Tartars; these it seemes professing robbery, and little minding any religion. They worship in those parts to the West, for that way stands Mecca.

2 Carol. Epist.

The fifth and last forme of our Tartars, are those which abide in those places, whence the Tartars first issued to ouerwhelme all Asia with their Armies: of which is related at large in the eleventh Chapter: of which, for want of probable intelligence, I can say little more. Our Maps place there the Hords of the Danikes, Nephthalites, Circassians, Turbites, and other, which some deriue from the dispersion (as is said) of the ten Tribes. Here is Tabor also, whose King was by Charles the fifth, Emperour in the yeere 1540. (as before is said) burned at Mantua, for soliciting to Iudaisme.

Pope Innocent, King Lewis of France (by meanes of William de Rubruquis) and the King of Armenia, solicited (as you haue partly heard) both the great Can, and his chiefe Princes, to become Christians: and it is likely that the Tartars might, if diligence had beene vsed, and some Superstitions had not darkened the Christian profession, haue thereunto bene perswaded, which many also of them were, as appeareth in Histon. Mat. Westmonast. and Vincentiui.

But the Saracens which had before polluted those Countries, where the Mahumetan Tartars now abide, by that sutableness of their Law to their lawlesse lusts of Raping and Poligamic, prevailed (as Michonius reporteth) with Babi and those other Tartars, to embrace Mahomet, and refuse Christ. They say, Elissa Rocholla, that is, Iesus is the Spirit of the Lord; Mahomet Rossolai, that is, Mahomet is the Iustice of God. They obey (saith hee) the Pentateuch of Moses, are circumcised, obserue the legall Ceremonies: they haue no Bels, but every day crie, La illo illo lolo; which signifieth, that there is but one God. They professe themselves Imaelites, the Christians they call Dinzais, that is, Pagans; and Gaur, Infidels. They obserue three Feasts: the first Kuiram, to which they prepare themselves, with their thirtie dayes Lent, and in that Feast offer Rammes, Birds, &c. The second they celebrate for All Soules, for which they fast a moneth, visit the graues, and doe workes of mercie. The third, they keepe for themselves and their owne saluation, and fast twelue dayes.

20 Iosafa Barbaro (a Venetian, which liued among the Tartars about the yeere 1437) saith, That they embraced not the faith of Mahomet generally, but as euery man liked, vntill about that time, in the dayes of Hedighi, a Capitaine vnder Sidabameth Can, who first compelled them therunto, being before free vnto their Idolatries, if they pleased. And of the other Tartars neere the Agathayans, he saith, That many of them were Idolaters, and carried Idols in the Carres; yea, some of them vsed to worship whatsoever Beast they first met with, after they went abroad in the morning: This Doller Fletcher reporteth of the Morduit Tartars, adding that they vse to sweare by it all that day, whether it bee Horse, Dog, or whatsoever else. And when his friend dieth, hee killeth his best Horse, and slaying off the skin, carrieth it on high vpon a long Pole, before the corps to the place of buriall.

30 The Moxi, at a certaine time in the yeere, take a horse, which they set in the field, with his foure legges tyed to foure posts, and his head to another post, fastened in the ground. This done, one of them standing in a conuenient distance, shooteth him to the heart. Afterwards they slay him, and obseruing certaine ceremonies about the flesh, eat the same. The skin they fill with chaffe: and in each of his legges thrust a straight stick, that hee may stand vp-right, as if hee were aliue. Lastly, they goe to a great Tree, and loppe there from as many boughes as they thinke good, and make a Robbe or Sollar in that tree, where they set this horse on his feet, and worship him, offering vnto him Foxes, and diuers Beasts which beare rich Fures; of which offerings the Trees hang full.

Master Jenkinson mentioneth a Nation liuing among the Tartars, called Kings; which are also Gentiles, as are also the Kirgessen (of whom wee haue spoken) and the Colimacker, which worship the Sonne, as they doe also a redde Cloth, fastened to the toppe of a Pole, and eate Serpents, Wormes, and other filth. Neere to which hee placeth (in his Mappe of Russia) certaine Statues, or Pillars of Stone, which sometime were Hords of Men and Beasts feeding, transformed by diuine power (if it bee not humane error) into this stonie substance, retaining their pristline shape. These Nations are eyther Tartars, or, in manner of life, like vnto them, and may therefore passe vnder that generall appellation. And this may suffice touching the Tartarian Nation and Religion, which in the West and South parts of their abode is Mahumetane, in the more Northerly and Easterly, partly Heathenish, partly Iewish, or Moorish, or mixed, or as may best aduantage them, and most please them, wandering in opinion in like sort, as in their habitation, Doller Fletcher reckons these things as generall to all the Hords of Tartars. First, To obey their Magistrates whatsoever they command about the publique seruise. Secondly, Except for the pulque behoofe, euery man to bee free and out of conseruement. Thirdly, No priuate man to possesse any Lands, but the whole Countrey to bee common. Fourthly, To neglect all daintinesse and varietie of meates, and to content themselves with that which commeth next to hand. Fifthly, To weare any base stire and to patch their clothes, whether there bee any need or not. Sixthly, To take or steale from any stranger whatsoever they can get. Seuenthly, Towards their owne to bee true in word and dede. Eighthly, To suffer no stranger to come within their Dominion, but the same to bee slaue to the first taker, except they haue a Passport.

50 But by this time I thinke the Reader will with mee their passport to bee gone from them, who haue hee wed my selfe no Tartarian, whilest I dwell so long on this Tartarian discourse, happily herein as tedious to him, as staying in one place would be to the Tartar; a thing so abomi-abominable, as in anger he wisteth it as a Curse, Would God thou mayest abide in one place, as the Christian, till thou smell thine owne dung. Indeed this Historie, not thoroughly handled before by any one, drew me along, and I hope will purchase pardon to this prolixitie.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Nations which lived in, or neere to those parts, now possessed by the Tartars: and their Religions, and Customs.

M. Paulus Lt.

From those Countries, inhabited by the Persians and Zagathayan Tartars Eastward, we cannot see with M. Paulus his eyes (the best guides wee can get for this way) any Religion but the Saracen, till we come to Bascia, a Prouince somewhat bending to the South, the people whereof are Idolaters and Magicians, cruel and deceitfull, liuing on Flesh and Rice. Seven dayes iourney from hence is Cheshmur, wickedly cunning in their deuillish Art, by which they cause the dumbe Idols to speake, the day to growe darke, and other maruellous things, being the well-spring of Idols and Idolatrie in those parts. They haue Heremites after their Law, which abide in their Monasteries, are very abstinent in eating and drinking, containe their bodies in straight chastitie, and are very carefull to abstaine from such finnes, wherewith they thinke their Idols offended, and liue long. There are of them many Monasteries. They are obserued of the people with great reuerence. The people of that Nation shed no blood, nor kill any flesh: but if they will eate any, they get the Saracens which liue amongst them, to kill it for them. North-eastward from hence is Vochan, a Saracenicall Nation, and after many dayes iourney ouer mountaines (so high, that no kind of birds are seene thereon) is Beloro, inhabited with Idolaters. Cascar (the next Countrey) is Mahumetan, beyond which are many Nestorian Christians in Carchan. There are also Moores, or Mahumetanes, which haue defiled with like superstition the Countreys of Cotam and Peyn (where the women may marrie new husbands, if the former be absent about twenty dayes), and the men likewise) and of Ciarcian, and Lop. From Lop they crosse a Defart, which asketh thirte dayes, and must carrie their victuals with them. Here (they say) spirits call men by their names, and cause them to stray from their companie, and perish with famine. When they are passed this Defart, they enter into Sachion, the first Citie of Tanguth, an Idolatrous Prouince, subiect to the Great Can: there are also some Nestorians and Saracens, where they haue had the Art of Printing these thousand yeeres. They haue Monasteries replenished with Idols of diuers sorts, to which they sacrifice, and when they haue a male child borne, they commend it to some Idoll, in whose honour they nourish a Ramme in their house that yeere, and after on their Idols festiuall, they bring it, together with their Sonne, before the Idoll, and sacrifice the Ramme, and dressing the flesh, let it stand till they haue finished their prayers for their child's health: in which space (they say) their Idoll hath sucked out the principall substance of the meate: which they then carrie home to their house, and assembling their kinsfolke, eate it with great reuerence and reioycing, sauing the bones in goodly vessels. The Priests haue for their fee, the head, feet, inwards, skinn, and some part of the flesh.

a This marriage admits no Non-resistance,

b Funerall obsequies in Sakh,

When any of great place dieth, they ^b assemble the Astrologers, and tell the houre of his natiuitie, that they may by their Art finde a Planet sitting to the burning of the corps, which sometime in this respect, attendeth this fiery constellation a weeke, a moneth, or halfe a yeere: in all which time they set before the corps a Table furnished with bread, wine, and other viands, leauing them there so long as one might conveniently eat: them, the Spirit there present (in their opinion) refreshing himselfe with the odour of this provision. If any euill happen to any of the house, the Astrologers ascribe it to the angry soule for neglect of his due houre, agreeing to that of his Natiuitie. They make many flayes by the way, wherein they present this departed soule with such cates, to hearken it against the bodies burning. They paint many papers, made of the barks of trees, with pictures of Men, Women, Horses, Camels, Money, and Rayment, which they burne together with the Body, that the Dead may haue to serue him in the next World. And all this while of burning, is the Musike of the Citie present, playing.

Idolaters, how understood in this Booke,

CHAMVL, the next Prouince, is Idolatrous, or Heathenish: for so we distinguish them from Saracens, Iewes, and Christians, which I would were not as guilty of Idolatrie as the former, in so many their forbidden Rites, although these haue all; and the other, part of the Scrip.

Scriptures, whereof those Heathens and Idolaters are yetterly ignorant. Here they not onely permit, but account it a great honour to haue their wiues and sisters at the pleasure of such strangers as they entertaine, themselves departing the while, and suffering all things to be at their guests will: for so are, their Idols seru'd, who therefore for this hospitalitie (they thinke) will prosper all that they haue. And when as Mangu Can forbad them this heathly practice, they obtained three yeeres; but then sent a pitifull Embassage to him, with request; That they might continue their former custome, for since they left it, they could not thrive: who overcome by their fond importunitie, granted their request; which they with ioy accepted; and doe still obserue.

In the same Prouince of Tanguth is Succuir, whose Mountaines are clothed with Rheubarb, from whence it is by Merchants conueyed through the World. Campion is the mother Citie of the Countrey, inhabited by Idolaters, with some of the Arabian and Christian Nations. The Christians had there, in the time of St. Paul, three faire Churches. The Idolaters had many Monasteries, abounding with Idols of wood, earth, and stone, couered with gold, and artificially made, some great, ten paces in length lying along, with other little ones about them, which seeme as their Disciples, to doe them reuerence. Their religious persons lue, in their opinion, more honestly then other Idolaters, although their honestie is such, as that they thinke it no sinne to lie with a woman, which shall secke it at their hands; but if the man first make loue, it is sinfull. They haue also their Fastings, dayes, three, foure, or fixe in a moneth, in which they shed no bloud, nor eat flesh. They haue many wiues; of which, the first married hath the first place and preheminence. Here Marcus Paulus liued about a yeere.

Touching the Religion and Customes in Tanguth, the reports * of Caggi Memet in Ramusius (who of late yeeres was in Campion) are not much diferent. He sayth, That their Temples are made like the Christians, capable of foure or fixe thousand persons. In them are two Images of a man and woman, lying in leagth fortie foot, all of one piece, or stone: For which vie they haue Carts with fortie wheels, drawne of fixe or fixe hundred Horses and Mules, two or three moneths iourney. They haue also little Images, with fixe or seuen heads, and ten hands, holding in each of them seuerall things, as a Serpent, Bird, Flower, &c. They haue Monasteries, wherein are men of holy life, neuer coming forth, but haue food carried them thither daily: Their gates are walled vp; and there are infinite of Friarlike companions passing to and fro in the Citie. When any of their kindred die, they mourne in white. They haue Printing, not much vnlike to that which is vsed in Europe; and Artillerie on their walls very thicke, as haue the Turkes. All the Casaians and Idolaters are forbidden to depart out of their native Countrey. They haue three Sciences, Chimia, Limia, and Simia: the first, Alchymie; the second, to make enamoured; the third, Iugling, or Magick.

Succuir also is, according to his report, great and faire, beautified with many Temples. Their Rheubarbe they would not bellow the paines to gather, but for the Merchants, which 60 from China, Persia, and other places fetch it from them at a cheape price. Nor doe they in Tanguth vie it for Physike, as we here, but with other ingredients make perfumes thereof for their Idols: and in some places they burne it in stead of other firing, and giue it their Horses to eat. They set more price by an herbe which they call Membroni zini, medicinal for the eyes, and another called Chai Catas, growing in Catay at Caciafufu, admirable against very many diseases, an ounce whereof they esteem as good as a sacke of Rheubarbe; whose description you may see at large, according to the relation and picture of the said Caggi, in Ramusius: for (to adde that also) they haue many Painters, and one Countrey inhabited onely by them. These Tanguthians are bearded as men in these parts, especially some time of the yeere.

50 Northwards from Tanguth is the Plaine of BAR GOW, in customes and manners like to the first Tartars, confining with the Scythian Ocean, fourescore dayes iourney from Ezina, in the North parts of Tanguth, and situate vnder the North starre. Eastward of Tanguth (somewhat inclining to the South) is the Kingdome of Eginul, addicted likewise to Euhike superstitions, wherein yet are some, both Nestorians and Mahumetans. Here are certaine wilde Bulls as big as Elephants, with manes of white and fine haire, like silke; of which, some they tame, and betwixt them and their tame Kine engender a race of strong and laborious Oxen. Here is found a beast also as big as a Goat of exquisite shape, which the Hunters (at every full Moone hath an apostemation or swelling vnder the belly, which the Hunters (at that time chasing the said beast) doe cut off, and drye against the Sunne, and it poueth the best Muske in the world.

60 The next Easterly Countrey is EGRI GAI, idolatrous, and hauing some Christians of the Sect of Nestorians. But Tendue, next adioyning, was at that time gouerned by King George, a Christian.

Christian and a Priest of the pollicitie of Presbyter Iohn, subiect to the Grand Can. And the Grand Cans giue commonly their daughters in marriage to this generation and stocke of Presbyter Iohn. The most part of the inhabitants are Christians; some Idolaters and Mohumetans being there also. There bee also that are called Agien, descended of Ethnikes and Moores, the wisest and properest men in those parts. All the people from hence to Cathay, are Christian, Mahumetan, and Gentile, as themselves like best. In Thebet, the next Countrey, the people in times past (saith William de Rubruquis) bestowed on their parents no other Sepulchre then their owne bowels, and yet in part retain it, making fine cuppes of their deceased parents skuls, that drinking out of them in the midst of their iollitie, they may not forget their progenitors. They haue much gold; but hold it as high offence to imprison it, as some doe with vs, in Chests or Treasuries; and therefore hauing satisfied necessity, they lay vp the rest in the earth, seating otherwise to offend God. Cambalu is in the North-east parts of Cathay: and fortie miles Westward from hence (all which way is enriched with Palaces, Vineyards, and fruitfull Fields) is Gouza, a faire Citie, and great, with many Idoll-Monasteries. Here the way parted, leading Westward into Cathay, and Southeastward vnto Mangi, or China. TANI EV and Cacanfu are Prouinces, which tend Westward from hence, inhabited with idolatrous Nations, and here and there some of the Arabian and Christian profession, full of Cities. Cunchin and Sindinfu are Ethnikes; as is Thebet: where they haue a brutish custome, not to take a wife that is a Virgin; and therefore, when Merchants passe that way, the mothers offer vnto them their daughters, much struing which of them may be the most effectually bawdy to her childe. They taking to their pleasure such as they like, gratifie them with some iewell, or other present, which on her marriage-day shee weareth, and shee which hath most of such presents, bringeth the most accepted dowrie to her husband, as testimonies of the great fauour of their Idols. This Thebet contained sometimes eight Kingdomes, with many Cities, but was now desolated by the Tartarians. There are great Necromancers, which by their infernall skills cause Thunders and Tempests. They haue Dogges as bigge as Asles, with which they catch wild Oxen & all sorts of beasts.

CANDV is an Heathenish Nation, where in honour of their Idols, they prostitute their wives, sisters, and daughters, to the lust of Travellers; which being entertained in the house, the good man departeth, and the woman setteth some token ouer the doore, which there remaineth as long as this stallion-stranger, for a signe to her husband, which there remaineth till the guest be as well gone from her house, as honesty from her heart, and wit from his head. They make money of salt, as in Cathay of paper. In Carazin also, (a large Prouince adioyning) there are some Christians and Saracens, but the most Ethnikes, which are not discontented, that other men should lie with their wives, if the women be willing.

CARAZAN is of like irreligion, their soules captiuated to the Old Serpent, and their bodies endangered to mighty huge bodies of Serpents, tenne paces long, and tenne spannes thicke, which that Countrey yeldeth. They keepe in their denues in the day, and in the night prey vpon Lyons, Wolves, and other Beasts, which when they haue deuoured, they resort to some water to drinke, and by their weight leaue so deepe impression in the sand, that hereby men knowing their haunt, doe vnderset this their Tract with sharpe stakes, headed with yron, covering the same againe with sand; by this meanes preying on the spoyler, and deuouring the deuourer; esteeming nothing more sauerie then the flesh, nor more medicinal then the gall of this Serpent. More Serpentine then this diet, was that custome which they vsed, when any proper and personable Gentleman, of valourous Spirit, and goodly preference, lodged in any house amongst them: in the night they killed him, not for the spoyle, but that his soule furnished with such parts of body and mind, might remaine in that house. Much hope of future happinesse to that house did they repose in so vnhappy attempts. But the great Can killed this Serpent also, overthrowing this custome in the conquest of that Prouince.

CARDANDAN confineth on the Westerne limits of Carazan. They make blacke lists in their Beth, razing the skinne, and put therein some blacke tincture, which euermayneth, & accounting it a great ornament. When a woman is deliuered of a child, the man lyeth in, and keepeth his bed, with visitation of Gossips, the space of fortie dayes. They worship the ancientest person of the house, ascribing to him all their good. In this prouince, and in Caidu, Vocian, and Iaci, they haue no Phisicians, but when any be sicke, they send for their Witehes or Sorcerers, and acquaint them with their maladie. They cause Minstrels to play while they dance and sing, in honour of their Idols, not ceasing till the Diuell entereth into one of them, of whom those Sorcerers demand the cause of the parties sicknesse, and meanes of recourie. The Demoniacke answereth, for some offence to such, or such a god. They pray that God of pardon, vowing that when he is whole, he shall offer him a sacrifice of his owne blood. If the Diuell see him unlikely to recouer, he answereth, that his offences are so grievous, that no sacrifice can expiate; but if there be likelihood of recovery, he enjoyneth them a sacrifice of so many Rams with blacke heads, to be offered by these Sorcerers, assembled together with their wives & then will that god be reconciled. This is presently done by the kinsmen of the sicke, the sicke killed, their blood hurled up towards Heaven. The Sorcerers and Sorceresses make great lights, and incense all this visited house, making a smoke of Lignum Aloe, and casting into the ayre, the water wherein the sacrificed flesh was sodden, with some spiced drinckes, laughing, singing, dancing in honour of that God. After all this rest, our they demand againe of the Demoniacke, if the God be appeased yf so, they fall to those spiced drinckes, and sacrificed flesh with great mirth, and being well appeased, retorne home; if not, they (at his bidding) renew their superstition, ascribing the recovery (if it happen) to that Idol; and if he dyeth notwithstanding, they shift it off to the want of their full due, fleeing, or tasting the same before, to the Idols defrauding. Thus doe they in all Cathay and Mangi. Thus much out of the large reports of Paulus that surnamed Venerian, to whom our Relations are so much indebted.

Rubragius telleth the like of CALIAK and CARACORAM, where hee had bene in these Cathayan Provinces, concerning their Christopher or Giant-like Idols, and Idol Temples: in one of which he saw a man, with a croffe drawne with inke on his hand, who seemed by his answers to bee a Christian; with Images like to that of Saint Michael, and other Saints. They have a Sect called Lugures, whose Priests are Juane, and clad in Saffron-coloured garments, ymmatted, an hundred or two hundred in a Cloyster. On their holy dayes they place in their Temples two long formes, one over against another, whereon they sit with bookes in their hands, reading softly to themselves: Nor could our Author (entering amongst them) by any means breake this their silence. They have, wheresoever they goe, a string about their neck full of beads, like the Popish beards; alway they are vitering these words, Oumiam bellari, God thou knowest, expecting so many rewards, as they make such memorials of God. They have a Church-yard, and a Church-porch, with a long pole on it (as it were a steeple) adjoining to their Temples. In those porches they vie to sit and conferte. They wear certain ornaments of paper on their heads. Their writing is downwards; and so from the left hand to the right; which the Tatars received from them. They vie Magically Characters, hanging their Temples full of them. They burne their dead, and lay up the ashes in the top of a Pyramit. They beleue there is one God, that he is a Spirit; and their Images they make not to represent God, but in memoriall of the rich after their death, as they professed to Rubragius. The Priests (besides their Saffron-jackets borrowed close before) wear on their left shoulder a cloake descending before and behind vnder their right arme; like to a Deacon carrying the Housel-boxe in Lent. They worship towards the North, clapping their hands together, and prostrating themselves on their knees, vpon the Earth, holding also their foreheads in their hands. They extend their Temples East and West in length; vpon the North side they build (as it were) a Vestrie; on the South, a Porch. The doors of their Temples are alwayes opened to the South. A certaine Nestorian Priest told him of so huge an Idol, that it might be seene two dayes before a man came at it. Within the Quier, which is on the North side of the Temple, they place a chest long and broad, like a Table, and behind that chest stands their principall Idol, towards the South; round about which, they place the other lesse Idols; and vpon that chest they set candles and oblations. They have great Bels like unto ours. The Nestorians of those parts, pray with hands displayed before their breasts, so to differ from that Lugurian Rite of voying hands in prayer. Thus saith Philippus de Rubragius, who was there Anno, 1253. In Thibet (saith Odericus) resideth the Abassi, or Pope of the Idolaters, distributing Religious preferments to those Eastern Idolaters, as the Roman Pope doth in the West.

Of other Northerne people adjoining to the Tartars, and their Religions.

THE Permans and Samoits that lye from Russia North, and North-east, are thought to have taken their beginning from the Tartar-kind, whom they somewhat resemble in countenance. The Permans are subiect to the Russ, they live by hunting and trading with their furs; as doe the Samoits, which dwell more toward the North-Sea: The Samoit, or Samoed, hath his name as the Russ sayth, of eating himselfe, as if they had sometime bene Cannibals: and at this time they will eat raw flesh, whateoever it be, even the very carrion that lyeth in the ditch. They say themselves, that they were called Samone, that is, of themselves, as if they were Iudgens, there bred, and not transplanted from any other people. I talked (sayth our Authour) with certaine of them, and finde that they acknowledge one God, but represent him by such things as they haue most vfe and good by: and therefore they worship the Sunne, the Ollen, the Loly, and such like.

The PERMACKS, * and SEBYRIANS are of the Ruffe Religion. The Yougoutians are clothed after the Permacke fashion, but worship Images as doe the Samodeys. The Tingofeys, a people farre more Easterly, are sayd to worship the Sun and Moone. They weare their apparell all of Deere-skinnes, made closer to them then the Samodeys, being also a taller people. Beyond ^b the Tingofeys liue the Boulafhees: beyond them the Seclachee. Beyond the river Yenisey the Imbaki, and Ollaki, a kind of Tartars. Beyond the Tingofeys is a River called Geta. This space extending Eastward from Ob, a Ruffe was a Sommer in traouelling, and liued there sixe yeeres, Onesko another Ruffe was first occasion of subduing the Samodeys to the Russian Dominion, in the raigne of Phedor Iuanonich. He sending his sonnes into the Samodeys Country, found that about the River Ob they were gouerned by the ancientest, had no Cities, liued in hords or companies, ate the beasts they tooke, knew not corne nor bread, were good Archers, sharpening their Arrowes with fish bones and fiones: fewed Fures with bones and finewes for their clothing, which they ware inward in Winter, outward in Summer, couered their houses with Elkes-skinnes: He grew rich by trading with them for Fures. The Muscouite sent thither Messengers gallantly attired, which easily obtayned leaue to erect Castles neere Ob, so which he sent condemned persons, and brought it into the forme of a petty Kingdome. Boris the next Emperour built Tooma 200. leagues vp the river Ob, and many other Townes on both sides the River, the which were peopled with Samodeys, Tartars, & Russes. It is ten weekes trauell from Ob to the Tingofeys through the Desarts. They in hords, haue deformed swellings vnder the throat. These traouelling Eastward passed a River which they called Pfida, & heard the sound of brazen bells: which if it be so, is argument of some more ciuill people, eyther of Cathay or the parts adioyning. The Cathayans are said to trade to Sergoit: From the mouth of Pechora to Ob is tenne dayes sayling. Ob and Ienisey runne North and South. The Samodeys report that in Ienisey are great vessels drawne with ropes.

In the yeare 1611. Iofias Logan and William Purfelow, sailed to Pechora, where they anchored Iuly the tenth, and on the sixteenth came to Pustozera: where Malster Logan wintered, but Purfelow trauelled from thence by Land to Colmogro. The nine and twentieth of November he departed with Russes and Permacks, for Slebotca in a sled drawne with two Deere: in their Artychey (so they call their whole company) were two hundred and tenne sleds: and they had about fise hundred for change when the other were weary. These kept company till the fourth of December, and then in company of foure sleds and a Samoyed for a guide, he left the laden sleds, and went in post for Slebotca, where he arriued the ninth day at night: and thence trauelled day and night to Colmogro, where he arriued the twelfth being two hundred and fiftie Versts, or Russe miles, somewhat shorter then ours. He returned againe with a better passage to Pechora, by reason of much snow faine in the meane while and frozen, passing ouer the mountaines, which are not high, but a Champaine Country. He left the company the sixt of January, and in forty houres continuall post, passed (by report) three hundred and fiftie versts. About the mouth of the River Ob, * is sayd to bee an ancient Idoll, in forme of an olde woman, holding in each arme a child, and a third at her feet, called by her worshippers (the Lugris, Obharani and Condorani) Zlata Baba, that is, the golden olde wife, to which they offer precious Fures, and sacrifice Harts, besmearing the mouth and eyes of the Idoll with the bloud. In the time of their sacrificing, the Priest demands of the Idoll touching things to come, and sometime receiueith answer. Deller Fletcher * found this to be a very fable, Onely (saith he) in the Prouince of Obdoria, on the Seaside neere the mouth of Ob, there is a Rocke, which naturally (being somewhat helped by imagination) seemes to beare the shape of a ragged woman with a child in her armes (as the Rocke by the North Cape, the shape of a Fryer) where the Obdorian Samoitteys vfe to resort, by reason of the commoditie of the place for fishings: and there sometimes practise their Sorceries, and ominous coniecturings about the good or bad successe of their iourneys, fishings, huntings, and such like.

The Samoitte or SAMOYEDS are clad from head to foot in Deeres-skinnes, or in Seals-skinnes, with the hairy side outwards downe as low as the knees, with their breeches and nether rocks of the same, both men and women. They are all blacke haired, naturally beardless. And therefore the men are hardly discerned from the women, but by the lockes which the women weare downe their eares. They liue a wilde and sauage life rouling from one place to another, without any property of House or Land. Their leader in euery company is their Papa or Priest.

The

The Samoyeds are Idolaters and Witches, obseruing Deuclish superstitions, as witnesseth Rich, Iohnson, who on the fifth of January, in the yeere, 1557. saw amongst them, as follows. The Samoyeds about the banks of Pechore, are in subiection to the Muscouite, and when they will remove from one place to another, then they will make Sacrifices, in manner following. Euery kindred doth Sacrifice in their owne Tent, and hee that is most Ancient, is their Priest. And first the Priest doth begin to play vpon a thing like a great Sine, with a skinne on the one end like a Drumme; his Drumme stick is about a spanne long, and one end is round like a ball, couered with the skin of an Hart.

pud Hak. 16. 1.

Also the Priest hath as it were a white garland on his head, and his face is couered with a peece of a shirt of male, with many small ribbes, and teeth of fishes, and wild beasts hanging thereon. Then he singeth, as we vse here in England to hollow, whoope or shout at Hounds, and the rest of the company answer him with this Outes Igha, Igha, Igha, to which the Priest with his voyce replyeth. And they answer him with the selfe same words, so many times, till in the end, he become, as it were, madde, falling downe as he were dead, hauing nothing on him but a shirt, and lying on his backe. I perceyued him yet to breathe, and asked why he lay so: they answered, Now doth our God tell him what we shall doe, and whither we shall goe. And when he had lyen still a little while, they cryed thus three times together, Oghao, Oghao, Oghao, and as they vse these three calls, he ryseth with his head, and lyeth downe againe; and then he rose vp & sang with like voyces as he did before, with the like answer, Igha, Igha, Igha. Then he commanded them to kill siue Ollens, or great Deere, & continue singing still, both he and they as before. Then he tooke a sword of a Cubine, and a span long (I did mete it my selfe) and put it into his belly halfe way, and sometime lesse, but no wound was to be seene; they continuing their sweete song still. Then he put the sword into the fire, till it was warme, and so thrust it into the slit of his shirt, and thrust it thorow his body, as I thought, in at his Nauell, and out at his fundament, the point being out of his shirt behind, I layd my finger vpon it. Then he pulled out the sword, and fate downe.

This being done, they set a Kettle of water ouer the fire to heate, and when the water doth feethe, the Priest beginneth to sing againe, they answering him. For so long as the water was in feething, they late and sang not. Then they made a thing being foure square, and in height and squarenesse of a chaire, and couered with a gowne very close, the fore-part thereof, for the hinder part stood to the Tents side. Their Tents are round and are called Chome, in their language. The water still feething on the fire, and this square seat being ready, the Priest put off his shirt, and the thing like a garland, which was on his head, with those things which couered his face, and hee had on yet all this while a payre of hose of Deere-skinne, with the hayre on, which came vp to his buttockes. So he went into the square seat, and fate downe like a Taylor, and sang with a strong voyce or hollowing. Then they tooke a small line made of Deere-skinnes of foure fathomes long, and with a small knot the Priest made it fast about his necke, and vnder his left arme, and gaue it to two men standing on each side of him, which held the ends together. Then the kettle of hot water was set before him in the square seat, which seat they now couered with a gowne of broad cloth-without lining (such as the Russes vse to weare.) Then the two men which did hold the end of the line, still standing there, began to draw, and drew, till they had drawne the ends of the line stiffe, and together; and then I heard a thing fall into the kettle of water, which was before him in the Tent. I asked what it was, and they answered, his head, shoulder and left arme, which the line had cut off, I meane, the knot which I saw afterward drawne hard together. Then I rose vp, and would haue looked whether it were so or not, but they layd hold on me, and sayd, that if they should see him with their bodily eyes, they should line no longer. (And the most part of them can speake the Russian tongue, to be vnderstood, and they took me to be a Russian.) Then they began to hollow with these words Oghao, Oghao, Oghao, many times together: in the meane while I saw a thing like a finger of a man, two times together, thrust thorow the gowne from the Priest. I asked them that fate nere to me what it was, that I saw, and they sayd, not his finger for he was yet dead; and that which I saw appeare thorow the gowne, was a beast, but what beast they knew not, nor would not tell. And I looked vpon the gowne, and there was no hole to be seene. At last, the Priest lifted vp his head, with his shoulder and arme, and all his body, and came out to the fire. Thus farre of their seruice, which I saw during the space of certaine houres. But how they doe worship their Idols, that I saw not: for they put vp their stufte to remoue from that place where they lay. And I went to him that serued their Priest, and asked him what their God sayd to him, when hee lay as dead. Hee answered, that his owne people doth not know, neither is it for him to know, for they must doe as he commanded.

William Purfalone tolde mee of the like cyther iuggling or Magicall pranks practised by Samoyed-Coniurours or Priests, whom they haue in great veneration. They haue (as hee reporteth)

reporteth) certaine Images, some in likenesse of a Man, others of a Beare, Wolfe, &c. which they behang with the richest Furses they can get, hiding them in Caues in the Woods, for feare of the Russes: who trauell those Countreies to hunt after wild beasts, as Sable, Fox, and Beuer: who, if they light vpon those furred Deities take away the Furses, and bestow on them greater heat in fires. Pustozera is in 68. degrees 50. minutes. The inhabitants hold trade with other Samoyeds, which haue traffique with the Ungarians and Moscowites, for Sables, blacke and white Foxes, Beavers, Downe, Whaler-Finnes. The Russes malingeing others that gaine which themselves find in the Samoyed-trade, traduced the English amongst them as Spies. The Ozers or lake before the Towne was frozen ouer, the thirteenth of October, and so continued till the twentieth of May. Iosias Logan there obserued, and the eleuenth of December, he could see but the way of the Sunne-beames: on the thirteenth, the beames burn not the Sunne: which on Christmas day he saw rising at South and by West, and setting at South West and by South: not wholly elevated from the Horizon, but all the way the nether part of the Sunne seeming iust and euen with it. They found the harbor of Pechora full of Ice in Iuly, the tide strong and dangerous. The Towne of Pechora is small, it hath three Churches: the poore in the Spring and Summer time lue by catching Partidges, Geese, Ducks, Swans: salt the fish and lue on them most of the Winter. Sailing from Pustozera in August towards Noua Zemla, they fastened themselves to a piece of Ice, which caused their retume homewards.

The Samoyeds know these vnknowne Desarts, and can tell where the Mosse groweth, wherewith they refresh their wearied Deere, pitching their tents of Deere-skins neere the same. Their wiues and daughters fetch wood sometimes renne versis off, they hang kettles on the fire with snow, of which melted, euery one drinks a caroule. When they haue supped, they spread a Deereskinne on the snow witt in the Tent. Whereon he resteth couered with his day-apparell. Tent, or twelve of the boyes, or maides, watch the Deere to keepe them from Wolves or Beares: making a great shout if they see any. For two hundred and fifty sleds they pitch euery night three Tents. The light of the Moone and snow helpe them in their trauels.

The Hollanders in the yeere 1494, sent to discover a way to Cathay and China, by the North-East, which by Master Burrough, Pet and Jacman, Englishmen, had beene long before in vaine attempted. William Barents was the chiefe Pilot for this discouerie. This yeere he they sayd thorow the Straits of Vaygats, and thought themselves not farr short of the River Ob, The next yeere they returned for the same discouery. They¹ landed in the Samogithians or Samoyeds Countrey, and named a place, because they there found Images carued of wood, Idall nooke. They gaue names to places long before discouered by the English, as if they had beene the first founders. They learned of certaine Muscouits, that the Inhabitants of Noua Zemla, had neither religion, nor Ciuility preferred them by any Law, but worshipped the Sunne, Moone, and North-Starr, and euery yeere offered vnto them sacrifices of Deere and other things. On the nine and twentieth of August there arose a thicke fogge, whereupon Oliner Bruuel (which had beene three severall yeeres sent by the King of Denmarke, for the discouery of Greenland) reporteth that in 76. Degrees hee had often obserued such thicke fogges, that some perished thereby. These happened most commonly in October and Nouember. The last of August they had speech with the Samoyeds, they were of ² short stature, scarcely foure foot high, with long hayre, broad faces, great heads, little eyes, short and bow legges, very swift, clothed with beasts skins, whereof the hayre side was outward. They know no God. The Sunne (whose presence they are long deprived of in the Winter (which is recompensed in their nightlesse Summer:)) is worshipped amongst them. And when the Sunne is declining out of their sight, the Moone or North-Starr, is his receiuer or successeur (if you will) in that tribute of their deuotions. They haue besides, many Idols rudely carued. In times past they had no King; but now they chuse one to that dignity. They bury the dead, and offer yeerely their sacrifices for them to the Sunne, Moone, and North-Starr, of their Deere, which they bunne, except the head and feet. They cate the flesh of wild beasts, eyther raw, or dried in the syre; which make them haue very vnlausory breath. On the sixth of September two of them went on shore, on the Continent of Moscovia, and encountered with a Beare, which killed one of them: his crye brought in other of their fellows (which were also stragling about) to his rescue, but the Beare laid hold also vpon one of them, and could not be driuen to forsake his prey, till himselfe became a prey in recompence. The two torne carkasses were there buried. They tooke from one Beare which they killed, an hundred pound of fat, which serued them for their lamps: the skinne was nine foot¹ long, and seuen wide.

Rainbow, one encompassing them, the other crossing them ouerthwart. After many dreadful combats with the Ice, and one of the Ships departing from the other, they were forced to winter in Nova Zemla; where they built them a house to serve them for a fortification against the savage Beares, tempestuous stormes, continuall snowes, Ice, and inspeakeable cold; and (if worse may bee) a worse then all these, they endured a continuall night of many weekes, wherein neither the Sun, nor any of his courtly traine, the least rayes to be the harbingers of his desired presence, did present themselves to their eyes: and the fire could scarcely prevaile against the insulting tyranny of the cold to warme them. The Beares together with the Sun forsooke them, but plentie of Foxes remained; and with the Sun the Beares also returned, sometime laying violent siege to their house. From the fourth of November, till the seven and twentieth of January they saw no Sun. Their Watch also or Clocke was by violence of the cold forced to stand still, that they could not measure their times. Thus did they waite in expectation of the Sunnes returne, that they also (not able futher to pursue the voyage) might returne home, which eleuen of them did in October following.

But seeing these North-easterne Seas are so frozen and unpasable, I will therefore in an inkie Sea finde an easier passage for the Reader, with more, both ease and securitie, to the mightie Kingdome of China, whereof wee are next to speake.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the Kingdome of China.

Of the Names, Prouinces, Cities, and situation thereof.

Hina is supposed of some, to be that Countrey, whose people of Ptolomy are called Sinae. Some thinke them to bee the people mentioned by the Prophet Esaie, whereunto Ianius also inclineth. The Arabians call them Tzsin; and the Portugals first of all other (because they could not pronounce it aright) called them Chinians (saith Joseph Scaliger) Pierre du Varre, saith, that before that time in all the East they were called Chy; and the Inhabitants of Ceilan were called Chingales, because they were mixed with the Chinois; and Cinamom, was of the Persians named Darchin, that is, wood of China, as some thinke: he addeth their opinion that deriue that name from the Chinian salutation, in which they vse the word Chy, Chy, as a nickname therefore giuen them; and others that thinke the Title Chincho gaue name to the whole Region: but it were tedious to recite heere the several opinions in this question. And siter it is to heare Kicili his iudgement, who being sent into the Indies Anno 1578. after foure yeeres stay at Goa and Cochim, was by the Iesuiticall Visitor employed for China, in which he liued, about eight and twentie yeeres: some of which he spent in Nanquin and other places, but the ten last in Paquin, the Royall Citie and Residence. He out of his experience could best informe vs of China affaires, and a litle before his death (which hapned the eleuenth of May 1618.) writ certaine Commentaries of his obseruations, which Trigautius another Chinian Iesuite, hath since reuiled and published: professing sincere truth in his Relations, which (hee saith) many former Writers, euen of their societie, wanted in many things, partly receiving by heere say of China, which was partly faying small time, and but in the skirts of the countrey. This I premise, that appeares partly to mee a fault, so much after so good intelligence, to haue increased the history of China, the most admirable this day in the world. For the name he acknowledged Ptolomy in his Sine, and the ancient Serica Regio, to agree with this, whose people are called in his Sine, and whence other countiees are therewith storied, the Inuention whereof selfe Nicholas filke, report 2600. yeeres before Christ. But of all these names the Chinois know none: whose custome is, that when any new family attaineth the soueraintie, the Countrey receiueth with the new Lords new Lawes, and a new Name. So they write that it hath sometimes bene called Tsao, which signifies Broad; after this Tu, that is, Rise; next Fu, or Great; afterwards Siam, Adrich; then Chy, which is Perfect; Ma, the Mother; and in Hegestrus with other names many. Barin the reigne of this family, which is called Cy, the Kingdome is called Mi; which signifies Brilliance, to which they add Ta, calling it Ta-Mi, or Great Brilliance. Few of the neighbour Nations obteine this, and by others of them it is diuerty named: Those of Siam and Cochin call it Cin, whence the Portugals call it

China; the Iaponites, Thau; the Tartars Han; the Westerne Saracens (as hath beene observed) Cathay; and the Chinois themselves haue one name common to all ages Cinquo, as also Chin boa; which signifie, the former, a Kingdome, the other a Garden, in the which conceining the Earth square, and their Countrey in the midst thereof, which made them defended with our Maps that placed them in the futhrell East: and Ricinus so disposed his Maps after, that hee placed them in the middle of the same. The King is entituled Lord of the Vniuerses, which how boysterous soever, is more excusable then in many other inferior Potentates, the Chinois thinking (according to their Geographie) that the World contained but few other Nations, and those for the most part so contemptible, that they willingly relinquished them, or thought them not worth the conquering. Neither was euer any one Kingdome so worthy the name of GRAT, beginning at the Ile Hainam (which signifies the South Sea) in the 19. degree, and extendeth Northwards to 42. and from the 112. degree in Longitude (reckoning from the Canaries) in the Prouince Yunan, to the 132. Eastwards. This hath beene observed by Mathematicall Instruments and obseruations of Eclipses in their Kalenders, and especially for the Northerne computation, it is out of doubt. But for illustration hereof, we will adde out of one of their own booke, entituled A description of that Kingdome, printed 1579. thus interpreted. In this Kingdome are two Royall, or Parliament Prouinces, Nanquin and Pequin (the one signifying the South Court, the other the North) and besides these, thirteene others. In these fifteene Prouinces or Kingdomes, are numbered by another diuision 158. Regions or Shires (they call them Fu) the most of which haue twelue or fifteene Cities, besides Townes, Villages, Castles, and Hamlets. In these are two hundred seuen and fortie great Cities, which they call Chu, rather in dignitie then greatness, or otherwise, exceeding the inferiour Cities, called Hien, of which are 1152. The persons of such as are growne to mans estate (all which pay tribute to the King are 8. millions, 550. thousand, 801: not reckoning the feminine Sexe, Boyes, Striplings, or Youths, Eunuches; Souldiours, Magistrates, the Kings kindred, Students, and many others. And yet of Souldiours, notwithstanding their long peace, are maintained in perpetual pay and seruice aboue one million; the three Northerne Prouinces, being almost halfe of them in militarie spend. The bordering Kingdomes tribute, are to the East three, to the West fiftie three, numbred in that Booke; though this tribute bee of no great value. The Kingdome is also fortified by Nature and Art: the Sea on the South and East, and deepe Precipices joyned together with a strong wall, the space of foure hundred and fiftie leagues to the North, and a sandie Wildernesse on the North-west; all conspiring to the strength thereof; and for the South-west it is full of Hills and Desarts, with a few small Seignories, vnworthy their feare or desire. It is diuided into fifteene Prouinces, six whereof border on the Sea, Canton, Foguen, Chequiam, Nanquin, Xantun, Paquin; the other nine be in land, Quikien, Hingnam, Honan, Xiansi, Xansi, Suehion, Quichen, Luan, Coanfu. Some sound these names somewhat otherwise. The Kings residence is at Paquin, though Paquin enjoyeth also a Court Royall, as being the Royall Seat of the ancient Kings; which some place in Quinlay; but of that afterwards.

Of the Commodities of China; and commodious Rivers and shipping: with two Maps; one made by HOLLANDS, the other taken out of a China Map made there by the Chinois.

Reason of this large extent, both East and West, and North and South, it comes to passe, that no Countrey yields such variety of things, growing in such variety of Climate and Soyle making others indebted to it, but it selfe not indebted to any Countrey, either for necessity or delicacie of diet. Neither haue wee scarcely any thing in Europe, which is not there found; and what is missing is more then recompensed in other things exceeding. There is more of Wheat, Barley, Millet, Panike, and other kinds of graine. In Rice (their chiefe food) it farre exceedeth Europe. Of Beanes and Pease (wherewith they feed their bests) in some Prouinces they haue two or three Harvests in a yeere. None of our principall fruits, but Olives and Almonds, are wanting; others they haue yknowne to vs, as those which they call Longans, Coco-nuts, and other Indian fruits. Their Oranges, Limons, Pome, Citrons, farre excell the European in variety and delicacie. The like we may say of their Garden heabes, which Religion to some, to others Poyertie, haue made their only food, Great is their variety of Flowers; many heare yknowne; but there, the colour more respected then the sent. As for dillations, they euer, sill of late by vs, had heard of such an Art, Betelle and Arecce! grow in the foure Southerne Prouinces. Their Wine is farre farre inferior to ours; for their Grapes are fewer, and lesse pleasant: nor doe they make Wine of them, but of Rice and other things; which is both well tasting, and not so burning as ours. They commonly feed on Porke: they have store also of Beeffe, Mutton, Goats flesh, Hennes, Ducks, Geese: they feed also on Horses, Mules, Ases, Dogs, which are sold in the Shambles as well as other flesh. But in some places, either for Superstition or Husbandry, they spare their Beeces and Buffalls. Venison, especially of red Deere, is plentifull, Hares, and other things, all verie cheape. Their Horses are not so comely as in these parts, but in number, cheapnesse, and use for burthen, excellling. Yet is there lesse need of such carriages, by reason 50 of plenty of Rivers, which Nature or Art hath provided through all the Countrey. Hence is there such store of shipping, that a moderne Author hath written, that there live as many on the Waters, as on the Land: which, to such a style in those Streames, will not seeme too excessive an hyperbole. And I dare affirme this as a thing credible, that there is as much shipping in this Kingdome, as in all the world besides; understanding this assertion of fresh-water vessels: for their sea-vessells are fewer and worse then ours. Pantogia & reporteth his owne journey from Macao to Paquin, the space of six hundred Spanish leagues (which the west way, by land, is reckoned 1450.) in all that space travelling but one day by land; for shortning his way; otherwile all the way by water, carried in a River, called of the Chiniáns a little Sea for the greatnesse, (being the greatest which euer he saw, in some places two or three myles 60 broad, often tempestuous, and cause of many shipwrackes.) The Chinoies dare not sayle in it by night: and they say, That if one fall in, hee is so whirled, that swimming can scarcely save him. They call it Yamfu, or the sonne of the Sea. It abounds with Sea-fish a hundred leagues leagues from the Sea. Hee sayled after that in another River of like bignesse, whose waters were thicke and myrie, which they clarify with Allome, before they can drinke it: All the rest of the streames that hee passed, were made by mens hands, about two hundred leagues. That yellow or muddie streame, at his beginning makes a Lake, and then runnes Westward beyond the walls, to the Tartars, and then backe againe by those walls, compassing the Province of Sciensi, running South, and after East, to the Sea. It often overflowses, and doth much harme, not subiect to their walls and lawes, and often changes the sandie channell. Some Magistrates are appointed to appease the Spirit thereof with rites, (for they ascribe Spirits to the rule of many things.) From Nanquin to Paquin, the space of three hundred leagues, it seemed to be, as it were, a continued street of ships: and though they came in the morning betimes to Nanquin, yet were there the same houre about five hundred sayle of Vessels vnder sayle, ready to enter, which were laden with prouision for the Citie. The Kings ships in that Region, about Nanquin, are reported to be about ten thousand, to carrie his rents and tributes, besides a thousand sayle belonging to priuate men. The ships wherein the Mandarines or Magistrates and Officers are carned, are not inferior in sumptuous stateliness to the ships Royal in Europe; and some exceeding them, hauing Parlors, large Halls, Kitchens, with other Offices; and many windowes, with silke curtaines, and curiously painted; without, cauerioned with galleries; the height, as of high houses; and painted within and without with a certaine liquor, made of a gumme, called Claran, of shining brightness, and long continuance, besides great store of carued workes, that they seeme Princes Palaces. Escalante and Gaifar de Cruz report a Prouerbe of the Chinois, That their King is able to make a bridge of ships from China to Malacca, which is neere five hundred leagues. They haue so great store of timber, that a ship may there bee built for a fourth part of that which it will here cost. The Rivers are no lesse adorned and beautified with Cities, Townes, and Villages; so many, as that in all this way being neere or against one, they had alway sight of another, that all the way seemed a continuall habitation; and so great, that sometime they sayled two or three hores alongst the walls of some Citie. Their Townes and Cities haue high walls.

But to returne to their Horses: Such as are for Warre, are innumerable, but vnfit for seruice, running away at the first neighing of a Tartarian Horse: besides that, they are vnshod with yron, and therefore too tender-hoofed, for hard trauell: neither haue they skill to manage them. Fish is there abundant, by the neighbour-hood of the Sea, store of Rivers, and Lakes (for their greatnesse and depth) as it were little Seas; besides Fish-ponds plentie, maintained to that intent and purpose, which euerie day store the Market.

Their Forrests breed no Lyons, but great quantitie of Tygres, Beares, Wolues, Foxes; Elephants none, but at Paquin, for shew in the Court; Flaxe they haue not, but Cotton enough for the world; and yet not about foure hundred yeeres since it was brought thither. Silke is plentifull and cheape: of Hempe and certaine other hearbes they make cloth: their wooll they sheare, and make thereof slight clothes; but good cloth they know not how to make; although that which is thither brought, bee deare sold. And this note I would commend to our English Merchants, that can best furnish them. For the cold in the Northern Provinces, seemes more then the Climate threatens, farre beyond the Countries of Europe in the same height; their huge Rivers and Lakes being frozen ouer, the cause yknowne, but guessed to bee the Tartarian Mountaines snowie tops, not farre distant; against which, they vse furred garments.

All sorts of Metalls are here found; Besides the ordinarie Brasse and Copper, they make another kind, white as Silver, no dearer then the former. Of melted yron, they make Cauldrons, Bells, Mortars, Furnaces, Ordnance, and the like, all cheape far then here. Their gold is not base, but not so fine as ours. Silver is vsed for money, but by weight, not by coynage; and so in all bargaines they vse the ballance, the price higher or lower, as the Silver is in finenesse: wherein much fraud is vsed. In many places they haue small coynes of Brasse, which come out of the publike Mint. Their great men haue vessels of silver and gold, but not so common as in Europe. But the women spend much gold & Silver in adorning their heads. Porcelaine is their vsuall Table-furniture; the most excellent whereof, is made in the Province of Kiamfi, of yellow earth: whence it is dispeised into the other Provinces, and euen to vs. They will with yre sow the broken pieces together, and make them hold liquor, as we doe with wooden dishes. Their glasse is not comparable to ours. Their buildings are of Timber, euen the Kings houses, the lower walls sometimes of Bricke; which, together with their store of shipping, argues their plentie of Timber: the kinds, most part, such as with vs. Oakes are scarce; but in stead thereof, they haue a hard kind of euerslabing wood, which the Portugalls therefore call iron, being like it also in colour. Cedar they vse for Funerall Coffins and Tombs, in which they are curious and costly. They haue also a kind of Reed (the Portugalls call it Bambu) almost as hard as yron, the greater sort, though hollow, and distinguished guished with knots, yet supplying the roome of studs, or posts, in smaller houses, being as big as with both hands may be griped: the smaller serve for launces, and other manifold uses. Of these is exceeding plenty and cheapnesse.

For Fuell, they have Wood, Coales, Reeds, Stubble, and a kind of pitchy bituminous matter, called 1 Mu (they have the like in the Bishopricke of Leege) digged out of the earth, very cheap, and not troublesome with the smoake. Here grows plenty of Rhubarbe, and Lignum sanctum: here is also store of Muske. Salt is made not only by the Sea-side, but of diuers waters within land. Sugar is more vied then Honey, yet like plenty of both. Waxe is there not of Honey alone, but another whiter and better, and burning clearer, made by certain Wormes, which they keepe on Trees to this purpose: and a third sort, made of the fruit of a Tree. Their Paper will not last with ours, nor beare Inke but on one side: yet they haue as white as ours, made of Cotton.

They haue Marbles of diuers colours, precious Stones, odoriferous Woods, and Gums, with other rarities. Amongst the rest, a certaine Shrub, the leaves whereof are gathered in the Spring, and dried in the shadow, and so preferred to their daily decoctions, which they drinke continually, both at Table, and when one friend enters anothers house, or oftner, if he makes any stay. They call it Cia, sup it hot, more healthsome then toothsome, for it hath a bitter smacke. The Iaponians will giue ten or twelue duckats for one pound of the best, and drinke it in powder mingled with two or three spoonfulls of boyling water: but the Chinois steepe the leaves. They haue another pitchy substance like milke, which they straine out of the barked of a certaine Tree, whereof they make their Cie, the Portugals call it Ciancon, wherewith they varnish their houses and household stuffe, and ships, in diuers colours, with glasse-like shining to the eye, smoothnesse to the touch; besides the long continuance, pleasingly maiestically: the cause they need no clothes for their Tables which are easily restored to their crytall lustre with a little washing, if by any fatty substance dimmed. Oyle is also expressed out of the fruit of another Tree, of use like the former, but inferior somewhat, and more plentifull. Cinnamon and most excellent Ginger are here growing; Pepper, Nutmegs, Aloes, and other like, are here plentifully, out of the Ilands and bordering Kingdomes. Gunpowder they haue in great store, which they vse not so much in Peeces (whereto they are more vnapt) as in Fire-works; in which they are curiously artificiall, lively expresting Trees, with their fruits, and other rarities. In the first month of the yeere wee saw as much this way spent at Nanquin, as would haue serued for two yeeres continuall warre.

§. III.

Of the Cities and Castles in China: and of Quinsay.

 The number of their Cities and their differing sorts is mentioned before. Besides these, they haue two sorts of Castles, both for fortification and habitation, with priuiledges also of Market, the greater sort named Huy 293. the lesse of greater number 293. Their Villages are innumerable. In each Citie is an Officer that hath charge of the walls, whereby they are kept faire and strong: and for further beautie, besides commoditie of shadow, they plant trees at their doores, which continue greene all the yeere long. The Cities generally are like one another, except in greatnesse.

The streets are strait, yeelding prospect from one gate to another. Canton (so the Portugals call it, according to the name of the Province: the Chinois call it Quamcheu, or Canceu) is accounted the least of the Metropolitan Cities: it hath on one side a great navigable Riuer, elsewhere enuironed with a deepe trench, filled with water, which is navigable also: the walls haue fourescore and three Bulwarkes; the streets so broad that ten men may ride in front, and paue, adorned with many triumphant Arches, and shops on both sides: the bridges there and elsewhere in the Kingdome are many of large free stones very costly, the high wayes very stately which leade to the Cities: and the Kings houses for the publike Officers very magnificent after their manner. Such was the plenty and abundance, that in this one Citie were spent every day betwene five and sixe thousand Hogs, and betwene ten and eleuen thousand Duckes, besides a great number of Kine, Birds, Hens, Conies, Frogs, Dogs, Fish of many sorts: and yet the most vsuall meate of the Chinois is Rice boyled with water.

Nanquin standeth in two and thirde degrees, and is eight or ten leagues from the Sea, with a Riuer leading thither. It hath three faire brick walls, with large and stately gates. The first wall containeth the Kings Palace, which it selfe also is compassed with three walls, in manner of a Castle, with ditches full of water round about them. This I dare be bold to say (it is as Ricinus his report) that no King in the world excels this King in a Palace, if we compare not particulars, but all things together. This first wall is in circuit four or five Italian miles. The second wall containeth the first; and withall, the best part of the Citie, having in it twelve gates plated with Iron, furnished with Ordnance; it comprehendeth eightene Italian miles. The third wall is not continued, but Arte supplying Nature elsewhere fortifying it; the compass whereof can scarcely be knowne. The Inhabitants say, that two went out on horsebacke, one this way, the other that, and met againe at night, having spent the day, each in his semicircle. The greatest part is very populous, howsoever there are also Mountaines, Gardens, Groves, and Lakes within the Citie. This singular forme is to be observed, as of greatest capacitie. There are fortie thousand Souldiers in continuall garrison. It is full of Palaces, Temples, Bridges, Towers; of best aire, fertilitie, and ingenious Inhabitants. The River doth not onely passe by, but entreteth the Citie with divers channels made by arte, capable of great ships.

1 This seemes to be some kind of Coale, such as is found in diuers places of our Iland.

The streets are (saith Pantogia) of two leagues, or of two and a halfe in length, wide, and paved. The compass is at least eleven or twelve leagues, and containeth by coniecture two hundred thousand houses, and (according to all the opinions of the Iesuites there abiding) equalling, or exceeding in people four of the greatest Cities in Europe.

Paquin (or as Ricinus alway calls it Pequin) is situate about a hundred miles from that famous Wall against the Tatars: in greatness and neatnesse exceeded by that of Nanquin; but in multitude of Inhabitants, Souldiers, and Magistrates, exceeding it. Two high and strong walls compass the South parts, so wide, that twelve horse may easily runge thereon together, without hinderance. These walls are of bricke, sauing at the foundation of huge staves, filled with earth in the midst, farre higher then those in Europe. On the North side there is but one. On these walls as diligent watch is kept every night, as in the hottest warre: in the day-time Eunuches watch at the gates, or rather exact customes. The Kings Palace is within the inner Southerne wall, neere the Gates, and so runges vnto the Northern wall, the rest of the Citie stretching on both sides. It is lesse then the Palace at Nanquin, but more glorious, that seeming by the Kings long absence a carcase without life. The Citie is troublesome (being little of it paved) in winter with durt, in summer with dust, which in that Region, wherein it feldome raines, vpon any blast of winde, fills their houses, and to prevent the trouble, there is none of any ranke which goes on foot, so rideth without a vaile hanging downe to their breasts and couering their faces, so thinne that it may hinder the dust and not the sight, preventing also the tedious knowledge and salutations by others. There are Muletters and Hackney-men in every corner, to let their beasts to such as will hire them, who also know all chiefe places, and make way in those populous streets vnto their customers, both for a little money. But for this there is also a Booke which relateth the scite and streets of the Citie: they may also hire chaires and bearers to carrie them.

Succu.

In the Prouince of Sciantum is Cinchiamfu (which in Paulus his time, had two Churches of Christians) whence is a River made by hand (a thing vsuall in China) whereby they haue passage to Succu, and to the Metropolitane Citie of Chequian, Hamceu. This River is so cloyed with ships, because it is not frozen in winter, that the way is stopped with multitude: which made Ricinus exchange his way by water into another (more strange to vs) by wagon, if we may so call it, which had but one wheele, so built that one might sit in the middle as it were on horse-backe, and on each side another; the wagoner putting it swiftly and safely forwards with leuers or barres of wood (those wagons driuen by wind and faile, he mentions not) and so he came speedily to Succu and Hamceu, which are of the Chinois effectem Paradises. They haue a prouerbe, then Xam thien tham, si Xam su Ham: that which the Hallofheauen or Presence-chamber is in heauen, that on earth are Succu and Hamcen. And fitt for Succu, the beautie, plentie, frequency, situation, make it admirable. It is seated as Venice, but better, in a pleasant River of fresh water, if it may not rather be called a Lake for the fulnesse. They may passe quite through it, either by water or land, all the streets and houses are founded vpon piles of Pine-tree, and the merchandise brought from Marao, and other parts and ports are here sold, as the fittest centre for dispersion. It hath one gate into the land, other passages by boat; innumerable bridges, very stately and durable, but in those narrow hills hauing one onely arch: butter and milke-meates no where more spent, nor better wine of rice, which is carried thence to Paquin: by the frequency of the Hauens and multitude of ships, almost denying faith to the eyes, which would thinke all the ships of the Kingdome here assembled, and notwithstanding the continuall going out so supplied as if they neuer weighed: the hand-made Rivers that are made from Nanquin-ward hither, so peopled with Townes, Cities, Villages, as no where in the Kingdome more, as from from hence also to Hamceu. It is scarcely two dayes iourney from the Sea, and the head of that Region, in which are eight Cities. When Hunni expell'd the Tartars, this Region held out longest against him, and therefore to this day payes an excessive tribute, even halfe of all which the earth brings forth: some two small Provinces not paying so much as this one Region, and the City alone (as in the printed Booke of the Kings tributes is extant) payes twelve millions to the King, more then the greatest Kingdom in Europe, if some have not accounted ¶ falsely: and he which knows this City will not marvell at it. It is still kept with a strong Garrison, for feare of innovation.

But Hamceu or Hanceu, the Metropolitane of Chequian, is perhaps more to be admired, o situate South-east from Nanquin almost nine dayes iourney, not two dayes from the Sea, in 30. degrees. This Province of Chequian is the chiefe of the thirteene washed on the East with the Sea, having Nanquin and Kiamfi on the West, Fuquian on the South, Xanton on the North; numbring twelue greater Cities, the chiefe of sixtie three lesse, besides innumerable Townes, Castles, Villages; the best wits, and most learned students in the whole Kingdom; it yeelds a fertile soyle, Art contending with Nature for variety of Rivers, so many as may seeme impossible to humane industrie, adorned with numberlesse Bridges of many arches, made of huge stones, equall to the European workmanship, and so abounding with Mulberrie trees and Silke-wormes, that all the China Markets, besides other Countries, are hence furnished; and ten vests of Silke may be had at a cheaper price, then one of Cloth in Europe. Hamceu is the chiefe City of this Province, yea, in all this Kingdom, lesse perhaps somewhat in compasse of walls then Nanquin, but better peopled: no place in the City empty, nor occupied with Gardens, but all builded, and all the buildings almost with diuers stories, which in other Cities of China is not vsuall. The Inhabitants are so many, and the Tribute so much, that the Iesuites durst not relate that which hereof they had heard by graue testimonie, for the incredibillitie: the description would aske a whole volume. The chiefe street is almost halfe a dayes iourney in length, and cannot be lesse then admirable. For whereas the Chinois vse to erect triumphall Arches, as Monuments; to well-deserving Magistrates and ornaments to their Cities; this one street hath at least three hundred such (besides very many others in other parts of the City) of masse stones, and exceeding curious workmanship, that if the houses on both sides yeelded the like splendour, the world could not shew such a spectacle. But they occupie it all with shops, and build the most magnificence of their houses inwards, and yet those not like the European Palaces. There is also a Lake close to the City, which the eye can scarcely measure, which sliding into a valley encompassing, embosomed with diuers hillocks; hath giuen occasion to Arte to shew her stonit in the adorning the same, beautifying all those spacious bankes with houses, gardens, groves; a very labyrinth to the bewitched eyes, not knowing whereat most in this maze to be most amazed, wherein most to delight. And in delights doe they spend their dayes, filling the Lake with vessels, furnished with feasts, spectacles and playes on the water. There is a pleasant Hill in the middle of the City, whereon is a faire Tower or Steeple, where they measure their houres by a strange deuice. Out of huge vessels water droppeth from one to another, the lowest being very large, in the middle whereof is perpendicularly raised a rule, distinguished with houre-spaces, which by the ascent or descent of the water, diuide the rising and declining day, and declare the houres: every halfe houre some men appointed by tables with cubittall letters, to giue notice of the time to all men. From this Hill is a prospect ouer all the City. All the streets being set with trees, make shew of pleasant gardens. It is so full of Rivers, Lakes, Rills, Ponds, both in the City and Suburbs, as if a man would frame a Platonickall Idea of elegancie to his mind. The Idoll Temples are many and stately, which Idolatrie where it is wanting in China, hath a worse successfull, Atheisme.

o Let vs stay a while and gaze (for where haue you such an Obiect?) Is not Quinsay (whilome the Royall Seat of the Kings of Mangi, as Venetius recordeth, supposed by our moderne Geographers to be swallowed vp with some Earthquake, or in Bellona's all-consuming bellie) here raised vp from the graue? The Lake situate on the one side, (so Panlly reports of Quinsay) the Name Quinsay signifying the City of Heauen, and this called a Heaptys Paradise by the Chinois; and Han signifies Laltea via in Heauen; and Ceu, persist: yea, Quinsay, or as Odoicus calls it, Canasia, and Han or Hanceu, not so disagreeing in sound, as different Dialects are wont: the excellency being chiefe City in the Kingdom, and this Province sometimes royall, as Pequin now and Nanquin are; the situation, South-east from Cineziensu, and ¶ true and twentie miles from the Sea: the high houses, and shops underneath: the exceeding trade, reuenue, pastimes by water, multitudes, fairness, and length of the streets; all so conspiring to proue this Han or Hamceu to bee that Quinsay of Panlly. True it is, that Quinsay was then greater, being as Venetius sayth, an hundred hundred miles about: But the euerling of that Euseb and his Familie, their raising, the diuerting of the Court to Cambalu by the Tartars, and after to Nanquin by Hannu, and neuer returning hither, might lessen the same. And might not warres, in that long siege by the Tartars; in the recovery thereof by the Chinois, easily circumscribe her superfluities? Besides, who knoweth whether all this huge Lake might be contained in that account of Pandus, still compassed about with buildings? Or before those warres, the Lake it selfe might (as Suceu now is) be builded on; which Time and Warre hath consumed: nor since the removal of the Court were so necessarie. Mandeville mentions warres at Quinsay in his time Nicolo di Conti (which was here about the yeere 1440) saith Quinsay was in his time new build, of thirtie miles compass. Or if any like better, that Suceu it selfe (to which also many of these arguments agree) should be this Quinsay, I contradiet not. That which sometimes I haue thought that Quinsay, after so long a sickness, and consumption of warres, died; bequeathing her Land, greatiest to Nanquin, her Sea-treasures to Suceu, both arising out of the ashes of that Quinsay-Phoenix; I find: cannot (I meane for Nanquins) agree with the distance betwixt Suceu and Nanquin, about foure dayes iourney. Of this Quinsay, let the Reader take a large and leisurely view in Marcus Paulus; which but for tediousnesse I could hither haue transcribed. Whether Hancu or Suceu be it, or whether both these Paradises doe now succeed that Citie of heauen, or wheresoeuer else it be, it was (which these are) the wonder of the world: reported (saith Paulus) to haue 12000. bridges, 160000. households: in which was arich Mart of all commodities of the world: there was spent euery day 9589. pounds of Pepper; it had ten principall Market-places, square, each square halfe a mile, the chiefe streets leading thereto being fortie paces wide, and running strait from one end of the Citie to the other, these Market-places foure miles asunder. But I forbear the rest; this Citie had twelue principall Companies or Arts, each of which had 12000. shops: the adioyning Countrey (reckoned the ninth part of Mangi) paid six millions and 40000. Duckats to the Great Chan yearly for custome of Salt, made of the Sea-water, by the heat of the Sunne in large plaines: besides sixteene millions and 80000. Duckats otherwise.

But let vs looke on some of the mesner Cities, one (of those called Hien) is Scianhai in the Province of Nanquin, in 29. degrees ouer-against Cerra, and within foure and twentie houres sayle of Japon, and therefore is defended with a Garrison and a Naule; it hath about 40000. households, and the iurisdiction adioyning seemes a continued Citie with Gardens intermixt; it payes to the King 300000. Duckats: there is great store of Rice and Cotton, and in this Citie and the Suburban-liberties are 200000. Weauers thereof: the aire wholesome, and they liue ordinarily to a great age, some to fourscore, and fourscore and ten, and many to a hundred yeeres. The keyes of Cities are euery night brought to the Governours, and thousands appointed to watch to prevent theues, theaues, lues being the worst: they ring bells at certaine spaces to each other.

These Cities of China ordinarily want that elegance and magnificence, which stateli Temples and sumptuous building doe afford vnto our Cities of Europe. Their houses are lowe; without the ornament of Porches, Galleries, Windows, and prospect into the streets. Besides these habitations, they haue many which dwell not on land but in their ships. For their shipping is of two sorts, one for sayle, another for habitation also, and these meaner or fairer, according to the wealth of the owners. In the one side they carrie their families, in the other side their passengers. Many Barques are as victuallling houses by the way, and likewise as shops of merchandize. Many of the poorer water-dwellers get their liuing by labour on land: their wiues ferry ouer passengers, and vie meanes to get fish. They bring vp thousands of Duckes, hatched with artificiall heat in dung, which hauing fed with a little Rice in the morning, they put out at a doore into the water, which presently swim on land, and eat the weedes which grow among the Rice (these weeders thereby procuring some wages of the husband-men to their owners) and at night are called home with a Tabor, each resorting to their owne Barque. They haue certaine Sea-crowes or Cormorants, wherewith they fish, tying their gorges that they cannot swallow the fishes which they take, till their Masters turne being serued, they are suffered to hunt for themselves: which one in this Citie of London hath lately imitated and effected.

In the winter they haue store of Ice and Snow, whereby the Rivers are frozen euen about Nanquin. They haue abundance of all things necessarie to the life of man, fruits, flesh, and fish, with prices correspondent. They haue two, and somewhere three harrets in the yeere, Few Mountaines, but Plaines of an hundred leagues. Wine they make of Rice. They are thrice a day, but sparingly. They drinke (be it water or wine) they drinke hot, and eat: with two stickes of Iuorie, Ebonie, or like matter, not touching their meate with their hands; and therefore little napery serueth them. Their warme drinks and abundance

Of their Persons, Attire, and many strange Rises.

10 Some of the Chinois haue faces almost square: many in the Prouinces of Canton and Quambi, haue two nayles on their little toes, a thing common to all the Cauchin Chinois. Their women are all of lowe stature, and account small feet their greatest elegance, and therefore binde and swaddle them so from their infancy all their liues, that they seeme, in going, stump-footed: which seemes to be by deuice of some to keepe them within doores. Neither men nor women euer cut off their haire (which is generally blacke, and other colour a deformitie) they let it growe on their crownes only till fifteene yeeres of age, after that all their heads out, adde on their shoulders till twentie yeeres, when they put on their virilis = pileus, the cap of manhood, and then gather it vp, the men into caules or hats, hollow at the top for the haire to passe thorow; which the women yle not, but trimme vp their haire on knots with gold, silver, stones, and flowers, caring also at their eares, but no rings on their fingers. Both men and women weare long garments with wide sleeves, The men weare shooes of silke with curious workes and knots: none weares of leather but the basest yea, their soles they make of cloth. The learned men weare square caps or hats, others round. They be slow long time every morning in trimming their haire. They yle no shirts, but weare their inmost garment of white cloth, and yle often washing. They haue fans or vmbrellas to keepe off the sunne or raine, borne oute them by their seruants; the poorer carrie them of lesse forme, themselves. The generally colour of the Chinois is white, more or lesse according to the climate. Their beard is thin, long before it comes, of a few staring haire (in some none) noses little, scarce standing forth; 30 eyes prominent, blacke, little, of egge-fashion; (many dreame they had of Pantagruel's eyes of a darke gray colour, as if iewels and precious things might thereby be knowne where they were hidden) their eares are small. If they would paint a deformed man, they giue him a short garment, great eyes, and beard, with a long nose, like to vs.

Their cuttome of names is very strange. The surname is ancient, vncchangeable and significant, of which there are not a thousand in all China. The name is also significant, and arbitrary, at the fathers pleasure, if a sonne: For daughters haue no names, besides the surname, but are called after their age and order; the sonnes also are so called by others; first, second, or otherwise, with their surname; the parents onely and ancestors calling them by their names, and themselves in their writings. It would be accounted an iniurie if any other should call them thereby: or if he should call his father or kinsman by his name. When 40 first a child be taken to studie, his Master giues him another name, which hee and his schoole-fellowes may call him by, and no man else. When he puts on his Man hat, and marries a wife, some chiefe man giues him another name more honorable, by which all men may call him, but his seruants, or such as are subiect to him. This they call the Letter. Lastly, when he is of full ripe age, some graue man giues him his most honorable name, which they call Great, and by this any one may stile him: which yer his parents and elders doe not, but onely by the Letter. If any make profession of Religion in any of their Sects, his ghostly Father or Authour of his profession giues him a new name (which they call) of Religion. When one visits another, if hee doe not write in his letter (of which afterwards) his honour 50 table name or surname, the Visitee askes him of it, that he may call him thereby without iniurie. And the Iesuites doe also take to themselves in China-fashion such honorable names.

Names.
Surnames few;

They are studious of Antiquities. Pictures artificially drawne with inke, without other colours they haue in highest price; the characters also and writings of the Ancients, with their Seales annexed. For many will seeke to gull men with counterfeits. All Magistrates haue the Seale of their office deliuered to them by Humus, which if they lose, they are both 60 deprived and punished, most diligently therefore preferred, carrying it with them to all places, and laying it vnder their heads at night. Men of good fort goe not in the streets on foot, but are carried in a close chaire by four men, the curtins drawne on all parts but before: to distinguishing them from Magistrates, whose chaires are every way open. The Mafors are also carried in chaires closed euery way, by the forme easily knowne from those of Men. Coaches and Chariots the law forbids. Dice and Cards are common playes in China; Chess also somewhat vnlike ours: for the King goes not out of foue places next him, 70 and and the two Bishops haue their Queenes: two men also goe before the Knights, besides the ordinary pawnes. They haue another play which makes the skillfull therein well esteemed, though he can doe nothing else, with two hundred men, some white, some blacke, on a table of three hundred diuisions. This is vsed by the Magistrates. Women goe not abroad, except seldome to see their neerest kindred, or some of basest condition.

In their offices of vrbanie and courtesie they goe beyond all others, haue many bookes thereof, and reckon it one of those fine vertues, which they call Cardinall. I feare to be in the relation, as they in action, tedious: and will but salute their salutations. They vncouer not the head to any, nor stirre the knee or foot, or vse embraces or kissing the hand. Their hands are hid and ioyned in their wide sleeves, except they doe some worke or with a fanne coole themselves, and in salutations first lift vp both sleeves and hands aloft in a modest manner, and then let them fall againe, standing face to face; and saying, Zin, Zin, which word is a rituell interiection, without any signification. When one visits another, or when friends meet in the streets, they doe thus, bowing also their bodies with their heads almost to the ground: they call this Zu ye: the inferior placing the superiour, and the visited the visitor, on the right hand (in the Northerne Prouinces on the left) and then turne themselves both to the North. In solemn salutations, on high dayes, or after long absence, after the first bowing they kneele and touch the ground with their forehead; and then rise and doe it againe three or foure times ouer. In visitations, after other officious ceremonies, they offer him Chia to drinke (of which we haue spoken) with other iunkets. Except there bee great familiarity, he which will salute a friend, must at the doore deliuer to the seruant a letter before for his harbenger, to signifie his name in modest termes and affection towards him, with termes answerable to his estate. He is hereby warned to prepare himselfe for entertainment, clothing himselfe with apparrell for that purpose, as must the guest also. If they were vnknewne to each other, they prostrate themselves, and knocke the ground diuers times with their foreheads. If they send a Present, they send withall a Letter, containing the Inuentorie of the things sent, with termes very complementall; which he must answer with another Letter of thanks, and a Present of like or greater value besides a recompence to the messenger. Their partings from each other are as full of ceremonie. In their feasts, they set each guest to tables, one furnished with flesh and fish, the other with fruits and iunkets. They send a Paître or Letter (the day, and sometime five or sixe dayes) before, to inuite them; and he which cannot come, with another Letter must excuse himselfe. On the day, with the first light he sends new inuitations, and againe a little before the time, or else his guests will not come. Much curtesie is in the meeting, exceeding much straying and striding about the place of sitting, as much solemn ceremonie in eating, as if they were bidden to be witnesses of their Hosts ostentation, to view and a little to taste his meates; but after sixe houres spent in this banquet, they may goe home to fill their bellies. In this officious trifling the Chinois spend a great part of their liues; but especially at the beginning of the new yeere fiftene dayes together, and at their birth dayes.

When seruants salute their Masters, or the baser people their Superiours, they fall on their knees and thrice touch the ground with their foreheads, iust as they doe to their Idols: and when the Master speakes to his seruants, they stand at his side, and at euery answer fall on their knees; and so doe the people to the great men. When one speakes to another they neuer vse the second person, nor the first when they speake of themselves, except Masters and Superiours to their seruants or inferiours. Many formes of complementall modestie in termes they haue, but the lowest, to call himselfe by his proper name, as we vse the pronoun I: and if they speake of any, they vse some more honorable name and circumlocution, if of themselves some modest termes. The Iesuits obserue a state and keepe within doores, not easie to be spoken with, because the Chinois contemne such as obserue modestie, and price men by their familiar and solempne reuerations.

When they send presents to each other, they may without inciuility take some and refuse others: they also vse to send presents in money. If a man be not within, when one comes with his Letter to visit, they leaue the Letter at the doore, to signifie his purpose: and this is enough also for the visited partie when in refusing he findes him absent. For euery one that visits must within three dayes be visited, in which respect the Iesuits were forced to cause their Porter or Seruant to keepe a note of them all, lest they should forget to repay these offices. If one meet another which hath not on his salutatory habit, he may not pettish these robes; or else he that was attired must put off, and both salute in ordinary habit.

In drinking, the Inuiter begins, holding vp his cup in a dish with both hands, all the guests turning to him, and pledging him together at once: supping vp their liquor, at foure or five times, although it be water, and not at one draught. No bread is brought into their feasts, feasts, nor Rice. None are compelled to drinke more then they please. The maiestie of feasts is in variety of dishes, none being taken off the table that are once set on, till the feast ended, and then bestowed on the guests seruants.

Their bookes are full of precepts of obsequence to Parents and Superiours, which outwardly is there performed more then in all the world besides. They neuer sit in equall site, or ouer-against their betters, but on the lower side. This the Scholers performe to their Masters, speaking to them with great reuerence, and (if they bee poore) nourishing them whiles they liue with their owne labour. And when one is admitted Scholer to another, the Master sits in the higher end of the Hall (which is ordinarily to the North, all the Temples, and priuate buildings, if it may be, opening to the South) with his countenance to the doore. The Scholer comes before him, and foure times bowes his body, and as often kneeles downe and toucheth the ground with his forehead: euer after (though higher preferred) sitting at his side in euery meeting: although he hath bene his Scholer but one day.

Here Nature is so prouident of Materials, Art is easily induced to triall of experiments: of which we will name such as to vs seeme rarest. They generally are not so curious for exquisite workmanship, as to make things saleable at easier and cheaper rates: where Nobilitie is wanting, & the Mandarines pay what they please, and sometime force their employments. They build for themselves, not minding continuance to posteritie: nor will they beleue without much astonishment the magnificence and antiquitie of European buildings. Foundations they lay not deepe (visually not at all) within the earth: which makes the greatest buildings short-liued, and their Citie walls to be often repaired. The tooles of their houses, euen where the walls are bricke, are sustained with pillars or posts of wood, and not on those walls. Printing is with them of ancient vse, at least fise hundred yeeres, some say, more then a thousand and sixe hundred. Their manner differs much from ours, and is rather an expression then impression: they provide a table of Pearre-tree, or other smooth wood, and vpon the same lightly glue the whole sheet or written copie, which being dried is cunningly taken off, so as the characters remaine on the same table, which is presently carued and cut with Iron instruments, that nothing but the draughts or lineaments of the letters are eminent and standing vp. Then with incredible celeritie and facilitie they print off the same, one man sometimes fiftene hundred in one day. And in cutting their tables they are so ready and expedite, that one of our Composers seemes to mee as long in setting a sheet of ours, as they in cutting theirs. The reason is, the greatnesse of their characters; for so small as our letters could not easily be engrauen in their tables. This commoditie they haue, that they may be layd by for as many impressions as they please, and in the meane time he may print off, for number of copies, as he findes sale: both which are wanting in our manner of printing. This makes their bookes so many and so cheape: and this easinesse made the Iesuits: print at their owne houses, what bookes they liked. They haue also another way of printing. An Epitaph or other copie being cut in stone or wood, they lay thereon a lease of moist paper, and on the same a woollen cloth: and then beat it on with a hammer till the thine paper insinuate it selfe into the emptie spaces of the mould or forme, and then lightly lay on inke or what other colouring they please, so that the Epitaph or Copie remaines in an elegant white: provided that this be vied where there is vse of greater characters.

M. Ricci. li. 44.

Printing,

That which some hold of steeping and burning the earth, of which their Porcelaine is made an hundred yeeres in the earth, remouing it euery eight dayes, others gainsay, and our Iesuits is silent. Linschoten affirmeth, that the earth is naturally hard, beaten small, steeped, often fired, and of the finest swimming in the top the finest made. Printing is much vied but not in such perfection as with vs: which is true also of grauing and caruing. To adorne their pictures with oyle, or shadows and landskips they know not, and in statues they haue no other rule of symmetrie but the eye. Their bells haue wooden clappers, and seeme not able to indure Iron, and therefore not comparable in sound to ours. Muscical Instruments they haue many and manifold: but they want Organs (except some blown with the mouth) and all such as goes with keyes, their strings are woven of raw-silke, and know not our way of making them. Nor doe they know the discord-concord in muscicall harmonie of diuers voyces, so that their musike to vs is harsh, in their owne opinion glorious. For measuring houres they vse houre-glasses of water and other devices, but in this and dyalling very rude.

They

They are much addicted to Comedies and therein excell vs : many young men travelling through the Kingdome in this profession and practice, or abiding in chiefe places of resort : But there (as here) the dregs of mankind. They are hired vnto feasts, whither they come provided for what play shall be demanded : offering to that end their booke of Comedies to the feast-Master, to chuse which he lieth : which the guests behold in their feasting-time with such pleasure, that they continue sometimes ten houres in feeding their eyes, and tastes, with one seruice after another in both kindes. Their Comedies are ancient, few of later writing, which the Actors pronounce in a singing accent. They haue also dancers on the rope, tumblers, and other feat-workers. Mathan an Eunuch feasted the Jesuites, where all these kindes were employed, being of his owne familie. One of them cast three knives vp into the aire, still catching them by the hasts. Another lying on his backe, tossed with his feet lifted vp, an earthen vessell euery way, so as hardly might be done with the hands: the like tennis-play with his feet he vsed with a ball, and a great table. They had also dumbe shewes acted : and a boy dancing very artificially : on a sudden start vp a boy of earth keeping the same measure, and much admirable sport betwixt them.

Seales are in much vse, not onely for their Letters, but for other their writings, Poems, Pictures, and other things : they contayne onely their name, surname, degree and dignitie. They vse not one, but diuers, not in waxe, but coloured red ; the Grandes hauing at table a box : full of Seales, which contayne their diuers names engrauen (for euery Chinoise is called by many names) and are of diuers matter, Wood, Marble, Iuorie, Brasse, Cryfall, Corall, and other stones more precious. The makers of them are many and those learned, the characters differing from the vulgar, and fauoring antiquitie. The art of Inke-making also is not here illiberal, which they make vp in balls, * of the smoake of oyle, and grind with water on a stone, and then take it vp with pensils made of Hares haire, and write therewith, not with penne, their paper being like thinn : transparent parchment.

They all of both sexes vse fang^{er}, without which none of them come abroad, not so much for necessity (especially in colder places and seasons) as for a kind of grace : Euen as gloves with vs are most for ornament, and the most vsuall presents, so are fang^{er} : in China; of diuers matter and forme, Reed, Wood, Iuorie, with Paper, Silke, or a kind of odoriferous Straw; round, square, ouall, with sentences written therein. In these things these differ from vs; in other things are very like, in the vse of tables, stools, beds, which other people neere and farr are obserue not, but sit, feede, and sleepe on carpets spread on the ground.

Things are there exceeding cheape; 7 a hundred pound of Sugar may be bought for nine or ten six-pences; and other things proportionable : so that though there are none rich, as we interpret the word in Europe, for such and such degrees : yet this cheapnesse doth recompence that other defect. They haue Artificers of all grades : and in idleness none may liue. The impotent are well provided for in Hospitals. They haue no Gentlemen, but euery man is a Plebeian vntill his merits raise him. Preferment is atchieued onely by learning. This maketh them generally studious.

VI.

Of their language, writing, Astrologie, Philosophie, and Physicke.

He beginning of this discourse must be with their words, letters, and writing : wherein this is first to be admitted, that they haue not one booke written in the vulgar idiom or common language. But they haue one language called Quenbo, for their Courts, and writings, which is common through all China, which alone the Iesuites learned, and which the learned and strangers commonly vse; women also and children attaining by this common vse to the vnderstanding thereof. As for the differing languages of each Province, it is not so necessary nor commendable, being but of vulgar syllables, howeouer sometimes two or three vowels fall into one diphthong. As for them, they mention not vowels or consonants, or letters, but in writing, the letter, syllable, word is all one, being nothing else but hieroglyphicall characters, of which there are no fewer then words, or things, which yet they so compound and connexe, that they haue not above 70. or 80000. If we pronounce any of their words in two syllables, it is when two of their characters are applied to signifie one thing. Some 10000. of these characters are necessary for vsuall writing: for to know them all, is that which few either can, or need. Their sound also is in great part the same, and yet both figure and signification different; so that there is no so equiuocall a language; neither can a Heaer write out an Oration or Speech from

from the Speakers mouth, nor a booke be understood of them which heare it read, but they must look, and discern with their eyes that equiuocation which their eares cannot. And in speaking they are often hereby forced sometime to repeat that which hath before been elegantly deliuered, sometimes to write it, or (if such meanes be wanting) with water on the Table, or Characters formed with the finger in the ayre, to expresse their mynd; to the conceit of others: and this is most common amongst the most learned which speake in print, and affect inke-borne Rhetorike. They haue fine accents, by which they also distinguish this equiuocation, that one and the same word thus by accents diuersified, shall signifie seuerall things nothing alike. This makes the language hard to be learned of strangers; which yet the Iesuites haue learned to write and read; and I would all the Equiuocators amongst them (that reach to illude oaths, and delude the World by their two-fold, two-forked, serpentine Equiuocation in Mental referuations, & Verball double-significations) were all there, learning the China language to conuert Heathens, rather then here praefising the Romish equiuocating Dialect to peruert Christians to worse then Heathenisme. Peruerse Masters, louers of strange language, in Prayers to God in Oaths and Assertions to Man; in the one, Parrats without reason in the other Devils, without Religion: this being the strongest bond which Religion hath, binding at once to God and Man, and yet their Religious Mountebanks, by iuggling quers dissolving these bonds, and at once deluding both God & Man. Foolish Romans! that sent backe the Legates to Hannibal, that by equiuocation had before fulfilled their Oath of returning! foolish Regulus! that returned to thy Tormentors, chusing thy selfe rather then thy Oath to be tortured! and most foolish Martyrs, that so sleightly for want of this sleight, ran vpon Fire, Swords, Lions! And might not we begin a contention with that assertion, That an Oath for confirmation is to men an end of contention, which in this equiuocating Hydra is rather multiplied? That neither Rome Ethnike, nor primitive Christian Rome, could (at least by imitation of diabolically ambiguous Oracles) deuiſe in those dayes so transcendent a subtlety, but Moderne Rome by Iesuiticall midwifery, must be the Mother of so super-fine a babe! But what doth this Brat in our way? I will rather follow the Iesuits in China then in Rome (except when Rome followes them thither too) and herein with thankfulness accept their report. The reason of this equiuocall sound of words is ascribed to the Chinois account of eloquence, in writing rather then speaking, and therefore to furnish that, neglecting this: in so much as familiar messages are sent by writing, and not by word of mouth. Musickall skill was a good helpe to the Iesuits in learning the language, by reason of their variety of accents. And although this multitude of Characters be to the Memory burthenſome, yet it helps it as much another way in sauing the labour of learning diuers languages, whiles euery Prouince of China speaking diuersly, agree in writing: the Iaponians, also Corayans, Cauchin-Chinois, Leuhiees, all conceiuing the same Characters, although the Iaponians haue an Alphabet of letters to write after our manner, which the Chinois haue not. They write their lines from the top of the Page to the bottome downwards, which they multiply from the right hand to the left: whereas our custome is quite contrary, from the left hand, side-ways. We haue three consonants B.D.R. which the Chinois neither vse, nor can by any Character expresse: and in our words which haue them they borrow some sound nereſt the same. Likewise they neuer haue two consonants without a vowel betweene: and all their words end in vowels, except M, or N, of consonants onely. This and the diuers pronuntiation of their Characters in diuers places, made the Latin forme of Baptisme hard to be expresse by the Iesuites.

Now for the Subject of their studies, their chiefe is Morall Philosophie: in Natural they are rude: and their Ethikes are confusedly deliuered, not digrest into formall method (for of Logicke they are ignorant) but in confused sentences and discourses. The greatest of the Chinian Philosophers was Confutius, who was borne five hundred and fifty one yeeres before the Incarnation of our Lord, and liued aboue seuentie yeeres in great shew of learning & holinesse. And few of our Ethnike Philosophers haue equallled him, many he hath exceeded. The Chinois haue him in such reputation, that they thinke there neuer liued man more holy, and all his sayings are of authoritie beyond gaine-saying amongst the learned. And the Kings themselves haue euer since had him in veneration, not as a god, but as a most excellent man and Author of their learning; honouring his posteritie, the chiefe of which enioyeth by inheritance ample titles, immunities and reuenues.

They are also indifferently skilled in Astrologie and diuers Mathematicall Sciences: in Geometry and Arithmetike they haue bene more expert. The Constellations they do not distinguish as we do, and number foure hundred Stars more then our Astrologers, reckoning some smaller, which do not alway appeare. They tell the Quantities, and foretell Eclipses, but not exactly: and referre all their Astrologie to that which is called Iudiciall, effecting a fatall dependance of all things from the Stars: and haue borrowed in these Arts many things things from the Saracens. The Author of this Royall Family forbad the studie of Iudiciall Astrologie to all but one Family, in which it continueth by inheritance. But he which now reigneth maintaineth many at great cost, both Eunuchs in his Palace, and Magistrates without, which haue two Courts in Paquin, one obseruing China Kalenders, the other the Saracenicall, and compare both together. Both of them haue an open place on the top of a small Hill to contemplate the Starres, in which they haue Mathematicall Instruments, of exceeding greatnesse, of molten brasie, which seeme to be ancient. On this Hill alwayes one of their Colledge doth watch by night to obserue, if any new Comet, or other raritie appeare in the Heauens: which if it happen, the next day they by libell admonish the King thereof, together with their opinion of good or euill ensuing. This place of contemplation is at Nanquin, is within the Citie, and in massinesse of Instruments excels that at Pequim * or Paquin. The Pequim-Astrologers haue priuiledge of foretelling the Eclipses of Sunne or Moone; and the Magistrates and Priests are commanded to meet in a certaine place in their Robes and Vestments, to helpe the labouring Planet: which they thinke they doe with musically sound of Cymballs, often bowing their knees, all the time of the Eclipse; fearing (as I haue heard) lest some, I know not what Serpent should then deuoure the same.

In Naturall Philosophie they were too Naturall, and haue very little Art. They knew not the cause of the Moones Eclipse, by the interposition of the earth, but thought that being opposite to the Sunne, it lost the light by some amazement; others thought that the Sunne had a hole in the midst, against which when the Moone came, shee lost her light. That the Sunne was greater then the earth seemed to them a strange paradox², much more that this might be spoken of the Starre: the like was it that the Earth was round (for they thought it square, and the middle and best part thereof to be their Kingdome) or that there could be Antipodes without falling, or that heauy things were attracted by the Center, or that there were Orbes: and for the ayre they thought it a vacuum or emptinesse, not reckoning it amongst the Elements, of which yet they numbred fire, Metall, Wood, Fire, Water, Earth. Their Arithmetike was with beades on wyre-strings fastned to a linnen cloth. In these things Ricinus declaring their ignorance and the Europzan Science, with great admiration, they (which before thought all besides themselves Barbarians) saying, that they were to vs as the rude Tartars to them, and that they left where we began, namely at Rhetorike and Grammar, which with Ethikes and Politikes are the chiefe. Some of the Idolatrous sects had more monstrous and ridiculous fancies, that the Sunne hid himselfe euery night in a certaine Hill called Siunni, which they said was fixed in the Sea 24000. miles vnder the water; and for Eclipses, they held that a certaine god named Holeban eclipsed the Sunne, couering it with his right hand; and so the Moone, with his left. Their Astrologers rather obserued their old rules, little knowing or seeking the Naturall causes. The Instruments which they had in their two Colledges at Nanquin and Paquin, were alike, very admirable, seeming to be made in the reigne of the Tartars. Foure of them were very great; One a Globe marked with parallels and meridians, as great as three men could fathom, set vpon a great Cube of brasie likewise: the second was a Spheare, five foot in the Diameter, with Chaines in stead of Circles, diuided into 365. degrees, and a few minutes: the third was a Gnomon, ten foot high on a huge Marble: the fourth, and greatest consisteth of three or foure Astrolabes, each five foot in the Diameter, with other appurtenances very admirable.

Their Rules of Physicke differ much from ours: yet agree with vs in feeling the pulse, and are not vnhappy in their cures. They vse simple medicines, roots, hearbs, and the like, their whole Art in manner the same with our Herbarists. They haue thereof no publike Schoole, but as each priuately learneth of some Teacher. In both the Royall Cities, Degrees are granted to the Professors after Examination; but both this and that of little worth: none being thereby of greater authoritie, or without it hindered to practise. And neither in Physicke nor Astrologie doth any take great paines, which hath any hope of proficiencie in their Ethikes, those being the refuges of Pouertie, this the high-way to Honor. Their Geography was such, that they called their Countrie Thien-bia, that is, All vnder heauen, thinking the World to haue little else of any worth.

2. VII.

Of their Ethikes, Politikes, and Degrees in Learning.

CONFUTIVS, their Philosophicall Prince, compyled foure Volumes of the Ancient Philosophers, adding a fifth of his owne; these he called the Five Dollines. They containe Morall and Politicall Precepts of good Life & Government, with the Examples, Rites, Sacrifices, and Poems of the Ancients. Besides these five Volumes, Volumes out of Confutius, & some of his disciples, are gathered into one Tome, diuers Rules, Sentences, Similes, touching the wel ordering of a mans selfe, family, or the kingdom; which is called the Fourte-booke, and into so many parts diuided. These nine are their ancientest, and fountains of the rest of their books, containing most part of their Hieroglyphicall Characters; authorized by royal Priuileges & ancient Customes to be the Principles and Foundations of all Chiniſ Learning: wherein it is not enough to vnderstand the Text, but suddenly to write of euery sentence; to which purpose, that a Tetrabiblion must be cunne by heart.

They haue no publike Schoole, or Vniuersity, where Readers vnder take to expound them; but euery one is to provide him a Master, at his owne choice and charge; of which are great numbers; because in that multitude of Characters, one cannot teach many, and each man desires to haue his children taught at home. They haue three Degrees, which are conferred vpon such, as by examination are found worthy. This examination is onely in writing: The first Degree, called Siencai, is bestowed in euery Citie by the Tibio (a learned man appointed thereunto by the King) in that place which is named the Schoole; and some what reſembleth our Bachelloſs. This Tibio viſiteth euery Citie in the Prouince, for this purpose; whether when he is come, all the Students in the Citie and Confinnes, that aspire to that Degree, resort, and submit themselves to a three-fold Triall. First, he is examined of certaine Masters, which are set ouer the Bachelloſs, till they attaine a higher Degree: in which, all are admitted so triall that will, sometimes foure or fife thousand in one Citie. These Masters are maintained by the King to this Office. These passe them ouer to a second proofe, by the Fourre Magiſtrates of the Citie; which, of so great a number, chuse some two hundred of the best Writers, whom they commit to the third Examination by the Tibio, who intitleth twentie or thirtie of the chiefe of them, and numbrell them with the Bachelloſs of former yeeres. These are priuileged to weare a Gowne, Cap, and Boote; in token of their Degree; and in publike Assemblies, haue higher Places, besides larger Compliments and Immunities, and are subiect to their Tibio, and those Fourre Masters; other Magiſtrates little meddling with their cases. This Tibio doth also examine those former Bachelloſs, to see how they haue profited or decayed; which, according to their writing, are diuided into fife ranks: the first, are licenced vnto some publike Offices, of lesse reckoning; the second, haue a reward, but not so great: the third, haue neither reward, nor punishment; the fourth, are particularly scourged: the last, degraded, and ranked with the Communalitie.

Their second Degree is called Kingin, somewhat like the Licentiates in some Europzan Vniuersities. This is conferred but once in three yeeres, in the chiefe Citie of the Prouince, in the eight moneth, and with greater ſolemnitie, to fewer, or more, according to the dignitie and largeneſſe of the Prouince. In Pequim, in Nanquin, 150. doe proceed Licentiate; in Ceqiuan, Quiansi, and Fuquiam, 95. in the rest, fewer. Vnto this Triall, onely Bachelloſs, and but the choice of them, are admitted, not aboue thirtie or fortie of one Citie; which yet, sometimes, in one Prouince, amount to 4000. Competitors. That third yeere therefore, which happened with them 1609, 1612, 1615, &c. a few daies before the eight Moone, which often falls out in September, the Magiſtrates of Pequim present vnto the King the Names of 100. the chiefe Philosophers in China, out of which, hee chuseth thirtie (two for euery Prouince) to bee sent Examiners. One of these two, must bee of the Kings Colledge, called Han lin yuen. As soone as euer they are named by the King, they must poſt to their designed Prouince, many Spies attending, that they speake not with any one man of that Prouince, before the Kingin are entituled. Other principal Philosophers also of that Prouince are chosen to assist these Examiners in the first Triall. In euery Prouinciall Citie is a huge Palace erected for this end, enclosed with high walls, in which are many roomes, wherein, without noyse, they may discusse those writings: and in the middle of the Palace aboue 4000. Cels, or little Studies, which can hold nothing but a small table, ſtoole, and one man, out of which, one is not permitted to see or speake with another. When these Poſets are come to the Citie, they, and their Assistants of that Prouince, are shut vp in their feuerall Stations, before they may speake with each other, or any one else, and so continue all the time of this Act or Commencement, many Souldiers and Magiſtrates attending to prohibit all commerce & conference, on all hands, with any within or without the Palace.

In this examination, three daies, the ninth, the twelfth, and the fifteenth of the Moone are spent in euery Prouinciall Citie, from the earliest light till the evening darkeneſſe, the doores carefully shut; some reſection being the day before allowed them, at publike charge. When the Bachelloſs come into the Palace, they are narrowly ſearched, whether they bring any Booke or Writing with them; and are allowed only their Penſill, Paper, Inke, and writing Plate or Stone. If any fraud bee found, they are both excluded and punished. Then the doores being shut and ſcaled, the two Examiners propound out of their Tetrabiblion, three sentences, on which euery one is to write ſo many Theſemes; also, out of those Fine Doctrines, foure four sentences, the arguments of so many other Theames or Orations. These seven Writings must be adorned both with eloquent phrase, and elegant sentences, according to the Chian Rhetorike; not any one Writing exceeding five hundred Characters or Words.

The next day of triall they have three questions of state propounded out of the old Chronicles, or of things which may later happen, to which they returne answer in three Writings. Likewise, the third day three cases propounded of such things as may be demanded in executing publike functions, which they answer in so many writings. Thus every one having that dayes arguments written out, is by some therunto appointed, brought vnto his designed Cell, where he writeth in a Booke his Meditations, subscribing his owne, his fathers, grandfathers, and great grandfathers Names; then closing the booke, that none but they which are deputed, may open it, to whom they offer it. These bookes, before they come to the Examiners, are new copied and transcribed by others in red inke, whereas the former were in blacke: and these transcripts, without the Authors names, delivered to the Provinciall Examiners, which are chosen to assist the two Principall, which reiect the worst, and offer twice so many of the best as are to proceed at that time, vnto the Kings Examiners. These make a new examination, chusing out so many as are to be admitted Graduates, and observe which are best, second, and third, composing them in their due order. This being done, all the Examiners together compare the Copies with the Originalls (knowne by certaine numbers indorsed) and taking out the Authors names, expose them, written on large Tables, in Cubitall letters, about the end of the eight Moone, with great concourse of Magistrates, and applause of their friends. This degree enioyeth farre greater priuiledges and immunities, with a peculiar habit: and if they seeke not to proceed further, they are capable of many publike Offices. After this, the Kings Examiners publish a booke, which containeth the names of the Licentiates, and the chiefe writings on every Theame; especially his, who obtained the first name amongst all the Competitors, who is called Quiyren.

The third degree answers to our Doctor: they call it Cm-su. This is conferred every third yeere also, but only at Pequim, the yeere next after the former Proceeding. Every Kingin, or Licentiat, out of all Provinces may be admitted to the Examination, but only three hundred are Speeders of five thousand Competitors. The Examiners are principall Magistrates: the time, the second Moone; on the same dayes, and in the same manner, as the former. These being created and pronounced Doctors in that place where the Licentiates are made, all in the Kings Palace, before the chiefe Magistrates of the Court (the King himselfe was wont to be present) doe vndergoe a new Triall, and make a writing on a Theame propounded; according to which the order of Offices, whereof they are made capable, is declared, being of three Ranks or Fomes. He which had the first place in the examination of Doctors, is here sure to haue the third: but he which here obtaines the first or second place, is dignified with an honorable title (like to that of a Duke or a Marquesse with vs, if it were hereditary) all his life, and obtaineth the highest places in the gouernment. Anno 1604. three hundred and eight Doctors were made; and then another Triall was made for the Kings Collegiats of Han-lynen: of that number were named twentie foure, chosen out of those three hundred and eight, as in the former Trialls. These are chosen to the chiefe Magistracies in the Kingdome; but so, as after many other trialls, only twelue or fifteene of those twentie foure be chosen.

These Doctors enioy their proper Vest, Cap, Boots, and other ensignes of Magistrates, and are admitted vnto the best functions, so as they alway exceed the Licentiates, and are suddenly become the Grandes of the Kingdome. Those Licentiates which are reiectd from their Doctorship, if they haue no further hope, are admitted, and betake themselves to some places of gouernment. But if they intend to make and abide a new triall, the studie hard at home other three yeeres: some of them ten times aduenturing the same, without desired successe, wearing and wearying out their liues in priuate. There is a booke also published of the Doctors Commencement or Act, as of the former: and another yeerely, containing all the Doctors names in the Kingdome, with their Country, Parents, Offices, and places of Residence. They also which are fellow Commencers, and proceed either Licentiates or Doctors the same yeere together, euer after affect each other as brethren, and their Examiners as Parents or Masters, although they sometimes attaine higher preferments then these. In some Cities they haue Exercises of Learning, every learned man of chiefe note hauing his day appointed whereon to lecture or discourse of some Morall Vertues. And they haue also an especiall Officer, called Tault, which on certaine dayes is to call an Assembly (he is a great Magistrate) and to exhort the people to vertue, as it were by preaching.

Militarie Honors are conferred in the same yeeres, places, titles, vnto the Professors thereof: the time, is the Moone following: the solemnitie much lesse, according to the Chian account of Souldierie. Their first triall is on Horse-backe, and then in full carriere they shoot nine Arrowes: in the second, three at the same marke, on foot. And they which with foure arrowes mounted, and with two standing, haue hit the marke, are admitted to the third triall: in which, they are enioyned to write an Oration, or Theame, of some question propounded. And the Iudges declare in each Prouince some fiftie of these Licentiates: and when Doctors are made at Pequiu, an hundredth of the best Militarie Licentiates in all the Kingdome, after a threefold examination are there declared Doctors. The Doctors of this Societie, sooner then Licentiates, but not without bribes, are admitted to some militarie place of command. And both Philosophicall and Militarie, being admitted Doctors, write ouer their doores, in Cubitall letters, their Degree and Title. The Presidents and Iudges, in all Examinations, whether of Militarie, Mathematicall, Physicke, or Ethicke Sciences, are of their Philosophers, without assistance of any of other professors: so much doe they account of this Confusian Philosophie, as if it had made them able to iudge of all things.

§. VIII.

Of the King, his Court, Issue, Reuennue, and Maiesie.

CHINA is a Monarchie, not knowing the names of Aristocratie, or Democratie, or any other Polytratie: nor so much as Dukes, or great Nobles, enjoying either Title there, or Dominion, (whereof in ancient times were many) these 1800. yeeres past. Sometimes it hath bene subiect to ciuile broyles, and sometimes diuided into many petty kingdomes: but was neuer quite subiect to forraigne Soueraigntie, till the Tartarian Conquest vnder one Tiemor (so the Chinois call that great Chan) which so continued till the yeere 1368. When one of their Chieftaynes (whom they called of the euent Hun-yu, that is, a floud of weapons) expelled the Tartars, compelled the Chinois to his subjection. The Kingdome passeth by inheritance. Some ancient Kings are yet commended for commending the Kingdome to the vertuous succession of some rarer men then their kindred yielded: and sometimes the people rebelling haue dispossessed one and substituted another. In this kingdome are no ancient Lawes: But the first of any Family which obtrayneth the Soueraigntie, makes new Lawes at his pleasure, which his Successors in that family doe not easily alter. This Hun-yu the Conqueror is the founder of their present Lawes, either establishing new, or confirming the old, as he saw good. From ignorance of Geographic they esteemed their King Lord of the World, and therefore call him Thienou, the Iodene of Heauen: for they esteeme Heauen the greatest God. Yet commonly the people call him Houan, that is, the greatest Monarch. Hun-yu was a great both Warrior and Politician. He ordained that none of the Kings children should deale in publike functions or affaires of state: yet hee made them seeming attendants, with assignation of most ample reuennues, and the title of Guzun, a Prince or petty King. Their reuennue is paid out of the Exchequer, to present Clients and dependants of Tenants. Much complement of reuerence is done them by the Magistrates, but no subiection. Their Children and Nephewes are honored also, but their riches and reuennues still decreasing as they descend further from the Royall stemme: till at last no more being allowed them, then may supply their needfull without trade or worke. The like care is had of the Royall daughters marriage and maintenance.

The Commanders which assisted him in the Conquest, hee vouchsafed honorable titles; militarie prebendes, with other immunities and reuennues, still descending to their posteritie, who are subiect neuertheless to the Ciuile Magistrates. One strange priuledge of theirs is this. The exploits of the head of their family vnder Hun-yu, are grauen in an yron plate. This continueth with the first borne of that family, who thereby may challenge pardon for any misdoings in any civill or militarie times, if hee offer the same to the King. Only treason is unpardonable, which striprieth the Traytor and all his posteritie for euer of all dignitie. Like honors doe the Kings Tonies or fathers in law enioy, and some others who haue well defended of the state.

Only the Doctors and Licentiates are admitted to offices of government, not preferred by favour of others, or of the King himselfe, but by the Law and his inherites. All Magistrates are called Quassu, that is, Presidents: and as an honourable title Lauke, or Lauke, a Lord or Father. The Portuguese stile them Mandariners. And although these Magistrates can finish nothing, till by Petition they obtayne the Kings confirmation: yet hee enacteth nothing which they doe not first sollicite. And if any private man preferre a Petition to the King (which seldom happens) hee saile there is an Officer appointed to examine them before the King receiue them: yet the King referres them to that Tribunall whereto they belong. This I haue diligently searched and found for certain, that the King himselfe may not give a sentence of money, or office to any man, vlesse hee bee first petitioned by some of the Magistrates, strates, except in his owne household: for those gifts are not taken out of the publike treasure, but the priuie purse. His Customes and Tributes, which exceed without controuersie a hundred and fiftie millions yeerely (euery house not priuiledged; paying tribute) are not brought into the Treasurie of the Palace; nor may the King spend them after his pleasure; but all the money and prouision is brought into the publike Treasuries and Store-houses, which are through the Kingdome. Out of these a certaine allowance is appointed by Law, and nothing more or lesse, for the Kings expences, his Wiues, Children, Eunuchs, and Family. Thence the Magistrates and Souldiers stipends, and other officers through the Kingdome are discharged. Thence also the publike Edifices of the Palaces of the King and his kinsmen, Cities, Walls, Forts, and all prouisions of Warre are mentioned. And some yeeres it happens, that this huge revenue will not serue for necessary expences, but they are forced to new impositions. The ordinary Census or poll-money is three Mazes or halfe Duckets; besides the profits of the earth and handicrafts. The rest are Customes, which in Canton, one of the least Provinces, are neere eight millions.

Vanlie, that is now King, hath reigned fortie yeeres, a man of great wisdom, but vicious and tyrannicall. Hee vseth his sonne and apparant Heire very hardly, and hath endeouored to make a second sonne, which he had by a more beloued wife, his successor: but was gainsaid by all the Magistrates in the Kingdome, those of the Court resigning their robes and hanging them on the Palace walls, so that he was forced to proclaime the eldest. Whose mother lately lying on her death-bed, the Prince could hardly obtaine his fathers licence to visit her, and then attended with two Eunuchs; the mother comforted her sonne, saying, It neuer yet happened that the heire of the kingdome dyed of hunger: (For the King scarce allows him necessities, none else daring for feare.) The King forbade mourning and publike pompe vnto her funerals. The King respects beautie only in choice of his wiues (as doe all of the Royall blood) nor doe the great men care to preferre their daughters to the Royall bed. For it is little they can doe, and much they must suffer, euery enclosed in the Palace, neuer admitted the sight of their friends, who also are not thereby aduanced to further preferments. The King hath Officers which make choice of women for him. One wife is chiefe and is as it were legitimate: the King and Heire apparant, marry other nine a little inferior; and after them sixe and thirtie others; all which enioy the title of wiues: to which are added many more Concubines, not entituled Wiues or Queenes. Those which bring the King loones, proue most gracious, especially the mother of the eldest sonne: howsoeuer it fareth otherwise in this before mentioned. This King was not the sonne of the first wife, nor is his Heire.

The Chinois are a deceitfull and trecherous people, and therefore the Kings in this age come not abroad in publike: and when in times past they did it, they obserued a thousand cautions for safety, the Palace and the streets being all in armes for his guard, nor was hee scene which thus hee was scene, nor the seat knowen in which he was carryed, many other being they carryed to preuent intelligence. And when hee came into the Tribunal, hee appeared from a high window, courting his face with an Iuory table in his hand, and hauing another table on his head a cubit long, halfe so broad, so behanged with stones that they hid his face. The Kings colour is yellow, his garment being embroidered with golden Dragons. These also are painted or carued in all the Palace, Plate, and household furniture; the tiles also being yellow, and set forth with Dragons. This hath caused some to thinke them to be of gold or brasse, whereas they are of earth (as I haue often felt) and yellow, greater then ours, and fastened on the rooof with nailes, the heads whereof are gilded. If any priuate man should use the yellow colour, or Dragons in priuate use, except of the Kings blood, it were high treason in him. These of Royall posteritie (being now about 60000. all maintained at publike charge, and daily encreasing) are a great burthen to the common-wealth: being idle, and as occasion is offered, licentious, on whom the King hath continuall spies. None of them without the Kings leave may goe out of the Cities appointed him, vnder grievous punishments: nor may any of them reside in the Royall Cities Pequim or Nanquin. The Kings Palace hath foure opposite gates, by which whosoever passeth, they alight off their horses or seats: in which they are carryed, and passe by on foot, which is also obserued at Nanquin. The South side hath three gates both within and without: by the middellof which the King passeth in or out, and is neuer else open; others at the right or left hand. No man speaks to the King but the Eunuchs, and the rest of his Family: others of all sorts speake to him only by Petition, and those so full of complement, that euery learned man cannot make them; besides, peculiar Magistrates are as it were Masters of Requests to examine all Petitions to be exhibited. At the beginning of euery yeere (which is at the new Moone which next goeth before or followeth the Nonas of February, the beginning of their Spring) a Legate is sent out of euery Province to the King, which is done with more formall solemnity euery

third yeere. And in every Citie, every new-Moone-day, all the Magistrates assemble to a place in the Citie, where is the Kings Throne, and his Armes (gilded Dragons) and doe worship on their knees before the same, praying ten thousand yeeres of life to the King. The same is done yearly on the Kings Birth-day; on which day, the Magistrates of Peguin, and other Legats out of the Prouinces, and all his kindred, come to the Court with gratulations and presents. All others that haue obtained preferments, by the Kings nomination, are to goe before day, and with appointed Rites to doe veneration to the Kings Throne, hauing on a Vest of purple, silver and gilt head-tyres, for that purpose. The kingdomes adiacent are willingly refused of this King, whose predecessors sometime possessed, after freed them, as bringing more burthen then profit: which of late appeared in Corea, which the Iapones invaded, the Chinois defended, as a bulwark on the frontiers; but when the enemy left invading, the defender soone after voluntarily relinquished these new subiects. Yet these, Cochinchina, Siam, and other adjoining, pay a tribute rather voluntarie, for hope of protection or payne, then required, exacted, or by the Chinois regarded. Five Prouinces, Chiansi, Cechian, Nanchin, Vquiam, and Sciantum, pay their tributes in Rice and Wheat, which are carried in the Kings Vessels and Ships thereto appointed; which are before related to bee more then ten thousand, belonging to these five Prouinces, besides those belonging to Magistrates and Merchants: in somuch, that Merchants that dwell Southwards from it, are forbidden to enter those streames, lest the multitude of vessels should cloy vp the passage, or damage the King; and yet they are so many, that sometimes they are forced to stay in many daies, especially in drier seasons, notwithstanding flood-gates made against Bridges, wherewith they stay, and heighen the waters; which being full, are opened, and sometimes in the Cataract, Vessels drowned as they goe out or in; the King being at a million of gold yearly charge to make one Streame, called the yellow Streame of the middle colour, nauigable and safe for his ships, which are drawne against the Streame by thousands of men. Neither dare they aduenture passage by Sea, for feare both of Pyrates, and of the Sea it selfe, which would bee farre more speedie, and lesse costly. The other ten Prouinces pay their Tributes in Siker. His Courtiers are Eunuchs; whom their poorer parents haue gelded in their youth, in hope of this Court-preferment: where, after they are admitted by that Manderine, appointed to this Office, they are trained vp vnder elder Eunuchs, to bee made seruicable. Of this drosse of mankind, are in the Court ten thousand; Pantogia supposeth sixteen thousand. This King is esteemed more tyrannicall then his predecessors: neither doth hee euer come abroad, as they were wont once in the yeare, to sacrifice in the Temple sacred to Heaven and Earth. His Palace is farre more spacious, but not equal in workmanship to those in Europe. It is compassed with a triple wall, the first wherof might enuiron a large Towne. Herein, besides the many lodgings of the Eunuchs, are Hills, Groues, Streames, and other things of pleasure. The Iesuite our Author saith, That he passed eight huge Palaces, before he came to the lodgings of those Eunuchs, which were appointed to learne how to order their Clockes or Watches, wherewith they had presented the King: and there were as many beyond. And ascending vp a Tower, hee saw Trees, Gardens, Houles, exceeding all that euer he had seene in Europe, who yet had bene in many the most sumptuous buildings therein. Within the third wall is the King, with his women, children, and such seruants as are thither admitted. When the heire apparant is proclaimed, all his other sones are sent away soone after, and confined to certaine Cities, where they nothing participate in affaires of State: other wife, are honoured as the Kings kindred, living in pleasure in their Palace prisons, vnto the third and fourth generation. Neither is any meanes of greatness left to any: the Royall kindred not dealing with affaires of Government, the Governours neither inheriting their Offices, nor leauing either place or name of Gentrie to their Families. And those which haue command of the Souldiers, pay not their wages; nor haue their Treasurers command of their persons: and their employments are (out of their native) in some remoter Prouince. Vpon occasion of the warres against the Iapones in Corea (which much terrified this warlike Nation) the Royall Treasure being exhaust, tyrannicall meanes were vsed to supply them. There is report of many Gold and Silver Mines in China, which the ancient Kings, vpon some policies, shut vp, and this now commanded to bee opened. Hee exacted also an imposition of two in the hundredth on all goods that were sold in the Kingdome: which had bene tolerable, if the Magistrates had bene employed: but hee vsed his Eunuchs as a proud, shamelesse, slauish, and imperious Nation; which, in stead of searching for Mines, vsed their Commission in wealthy Cities; where euery rich mans house was a Mine: and except they would haue digged it vp, must bee redeemed. Some Cities and Prouinces compounded a certaine summes, which was paid to the King, as extracted out of his Mines. Some zealous and courigious Magistrates made complaint by Libels to the King, but themselves therefore punished. One Fumocadin, of the Prouince of Vquam, was cruelly beaten, and cast in close prison: whom his Province so honoured even then, that they published his worthie acts in bookes; they made his picture to bee sold through all the Province, that all men might priuately honour him as a Saint; and erected vnto him some publike Temples, with tapers and odours continually burning. But the Eunuches, to the extreame distaste of all the subjects, continued in their tyrannicall exactions (or robberies rather) throughout the Kingdome; into one of whose hands the Isles fell, with their presents: The Magistrates hate them, and they insult over the Magistrates. At Nanquin are also some thousands of these Eunuches in the Palace, one being chiefe over the rest. Some of them are so arrogant, that they looke for appreciations of a thousand yeeres life (which is the custome to the Queenes and Kings children; whereas to the King they say, Van van sin, that is, ten thousand yeeres, as Daxiel to Nabuchodonosor, O King line for euer) besides the bending of the knee, as to the chiefe Magistrates. The King will for light causes sometimes cause his Eunuches to be beaten, till they die vnder the blows. When Ricinus was dead, they coffined him after the China fashion, till they could find some place for his buriall (which till that time was at Macao, whither they sent their dead) Pantegia put vp a petition to the King, in behalfe of Ricinus his corpse. (This storie will be, I hope, acceptable, as shewing the manner of obtaining any thing at the Kings hand.) IAMES PANTOGIA, a stranger of a most remote Kingdome, moued with the vertue and fame of your Noble Kingdome, haue in three yeeres saile, with much trouble, passed bither aboue 6000. leagues. In the twentie eighth yeere of VAN LIE (for so, as we, they account their yeeres by the Kings teigne) in the twelfth Moone, I, with MATTHEW RICIVS, came into your Court, where we presented some gifts, and haue since bene sustained at the Kings charge. The nine and twentieth yeere of VAN LIE, in the first Moone, we petitioned your Maestie for a place of residence, and haue many yeeres enjoyed the Royall bountie. In the eight and thirtieth of VAN LIE, the eighteenth day of the third Moone RICIVS died, I, a Client of the Kingdome of the great West, remaine a fit subject of iustie. The returne into our Countrey is long, &c. And I now, after so many yeeres stay, suppose that we may be numbred to the people which followeth your Royall Chariot, that your clemencie, like that of YAO, may not containe it selfe in the Kingdome of China alone, &c. So proceeds hee to set forth the good parts of Ricinus, and with a long supplication to beg a place of buriall, some Field, or part of a Temple; and he, with his fellowes, should obserue their wonted prayers to the Lord of Heaven, for thousands of yeeres to him and his Mother. This Libell was written with peculiar forme, Characters, Seales; many Rites herein necessarily obserued. Before any be offered to the King, it must be viewed of some Magistrate, and they got this to be allowed by one which is Master of Requests, which sent it presently to the King. They must also haue many Copies thereof, to shew to those Magistrates, to whom it appertaines; which they did: one of them affirming, That Ricinus deserued a Temple also, with his Image to bee there set vp. This message he sent them by another: for when they fauour a cause, they shew great strangeness. The King commonly answers the third day (except hee mislike, for then hee suppresseth) and sends it to the Magistrate that had presented it, who shewes which of the sixe is the peculiar Court, which iudgeth of these things: This being sent to the Rissuall Tribunal. Their answer is sent to the King within a moneth (which there is a short space) and repeating the Petition verbatim, and the Kings command to the peculiar Office, answers what the Law sayth in that case, and concludes the Petition to be agreeing to Iustice, and earnestly pleads and sues for confirmation. The King sends this answer to the Calao, which subscribed his approbation; which being sent againe to the King, hee subscribed with his owne hand Xi, that is, Fiat, or be it done: which the third day after was deliuered them.

These petitions, see verbatim, Exped. Sinica, l. 1. Of the Officers, see the next §.

Of the Magistrates, Courts, and Government.

That which the Philosopher wished, That Kings might be Philosophers, and Philosophers Kings, is in part fulfilled in China; where all the Government is in their administration, which haue attained thereto, not by birth, fauour, wealth, or other Mediators, but their Philosophicall proficience and degrees, of which we haue spoken. Of these, there are two Orders: one, of the Court, which, besides their Offices in that City, moderate euen all those of the second sort, which are Prouinciall Magistrates, abroad in the Cities or Prouinces. Euery two moneths there is a new booke printed at Pequim, of all their Names, Places, and Degrees. First, of the Officers of Court. There are sixe Tribunals, or chiefe Courts: the first, called Li pu (pu signifieth Tribunal) which is the Court of Magistrates, strates, who are hence nominated throughout the Kingdome; which nomination is guided by the excellencie of their writings aforesaid. And all beginning, with inferiour Offices, come by Degrees prescribed by the Lawes, in order, to the higher: except Injustice cast them lower, or quite degrade them; which makes him past hope of regaying his dignitie. The second Tribunal, is Hopu, or the Tresurie, which receiveth and payeth out the Kings reuenues. The third, is Lypu, the Court of Rites, whence are ordered matters of Sacrifices, Temples, Priests, Schooles, Examinations, Festiual dayes, Gratulations to the King, Titles, Physicians, Mathematicians, Embassages, with their Letters and Presents (for they thinke unworthy the Maiestie of their King, himselfe to write to any.) The fourth Court is called Pimpu; to which are subiect all Militarie Matters, and Charges; and Examinations. The fifth, is Compu, that hath the handling of publike Edifices; as the Palaces of the King, of his Kindred, of the Magistrates; the Naule, Bridges, Walls of Cities, and the like. The sixe, is Himpu, of criminall Cases, Prisons, and Imprisonments.

1. Li pu, Courts or Magistrates.

2. Hopu, Court of Treasurie.
3. Lypu.

All the publike affaires depend of these Courts, which haue their Officers and Notaries in every City and Prouince, which informe them of all things. One in euery of these Courts is President, called Cim, who hath his two Cilm, or Assitants, one at his right hand, the other at the left: These are accounted the highest Dignities in the Kingdome. Next to these, euery Court hath their severall Offices, and ouer each, many Officers, besides Notaries, Appritors, and others. Besides these Courts, there is another, the greatest in the whole

4. Pimpu.
5. Compu.
6. Himpu.

20 Court and Kingdome, called Colau, which are three, foure, or sixe: Councillors of State, hauing no peculiar charge, but looking to the whole. The King was wont to sit with them in Councill: but now they doe it without his presence; euery day admitted into the Palace, and there remaining in consultation; send Libels many and often vnto Him, who approueth, disalloweth, or altereth at his pleasure.

Colau.

Besides these and other Magistrates, there are two sorts, one called Choli, the other Zanli, of each about three score, all choise Philosophers, which haue before giuen approved testimony of their sufficiency. These are employed in affaires of moment extraordinary with the Court or Prouinciall officers, with Royall authoritie: and their especiall Office is, to admonish the King by Libell, if any thing bee done contrary to Law through the Kingdome;

Choli & Zanli.

30 not dissembling the fautes of the greatest Magistrates, nor of the King himselfe, or any of His: which they performe, to the astonishment and wonder of other Nations, at their integritie and libertie; neuer giuing ouer (frownes or threats notwithstanding) their complaints and admonitions, till they procure redresse. This is also lawfull to euery Magistrate, yea, to euery private man: but these are most respected, because it is their peculiar Function. These Libels and the Kings answers are printed by many, and so passe through the Kingdome, whence their Historians may bee furnished with intelligence. This was lately apparant in the case of the Prince, whom the King would haue disheeried, the King being so incensed with numbers of Libels or Bills of Complaint, that hee decried or dejected to inferior places about a hundred; whereupon the rest abdicating themselves (as is said)

40 he was forced to surcease his attempt. And lately, when the greatest of the Calau tooke indirect courses, hee was accused by these Officers in a hundred Bills, within two moneths space, though in greatest grace with the King; which (as it was thought) killed him soone after with thought.

Han lin yuen Colledge.

Besides these Magistrates in Court, there are diuers Colledges instituted, to diuers purposes; the noblest of which, is Han lin yuen, consisting of choise Doctors, which deale not in the Government, and yet are accounted of greater Dignitie. Their Office is, to compile the Kings Writings, to compile the publike Annales, and to write out the Lawes and Statutes. Of these, are chosen the Schoole-masters of the Kings and Princes. They wholly addict themselves to Studie, haue their Degrees of honour in the Colledge, which they attain by their writing; and are preferred to the greatest Dignities; but in the Court only. None is chosen to be of the Calau, but these. They gaine much, by composing Writings for their friends, as Epitaphs, and the like, which for their very name are precious. They are also Presidents and Iudges in the Examinations of the Licentiates and Doctors.

Prouinciall Government.

All these Magistrates (except the Colai) are as well at Nankin as Pequim, The Cities attributed to them both, are governed as other Cities in other Prouinces. The government of those thirteene Prouinces depends of one Magistrate, called Pueinsu, and of another, called Naganasju, the former iudging ciuill cases, the later criminall. Their Residence, is in the chiefe City of the Prouince, with great pompe. In both these Courts are diuers Collegues, called Tails, which are also principall Magistrates, and sometimes reside without the Mo- ther-City, in some other, where they haue speciall charge. The Prouinces are diuided into 60 diuers Regions, which they call Fu, and the proper Governour of each Region, Cifu. These are also subdiuided into Cen and Hien, that is, nobler, or meaner Townes, as bigge yet as our European greater (not greatest) Cities. Each of these hath a Prouost, called Cicun, or Cubun, Ci signifies to gouerne. These Prouosts or Gouernours haue their foure Assistants to helpe them. That which some thinke, that they are onely in repute of Cities, which are intituled Fu and the rest Cen and Hien but villages, is a tale. For both the Prouinciall Citty hath her Cifu and Cubien, and the Lieutenant of the Shire, or Region, hath no more power in the Shire-Towne, then in other Cities of the Shire, that is, the right of first Appeale. The second Appeale is to the Pucinsu and Naganzsu, Gouernours of the Prouince. Besides these in euery Prouince, there are other two of more eminent place, sent from the Court: one of which is resident there, called Tutun; the other sent yeerely from the Court, called Cia yuen. The former hath power ouer all, both Magistrates and Subiects, and in militarie affaires, and may be compared to our Vice-royes, or Deputies. The other is a Commissioner, or Visiter, who enquireth into all Officers, and punisheth the faultie (except the greatest, whom he accuseth to the King) and onely of all Magistrates executeth the sentence of death. Many other Officers in Cities, Towns, and Villages, many Captaines and military Commanders, many which haue charge of Walls, Gates, Buidges, Forts, (euen as it were in time of Warre:) Mustiers daily, and Wrestling might here be recited.

Europæan

All the Magistrates, both Philosophicall and Militarie, are reduced to nine Orders, and according to their severall Order, they receive Money or Rice monthly: which, in such multitude of Magistrates, is very small; the stipend of the highest not amounting to a thousand duckats yeerely, and euery one of the same Order receiuing alike; the chiefe in the militarie Order receiuing the same stipend, which the chiefe in the Philosophicall. True it is, that more accrues to them by industrie, gifts, or otherwise: but this is the Legall allowance. All Magistrates wear the like Cap of blacke cloth, with eares or wings on both sides, of Ouall forme, apt to fall off: which is done purposely, to make them walke grauely, without light mouing of their heads. They wear all like attire, Bootes alike, of peculiar fashion and substance, of fine blacke Leather. They wear also a faire girdle, about foure fingers broad, large and loose, of curious embroderie, and on their breasts and backs they haue square pieces of Cloth embrodered: by both these are discerned their Places and Dignities. They are also knowne by their Vmbrellas, which are carried ouer their heads, some blew, some yellow; some two, three, and some one: the meanest on horse-back, the greater on chaires, carried on foure or eight mens shoulders, according to their Dignitie. They haue other Ornaments, Banners, Chaines, Censers, multitudes of Sergeants, or inferior Officers, going before them, two and two in a ranke, with Halberds, Maces, Battle-axes, Chaynes, Canes, crying out to giue way, with such clamours and noyse, that euen dogs shrinke away, and not a man to be seene in most populous streets: this more or lesse, according to the degree of the Magistrate. Thus haue we seene a Philosophicall Empire, all, euen the Souldiers, being subiect to them; yea, the Capitaines beaten by them, as boyes by their Masters: Neither is the sentence of Militarie men, in matters of Warre, of authoritie with the King, like theirs; no, nor their valour comparable: these, in maintainance of their loyalty, being (as yet haue seene) prodigall of preferment and life. The Souldiers betake themselves to Handicrafts, or Service of great Men, making shew of themselves on Muster and Pay-daies. Their Weapons, as their courage, ridiculous for offence or defence. I haue seene many Gunnes (saith Pantogia) in their Souldiers hands, but none, whose barrell was about a span * long: a little Ordnance on their walls, but little seruicable. Militarie men are little esteemed, in so long peace, where they feare no enemy, nor care for encroachment: that which some say, of their extending their Dominions to the Indies in former times, being a fable, and disagreeing with their Chronicles, which are studiously continued foure thousand yeeres to these times. Neither doe they conceiue the rest of the world worth the conquering. Marvellous also is the Symmetric of all the Magistrates, the members of this great Body, both with the Head and each other, both in reall obedience and complementall Rites. The inferiours, whether priuat men or Magistrates, seldom speaking to their superiours, in the Court, or elsewhere, but on their knees, and with honourable termes, how meane sower knowne before their Degree.

No man also enjoyeth any place about three yeeres, except he be a new confirmed by the King: but usually is preferred to a greater; but in another Region, to prevent acquaintance, an occasion of vsuicide, or popular affection. And all the Pucinsu, Naganzsu, Cifu, Cicun, Cubien, and the like principall Officers, must euery third yeere appeare solemnly at the Court at Pequim: at which time, diligent inquisition is made of all Officers in the Kingdome, with great rigour, euery one rewarded according to his desert. I haue obserued, that the King himselfe dares not alter any of those things, which in this Inquisition are constituted. In the yeere 1607, foure thousand Magistrates, in this publike Disquisition, were condemned, as appeared by their names published in a Booke: some for couetous corruption, vsurping ſurping publike or private goods; theſe were wholly deprived: ſome for rigorous, ſeuertie were ſo ſerued: a third ſort were ſuch, as were old, ſickly, or remiſſe; theſe might vie the enſignes of Magiſtrates, but liue a private life: the fourth were raſh and vnuaiſed, which were put into inferior Offices, or ſent to places of eaſier government: The laſt ranke was of ſuch as gouerned not themſelues, or their families, in good order; and ſuch were alſo for euer de-10 deprived. The like Inquiſition every fiſt yeere is obſerued, concerning the Officers of Court, and Militarie. The Leſuitas were acquainted with one great Magiſtrate, which was thruſt into an inferior Office three yeeres ſpace, onely for being too often at Feaſts, and too much addicted to Cheſſe-play.

No man may beare Office (except Militarie) in that Province where he was borne. Thus the Militarie men haue ſpurges of fidelitie, and the other want occaſions of corruption: for which cauſe alſo, his houſe-hold ſervants and children may not ſtirre out of doores, whiles he executes his Office; but when he goes out, he ſeales vp his doores, both private and pub-
 15 like, hauing all neceſſarie ſeruices performed by ſuch as are appointed thereto by the State. None weare any Weapons in the Cities, nor Souldiours or Captaines, nor men of Leathing, but when they goe to their Maſters, Exerciſes, or Warres: onely ſome attend the chiefe Magiſtrates with weapons. Nor hath any weapons at his houſe, except ſome ruſtie Blade, for feare of Theeues when he trauailes: and further then ſcratching, or pulling off the 20 haire, they manage no quarrels, eſteeming no iniurie a morall indignitie, and him the wiſeſt and moſt valiant, that flies the furious, and offers no wrong. When the King dies, none of his blood, but the heire onely, may ſtay in the Citie Royall, or remove out of the Cities where they are confined, on paine of death. And when any contention ariſeth amongſt them, one of the chiefe of them, which is their Gouernor, decides it: if with others, not of the blood Royall, the publike Magiſtrate.

When the King preferreth any Magiſtrates to ſome higher dignitie, if they haue verie well deſerued, they are requeſted to leaue their Boots behind, which are kept in the publike 25 Cheſts, together with veſſes in their prayle, and are honoured with gifts. If they be of ſuper- eminent worth, a publike Marble Pillar is erected, with inſcription of their deſerts. Yea, there are two ſuch Temples are built at publike charge, and their Images as like as the work- men can make, ſet on the Altars; with a yeerely reuenue, and certaine men appointed to keepe perpetual odours and lightes there burning, (ſupplifications excepted) in manner as they
 30 doe to their Idols. The Cities are all full of theſe Temples, ſometime by ſauour more then merit, to which at certaine times they goe, and exhibite kneelings, with meat-offerings, and other things.

In ſome Provinces, vpon ſpeciall occaſions, they alter their courſe, as to preuent Pyracies and Robberies. Some were conſtituted, with Commiſſion extended into diuers Provinces, 35 ſome bordering parts of all thoſe Provinces obeying him as Vice-Roy: As at Canceu, one ſuperior to the Vice-roy of the Province, hauing part of Chianſi, Fuchien, Canton, and Vquam ſubiect, hauing out of euery Province two Regions, all adioyning together, affig-40 ned to him.

Although they haue no Nobilitie employed in Magiſtracie, yet there are ſome deſcen-
 45 dents of thoſe Captaines and Great men, which helped Hun-vu in expelling the Tartars, which are borne Noble, called Quorum, as we haue elſewhere ſhewed. Theſe are capable of Militarie places. One head of one of theſe families, reſides at Nanquin, which liues in great magnificence, carried on eight mens ſhoulders; his Gardens, Palaces, houſehold Furniture,
 50 Royall, Ricinu was entertained in his Garden, wherein (beſides other rarities) he ſaw an arti- ficiall Mount made of vapoliſhed Marbles, which in the hollow places thereof contained Chambers, Halls, Stayres, Trees, Ponds, and other Deuices; this increaſing both delight and wonder, that it was of Labyrinthian forme, in a little ſpace of ground detayning the ſteps
 55 two or three houres, in paſſing the many Mazes thereof. The cooleneſſe of this place was conuenient both to their Studies and Feaſts.

Of their Punishments Diuine and Humaine; and a Catalogue of their Kings.

When the King preferreth any to the dignitie of a Mandarine, or to a higher Office, 60 their cuſtome is, to put vp a Libell or Supplication, inferring their inſufficiency, with many modeſt refusals: yet loth to be beleued, and that the King ſhould accordingly, reſuſe them; as ſometimes (againſt their will) hee doth, and cer-tainely would, if this officious forme of deprecation be omitted by them. Notwithſtanding all

all piousness to the contrarie, they are covetous, cruel, and exceedingly addicted to bribes: and where they finde not (as it often happens) they make Lawes, sometimes contrarie to others, alway for their owne will and advantage.

None may execute the sentence of death, but by speciall commission from the King. And therefore the Malefactors are consumed in the prisons. But they have authority with certayne Canes to beat men on the legs, thighs, and hammes, in such terrible cruelty, that a few blowes may either lame or kill the partie. And therefore no King is more feared then these Mandarines or Magistrates. In the midst of their Cities are Palaces of the Kings for these Officers to reside in. In Paquin and Nanquin the multitude of these Magistrates is incredible, one of these Cities containing more then two thousand and five hundred, as many as somewhere are of Citizens. These all twice a day heare causes, and execute iustice.

These Magistrates are no way comparable in wealth to the Nobles in Europe. Their sentence against guiltie persons is without solemn furniture of words; as, Let him haue twentie strokes more or lesse, which by those Canine Cane-men is suddenly executed, the partie lying grouelling on the ground. These Canes are clef in the midst, three or foure fingers broad: twentie or thirte blowes will spoyle the flesh, hitte or threescore will aske long time to be healed, an hundred are vncurable. They vse also the Strappado, hoyfing them vp and downe by the armes with a cord. They bee about measure patient in hearing causes; and their examinations are publike. Condemned persons haue a pillory-boord fastned about their necke, and hanging downe before them to the knees, in which his Fellony or Treason is exprest; which boord neither suffereth them well to sit or lye, to eat or sleepe, and in fine killeth them. There be in euery Metropolitane Citie foure principall houses, for those chiefe Officers before mentioned; the fourth for the Taïssu, wherein is the principall Gaole or Prison, walled about high and strong, with a gate of no lesse force: within the same are three other gates before you come where the prisoners lye, in the meane space are such as watch and ward day and night. The prison within is so great, that in it are streets and market-places, and neuer void of ten or eight hundred men, that goe at liberty. In Canton alone are said to bee 15000. prisoners: and in this and euery other Metropolitane Citie, thirteene prisons, sixe of which are alwayes possessed, or doe possesse rather, those which are condemned to death. In euery of them are a hundred Souldiers, with their Capayne to keepe them. The offenders are allowed to worke in the day-time for their liuing; for little almes are giuen in China, and but a little Rice allowed them by the Kings. Such prisoners as are in for debt, haue a time appointed for payment; at which if they faile, they are whipped, and a new time assigned: and so they proceed till the debt bee paid, or the debtor dead. If any man remoue his dwelling from one place to another, the Neighbours cause a Cryer to proclaim it with ringing of a Bell, that his creditors, if hee haue any, may come to demand their debts, which the Neighbours, if they neglect this duty, are charged with. Executions of deadly sentence are seldome, and that with many ceremonies. Thus it comes to passe, that of whippings and imprisonment there die thousands yeerely. Theeues are slightly punished the first time. The second they are burned with two characters on the arme: the third receiue the same punishment on the face. If he steale oftner, hee is whipped more or lesse, or condemned for a certayne time to the Gallies. This makes pilferies common: for they are neuer done to death for theuery. Many extraordinary crimes haue new deuised extraordinary punishments, as after in this history followeth. One had so freely libelled against the Kings tyrannies, that many were cruelly tormented being thereof suspected, and one by torments confessed the fact, and was therefore adiudged to haue 1600. pieces of his flesh cut from him, his head vtouched that his eyes might see this mangling: and lastly, his head cut off, which amongst them is a great abomination. Others accused of treason at Nanquin, were forced to stand in those pillory boords till they rotted, some continuing fifteene dayes in torment. Those which out-lue their beatings, must passe vnder the Surgeons hands for cure, which ordinarily proue new tormentors, except money make them propitious: and this the Iesuites report of their owne fauours amongst them in all difficulties, money hath bin their best friend; without which is no friendship in China, no Faith, no Loue, no Hope of them. But by following Perera (sometime a prisoner there) into his prison, & others, I had my selfe almost imprisoned, and therefore will see hence into their Temples, & there take Sanctuary. Here they deale as madly with their gods, as there with their men. Yet first let vs take view of some rare workes of diuine Providence in this Countrey.

Orelum.

Ludovicus Georgius in his Map of China, ^b describeth a huge Lake in the Prouince of Sanchi, made by inundation, in the yeere of our Lord 1557. wherein were swallowed seuen Cities, besides Townes and Villages, and innumerable multitudes of people: one onely Child in a hollow tree escaping so great a destruction. Such as escaped drowning, were, as Bosetum addeth, destroyed with fire from heauen. Gasper de Cruz reciteth a Letter of the

Mandarins to the King 1556. containing newes of a terrible Earth-quake in the Provin-ces of Sanxi and Santon; wherein the day waxed darke. The earth opened the yeere before in many places, vnder which was heard the noise, as it were, of bells: there followed wind and raine. The winds, which they call Tyfan, is so violent, that it driueth ships on the land, ouerthroweth men and houses: it commeth almost euery yeere once, lasteth foure and twen-ty houres, in which space it compasseth the Compasse, in Vioyansu the Earth-quake caused a fire to breake out, which consumed all the Citie, and innumerable people. The like hap- pened to another Citie neere it, where none escaped. It caused the Riuer at Leuchinen to en- crease and drowne multitudes. At Hien the fall of the houses slue eight thousand. In Pichio the house of the Kings kinsmen fell, and slue all therein but a child. Cochu with fire from above, and waters from beneath, was left desolate. At Enchinocn almost an hundred thou- sand perished. At Intchunen the Riuer ebbed and flowed ten times in a day and night. This perhaps was the same with that which Georgius and Boterm mention.

Boterm ascribeth vnto China seuentie millions of people, whereas hee alloweth to Italy scarce nine, and to Spaine lesse, to England three, to all Germany, with the Switzers, and Low-Countries, but fifteene; and as many to all France. Lamentable it is that the Deuill should haue so great a tribute in this one Kingdome. Consuler (in his Discourse of China, translated by Parker) reckoneth (I know not how truly) almost seuen millions of Souldi- ers in continuall pay. Dahucida numbeth seuentie millions, and two hundred and fiftie thousand Inhabitants, besides Souldiers; and reckoning but the principall in each Family; often-times not aboue three of ten, as their Bookes testifie.

I thought it not impertinent here to adde the Catalogue of the Kings of this countrey; according = to their owne Stories, which although it be in part fabulous (as what ancient prophane storie is not?) yet, because I haue done thus in other Nations, and haue so wor- thy a patterne in this, as the Worthy of our Age = Iosephus Seutiger, pardon mee to trouble thee with this Chronicle of their Kings.

The first was Puey, a Gyant-like man, a great Astrologer and Inuenter of Sciences; hee reigned an hundred yeeres. They name after him an hundred and sixteene Kings, (whose names our Author omitteth) all which reigned two thousand two hundred fiftie and seuen 30 yeeres; all these were of his linage: and so was Tzintzon, the maker of that huge wall of Chi- na, which killed many of the Chinois; of whom hee tooke every third man to this worke. For which cause they slue him, when he had reigned forty yeeres, with his sonne Aguiz. They ordained King in his stead Auchosau, who reigned twelue yeeres; his sonne Fuicy succeeded and reigned seuen yeeres; his wife eighteene; his sonne, three and twentie; then followed Gunter, foure and fiftie; Gunter the second, thirteene; Ochamey five and twen- 40 tie; Coantey, thirteene; Tzantze, fixe and twentie, and foure moneths; Anthey, six; Pin- tatey, fixe; Tzintzamey, three and seuen moneths; Huy Hannon, fixe; Cuauu, two and thir- tie; Benthey, eighteene; Fuhey, thirteene; Oihy, seuentee; Tanthey, eight moneths; Atey, nineteene yeeres; Taney, three moneths; Chitey, one yeere; Linthey, two and twen- 50 tie yeeres; Tanthey, one and thirtie yeeres; Lamp, one and forty yeeres; Cuyshy, fixe and twen- tie yeeres; Fontey, seuentee yeeres. Fifteene other Kings reigned, in all, one hundred seuentie and six yeeres. The last of which was Quantey, whom Tzobu deposed, who with seuen of his linage reigned threescore and two yeeres; Cotey, foure and twentie yeeres; Dian, fixe and fiftie yeeres; Tyui, one and thirtie yeeres; Tzuy, seuen and thirtie yeeres; Tance, with his linage (which were one and twentie) reigned two hundred ninety and foure yeeres; Bausa a Nunne, wife of the last of them (whom she slue) one and forty yeeres; Tautzan slue her, and reigned with his posteritie (which were seuen Kings) one hundred and thirtie yeeres; Dian, eighteene yeeres; Onton, fifteene yeeres; Outzim, nine yeeres and three mo- 60 neths; Tozon foure yeeres; Auchin, ten yeeres; Zayizon, and seuentee of his race, three hundred and twentie yeeres; Toppna, the last was dispossessed by Yzon the Tartar, vnder whom, and eight of his Tartarian successours, China endured subiection ninety and three yeeres; Gombu or Huan-yn expelled Tzintzon, the last of them. He with thirteene suc- cessors haue reigned aboue two hundred and forty yeeres. Their computation = of times is more prodigious then that of the Chaldeans, after which this present yeere of our Lord 1644. is in their account from the Creation 884793.

Of the Religion used in China.

§. I.

Of their Gods and Idols in former times.

Ow much the greater things are reported of this so large a Countrey, and mightie a Kingdome, so much the more compassion may it prouoke in Christian hearts, that amongst so many people there is scarce a Christian, who amongst so ample reuenues, which that King possesseth, payeth either heart or name, vnto the King of Heauen, till that in so huge a Vintage, the Leuites of late haue gleaned a few handfulls to this profession. Before we come to the Narration of their gods, I thinke it fit to deliuer what our ancient Authors haue obserued of their Religion, and then to come to the Moderne. They were before the Tartarian Conquest ^a given to Astrologic, and obserued Natiuities, and gaue directions in all matters of weight. These Astrologers or Magicians told Farsur the King of China or Mangi, that his Kingdome should neuer be taken from him, but by one which had a hundred eyes. And such in name was ^b Chinshanbaian the Tartarian Captaine, which dispossessed him of his state, and conquered it to the great Can about 1269. This Farsur liued in great delicacie, nor did euer feare to meet with such an Argur. He brought vp ycerely two hundred thousand Infants, which their Parents could not prouide for: and every yeere, on certaine of his Idoll-holy-dayes, feasted his principall Magistrates, and all the wealthie Citizens of Quinsay, ten thousand persons at once, ten or twelue dayes together. There were then some few Nestorian Christians: one Church at Quinsay; two at Cughianfu, and a few others. They had many Idoll-Monasteries. They burned their dead: the kinsmen of the dead accompanied the corps, clothed in Canuas, with Musicke and Hymnes to their Idols: and when they came to the fire, they cast therein many papers, wherein they had painted Slaues, Horses, Camels, &c. as of the Cathayans is before reported, to serue him in the next world. They returne, after their Funerall Rites are finished, with like harmony of Instruments and Voyces, in hono-

Hek.

Odoricus ^c affirmeth that at Katan or Zaiton, hee found two Couents of Minorite-Friers, and many Monasteries of Idolsters, in one whereof hee was, in which (as it was told him) were three thousand Votaries, and eleuen thousand Idols. One of those Idols (lesse then some others) was as big as the Popish Christophers. These Idols they feed every day with the smoake of hot meates: set before them: but the meate they eate themselves. At Quinsay a Chinian conuert led him into a certaine Monastery, where hee called to a Religious person, and said, This Raban Francus, that is, this Religious French-man commeth from the Sunne-setting, and is now going to Cambaleth, to pray for the life of the great Can, and therefore you must shew him some strange sight. Then the said Religious person tooke two great baskets full of broken reliques, and led me into a little walled Parke, and vnlocked the doore. We entered into a faire greene, wherein was a Mount in forme of a sleepe, replenished with Herbs and Trees. Then did hee ring with a Bell, at the sound whereof many Creatures, like Apes, Cats, and Monckies, came downe the Mount, and some had faces like men, to the number of foure thousand and two hundred, putting themselves in good order, before whom he set a platter, and gaue them those fragments. Which when they had eaten, he rung the second time, and they all returned to their former places. I wondred at the sight, and demanded what creatures they were. They are (quoth he) the soules of Noble-men, which we here feed for the loue of God, who gouerneth the World. And as a man was honourable in his life, so his soule entereth after death into the body of some excellent beast, but the soules of simple and rustical people, possesse the bodies of more vile and brutish creatures. Neither could I dissuade him from the opinion, or perswade him that any soule might remaine without a body.

Ep. Ramus.

Nic. di Conti ^d saith, that when they rise in the morning, they turne their faces to the East, and with their hands ioyaed, say, God in Trinitie keepe vs in his Law.

§. II.

Of their present Gods and Idols.

THeir Religion at this time is Idolatrous and Pagan, wherein the common people are somewhat superstitious; but the King himselfe, & the Mandarines or Magistrates, as seeing the vanitie thereof, and not able to see the truth, are in manner irreligious and profane: the first worship that which is Nothing in the World, and these

find nothing in the World, but the World and these momentary things, to worship.

Richu reports that the ancient Chinois worshipped one only great God, which they called the King of Heauen, or other wise, Heauen and Earth: whereby he gathers, that they thought Heauen and Earth to be endued with life, and the Soule thereof to be the greatest God. Beneath which they worshipped also diuers Spirits, Tutelares, preservers of the Mountaines, of Rivers, and of the foure parts of the World. They held that Reason was to be followed in all actions, which light they confessed to receiue from Heauen. They neuer conceiued yet such monstrous absurdities of this god, and these spirits, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and Romanes haue done: Whence the Iesuite would haue you thinke (euen in this Idolatry) many of them to be faued, by I know not what congruities, which merits not the mention. In succeeding ages, this Idolatry became more manifold in some, whiles other became Atheists, of which their King and Magistrates are blamed. And yet this King, when some few yeeres since his Palace was sited with lightning, being guiltie of his owne ynworshippesse, he commanded his sonne to pray to Heauen for reconciliation.

Fryer Gasper de la Cruz, being in Canton, entred a certaine Religious house, where he saw a Chappell, hauing therein, besides many other things of great curiositie, the Image of a woman, with a child hanging about her necke, and a Lampe burning before her. The mystérie hereof (so like the Popish mystérie of iniquitie) none of the Chinois could decyphre. The Sunne, the Moone, Statues, and especially Heauen it selfe, are gods of the first forme in their Idol-schoole. They acknowledge Laocœn T'waney the Gouernour of the great god (so it signifyeth) to be eternall and a spirit. Of like nature they esteeme Causay, vnto whom they ascribe the lower Heauen, and power of Life and Death. They subiect vnto him three other spirits, Tanquam, Terquam, Tzuinquem: The first, supposed to be: Author of Raine; the second, of humane Natiuitie, Husbandrie, and Warres; the third, is their Sea-Nepitune. To these they offer Victualls, Odors, and Alter-clothes; presenting them also with Playes and Comedies. They haue Images of the Deuill with Serpentine lockes, and as deformed lookes as here he is painted, whom they worship, not to obtaine any good at his hand, but to de-raine and hold his hand from doing them euill. They haue many Hee and Shee-Saints, in great veneration, with long Legends of their liues. Amongst the chiefe of them are Siechia, the first inuenter of their religious Votaries of both Sexes; Quannia, an Anchorese; and

Neempa, a great Sorceresse. Fryer Martin in one Temple in Vcheo, told a hundred and twelue Idols. They tell of one Huimsin, in the Prouince of Cechian, which did much good to the people, both by Alchimy, making true Siluer of Quick-siluer, and by freeing the Metropolitane Citie from a huge Dragon, which hee fastened to an yron pillar, still shewed, and then flew into Heauen with all his Houle, Mice and all (Iye and all) and there they haue built him a Temple; the ministers whereof are of the Sect T'hanfu. Trigantius writes of certaine Gods, called Foe, which, they say, goe a visiting Cities and Prouinces; and the Iesuites in one Citie were taken for these Idols Foe. At Sciauchin, they in time of drought proclaimed a Fast, euery Idoll was solicited with Tapers and Odours, for Raine. A peculiar Officer, with the Elders of the people, obserued peculiar Rites to these purpose, the Priests went on Procession, all in vaine. When the Citie-Gods could doe nothing, they fetched a Country-Idoll, called Locu, which they carrie about, worship, offer to: But Lo c v is now growne old; thus they said of his deafensse. At last they goe to a Witch, who told them, Quouin (a Goddess) was angry, that her backe was burned; meaning the Conuers, which burnt their Idols, which incensed them against the Christians. Houquam is the name of an Idoll, which hath rule ouer the eyes, which they carry about in Procession, and beg in his name. In time of trouble they haue familiaritie with the Deuill; Pedro de Alfaro obserued, being in a Ship with the Chinois, in this sort. They cause a man to lye on the ground groeling, and then one readeth on a booke, the rest answering, and some make a sound with Bells and Tambors. The man in short space beginneth to make visages and gestures, whereby they know the Deuill is entred, and then doe they propound their requests, to which he answereth by word or Letters. And when they cannot extort an answer: by word, they spread a red Mantle on the ground, equally dispersing all ouer the same a certaine quantitie of Rice. Then do they cause a man that cannot write to stand there, themselves renewing their former inuocation, and the Deuill entering into this man, causeth him to write vpon the Rice. But his answer: are often full of lyes. In the entries of their houses they haue an Idoll-roume, where they inuente their Deities morning and euening. They offer to them the sweetest odours, Hens, Geese, Ducks, Rice, Wine; a Hogs-head boyled is a chiefe offering. But little hereof falleth to Gods share, which is set in a dish apart: as the tippes of the Hogs-eares, the bylls and feet of the Hens, a few comes of Rice, three or foure drops of Wine. Their Bookes tell much of Hell; their deuotions little. Their Temples are homely, and filthy: no Oracle is in any of them. They haue fables of men turned into Dogs or Snakes, and againe metamorphosed into men. And they which beleuee the paines of Hell, yet beleuee after a certaine space, that those dammed soules shall passe thence into the bodies of some beasts. But their Idolatries and religious Rites will better appeare, if we take view of their different Religions and Sects.

§. III.

Of their three Sects: and first of that of CONFUCIUS.

Ric. 1. c. 10.

They reckon in the World, and obserue amongst themselves, three Sects; the first, 2 of the Learned; the second, Sciequia; the third, Lanchu. One of these three, euery Chinois professeth, as doe their Neighbours also, which vse their Characters, the Iapanders, Corians, Leguians, and Cochinchinois. The Sect of the Learned is peculiar to the Chinois, very ancient and famous, which they drinke in together with the Studies of Learning, all their Students and Magistrates professing the same, obseruing Confucium, the Author thereof. These worship not Idols, nor haue any. One God they worship, as preferer of all things, certaine Spirits also, in an inferior honour. The chiefe of them neither acknowledge, Author, Time, or Manner of the worlds creation. Somewhat they discourse of Rewards, of Good and Euill, but such as are bestowed in this life vpon the Doer or his Posteritie. The Ancients made no question of the Soules immortality, speaking often of the Dead as liuing in Heauen, But of the punishments of wicked men in Hell, not a word. The later Professors teach that the Soule dies with, or soone after the Bodie, and therefore beleuee neither Heauen nor Hell. Some of them hold that good mens soules by the strength of vertue, hold out some longer time, but of bad men to die with the bodie. But the most common opinion, taken from the Sect of Idolaters, and brought in fise hundred yeeres since, holdeth that the World consisteth of one substance, and that the Maker thereof, together with Heauen and Earth, Men, Beasts, Plants, and the Elements, doe make vp one bodie, of which euery Creature is a distinct member: thence obseruing what loue, ought to be amongst all things, and that Men may come to become one with God.

Although the learned men acknowledge one supreme Deitie, yet doe they build him no Temple, nor depute any place to his worship, no Priests or Ministers of Religion, no solemn Rites, no Precepts or Rules, none that hath power to ordaine or explaine their Holies, or to punish the Transgressors. They doe Him no priuate or publicke deuotions or seruice, yea, they asseme, that it belongs to the King only to do sacrifice and worship to the King of Heauen; and that it is treason for others to vsurpe it. For this cause the King hath two Temples very magnificent in both the Royall Cities, the one consecrate to Heauen, the other to Earth: in the which hee was wont himselfe to sacrifice, but it is now performed by some principall Magistrates, which slay there many Sheepe and Oxen, and performe other Rites many to Heauen and Earth, in his stead. To the other spirits of Hills, Riuers, and the foure Regions of the World, onely the chiefe Magistrates doe sacrifice, nor is it lawfull to priuate men. The Picepts of this Law are in their nine Bookes before mentioned.

Nothing in this Sect is more generall, from the King to the meanest, then their yeerely Obits to their Parents and grand-fathers, which they account obedience to Parents, though dead; of which afterwards. The Temple they haue is that, which in euery Citie is by the Law build to Confucium, in that place where there Schoole or Commencement house is. This is sumptuous, and hath adioyning the Palace of that Magistracie, which is ouer the Bachelors or Graduates of the first degree. In the chiefe place of this Temple or Chappell is placed his Image, or else his name in golden Capitall Letters, on a faire Table: besides which stand other Images of his disciples, as inferior Saints. Into this Temple euery new and full Moone, all the Magistrates of the Citie assemble with the Bachelors, and adore him with kneelings, wax-lights and incense. They do also yeerely on his birth-day, and other appointed times, offer vnto him meat-offerings or dishes with great prouision, yeelding him thanks for

for the learning they haue found in his Bookes, as the cause of their Degrees and Magistracies. But they pray not to him for any thing, no more then to the dead in their Obits.

There are other Chappels of the same Sect vnto the Tutelare spirits of each Citty, and proper to euery Magistrate of the Court. Therein they binde themselves by solemne oath, to oblerue the Lawes in their function, and that at their first entrance: heere they offer meates, and burne odours, acknowledging diuine Iustice in punishing periuice. The scope of this Sect of the learned, is the publike peace and well ordering of the priuate and publike state, and framing themselves to Morall vertues, wherein they doe not much disagee from the Christian veritie. They haue five concords in their Morallitie, in which as Cardinall vertues, they comprise all Humanitie; the duties namely of Father and Child, Husband and Wife, Master or Superiour, and those vnder them, Brethren amongst themselves, and lastly, Equals and Companions. They condemne single life, and permit polygamic. This precept of Charitie to doe to others as one would bee don'to, is well handled in their Bookes, and especially the pietie and obseruance of Children to their Parents, and Inferiours to their Superiours.

Longobardus saith, that euery new and full Moon-day, a little before Sun-rising, in all the Cities of this Kingdome, and in all the streets, at one and the same houre, they make publication of these six; Precepts. First, Obey thy Father and Mother. Secondly, Reuerence thy Elders and Superiours. Thirdly, Keepe peace with thy Neighbours. Fourthly, Teach thy Children. Fifthly, Fulfill thy Calling and Office. The last prohibiteth crimes; Murther, Adulterie, Theft, &c.

Nic. Longobard.

Many mixe this first with other Sects: yea, some hold not this a Sect, but an Academie; Schoole, or Profession of Policie, and gouerning the priuate and publike State.

§. IIII.

Of the Sect Sciequia.

The second Sect is called Sciequia, or Omitose, in Iapon pronounced Sciaccu and Amidabu, the characters to both are the same; the Iaponites call it also the Totoku Law. This was brought into China from the West, out of a Kingdome called Tienicio, or Scinto, now Indoestan, betweene Indus and Ganges; Anno Domi. 65. I haue read, That the King of China, moued by a dreame, sent Legates thither, which brought thence Bookes, and Interpreters, which translated those Bookes: from hence it passed into Iapon; and therefore the Iaponiders are decciued, which thinke, that Sciaccu and Amidabu were Siamites, and came into Iapon themselves. Perhaps they then heard of the Apostles preaching in India; and sending for that, had this false doctrine obtruded on them.

2. Sciequia.

They hold, that there are foure Elements (whereas the Chinois foolishly affirme five, Fire, Water, Earth, Metals, and Wood, not mentioning the Aire) of which they compound this Elementary World, with the creatures therein. They multiple Worlds with Democritus, and with Pythagoras, hold a Metempsychosis, or passage of Soules out of one body into another. They tell of a Trinitie of Gods, which grew into one Deitie. This Sect promisseth rewards to the good in Heauen; to the euill, threatens punishments in Hell; extolleth Single life; seemes to condemne Marriage; bids fare-well to house and household; and begs in Pilgrimages to diuers places. Their Rites doe much agree (it is the Iesuites assertion) with the Popish; their Hymnes and Prayers with the Gregorian fashion, Images in their Temples, Priestly Vestments, like to their Plumasa. In their Mumismus they often repeat a name, which themselves vnderstand not, Tolome which some thinke may be deriued from that of Saint Thomas. Neither in Heauen or Hell doe they ascribe eternitie: but after certaine spaces of yeeres, they allow them another birth in some other Earth, there allowing them penance for their passed sinnes. The severer sort eate not flesh, or any thing that had life; but if any delinquish, their penance is not heard; the gift of some money, or the mummbling over their Orisons, being (they promise) of power to free from Hell. These things made a faire shew; but their corruptions made them distastfull: and this also (which the Learned often object to these Sectaries) that the King and Princes, which first gave way hereto, died violently and miserably, and fell into publike calamities. Yet hath it euen to these times, in diuers vicissitudes, encreased and decreased, and many Bookes haue bene thereof written, which contayne many difficulties, inextricable to themselves.

Their Temples are many and sumptuous: in which, huge monstrous Idols of Brasse, Marble, Wood, and Earth, are to be seene; with Steeples adioyning, of stone, or timber; and therein exceeding great Bells, and other ornaments, of great price. Their Priests are called Oscami.

Fasting.

Ofiam: They continually shauē their heads and beards, contrary to the Countrey custome. Some of them goe on Pilgrimages: others liue an austere life, on Hills or in Caves; and the most of them (which amount to two or three millions) liue in Cloysters, of their reuenues and almes, and somewhat also of their owne industrie. These Priests are accounted the most vile and vicious in the Kingdome, being of the baser raskalitie: sold, when they are childien, by their parents, to the elder Priests; of slaves, made Disciples, and succeeding their Masters in Sect and Stipend; few voluntarily adioyning themselves to these Cloysterers. Neither doe they affect more liberrall learning, nor abstynce (but perforce) from disauowed Luxurie. Their Monasteries are diuided into diuers Stations, according to their greatnesse: in euery Station is one perpetuall Administrator, with his slave-Disciples, which succeed him therein. Superiour in the Monastery they acknowledge none, but euery one builds as many Cells, or Chambers, as he is able, which they let out to strangers for great gaine, that their Monasteries may be esteemed publike Innes, wherein men may quietly lodge or follow their businesse, without any explication of their Sect. They are lured also by many to Funerall Solemnities, and to other Rites, in which wilde Beasts, Birds, or Fishes, are made free and let loose; the feuerer Sectaries buying them to this meritorious purpose. In our times this Sect much flourisheth, and hath many Temples erected and repaired; many Eunuches, women, and of the rude vulgar embracing the same. There are some Professors, called Quicums, that is, Fasters, which liue in their owne houses, all their life abstyning from Fish and Flesh, and with certaine set prayers, worship a multitude of Idols at home, but not hard to be hired to these deuotions, at other mens houses. In these Monasties, women also doe liue separated from men, which shauē their heads, and reiect Marriage. These Nunnes are these called Nieu. But these are but few, in comparison of the men. One of the leamed Sect, famous in the Court, relinquished his place in the Colledge, and shaued his haire, wrote many Bookes against the Confutians: but being complained of, the King commanded hee should be punished; which hee punished further on himselfe, with cutting his owne throat. Whereupon a Libell or Petition was put vp to the King against the Magistrates, which relinquished Confutius, and became of this Sect: the King (notwithstanding all the Queenes, Eunuches, and his Kindred, are of this Sect) made answer, That such should goe into the Desarts, and might bee ashamed of their Robes. Hence followed orders, that whosoever in his Writings mentioned an Idoll, except by way of Confutation, should be vncapable of degrees in Learning; which caused much alteration in Religions for many of this Sect haue preyed much in Court, and elsewhere. Amongst the rest, one Thacon was so honoured of the chiefe Queene, that shee worshipped daily his garment, because it was not lawfull for himselfe to enter the Palace, but dealt by Eunuches. One libelled to the King against him, but had no answer (which is the Kings fashion, when he denies or disallows it) which made him more insolent. But being suspected for a Libell made against the King, and some writings, in zeale of his Idols, against the King, being found, he was beaten to death, howling in his torments, which before had wanted a Stoicall Apathie. The other Sect-masters were banished the Court.

§. V.

Of the third Sect Lanzu.3. Lanzu.

THeir third Sect is named Lanzu, of a certaine Philosopher which liued in the same age with Confutius. They saie, that he was fourescore yeeres in his mothers wombe, before his birth, and therefore call him Lanzu, that is, old Philosopher. He left no booke written of his Sect, nor seemes to haue intended any such institution. But his Sectaries called him after his death Tausa, and haue fathered on him their opinions, whereof they haue written many elegant bookes. These also liue single in their Monasteries, buying Disciples, liuing as vile and vicious as the former. They shauē not their haire, but weare it like the Lay-men, sauing that they haue a Hat or Cap of wood. There are others married, which at their owne houses profess greater austeritie, and recite ouer set prayers. They affirme, That amongst other Idols, they also worship the God of Heauen, but corporeall, and to whom their Legends tell, that many indignities haue happened. The King of Heauen which now reigneth, they call Ciam; he which reigned before was Leu, who on a time came riding to the Earth on a white Dragon. Him did Ciam, who was a Diuino, giue entertainment, and (whiles Leu was at his good cheere) mounted vp his Dragon, which carried him to heauen, & there seized on the heavenly Royaltie, and shut out Leu, who yet at last was admitted to the Lordship of a certaine Mountaine in that Kingdome.

Thus

Thus they professe their god to be a coozener and vsurper. Besides this King of Heauen; they saie another threefold Deitie; one of which they say was the head of their Lanzu sect. They promise to theirs Paradise, which they shall enioy both in bodie and soule, and in their Temples haue pictures of such as haue the Images of such Saints. To obtaine this, they prescribe certaine exercises, which consist in diuers postures of sitting, certaine prayers and medicines, by which they promise to the obseruers through their gods fauour an immortal life in Heauen, at least a longer mortall in the bodie. The Priests of this Sect haue a peculiar Office of casting out Devils, which they do by two meanes: one is to paint horrible Shapes of Devils in yellow paper with inke, to be fastned on the walls, and then fill the house with such savage clamors, that themselves might be thought to be Devils: the other is by certaine prayers or coniurations. They professe also a power of faire weather and soule, and other priuate and publike misfortunes: and some of them seeme to be Witches.

These Priests reside in the Kings Temples of Heauen and Earth, and assist at the Kings sacrifices, whether by himselfe performed, or his Deputie Magistrates, and thereby acquire great authoritie. At these sacrifices, they make musicke of all sorts which China yeeldeth, harsh to European eares. They are called likewise to Funeralls, to which they come in precious Vestments, playing on Musical Instruments. They assist also at the consecrations of new Churches, and in pompous Processions through the streets, which the chiefe Inhabitants at certaine times obserue at the common cost of the Neighbours all about.

This Sect hath a Prelate, called Ciam; which dignitie these thousand yeeres together hath descended by inheritance, and seemes to haue receiued originall from a Southsayer, which liued in a Cane in the Prouince of Quiamsi, where his posteritie still continue, and with them his juggling sorceries. This their Prelate liues for the most part at Paquin, in estimation with the King; being admitted into the Palace for hallowings, and chasing away ill spirits. He is carryed through the Citty in a chaire, otherwise accomplished as the chiefe Magistrates, and receives a large salarie of the King. I haue heard that in these times the Prelates are so ignorant, that they know not their owne Deuillish charmes and rites. This Prelate hath no iurisdiction ouer any but those of his profession. Many of these doe worke by Alchimy to obtaine the Precepts of longer liuing, of both which their Saints (they say) left certaine rules. There are the three Sects of the Chinois, which are since by their vaine Sectaries so diuersified, that they may seeme rather three hundred. Hun-zu that raised his now reigning Family to the Scepter, was himselfe professed Religious in one of these Sects, and authorized all three Sects, admitting onely the first to the Government. Hence it is that One seekes not the ruine of the Other Sect; and the Kings themselves foster all, as they see occasion, building and repairing their Temples. The Queenes are more prone to the Idoll Sects, and bestow much almes on the Priests, maintaining whole Monasteries, to be helped by their prayers. The multitude of Idols is seene not onely in the Temples, but in priuate houses (in a place appointed after the fashion of the Countrey) in the Market-place, in Streets, Ships, publike Palaces: and yet it is certaine that few beleue their Legends, but thinke if these things do them no good, they yet will doe them no harme. The wisest in these times thinke, that all these three Sects may concur and be: all obserued together, and esteeme varietie most acceptable. From this hotchpotch, vniuing and separating, perhaps haue risen those confused and various reports of these confusions and varieties of rites: wherein if any haue like pleasure in varietie, and be wearie of hearing Ricinus and Trigantius, the latest Spectators, I will not defraud them of those things, which out of former Authors I had more confusedly before gathered.

They haue (if Mendoza be not mendax) many Monasteries of foure differing orders of Religion, distinguished by the severall colours of their habit, black, yellow, white, and russet. These foure Orders are said to haue their Generalls (whom they call Tricon) which reside in Paquin. These ordaine Provincials, who againe haue subordinated to them the Priors of severall Houses or Colledges, in those their houses acknowledged chiefe. The Generall is clothed with silke in his owne colour, and is carryed on mens shoulders in an Iworie chaire, by foure or six men of his habit. They liue partly of reuenues given them by the King, & partly by begging: which when they do, they carry in their hands a certaine thing, wherein are prayers written, whereon the almes are laid, and the giuer thereby cleared (of his money, I should haue said) of his sinne. They are Siauen, vie beades, eat together, and haue their Cells, assist at burials, arise two houres before day to pray vnto the Heauen and Singuan, who (they say) was the inuenter of that their manner of life, and became a Saint, in which their deuotion they continue untill break of day, singing and ringing of bells. They may not marry in the time of their Monkish deuotion, but they may (acquainting the Generalls therewith) at their pleasure relinquish their vow. The eldest sonnes may not enter into Religion, because they are bound to sustaine their aged Parents. At the admittance admittance of any is a great feast, made by their friends. At the lanching of any ship, they dedicate the same to the Moone, or some Idoll: and besides, there resort thither these Monkes, to make sacrifices in the poope, and reuerence the Deuill, whom they paint in the fore-castle, that he may doe them no harme. Else would they make an vnfortunate voyage. The people wear long haire, in combing whereof they are womanishly curious, these hoping by their locks to be caried into Heauen; the other, professing a state of greater perfection, refuse any such helpe. There be of their religious more austere, ^q which live (in deserts and solitary places) the liues of Hermites, with great abstinence and austeritie of life.

Anchoretis.

Nancan ^r is a Citie at the foot of Mount Liu, on which are many Anchorets, which haue each a house by himselfe, and there exercise themselves in voluntary chastisements. There are said to be as many of those houses on this Hill, as are dayes in the yeere: they obserue it as a prodigie, that when it is elsewhere cleere sun-shine, there it is cloudie and mystic allway, so that the Hill cannot be seene from a Lake neere it, which Lake also deserves mention, being great and as farre as the eye can discerne, crownd with innumerable Townes, Castles, and Habitations.

They haue Hills consecrated to Idols, whither they resort in heapes on pilgrimage, hoping hereby to merit pardon of their sinnes, and that after their death they shall be borne againe more noble and wealthy. Some of these will not kill any liuing creatures, especially such as are tame, in regard of this their Pythagorean opinion of the ^q transmutation or passage of 2 soules into beaats. The Iesuites conuerted one man neere vnto Nancun, which had thirtie yeeres together obserued a fast, not strange among the Chinois, neuer eating flesh or fish and on other things feeding temperately. Vsurers are punished in China, with the losse of that money so employed. Their fast is not a totall abstinence, but from flesh and fish.

Of their Priests is before shewed, that they haue both secular and regular: ^r the one wearth long haire and black clothes, and hath priuate habitation; the other liue in Couents and are shauen. Neither may marrie, though both doe (and not here alone) farre worse. They much commend in their bookes the consideration and examination of a mans selfe, and therefore doe esteeme highly of them which sequester themselves from humane societie to diuine contemplation, that (as they say) they may restore themselves to themselves, and to that pristine state, wherein the Heauen created them; And therefore haue not onely Colledges of learned men, who leauing the affaires of state and secular distractions, doe in priuate Villages liue together, obseruing these contemplations with mutuall conferences: but euen women also haue their Nunneries, & liue a Monastical life vnder their Abbesses: but euen such as are married liue closely enough; their feet to this end so straitly swaddled in their infancy, that they grow but little (and to haue little feet is with them great commendation) whereby they cannot but lamely walke abroad. And if any widow refuse a second marriage, shee obtaineth hereby much praise and many priuiledges. Their Bonzi are so little accounted of, that the Iesuites wearing their habit were little let by, and therefore taking the Mandarin-habit, were exceedingly honoured of all sorts, as professors of learning.

§. VI.

Of their Superstitious Divinations, and curious Arts.

For their Mechanicall and Liberrall Arts wee haue already spoken, the same in this Suruey of their Religion, you may expect of those Arts which are curious and superstitious. None of which is so generally, as their vaine obseruations of luckie and vnluckie dayes and houres, by which they measure the oportunities of all their actions. To this end they haue Almanacks or Kalenders yeerely set forth by the Kings Astrologers with publike authoritie, in such numbers that no house wants them. Somewhat of these hath bene spoken already. Trigantum writeth at large of their mysteries in this kind, comparing the differences thereof with ours in Europe. They follow certaine rules, the first Authors whereof liued 3970. yeeres since in the reigne of Tao (whom they still obserue as a Saint) who set two brethren on worke to finde out the celestiall motions. Their names were Hi and Ho: these wrote certaine rules, which two thousand yeeres after were burned by Xi Hoan, and not a booke left that was knowne, till some Copies were againe discovered in the time of King Vu is about an hundred yeeres after. These rules haue bene five and fiftie times examined, and as it were new reuised and allowed, the last of which was three hundred yeeres since, by Co xen kim, while the Tatars reigned. As for the Theoricall Astrologie they know it not, and in the practicall they are not so practised, but their rules deceive them.

them. So it hapned about siue yeeres since, they foretelling an Eclipse falsly, for which One libelled against them to the King, and they confessed the error, but blamed their grounds: whereupon consultation was had, and the Iesuites employed by publike Commission to ioyne with their Mathematicians in reforming their Kalender: which they intended to doe by bringing in the Europzan. This, and the Kings grant of an Idoll-Temple to them a litle before 1610. for the buriall of Ricciu, wanne the Iesuites great respect in this Kingdome. Their yeere they reckon by the Moone like the Hebrewes. Their day they account from mid-night to mid-night, diuiding it into twelue equall spaces. But that which I intend, is not to shew their want of Art so much, as their wanton Art, and artlesse trifling in superstitions without ground. As, such a Day is fit for sacrifice, for bankets, for a journey, a suite to the King, building of a house, or the like, what is to be done or not, whereto they are not more ridiculous prescribers, then the people superstitious obseruers.

There are others also that get their living by this profession, appointing daies and houres: many deferring their necessary affaires till the Wizard finde out a luckie houre for the beginning, and then wil he begin, although the blustering winds, lowering skie, and all the elements forbid him, and force him to a present retreat. This hath beene a generall folly in the East, & thence hath infected the West also, but China runs mad therof. The like care they vse in calculating Nativities, an Art professed by many: as is that also by the course of Stars, or certaine superstitious numbers, to foretell things. Physionomie and Palmistrie, and Diuination by Dreames, by words in communication, by casuall gestures, auguries, sunne-beames, and innumerable other fancies, haue conspired to this phrensie: wherein it is hard to iudge whether is more absurd, the fraudulent Impostor impudently promising without feare or wit, what the impotent Consultor with a witlesse seate, makes credible by his credulitie. Many of them sickning and sometimes almost dying, vpon meeke conceit of sicknesse on such a day, foretold. Many also consult with Demills and familiar Spirits (of which before is mentioned) and diuers wayes receiue his Oracles, by the voyces of Infants, of Beasts, of Men distracted, or otherwise. Besides these fooleries, they haue one more peculiar namely, in choosing a plot of ground for priuate or publike buildings; which plot they compare with the head, tayle, feet, of certaine imagined Dragons, which they thinke liue vnder the earth, from whence all diuerse or prosperous fortunes befall Families, Cities, Provinces, and the whole Kingdome. And therefore many chiefe men spend their wits in this profound science, and are employed, especially in publike structures. As Astrologers view the Heauens, so these the Earth, and by the Mountaines, Riues, Site, foretell the Fates: and make good or bad fortune to depend on the placing of the doore, window, or other part of the house, on this or that side, or site. It is a world to see what a world of these Impostors there are in this their world (so they call the Kingdome) of China, which gull the learned, the Magistrates, and the King himselfe.

Strange is their Diuination by Idolatrous Lots, which some tell on this manner. They haue their Idols in their houses, with which they consult, sometimes praying, and sometimes beating them, and then setting them vp againe with renewed incense and flatteries, and with (as they see occasion) redoubled stripes, being cruell or propitious (as Tertullian objected to the Romanes) to their Gods. And in a word, the Mandarinnes are the Gods (or Devils rather) whom the people must feare, as dreading blowes from them, which they themselves at pleasure can and doe inflict on the other. This God-beating they vse with Lots. For when any is to vndertake a journey or any matter of weight, as buying, lending, marrying, &c. They haue two stickes flat on the one side, otherwile round, as bigge as a Walnut, tyed together with a small thread, which after many sweet, Oraisons they hurle before the Idoll. If one or both of them fall with the flat side vpwards, they reuile the Image with the most opprobrious termes: and then hauing thus disgorged their choller, they againe craue pardon with many fawning promises. But if at the second cast they find no better fortune, they passe from words to blowes, the deafe God is hurled on the earth into the water or fire, till at last with his vicissitude of sweet and sowre handling, and their importunate reiterations of their casts, he must needs at last relent; and is therefore feasted with Hens, Musicke, and (if it be of very great moment, which they consult about) with a Hogs-head boyled, dressed with Hearbes and Flowers, and a pot of their Wine. They obserue another kind of Lots, with fliskes put together in a pot, and drawing out the same, consult, with a certaine booke they haue, of their destinie.

Amongst other their curious Arts, there are two in chiefe request, Alchimie, to bring siluer out of other metall, and the other to procure a long or endless life. They fable that some of the Ancients, which they hold in estimation of Saints, diuised these Arts, and after ascended bodie and soule into Heauen. Many volumes are written in both these Arts, and many printed. Both seeme to haue like successe, the one lessening their siluer for siluer, the other shortning their lives to lengthen them. The Alchymist passeth his dayes, and squaraterh his substance in smoke, either advanced by great labour and cost to beggerie; or if bee attaine to any silvered filuer-science, it furthers him in deceiving himselfe and others. One onely Alchymist (said a madd lad of this generation, that had melted a faire house in these furnaces) hath beene in this kind happy, that can turne so little Lead into so much Gold. But these Chinois want such sanctified fires, howsoever herein also besides their exceeding diligence, many of them seeke to better their attempt by many yeeres fastings. No people more bewitched with this (though vniuersall) foolery; no harmes, fraudes, losses, teaching them more discretion. And yet greater madnesse may be ascribed to the other, who haue obtained some prosperous condition of life, thinke nothing wanting to felicity but continuance. Few there are in this City Pequim (saith Riccius) of the Magistrates, Eunuchs, and chiefe men, which are not sicke of this disease, none being warned by the ordinary deaths of Masters and Schollers in this kinde. I haue read in the Chinese Chronicles of one of their ancient Kings, who by these Impostors helpe had procured a potion, which hee thought would make him immortall. A friend of his sought to dissuade him from this vanitie, but in vaine: whereupon watching opportunitee, he caught the cup and dranke vp the potion. The King in his furie offered to kill him; whereat the other, How canst thou kill mee (said hee) whom this cup hath made immortal? and if thou canst, then haue I freed thee of this error. The King rested satisfi'd; but not so this people, which though many write against both these professions, doe now more then euer practise them. Trigantius writes of one man which had obtained the second Degree of learning, which by this profession had gotten much wealth. He had bought many children and killed them secretly, composing his Recipes of their blood, as if hee could adde life to others which he had taken from them. This came to light by one of his Concubines, and he apprehended and thereof convicted. A new punishment was inuented for this new inuention, that hee should be bound to a stake, and three thousand pieces of his flesh should be cut from him with a Razor, the vitall parts being spared as much as might be. This sentence being sent to the King, was by him confirmed.

There be which fable themselves to be very old, unto whom is great recourse of Disciples, as to some heavenly Prophets, to learne lessons of long liuing. They supposed the Iesuites (whom they tooke to be of great learning) did not truly tell them their Age, but suspected, that they had already liued some Ages, and knew the means of liuing euer, and for that cause obtained from marriage.

The Spaniards of the Philippina's being feasted by the Viceroy, two Captaines, appointed Swards, or Feast-masters, before they sate downe, did take each of them a cup full of liquor in his hand, and went together, whereat they might discouer the Heaven, and offered the same to the Sunnet, adding many prayers, that the coming of their guests might bee for good, and then did fill out the wine, making a great curse. And then proceeded they to their feast. The Chinois in the Eclipse of the Sun and Moone, are afraid that the Prince of Heaven will destroy them, and pacifie him with many sacrifices and prayers; they hold the Sunne and Moone, Man and Wife.

¶ VII.

Of the Marriages, Concubines, and other vices and errors of the CHINOIS.

THeir Marriages and Espousals want not many Ceremonies. Both are done in their youth. They like equalitie of age and state betwixt the parties. The Parents make the contracts, not asking their Childrens consent, neither doe they euer refuse. As for their Concubines, every one keeps according to his pleasure and abilitie, respecting in them especially their beautie, and buy them for the most part, the price being a hundred Crownes or lesse. The common people also buy their wiues, and sell them at their pleasure. The Magistrates marry in their owne ranke their legitimate wife. This chiefe wife only sits at table with her husband, the rest (except in the Royall Families) are as seruants, which in the presence of either of the former may not sit, but stand. Their children also call that wife their Mother, not their naturall Parent, and for her Funeralls alone solemnize their three yeeres mourning, or lesse their Office, not for their owne Mother. In their marriages they are very scrupulous that the wife haue not the same surname with her husband, although there be no kindred betwixt them, and the surnames in all China are not a thousand (as before is said) neither may any devise new, but must haue one, & that the same which their Ancestors by the fathers side (not the mothers) had, except be adopted into another Family.

They

They hee not degrees of affinitie or consanguinitie, so this surname differ, and therefore marry in the Mothers kindred be it almost neuer so neere. The Bride brings no portion for her husband, and yet the first day she comes to his house, she hath to attend abundance of household-furniture, even the Streets being therewith filled, all at the husbands cost, who some months before sends her a great summe of mony to this purpose. There are many, which being poore doe for lust make themselves slaues to rich men, that so they may be furnished with a wife amongst his women-slaues, whereby also the children become perpetually bond. Others buy their wiues, but seeing their increasing family grow chargeable beyond their abilities, sell their young sonnes and daughters at the same price they would sell a swine or beast, or some two or three duckats more, yea though they bee not by dearth compelled thereto. Thus this Kingdome abounds with seruants, not taken in the warres, but home-bred Citizens.

The Spaniards also and Portugalls carry many of them out of the Countrey into euellasting seruitude. But this child-sale is the more tolerable, because the estate of seruants is there more easie then in other Nations, & the number of the poore which liue hardly is exceeding, and they may redeeme themselves at the same price if they be able to giue it. And lastly, a greater villany in some Prouinces vsed, makes this seeme the lesse, which is to murder those their children (especially of the female sexe) which they thinke they cannot bring vp: which fact also is with them the lesse heynous, not by preuenting that sale and transportation of their children (an impious pietie) but by a pious impietie, that opinion of transmutation or passage of soules into other bodies, thinking that by this vntimely and sudden murder, they may haue more timely and quick passage, and be borne againe in richer Families. And therefore they seeke no corners, but execute their bloody parricides publicly. Yea, greater abominations then these are here perpetrated vpon as slight grounds, many laying violent hands vpon themselves, both in desperation and impatience, and in malice also, so to hurt their enemies. Thus, they say, many thousands both of men and women euery yeere drown themselves in Rivers, hang themselves, sometimes at their aduersaries doors, or poison themselves; whereupon their kindred complaine to the Magistrates on those, which gaue cause or occasion to these extremities, which sometimes are seuer in these cases to the accused. It may be reckoned among their cruelties (which in the Northerne Prouinces is practised) the gelding of their Male-Infants, so to make them capable of the Kings seruice, none other being admitted to attend or speake with Him, and the whole sway of the Kingdome, being in great part in these vn-manly hands, of ten thousand scarce any but Plebeian, illiterate, ferule in condition and conditions, impotent, impudent, of weak both conceit and performance. Neither is this a little crueltie, that the Magistrates are thought to kill as many against the Lawes, as the Lawes themselves by execution of iudiciall sentence, by their custome of beating men with Canes, in manner at their owne lust. This makes men that they are not Masters of their owne, but are in continuall feare to be vndone by calumny and tyranny. The Chinois are also a fraudulent and treacherous people.

They contemne strangers, scorning to learne any thing out of their bookes, as being vnlearned and rude: yea all the Characters whereby they expresse the name of strangers, are compounded of such as signifie beasts, having indeed a beastly and diabolically conceit of them. When Embassadors come to them from Neighbour-Countries to pay their tributes, or for other busines, they are very suspiciously intreated, entertained as captiues all the time of their iourney, not permitting them to see any thing. They shut them vp (like beasts in stables) within their Palaces, neuer admit them the Kings presence, themselves dealing with few of the Magistrates, and all their businesse being ordered by Officers thereto assigned. Nor may any native trauell out of the Kingdome without diuers cauelesse. Petrus the Portugall Embassador died in prison at Canton. They will not suffer strangers which haue staid long in China (in some places the custome is nine yeeres) to returne from thence. Their Souldiers are base, mercer mercenaries, not regarding honor where they are not rewarded with honor, alike vile in estimation and action, the most part slaues, thereto by their owne or parents wickedness legally condemned; except at times of employment, being Porters, Horse-keepers, or of like ferule drudgerie. Their Captiues and Commanders haue some shadow of dignitie, but the substance we haue before rightly attributed to them, who can punish these as the meanest. Long nayles are (some say) accounted a Gentlemanly signe, as of hands not employed to labour. Their exceeding pride (in which they are not exceeded of any) appeared in this, that they thought the Iesuites must needs attaine the Popedom at their returne into Europe, as hauing so much bettered their learning by the Chinois Authors. But These haue since euen by the opinion of learning, obtained a better estimation.

It were tedious to tell of their opinions touching the Creation. All being a rude and vnfound Chaos, Tayn (say they) framed and settled the Heauen and Earth. This Tayn created Pancon and Panzon, Panzon by power of Tayn created Tanbom, and his thirtee brethren. Tanbom gave names to all things, and knew their vertues, and with his said brethren multiplied their generations, which continued the space of ninetie thousand yeeres. And then Tayn destroyed the world for their pride, and created another man named Lorzi-am, who had two hornes of sweet savour, out of which presently did spring forth both men and women. The first of these was Alazan, which lived nine hundred yeeres. Then did the Heavens create another man (Lorzi-am was now vanished) named Alzian, whose Mother Lutim was with child with him only in seeing a Lyons head in the skye. This was done in Truchin, in the Province of Santon: he lived eight hundred yeeres. After this, Yao and Hauzui, and Ocheney with his sonne Ezomlam, and his nephew Vnei the first King of China (they say) were the inventers of their many Arts.

In the later ¹ Epistles from China, dated 1606. and 1607. little is there to further this Historie. As for their tales of Miracles in those and the Japonian Epistles (beating the same date) wherein Ignatius Loyolaes picture is made a miracle-worker; I hold them not worth relation. The Chinois beleev^e (as is there reported) that there is a certaine spirit which hath power of the life and death of children that are sicke of the measles, and therefore when their children are sicke thereof, they hang a glasse before the dore of the chamber where he lyeth, that the spirit coming to destroy the child, seeing his Image in that glasse, should not dare to approach nearer. Their Baptisme cured the disease: a new remedy for measles, a new vertue of Baptisme.

Their order for the Poore may be a pattern vnto Christians: they suffer none to beg, nor to be idle. If any be blinde, yet hee is set to some worke, as grinding in a Querne, or such like; of which sort (after ^m Boterm account) there are foure thousand blind persons that grind^e still in Canton alone. If they be impotent, that they cannot worke, their friends (if they be able) must provide for them; if not, they are kept in Hospitals, out of which they never passe, and have all necessaries provided them by Officers appointed in every City to this buisness. Common women are confined to certaine places, and may not goe abroad, nor dwell in the City, for infecting others, and are accountable to a certaine Officer of their euill earnings; which when they are old, is bestowed on their maintenance. Their dwelling is in the Suburbs of Cities.

They are great Sodomites, although they haue many Wives and Concubines, which they buy of their Parents, or in the Markets, in like manner as the Turkes. They are not by Law prescribed to observe this or that Sect: and therefore they haue many Sects, some worshipping the Sunne, some the Moone, some nothing; and all, what themselves best like, as is in part before shewed. They take their oathe (as here by kissing a booke) with thrice drinking of a certaine liquor. Antony Dalmeida saith, that in saying Masse, they were so thronged with the people, that they were almost trodden vnder foot. And of a Chinian Priest (contrary to the zeale elsewhere in any Religion) they were invited to dinner, and feasted together with many other of their Priests that vsed them kindly.

2. VIII.

Of their Temples.

Triguim.

IT followeth now that we speake of places Religious amongst the Chinois, of which their Temples challenge the first place, their Sepulchres the next. Of their Monasteries we haue already spoken. Their Temples, as their other structures, come short of the European magnificence: yet are they many, and that about Paquin it selfe. For howsoeuer the King hath little deuotion to any Religion at all, yet his Mother is verie zealous, repaires and builds Temples in diuers places, and in one Monastrie sustaineth above a thousand Ministers of her Holies: so that this kind elsewhere contemned, is in the Royall City better respected. Hence they haue a Prouerbe, In the City Royall, Hu-xam (so they call their Priests) in the Provinces the Magistrates are worshipped. We haue mentioned the Temples dedicated to men of Merit and publike Benefactors. Such an one is in the confines of the Province of Conton erected to the Honour of One, which for the benefit of Trauellers made a passage over a steepe and vnpassable hill, diuiding the Rocks, as Annabal did the Alps; where are such Precipices, as cannot but strike horror to the passenger: & yet they are safely carried, without descending from their chayres, borne on men shoulders. On the top of this hill is a Temple built to the Colana, that made this way, with his Image therein and odours burning perpetually: the walls and floore thereof adorned with many Poems and inscriptions to his praise, cut in Marble. This Mountaine is one daies journey, standing betwene betweene two great Rivers, whereby there is continuall traffique betwixt this of Cantoni and the other Prouinces, there being about three thousand Porters, or bearers of Burthens, which carrie those wares, besides Beasts of carriage, and that with great fidelitie; a rare vertue in other parts of China. When they haue pass'd out of Cantoni, ouer this Mountaine, they come into the Riuer, which is called the Sonne of the Sea for the largenesse, but in Winter (which is their driest season) full of shoalds, the cause of much shipwrackes. But lest my Relation flay, or be wracked in these shoalds; let vs take view of that which the King bestowen on the Iesuites for their Residence, and for the Bynall of Matthæu Ricini, to whom our China Relations are so much indebted.

- 10 It was about a quarter of a myle from one of the Citie gates, built by an Eunuch, who now was condemned for some crime, and left his Palace which he had here builded, with the expence of about 14000. duckats (which in China is a great summe, in that cheapnesse of all things, far beyond European computation) should fall into the hands of spoilers (the goods of Eunuchs in this kingdome vsually becoming his, which first can catch them) he consecrated his Palace, and made it a Temple, maintaining therein one Priest. Such Palaces many of the Magistrates haue neere to the Citie, as retiring places and Tusculanes for their Muses. The portraiture of this whole House, with the Garden, and other appurtenances, Tri-gantius hath set forth in picture; being after the China building, with the doore Southwards, and so running a great length into the North, with foure great Halls one beyond another; 20 in the middle parts, and on each side, Chambers and other rooms; beyond all the Garden, the pillars of Timber bearing vp the roofo; the walls and paucement of Bricke, The outmost of these Halls was conuered into a Temple or Idoll-Chappell, in which was a great Altar of Stone and Bricke, cunningly fretted, painted red (a colour forbidden to priuate houses) and vpon the midst thereof sat a huge Monster of Earth, gilded from top to toe, of masse quantitie. The Chinois call it Ti cam, the God (as they fable) of the Earth and Treasures, as Pluto in the Poets. In his hand was a Scepter, on his head a Crowne, not vnlike those vied by our Kings. On each side stood foure ministers of the same matter: on both sides of the 30 roome two great Tables, and on each of them five Kings, or great Officers of Hell. On both the walls were painted the same Officers, or Judges, sitting on their seuerall Tribunals, giuing sentence on wicked men, every one according to the condition of his Court. Before them stood many Deuils, more terribly formed then with vs. The paines of Hell also were so deciphered, that could not but strike terror to the beholders: some rested in yron beds, some fried in scalding oyle, some cut in pieces, or diuided in the middle, or torne of dogs, or otherwise tortured. The first of those Iudges examined the faults, which they said he: law in a certaine glasse. Those which he found guiltie, were sent to the other Iudges, according to the qualitie of the crimes. One of these was Iudge in cases of Transmigration, which sent the soules of cruell men into Tygres; of vnclane persons, into Swine, and the like: or if their crimes were smaller, into the poorer sort. There was a great Ballance; in one of the Scales, a man laden with sinnes; in the other, one of their hypocritical prayer-bookes, which counterpoysed the other Scale, and freed the sinner. There ran through the midst of Hell a discoloured Riuer, which carried away many. For ouer it were two Bridges, one of Gold, the o- 40 ther of Siluer; by which, those passed ouer, which had been deuout Idolaters, carrying in their hands ensignes of the same: these were guided by the Priests, which led them through the midst of Hell to faire and pleasant Croues and Gardens. In another part were painted the dungeons of Hell, with horrible Serpents, flames, Deuills. To the brazen gates thereof there comes an Idolatrous Priest, which in despite of all the Deuils deliuer his mother from those flames. There was no infernall punishment painted, but had such an inscription: He who shall pray to such an Idoll a thousand times shall be free from this punishment. The Iesuites beat the earthen Idols to dust, and burnt those of wood, wherein the Chinesse Conuers were 50 the forwarder, because the Country custome is to fill the hollow bellies of these Images with deuoted money or jewells. They demolished the Altar and plaistered ouer the pictures, and in place thereof erected the Image of Christ. No priuate man may erect a Temple by Law, which yet the mightie Eunuchs transgresse.

A little before this exchange of Idols into Images (after their distinction, and a silly one it is) some tooke their last leaue of Ti cam: one kneeling and bidding it farewell; another chafing, said; Thou wast of dung and earth, if thou hast no power to maintaine the Temple and thy selfe, what helpe may I looke for at thy hand? neither art thou worthy of any honour at mine. Others said, that this had sometime borne the name of some other Idoll, and therefore was augured for that change.

- 50 At Xaucum is the Temple of Nanboa vpon a goodly Hill, and nigh to it a Monasterie, in which are maintained one thousand of their Religious Regulars, the lands adioyning being theirs. They tell that about eight hundred yeeres since liued one Lusiu in great austeritie, S f 3 always girded with a chaine next to his flesh, which vsed to grinde as much rice as might serue one thousand of them a day. When the wormes (by reason of that chaine breeding in his flesh) fell off, he would place it there againe, and aske if it had nothing to gnaw. His car-kasse is still kept there, to which are pilgrimages out of all the Kingdome, and this Temple built to his honor. The Regulars are diuided into twelue stations, and each hath a Superior, besides One supreme ouer all the rest. They professed chastitie, but their house was both a stewes for whore dome, and a denne of theues and robbers. Here were many huge Idols of brasse, and other metall, and of wood, gilded, in one station fise hundred. They had diuers steeples and bells in them, one so great, that they had neuer seene so great a bell in Europe.

The Corpse of Lusfu was shewed them, which they worship (but many doubt whether it be the true, for could it escape the wormes, which had seised on it aliue?) kept in the midst of the Temple in a high place, where hang fiftie lamps, which burne at appointed times. The Abbot of this Monasterie confessed that in ancient times the Chinois had worshipped no Idols, but that they were politically appointed by Magistrates, lest the vulgar should bee without all Religion. They haue their Chappels in great mens houses. But we will take view onely of the Kings Temple at Nanquin, and so end. This is a Royall one indeed for greatness and statelynesse. It is built in a groue of Pine-trees neere the Citie, which is compass with a wall twelue miles in circuit. The Temple after the China manner of building is most of timber, the walls of brick; diuided into fise lles with rowes of pillars on both sides, which are of round timber as big as two men can fathom: the roofe is carued and gilded verie faire, hauing lost nothing of the beautie, though not vsed by the Kings for sacrifice in this their two hundred yeeres absence. In the midst is an eminent place of precious Marble, in which are two Thrones of Marble, one for the King to sacrifice in, the other left empty for him to whom he doth sacrifice. The Cloisters without the Temple are beautified with elegant turnings, and all the windows netted with yron to keepe out birds, which is vsed also in all the Palace. All the doores of the Temple are couered with plates of brasse gilded and richly carued; without the Temple are many Altars of red Marble which represented the Sun, Moore, Starres, and China Mountaines; whereby they inferre that the god there worshipped created all things, which are therefore set without the Temple as acknowledged not to be gods. No man vnder grieuous penalties may cut a bough off any of the trees in that groue, which makes them great and old. About the Temple are many Cels, which were baths in which the Kings and Ministers washed before sacrifice. There Altars are of the Dutch fashion that one may goe round about them.

Of their Funeralls.

The Chinois are very superstitiously conceited of Death, and are exceeding loth to haue any die in their house. Linschoten writeth, That when a man lies on his death-bed, they present vnto him the picture of the Deuill, with the Sunne in his right hand, and a Poniard in his left, bidding the sicke man looke well on him, that hee may be his friend in the other world. How euer the sicke be visited, let vs now performe our last office to these Chinois, and follow them to their graues.

Many are the Ceremonies which they there obserue in Funerals. As they honor their parents in their life time (being otherwise liable to grieuous punishments, yea some of their chiefeft Mandarines will sue for the Kings licence, to leaue their publike function, to giue priuat and more diligen attendance to their parents;) so, after their death, they mourne three yeeres in white Hats and Garments, although they beare the highest Magistracies in the Kingdome, as the Colai, &c. the militarie Magistrates excepted. The first moneths they giue vnto them a rough Vesture with a rope, like the bare-foot Friars. This is not onely obserued of the meaner sort; but the mightiest Mandarines, after newes of their fathers death, leaue their function, and in their priuate houses bewaile their losse. The wealthier sort keeps them aboute ground two or three yeeres, as in a Parlour, fitted for that purpose, whither they daily resort vnto them, to salute them, and to burne Incense, and set meates before them. Sometimes also the Bonzis, or Priests, resort thither with their Dirges and holy things. Their wiues, children, and neighbours come likewise to bewaile them, being admonished of the death by the sonne or neereft of the kindred, in a solemne Libell mournfully composed. The Hall is spread with white Clothes or Mats: in the midst thereof is an Altar, and thereon the Coffin and Image of the dead. To that Hall, within foure or fise dayes, all the kindred come in mourning attyre, one after another, euery houre of the day, and burne odours, and set two Wax-lights to the dead, making foure bowings and kneelings, after their fashion, before deliuered; the sonne, meane while, standing by, and modestly lamenting. Behind the Coffin are the women of the house hid, behind a curtaine, in mourning weeds, and howling behaviour. They burne Paper and white-Silkes, so thinking to minister apparell to the dead. They will not vse their wonted lodging, diet, and delights; but lye on Straw Mattresses, on the bare ground, neere the Coffin; eat no Flesh, or Dainties, drinke no Wine, Bathe not; companie not with their Wiues, come not at Feasts, nor for certaine moneths space, abroad; alwayes remitting more of this austeritie, as the three yeares grow neerer an end. They vse not the same apparell, house-hold furniture, salutations. They colour part of the Paper in which they write, with another colour. They obserue not their wonted proper names, but call themselves otherwise, as Disobedient, or such like. Musick is banished; their dyer is hard. When the corpes is to bee buried, all the kindred come together, being re-inuited with another Libell, in mourning habit. The pompe is in manner of Procession: diuers Statues of Men and Women, Elephants, Tygres, and Lyons, all of Paper, diuers-coloured, and gilded, goe before; which at the graue are burned. A long rucke of Priests also attend, which performe many Rites by the way, pattering their prayers, and playing on Tymbrels; Pipes, Cymballs, Bells, and other Instruments. Likewise, huge Centers of Bell-metall are carried on mens shoulders. Then follows the Coffin, adorned sumptuously, carried of forty or fifty Bearers, vnder a great Canopie of Silke. The children come after on foot, leaning on their stauces; as fainting: Then the women, vntwene, vnder a white curtaine; and then other women, further in bloud, carryed in mourning chayres. They assemble as many Priests as they can, which on muscall Instruments, and with their voyces, tune their mournfull Ditiees. The place whither the corpes is carried, is adorned with diuers Images. The Coffin is very large, the prouiding of which they commit not to their heire, but themselves in their liues take order for the same, bestowing great care and cost for the best wood and workmanship which they are able to procure, therein spending sometimes seventy, eighty, or a hundred ducats. They hold it vnforgotten to die before they haue prouided the same. They are no lesse curious for the place of their buriall, thinking that hereon dependeth the fortune of their posterity, and therefore sometime spend a whole yeare in consultation, whether it shall bee toward the North, or some other Region. Their Sepulchres are in the fields on some hill-tops neere the Cities, each family by themselves where they forsifie them, and oftentimes resort thither to performe their obsequies. To bee buried within the walls were a thing most miserable, neuer to bee forgotten. At these Sepulchres they haue their yeerely meetings, where their kindred burne odours and make a Funerall banquet. Their Sepulchres are very great of maile, with the images of diuers beasts and men standing by. Their Epitaphs also in marble, magnificent, with elegant inscriptions of their exploits. For some time after they will eat no flesh, in regard of that passage of soules before spoken of. This opinion is of more authoritie and credite with them then that of Hell or Heauen, although (as is said) their Bookes and Pictures depaint horrible things in that kinde. Others adde, that as soone as one is dead, they wash him, and clothing him in his best apparell, all perturbed, see him in his best chaire, and there all his neerest kindred kneeling before him, take their leaue with teares. They Coffin him (as before) and place him in a roome richly furnished, and couer him with a sheet, in which they paint his portraiture. A table standeth by full of Viands, with Candles on it. Thus doe they keepe him fiftene dayes, euery night the Priests executing their superstitious exequies, burning and shaking certaine papers before him. By the Sepulchres they plant a Pine tree, which is sacred, and may not be cut downe, nor converted to any vse if the weather ouerthrow it. Their funerall pompe is in manner of Procession; with Candles carried in their hand. They burne vpon the graue many papers, pointed with men, catrell, and provision for his vse in the next world. It is now time to leaue them quietly resting in their graues: onely a word of their Times reputed holy.

The times religious are the new Moones, and full Moones (as yet haue heard) in which they make great barquets, and then also they muster their Souldiers, who alone may wear weapons in China. They solemnize also their Birth-dayes, whereunto their kindred doe resort of custome with presents, and receiue good chere. The Kings birth-day is a great festival. But New-yeeres day is their principall feast. This is solemnized of all Sects alike the first new Moone, and then againe the first full Moone in the beginning of the yeere: This is their Chindemasse feast, euery man deuising artificiall lanterns of paper, glasse, cloth, the Halls seeming to bee on fire with the multitude of lights; some carrying in the night with great reuels, lights and twisted lanternes Serpentine fashion, and many devices are practised of fire-workes with gunpowder. Then they send New-yeeres-gifts to each other, as Mendoza writes. They haue no Sabbath nor weekly solemnity.

Of Strangers, and Forren Religions in China.

F the Iewes in China wee haue spoken already: with their Ethnike rites we haue toyled and tyred you. It may haply be some refreshing to looke vpon Sarecenicall or Christian objects, if it bee but for variety. How inhospitable the Chinois are to strangers wee haue in part heard, neither permitting egress to the Nations, nor ingresse to aliens except in three respects. The first, such as come to paye * their annuall tributes. The second, such as pretending honour and tribute come (as wee haue heard) from the West with seeming tribute, a colour to their gaine by Merchandise. The third, such as in admiration of the Chiniian vertues and learning, come thither (as the Quene of Sheba to Salomon) to learne the same, which is the Iesuits; pretence: but these must here fixe their habitation, nor may be suffered to returne; such is their ieaalousie, of discouering their mysteries to others. And this made the Iesuits, after so long stay, free from feare of expulsion, which yet since complaine of y persecution. But it may not bee knowne, that they haue any intelligence or commerce with strangers: and therefore the Iesuits, which haue obtained two so great priuiledges, the Eunuchs Palace for their Residence, and the employment in correcting the China Kalender, both by Royall approbation; yet could not obtaine leaue to goe into the Prouince of Canton, though with Mathematicall pretexts for that Kalender-businesse, to obserue Longitudes and Latitudes of Places, because they were said to bee countrey men to those of Macao. Yea, a Colao, or Counsellor of State, was depriued, for sending a message to a bordering King; a tempest of libelling complaints thundering and shewing against him therefore. In the bordering Prouinces they set narrow watch at Custome-houses, Bridges, and in the very Riuers, by ships of warre thereto appointed. But if they be once gotten into the inner parts of the Kingdome, there are no such officers, nor Searchers. Neither may any stranger passe out of the Kingdome, after once entering, without the Kings licence. The Iesuits scale their ingresse and egress by means of the Portugalls, which had the Towne of Macao assigned them by the Chinois for traffique. These come usually twice a yeare to the chiefe Citie of the Prouince of Canton, which is not called Quantum, or Canton, (the name of the Prouince) but Quam ceu. All the * day time they haue free entrance into the Citie about their Merchandise, but must lye on shipboard at night. In the midst of the Riuer there is a little Island, and therein a Temple, in which they are allowed their Catholike deuotions. There by Boat did they provide to steale in or out of the Countrey. The Mahumetans that come in by land, if they stay nine yeeres (as is obserued) may neuer returne home againe. Of these there are now many thousand Families in China, dispersed into most of the Prouinces and chiefe Cities. They haue there their Temples very sumptuous, and their Circumcision. But as farre as I could euer learne, they neyther teach, nor care to teach others their deuotions, but are vnskillfull of the Saracen Tenets, and are contemned of the Chinois. It seemes, that they comming in was in the time that the Tartars reigned here, which since haue increased, and after so long continuance, are not held in suspection, as other strangers. Some say, after the fourth generation they are reputed as Natives: yea, they are admitted to the studies of Learning, Degrees, and Magistracie, as well as the Chinois. But most of these, thus dignified, relinquish their former Superstition, retaying nothing thereof, but abstinence from Swines flesh, which rather by Nature, then for Religion, they abhorre. They differ in countenance from the Chinois. Perera saith, hee saw at Fuquien certaine Moores, who could say little of their Religion, but, Mahomet was a Moore, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moore, with some other words of their Alcoran, wherewith all, in abstinence from Swines flesh, they liue (saith he) vntill the Diuell take them all. He reasoned with them, because hee had in many Chiniish Cities scene the Reliques of Mahomet kept; and they answered, That they came in great ships fraught with Merchandize from Paquin-ward, to a Port appointed to them by the King, where they conuerted to their Religion the chiefe Mandaries or Lytia, whereupon the people began to turne Mahumetan. They now waxing bolder, prohibited the eating of Swines flesh, the peoples chiefe food: who hereby prouoked, complained of a conspiracie betwixt these Moores and the Lytia, against their King. Hereupon hee and the chiefe of them were executed, and the rest dispersed into certaine Cities, where they remained slaves to the King.

Touching Christians in China, there is not so great certaintie. Certaine Mogores told Riccius of some in the Xenfan Prouince, in the North parts of China, at a place called Xuchoo, which were white, bearded, vied Bells, worshipped Isa, that is, Iesu, and Mary, and honoured the Crucifix; their Priests married, which cured diseases without medicines. quin gave more full intelligence, that at Caifumfu, and at Lincin, in the Province of Sciandun, and in the Province of Sciand, there lived certaine strangers, whose ancestors had come out of forraigne parts, which worshipped the Crosse (which the Chinois expresse by the Character of Ten) and made the signe thereof with the finger on their meate and drinke. They also made the same signe with Inke on the foreheads of their children, to preserve them from misfortune. A Jesuite also saw, in the hands of an Antiquary, a Bell with a Church and Crosse thereon graven; circumscribed with Greeke letters. The Jew also reported, that those Crosse-worshippers had the same doctrine in their prayers which the Jewes hold: this the Jesuite interpreted of the Psalter common to them both. Hee affirmed that there were many of them in the Northern provinces, which so flourished in letters and armes, that they grew suspicious to the Chinois, which he thought was caused by the Saracens some sixty yeeres before. The Magistrates were so incensed hereby, that they for feare were dispersed, some turning Jewes, some Saracens, others Idolaters: and their Temples were also converted into Idolatrous Temples, one of which he mentioned in his country. Ever since they lived in this profession, and when the Jesuits sent one of their Converts to make enquiry, hee could bring of none: which they thought proceeded from their feare, taking him for a Spie sent from the Magistrates.

All these Sects the Chinois call Hoei, the Jewes distinguished by their refusing to eat the flesh of leg; the Saracens Swines flesh; the Christians by refusing to feed on round-hoofed beasts, Ases, Horses, Mules, which all both Chinois, Saracens and Jewes doe their feed on. The Saracens called the Christians also Isas as before; and Tercas, which is a name given in Persia to the Armenian Christians (as an Armenian affirmed to Reina) whence hee conjectured, that these Christians came out of Armenia. And by the report of Hairon the Armenian, which saith, their King came to the Great Chan of Cathay (which we have before observed, at least the best parts thereof, to be the North parts of China) to persuade him and his to become Christians; which in great part also he affected, besides other Christians there reported to be, by Paulus; and those of Sarnau, subiect to the Great Chan, mentioned by Veronamus, which seeme to be neere these in China. The Malabar Christians have Chaldean memorials of China, converted by S. Thomas; and their Metropolitan hath his style of all India and China.

Now, for the later Christianitie there preached by the Jesuits; their owne Commentaries and annual Epistles are full. Xaverius attempted it often and earnestly but could never obtaine entrance; which by others of that societie was after affected, and with much trouble effected. When the Portugalls came first into those parts, the Chinois were suspicious of them, their Ordinance and great shupps, seeming dreadfull. The Saracens told them, they were called Frankes (so they call all the Europeans, since the Expedition of Codfrey of Bullen) which name the Chinois in Canton still give them, calling them and their Ordinance Falanks (pronouncing f for r, as th for d, p for b) and by relating the Conquests of Malacca, and other places in India, brought them into greater jealousy. Yet covetousnesse of gaine opened them a way first to merchandise in a desert Iland, called Sanctian, seventy myles off in the Sea, and after to a habitation assigned them in a Peninsula (part of a greater Iland) neere to China, called of an Idoll Amu, there honored, Amacao, or Amar harbour, shortly Macao, which since that time hath bene inhabited by people of divers Nations, together with the Portugalls, and hath become a Citie, with a Bishops See, and a Colledge of Jesuits, and a famous Mart of European and Indian commodities. After that they admitted them trafficke in the chiefe Citie of Canton, two dayes sailing from Macao; whereby they found means, by degrees, to bring in first Rocurus, and after Ricini, with other Jesuits; which insinuating by gifts and obsequiousnesse into the Magistrates affections, furthered the same by reputation of Sanctitie, and especially of Learning. Many yeeres they spent to little purpose, till Ricini by his Mathematicke, and the Art of Memorie, in both which the Chinois admired him; then by changing his habitation to that of the Learned men in China, professing al- so a maintenance of the Sect of Confucius, which they professed, and confutation of the Idoll Sects; and lastly, by presents to the King, he made way into the Kings Palace & favour, who also bestowed an Idoll Temple for his dwelling, and the Residence of his Societie. Many troubles they encountered meane while, to get to keepe their Residences; that inhospitable people, sometimes accusing them to the Magistrates with devised Calumnies. Sometimes tumultuously stoning their houses, sometimes charging them to be the cause of Dearth, or that their Idols sent them not raine; calling them Demill strangers, fathering on them curious Arts, not only of Alchymie and Long life, which they honour, but others: as that they knew by mens countenance, that they had a precious stone in their heads, to know not what purposes; that they plotted devices against the state; & the Crucifix was accused also, as deified by enchantments to destroy the King. The Hollanders likewise, among other their insinuations of the Portugalls in all the parts of India, brought these of Macao into such feare, that they went about to Compasse some part of their Towne with a Wall, which the Chinois there dwelling, thinking to be done against them, caused such an vpror, that they fell together by the eares: and another quarrell happening betweene a Religious and a Secular Priest, the Chinois gaue out, that Catarena the Iesuite went about to make himselfe King of China (as one that knew the Countrey, and had bin in both the Royall Cities) with the helpe of the Iesuits there residing, Iapanders, and others. This made the Chinois to flye from Macao, and to divulge such rumors in Canton, that there was a sudden muster of souldiers through the Prouince, and one thousand houses of the chiefe Citie without the Walls pulled downe, one of the Iesuits Societie apprehended and beaten with Canes to death, and with much adoe, this little adoe was after pacified. And now the Iesuits thinke themselves in better case then euer, and haue (as they say) conuerted five thousand to their Faith in this Kingdome, after thirty yeares labours, hauing four or five places of Residence. And would God, as I proteste my selfe indebted to them for this Light of History, so they might haue iust cause of thankfulness to God and them, for the Christian Light; and that it were not confuted with such Heathenish exchange, of one Image for another, and rather the names, then substance of deuotion, altered; Beads, Tapers, Single Votaries, Processions, Monasteries, Altars, Images, hee and the Saints, with other Rites, being there already: and the very art of their Images causing an Ethnick adoration (as they tell of a Vice-roy, that would not looke vpon one of them, but in a Chappell, in the higher part of his house, set on an Altar, with Tapers and O-lours dayly burning thereto) and their manner of Preaching being not by Word, so much as by Whining; and that not by Authorities of Scripture, but by Arguments of Reason, furthered by their owne Philosophie, and commended by Mathematicall Sciences: strange Ground-works to Faith and Theologic.

§. I.

The Limits, and the ancient People and Invasions of India.

The name of India, is now applied to all farre-distant Countries, not in the extreme limits of Asia alone; but even to whole America, through the error of Columbus and his followers; who at their first arrival in the Western world, thought that they had met with Ophir, and the Indian Regions of the East. But the Ancients also comprehended vnder this name a huge Tract of Land, no lesse in the judgement of Alexanders followers in his Eastern Invasions, then the third part of the Earth; Ctesias accounted it one halfe of Asia. Yea, a great part of Africa also is comprehended vnder that name. So Turnebu * In his Adversaria, not onely findeth the Barbarians and Pathians, called by that name in Virgil; but Thebes in the higher Egypt, and Ammens Temple in Higius; and Aethiopia also, as in our discourse thereof will further appeare. But taking India more properly, Dionysius * bounds it betwene Caucasus, and the Red-Sea, Indus and Ganges: Ouid likewise in that Verse, Decolor extremo quâ cingitur India Gange.

But Ptolemy ⁴ and other Geographers, did vsually diuide India by the River Ganges, into two parts, one on this side Ganges, and the other beyond. Although here we finde no lesse difficultie concerning Ganges, which the most, with my selfe, account the same with Guanga, that falleth into the gulfes of Bengala, which they also imagine to be that which the Ancients is called Sinnu Gangevisu: Others * esteeme the River Canton (whereon standeth the supposed Canton, chief City of one of the Chinian Prouinces, whereof we haue sololy taken our lesse) to be the Ganges: of which minde are Mercator, Maginus, Gosardus, Arrianus, and their disciples: M. Panini * diuideth India into three parts, the Lesse, the Greater, which hee calleth Malabar and Abassia, betwixt them both, Dem. Niger reckoreckoneth the same number. The Name of India flowed from the River Indus. Semiramis is reported to invade India with three millions of foot-men, and 500000. horse, besides counterfeite Elephants, made of the hides of 300000. Oxen, stuffed with hay. Yet Strabo writes, at that time the Indian Monarch, brake her Forces, and chased her out of the field.

Megasthenes reckoneth one hundred twentie two Indian Nations. Arrianus in his eight booke makes a large description of this Indian world, saying, That they lived like the Scythians, without Houses, Cities, Temples, in a wandering course with their Tents, on the barke of the Tree Tala, and wild Venison, the skins whereof were their garments. In all India were no servants, but all free-men. These things were alured by Bacchus or Dionysius, who made an Expedition hither, not so much with Armes as with Arts. He taught them the vse of Wine, Oyle, and Sacrificing: in memorie whereof, Posteritie honoured him for a god. Of this the Poets, and Histories of Alexander & others, make much mention. So doth Suidas tell of one Brachman, that prescribed the Rites and Lawes of the Brachmanes: Solinus of Hydaspes; and others, of Ganges, Hercules, & the rest, with much vncertaintie. Postellus k strangely conceiteth himselfe, that Abraham posteritie by Keturah seated themselves in India, and were there knowne by the name of Lewes, before the Lewes in Palestina: that they obserued Circumcision, and dispersed it into Syria, Egypt, Armenia, Colchis, Iberia, Paphlagonia, Chaldee, and India, before Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt: and that the Brachmanes were so called, quasi Abrahamanes, as following the instructions of Abraham. Abraham wee beleuee the Father of the faithfull, but cannot father on him such vnfaithfull and degenerate generations, no more then with the same Postellus wee acknowledge the Turkes the posteritie of the ten Tribes, and the Tartars k to be the remainder of those Turkes, following Cabalisticall conjectures. But that which he speaketh of the name Lewes and Abrahamanes in India, may perhaps arise from a testimony cited out of Megasthenes his Indica, by Clem. 1 Alex. That all things obserued by Naturall Philosophers in Greece had bene handled before, partly by the Brachmanes amongst the Indians, partly of those which in Syria are called Lewes: in which testimonie he ioyneth Lewes and Brachmanes in Profession of the same learned Science of Naturall Philosophy. Aphleius m maketh the Brachmanes first Founders of the Pythagorean Learning: and reporteth further, That at dinner-time the Table was made ready, and the youths from diuers Places and Seruices resorted thither: at which time the Masters questioned with them what Good they had done that day: one answered, Hee had bene a Peace-maker to reduce such & such which were at odds; another had done this or that for his Parents: another had studied or meditated on such a point. Once, he which could not giue good account of his mornings worke, might not be admitted to receive any dinner-wages.

Strabo in his fiftenth Booke is large in this Indian subiect. Hee reporteth out of Aristobulus, that the River Indus by force of an Earth-quake, changed his channell, thereby a great part of the neighbour Region being turned into a desert. For in this Indus is like unto Nilus, in that, without it, the Country would be a Wildernesse, and therefore is also worshipped of the Inhabitants. It receiveth fiftene other Rivers into it. Hee mentioneth the Cathus not farre from thence, which after happily gaue name vnto Cathay.

The Indians are of seven sorts: 1. The first in estimation, and fewest in number, were their Philosophers. These kept publike Acts once a yeere before the King, & he which in his Observations was found three times false, was condemned to perpetual silence. The second sort were Husband-men, which payd the King (the onely owner of all the Land) a fourth part of the increase. The third, was of Shepheards and Huntmen, which wandered in Tents, The fourth, Artificers. The fifth, Souldiers. The sixth, Magistrates. The seventh, Courtiers, and those of his Priuie Councell. If any woman killeth the King in his drunkenesse, hee is rewarded with the marriage of his Sonne and Heire. If any deprive another of a member, besides like for like, he loseth his hand; and, if hee bee an Artificer, his life. They strangle their sacrifice, that it may be so offered whole to their Idols.

Of their Philosophicall or Religious Sects.

F their Philosophers, or men Learned and Religious, the Brachmanes obtaine the first place; 2. being next in Sects to the Greekes. These are after their manner Naturall writers from the wombe. So soone as their Mother is concludeth of them, there are learned men appointed which come to the Mother, with Songs, containing 6 Precepts of Chastitie. As they grow in yeeres they change their Masters. They haue their places of Exercise in a Grove nigh to the Citie, where they are banded in graue conferences.

They

They eat no living Creatures, nor have use of women, live frugally, and lye vpon skinnes. They will instruct such as will heare them, but their Hearers must neither Sleepe, nor Spit, nor Speake. When they haue in this strict course spent seuen and thirtie yeeres, they may lue more at Pleasure and Libertie, in Dyet, Habit, proper Habitation, and the vse of Gold, and Marriage. They conceale their mysteries from their Wiues, lest they should blab them abroad. They esteeme this life as mans Conception, but his Death-day to bee his Birth-day vnto that true and happy life, to him which hath bene rightly Religious. They hold the World to bee Created, Corruptible, Round, ruled by the high God. Water they imagine to haue bene the beginning of making the World; and that besides the foure Elements, there is a fifth Nature, whereof the Heauen and Starrs consist. They intreats of the immortallitie of the Soule, and of the torments in Hell, and many such like matters.

The p Germans, another Order of Religious or Learned men, are honoured amongst them: especially such of them as liue in the Woods, and of the Woods, both for their dyce of those wilde Fruits, and their habit of the Barkes of Trees, not acquainted with Bacchus or Venus any more then with Ceres. They speake not to the Kings, when they aske counsell of them, but by messengers; and doe pacifie the angry gods, as is supposed, by their holinesse.

Next in honour to these, are certaine Mendicants, which liue of Rice and Barley, which any man at the first asking giueeth them, together with entertainment into their houles. These professe skill in Physicke, and so remedie Diseases, Wounds, and Sterilitie; very constant in labour and hardship. Others there are, Inchanters and Diuiners, Masters of Ceremonies about the Dead, which wander thorow Townes and Cities. Some there are more Ciuil and Secular, in their life professing like Pietie and Holinesse. Women also are admitted vnto the fellowship of their studies in this Philosophie, not to their beds. Aristobolus writeth, That hee saw two of these Brachmanes, the one an old man shauen, the other young with long haire, which sometimes resorted to the Market-place, and were honoured as Counsellors, and freely tooke what they pleased, of any thing there to be sold, for their sustentance. They were appointed with Sefamine oyle, wherewith, and with hony, they tempered their bread.

They were admitted to Alexanders Table, where they gaue lessons of patience: and after going to a place not farre off, the old Man lying downe with his face vpward, sustained the Sun and showres terrible violence. The younger standing on one foot, held in both his hands a peece of wood of three cubits lifted vp, and shifted feet, as the other was weary: and so they continued every day. The young man returned home afterward, but the old man followed the King, with whom he changed his Habit and Life, for which, when as he was by some reproued, he answered, That he had fulfilled the forty yeeres exercise, which he had vowed. Onesicritus saith, that Alexander, hearing of some Religious Obseruants, which were naked, and exercised themselves to much hardship, and would not come to others, but would bid Men, if they would haue any thing with them, to come to them; sent him vnto them, who found fiftene of them (twentie furlongs from the City, each of them obseruing his own gesture of sitting, standing, or lying naked, and not stirring til sun-setting, in that vn-supportable heat, at which time they returned into the City. Calanus was one of them. He afterward followed Alexander into Persia, where beginning to be sicke, hee caused a great Pile or Frame of wood to be made, wherein he placed himselfe in a golden chayre, and caused fire to be put to, in which he was voluntarily consumed, telling (if they tell true) that he would meet Alexander at Babylon, the place fixt all to Alexanders death. Strabo saith, That this was done in a suburbs of Babylon, and that the fire was of Cedar, Cypress, Mirtle, Laurel, and other sweet woods: and after he had performed his daily exercise of running, hee placed himselfe in the middle, crowned with the leaues of Reeds, the Sunne shining on him, which he worshipped. This adoration was the signe which hee gaue to the Macedonians to kindle the fire, in which he abode without any stirring till hee was dead; Alexander himselfe admiring, and preferring this victorie of Calanus before all his owne. This Calanus told Onesicritus of a golden World, where Meale was as plentiful as dust, and Fountaines streame Milk, Hony, Wine, and Oyle. Which Country, by men turned into wantonnesse, Iupiter altered and detayned, imposing a life of hardnesse and labour, which while men followed, they enjoyed abundance; but now that men begin to surfer and grow disobedient, there is danger of vniuersall destruction. When hee had thus spoken, hee bad him, if hee would heare further, flip himselfe, and lie naked vpon these stones. But Mandanis, another of them, reproued Calanus for his hairenesse, and, commending Alexander for his loue to learning, said, that they injured their bodies to labour, for the confirmation of their minds: against passions. For his nakednesse hee alledged, that that was the best house which needed least furniture of the household. Hee added, that they searched the secrets of Nature, and that returning into the

Cicle, if they met with any carrying figs or grapes, they received of him gratia: if oyle, they poured it on them: and all mens houles and goods were open to them, even to the Parlors of their wives. When they were entered, they imparted the wisdom of their sentences, as the other communicated his meats. If they feared any disease, they prevented the same with fire, as ^v was now said of Calanus. Megasthenes reprooveth this Calanus, as Alexanders Trencher-Chaplain, and commendeth Mandamus, saying, That when Alexanders messengers told him that he must come to the sonne of Jupiter, with promise of rewards, if he came, otherwise menacing torture: he answered, That neither was he Jupiters sonn, nor did he possesse any great part of the earths: for himselfe, he neither respected his gifts, nor feared his threatnings: for while he lived, India yielded him sufficient; if he dyed, he should be freed from age, and exchange for a better and purer life. Whereupon, he saith, Alexander both pardoned and praised him. Clitarchus reporteth also, that to the Brachmanes are opposed another sect, called Pramma, men full of subtiltie and contention, which derided the studies of others in Physilogie and Astronomie. He diuideth the Brachmanes into those of the Mountaines, clothed in Deere skins, which carried scrips, full of roots, and medicines, which they applied with certaine charmes to cure diseases: and the second sort he calleth Gymnetae, those naked ones before mentioned (whereof it seemeth they were called Gymnosophists) which had women amongst them, but not in carnall knowledge: the third he calleth Ciuill, which lived in Cities and Villages, wearing fine linnen, and apparelled in skins. Clemens ^x Alexandrinus speaks of their fastings, and other austere courses, put of Alex. Polyhistor, de rebus Indici. The Brachmanes (saith he) neither eat any quick thing, nor drinke wine. But some of them eat every day, as we doe: some onely every third day. They contemne death, nor much esteeme of life, beleieving to be borne againe. Some worship Pan and Hercules. But those Indians which are called eyural for their grauitie and austeritie, liue altogether naked. These practise Truth, and foretell things to come, and worship a certaine Pyramid, vnder which they thinke are laid the bones of some god. Neither the Gymnosophists, nor these eyural vie women, but thinke it vnlawfull and against Nature, and therefore obserue chastitie. Likewise there are Virgins, which are called eyural of the female sex. They seeme to obserue the heavenly bodies, and by their signification to foretell future euents. Thus saith Clemens.

^y Nic. Damasc. Nicotianus saith, That at Antiochia hee saw the Indian Embassadors, sent to Augustus from Perus the King (as his letter contained) of fixe hundred Kings, with presents, among which was a female-Viper of fixteene Cubits (one of the like biggnesse Strabo saith, he saw sent out of Egypt) and a Cray-fish of three Cubits, and a Partrich bigger then a Vulture. Zarmanochagus, one of these Indian Philosophers, was one of the Embassadors, who at Athens burned himselfe, not moued thereto by aduerfite, but by superstition, which had in all things followed his desires, lest in his succeeding age it might alter: and therefore entered the fire, anointed, naked, laughing. His Epitaph was, Here lieth Zarmanochagus the Indian, of Bargosa, which according to his Countrey-custome, made himselfe immortal.

But it is not such maruell that their Philosophers thus contemned death, whereas their Women, the weaker and more fearefull sexe, wherein out-went their sexe and weakness. For their custome admitting many wives, the dearest of which was burned with the deceased husband: He igitur contendunt inter se de amore viri (they are ^z Hieromes words) & ambitio summacerantium est, ac testimonium castitatis, dignam morte decerni. They ambitiously contend amongst themselves, to obtaine this fatall testimonie of their husbands loue, and their owne chastitie; and the conqueresse in her former habit, lyeth downe by the carcase, embracing and kissing the same, contemning the fire which thus marryeth them againe in despite of deaths diuorce. A thing to this day obscured in many parts of India, as we shall see anon. Arrianus ^a reporteth of a place called Comar (it seemeth the Cape Comori ouer-against Zeilan) wherein is a Hauē, to which vied to resort certaine Votaries, which had deuoted themselves to a single life, to wash themselves in those holy-waters. The like was done by their Nun-like women. They had a tradition of a certaine goddesse, which vied to wash her selfe there euery moneth.

^b Suidas telleth of a Nation called Brachmanes, inhabiting an Iland in the Sea, where Alexander erected a pillar, with inscription, that he had passed so farre. They liue an hundred and fiftie yeeres, and haue neither bread, wine, flesh, nor metals, nor houles, but liue of the fruits, and cleere water, and are very religious. Their wives liue apart on the other side Ganges, to whom they passe in July and August, and after fortie dayes, returne home againe. When the wife hath had two children, shee neither knoweth her husband after, nor any other man; which is obserued also, when in fife yeeres he can raise no issue of her, hee after abstaineth. These ^c slay no beasts in sacrifice, but affirme, That God better accepteth vnbloudie sacrifices of Prayer, and more delighteth in Man, his owne Image.

In the Hills, * called Hemodi, Bacchus is said to haue erected pillars, to witnesse his Conquest, as farre in that Easterne Ocean, as Hercules did in the West. He built the City Nysa, where he left his sick and aged Souldiers, which Alexander spared, and suffered to their owne libertie, for Dionysius or Bacchus his sake. And as Bacchus erected Pillars, so did Alexander Altars to the Twelue chiefe gods, as high as Towers, Monuments of his farre trauels, where he obserued solemne games and sacrifices. Hee * sacrificed also, not to his Countrey gods alone, but to Hydaspis, Acetue, and Indus, Indian Riuers, and to other gods, with other Rites and Sacrifices, then he had before vsed: drowning a golden bowle in Indus, and another in the Ocean, in his Ethnick superstition. To him did the Indian Magi (so doth Arrianus * call their Brachmanes) say, That hee was but as other men, sauing that hee had lesse rest, and was more troublesome, and being dead, should enioy no more laud, then would serue to couer his bodie. And every man (said they) stamping with their feet on the ground, hath so much as he treadeth on. Eusebius * reciteth out of Bardanes Cyrus, that amongst the Indians, and Bactrians, were many thousand Brachmanes, which as well by Tradition, as Law, worshipped no Image, nor ate any quick Creature, dranke no Wine nor Beere, onely attending on Diuine things: whereas the other Indians are very vicious, yea, some hunt Men, sacrifice, and deuoure them, and were as Idolaters.

Plinie, besides his Relations of Monsters in these parts, telleth of their Philosophers (called Gymnosophists) like things to that, which is before mentioned of their beholding the Sunne from the rising to the setting, with fixed eyes, standing on the hot sands all day long, on one foot by course. Tooth-ache, with other diseases of the head and eyes, spitting, and other sickneses, are either exiles or strangers to the Indians. Tully saith, ^b That in this naked plight these Philosophers endure the cold of Winter, and Snowes of Caucasus, while they lye, and the burning fire at their end without any playning. The Indian women also steepe which shall be married to her husbands corps, in a fierie Chariot, riding with him into another World.

Hystaspes, the Father of Darius, is reported to haue learned of the Indian Philosophers or Brachmanes, both Astronomie and Rites of Religion, with which hee after instructed the Persian Magi. None * might sacrifice without one of these to direct him, who onely among the Indians had skill of Diuination, and authoritie to sacrifice, and were free from other seruices.

§. III.

Many doubtfull and fabulous reports of the Indians.

He Indians are said to worship Iupiter, Ganges, and other Heroes of their Countrey. Some of the Indian Nations accounted it dishonourable (as they doe also at this day) for the wiues not to be burned with their deceased husbands. Thomas ¹ the Apostle preached the Gospell to the Indians, and so did Bartholomew also, and destroyed their Idols (which wrought great wonders amongst them) Asarath, Beirith, and Waldath; as Abdias * reporteth, who euen in this Historie may easily be conuincied to be counterfeited, in ascribing the Names and Religions of the Grecians, Iuno, Neptune, Berecinthia, to the Indians; besides those vnchristian reuenges, in killing so many of their Adversaries, and old Heathenish, new Popish Ceremonies, fathered on those Apostles.

To let passe that Abdias, a sic Bishop of that mysticall Babylon: * Alexander ab Alexandro reckoneth among their gods the greatest Trees (to cut which, was with them a capitall crime) and a Dragon, in honor of Liber Pater. Hercules they honored in a Gyant-like statue, whose daughter Furden, the Pandean say, was their first Queene. These affirme, that in the Hill Meros, which they account sacred to Iupiter, is a Caeue wherein Liber or Bacchus was nourished, from whence the fable grew, that hee was borne of Iupiter's thigh; for so much significth. Some of the Indians (saith * Salinus) kill no beasts, nor eat flesh: some liue onely on fish. Some kill their Parents and Kinsfolks; before Age or sicknesse withereth them, and deuoure their flesh: an argument, not of villany, but pietie amongst them. Their Gymnosophists *, from the Sun-rising to the setting, fixe their eyes on the bright Orbe of the sun, thence obseruing certaine secrets. Hereunto he addeth the tales, of Men with dogs heads; of others with one leg, and yet very swift of foot; of Pigmeis, of such as liue onely by sent; of hoarie Infants; of some like Polyphemus, with one eye in their fore-head; of others with eares to the ground, wherein many of the old Writers are Poets; and the Moederne Painters, as in many other Monsters of Men and Beasts. We seeke credit with the wise, and not admiration of fooles.

The Indians neuer sacrificed, or saluted their Idols without dances. They were neuer rewarded with militarie honour or spoile, except they brought into the Campe an enemies head in their hand. They punished periuie with the losse of fingers and toes: and such as deceived their Clients, with perpetuall silence; and besides, they were disabled vpon any Office. Their Lawes are not written; their Contracts without seales, or witnesses. They vied no pledges; nor might borrow or lend vpon vsury.

Philostratus in his large Legend of the life of Apollonius Tyranus, their Philosophicall Saint, relateth his Pilgrimage into India, to the Brachmanes, in which he came to Nysa, where was a Temple of Bacchus, built by himselfe, planted about with Bayes, Vines, and luy, whose shady rooffe covered the same. In the midst was an Image: all Instruments belonging to the Vintage were there, some of Gold, others of Silver hanged vp, sacred to Dionysius. Hæ after came to Taxilla the Citie Royall, where he found the Temple of the Sun, and in it, the yuorie Image of Ajax, with golden statues of Alexander; and ouer-against the same, the brazen Images of Porns. The walls of red Marble shined like fire, interlaid with Gold, resembling lighting. The Mosaicall floore pouldred with Pearles. The King here offered sacrifice to the Sun. For the Pepper-trees, which (he saith) are great, and abound with Apes, who gather the Pepper for the Indians gratis, brought thence by a wyle of the Indians, who first gather some, and lay it on heapes, and then go away: at their returne, hiding many the like heapes made by the emulous Apes; I leaue it to the Author's authority, and Readers credulities: as that also which followeth of the Inhabitants of Paraca in these parts, who by eating a Dragons heart and liuer, attaine to vnderstand the Language (if so I may term it) of Beasts. And if you matuell at this, that which followes will amaze you of Men which doe not, as the former, communicate with the nature of Beasts, but of Spirits, making themselves at their pleasure inuisible. Here in a holy Hill was a pit, whereof no man drinketh, by which the Indians bind their faith, as by the most solemne and inuiolable oath. In this pit was a fierie receptacle, where men were purged from their offences; and two tubes (of which I should say) of raines and windes, the one being opened yeelding raines, and the other windes. In this place were many Indian, Grecian, and Egyptian statues, with their Rites obserued accordingly. This Hill was reported the middle of India, and euery noontide they sing Hymnes to the Sun for that fire, borrowed (they say) from his beames. The Brachmanes sleepe on the ground, on hearths strewed two cubits thick; that by this eleuation they might more signifie their deuotion to the Sun, whom they laud night and day. Her found ¶ Iarchas their Principall, with seuen Associates, sitting on Thrones of Brass. Iarchas could tell Apollonius his Name, Nation, and Aduentures, which had beset him all his life. They adioint themselves, then walk in a Fountaine, and after this being crowned, enter the Temple in solemne Procession, with Dances, smiting the ground with Rods, where with the earth, like vnto waues, did moue and raise it selfe. Iarchas being asked by Apollonius, What he thought of himselfe and his company? answered, That they were Gods; because they were good men: that hee himselfe had sometime benee Ganges, and Apollonius before had benee an Egyptian Mariner, an Attendant, which there waited on them, had beene Palamedes, whose misfortunes we read of in the warres of Troy, this in new bodies presenting themselves to the world. The World, he said, was a living creature, compounded of fise Elements, with diuers other things of Pygmies, which liued vnder the earth, of Gryphons, &c. Thus much I thought to adde of Apollonius, because some vaine Philosophers haue impudently compared him to our Sauiour, that the Reader might parallell this Legend with the Gospell out of this darknesse, the more to admire that more then admirable Light. And thus much out of Philostratus, of the Brachmanes. The Gymnosophists are by him placed, and by that name knowne, in Egypt and Ethiopia, whither also Apollonius went to visit them, and we in due place will follow him.

Of later Indian Discoveries, and an Apologie for the English Trade in the East Indies.

After this sort of Fables (which commonly attend whatsoever is farre distant in Time or Place) the Indian Truth will be more welcome, as the Sun after a storme. And Time, her Father, (which was said before to deuour her) hath now brought her out of her obscure Prison, and by Neptunes helpe shipped her into Europe. In this Expedition, the Portugalls were full in Commission, the Hollanders and English since annexed. These are the Triumviri, which of all the European Nations haue subdued those Seas: Happy Three, if they enuied not each others happinesse: a three-fold cord, by no humane power to be broken. The Portugalls in the yeere 1498. (hauiug about eleuen months before passed from Lisbon, the Cape of Good Hope happily compassed) first entred the Indian Ocean, and came to Calicut, Vasco di Gama being Generall of that Fleet, which King Emanuel set forth. Their Exploits by Sea and Land, as well on the Western Coast of Africa, euer since Henry the Infant had begun this Discouerie, vntill this time, as on the Eastern, beyond the Cape: their Conquests by Gama, Albuquerque, and others, which subdued to the Portugall Scepter so many Territories, peopled so many Ilands, erected so many Forts both on the African and Asian Shores, made Tributarie so many petty Kingdomes; their owne Writers, Barrius, Ossorius, Maffaeus, and others, haue sufficiently recorded. Besides what they held in Barbarie, they reckon theirs the Azores, Madaga, the Ilands of Cabo Verde, the Fortresses of Arguin in Guinea, and of Mina; the Ilands del Principe, S. Thomas, Atubon, with some places in Congo and Angola, and Brasile also, on the American shoare: beyond the Cape, Soffala, Mosambique, Bombassa; the Iland of Ormuz, in the Persian Gulfe; in India, the Castles and Townes of Diu, Daman, Bagayn, Chaul, Goa, Honor, Barcela, Mangalor, Cananor, Cranganor, Cochin, and Coulan; in Seylan, Columbo; Negapatan and S. Thomas, on Choromandel Coast; Porto Pequene, Porto Grande; Serapure, in Bengala; Serone, Malacca, Molucca Ilands, Malao, and Nangasacke, in Japan, with other their Conquests; which, besides their Empire ouer these Seas, and Riches by Merchandise, made Portugall the least part of the Portugall Crowne; pari minima est ipsa Puella Sui. And worthy of praise they are, that being so small and poore a Nation, haue thus enlarged their State and Soueraignetie, which they haue basely defended against all the power of the Saracens in those parts; and the mighty Kings of Cambaya, Deccan, and the Great Turkes Forces, in strong Sieges. But whiles they sought a Monopoly of Indian Merchandise, and as Neptunes Miions, would engrosse all Sea-faubes to themselves; not onely (I know not with what right) forbidding the Indians to Trade their owne Seas, but those European Courses, which gloried in as good Neptunian bloud as themselves; the Hollander steps forth, and borrowing his words and rage together, chal-length the Portugall,

Sed mihi sorte datum.*

50 And for prooffe alledgeth Canon Law, and Steele Arguments, making Prize of all hee can get from them. And so haue they prevailed within these twentye yeeres (for in the yeere 1599. were their first Ships sent from Amsterdam) that now, besides many mischiefs executed on the Portugalls in Africa and India, by Land and Sea, they had thirtie seuen Factories, and twentye Ports and Castles in the East Indies, long since mentioned in Nieffels Bangens Journall: and since haue further prevailed in Iacatra, Banda, and other places, and scarcely could brooke the English their old friends, that new Indian neighbour-hood.

Of the English Trade there; many arguments in defence of it.

NOW, if that this Collateral Line of that Sea-Soueraigne may promise thus much of his favours to themselves, how much more may the English? Hee but kisseth Them in passing by, but euer embraceth in neuer-unclaiped armes this Britissh Nymph, and long since offered all his Shores in Dowrie. Yea, let this be added to the English glorie, that Prince Henrie, first Founder of the Portugall Discoveries, was of English blood, sonne to Philip the daughter of Iohn of Gaunt. And for the Hollanders, I say not their free Navigation, but that they are a free Nation (I would they did not forget this in the Indies) may be ascribed to English Protection and Assistance. About the beginning of this ^e Secular Account (as in the Ocean jubilee with largest Indulgence) began the English Societie their Indian Navigation and Commerce, Sir Lames Lancaster being thither sent, with the Dragon, Heitor, Ascension, and Susan: which their Endeours haue since so well succeeded, that they haue set and sent forth twentie severall Flects or Voyages, planting their Factories, and placing a Trade in Surrat, and other places of the Great Mogoll, in Mcslulopatan, Bantam, Patane, Siam, Sagadan, Macassar, and as farre as Firando in Iapan; encheouring a mutuall good both to themselves and the Indian, without spoyling Portugall or Flemming.

True it is, that many open their mouths wide in traducing this Trade, and detracting our Traffique this way: nor am I entertained, or once inuited, to plead their Case against calumnious Adversaries: nay, they need not such a Defender, nor feare such Quarrellers. But because euen honest Minds are posselt with Scruples and Doubts, rayed by Ignorance, or malignant imputations of busie Braines; for their sakes, if I say somewhat, I shall not erre from my Geographicall Historie; this Studie receiuing principall supportation by the aduenturing Souldier and Merchant, Honor and Gaine breaking through all Obstacles, and opening all parts of the World to euery part. As obliged therefore to the Iournall, which (borrowed of that Societie) haue led mee alongt the Indies; Gratitude thrusteth me forth an Orator and Patron; not so much for their Persons, or personall Actions, which I know not (and can wee know any, either Men, or Societies, free from personall Euills? or is it so rare, that in Merchants of all sorts, Couetousnesse and priuate Ends should haue place? yet herein I doe not, I cannot accuse, no more then excuse them:) but for the Societie, and iust Grounds of this Indian Aduenture (which some affirme gainefull to the Aduenturers, but with publike detriment to the State) I haue aduentured on this Stage, and opposed and exposed my selfe to Imputation.

For the General Equitie thereof, it is consonant to all kinds of Lawes; to the Law of GOD, who hath given the Earib to the Sonnes of Men; each Man being by naturall Inheritance Kingdome, hauing an e uersall Tenure in the Vniuerse: of Nature; which by mutuall Offices insinuateth a Generall Good: of Nations; which flourish most in communicating their Superfluities, by Exchange for Necessaries; and concurreth with the Lawes of this Kingdome; which being placed in the bosome of the Ocean, hath enacted many Provisions for the maintenance of Navigation, which yeilds vs wooden Walls, and moueable Fortresses, in defending our Selues, or offending the Enemie.

And particularly, let it be no disparagement vnto this Action, that it was Nobly borne, the Daughter of a famous Mother in Israel, Renowned ELIZABETH, who by her Letters Patents, for the Honour of her Realme of England, for the increase of her Navigation, for the aduancement of the Trade of Merchandise, and for other important Causes and Reasons, first conceived, and gaue first breath to this Societie. Blissh Englishman, if thou hast true English blood in thee, that darrest on rash Surmises, Censure (I had almost said, Examine) the Constitutions of that Cyrus, Asiaces, Augustus, (I want a Name) that more then they All, if not in Founding, yet in Grounding, Establishing, Adorning, the English Nation. Happie ELIZABETH, the Virgin: Mother of thy Countries Peace, Religion, Arts, Armes; Mother to thy distressed Neighbors; Mother to so many famous Expeditions in and about the World; and the same Mother of the Indian Traffique! Happie ELIZABETH, in thy Glorious Successes (that when our Sunne was set, no Night ensued) succeeding (if not with Masculine Excellence exceeding) in Fatherly Care, as well as in the Royall Throne. In his dayes our Peace, before, subject to the infirmities of Conception, Birth, Infancie, hath grown to her Mature and flourishing age: Religion hath not since Salomons dayes, found so Royall and Learned a Defender of the Faith: Arts elsewhere diffused, combined in that Heroike Center, haue proclaimed Him King of a larger extent of Learning, then the Muses professed professed. Admirable (almost miraculous) are his Armes; who without Armies poyseth and ballanceth the Westerne World in an even Counter-poys; like herein to that OMNIPOTENT MAJESTY which being vnmoveable moueth all things. But alas, why doe I eclipse so brightshining Prayes with my interceding praying; obscure Candles before This Sunne (long may he shine) in Our, or That Other (defended shall I say to the Lower ³ no) exalted to the Highest Hemisphere? Pardon Reader, if when I looke vp to the Author of this Attempt, Two so bright Lights haue dazeld my weaker eyes, and made me almost lose my selfe in this Maze of more then Humane Worth, Yet this thou seest, Two propositions beyond Caster and Pellux are the Badge of our Indian Ship; and the Glorie of our Nation is the glorie of this Action, Queene ELIZABETH, and (long and farr may He flourish) the Maiestie of King JAMES.

Neither can the English bee charged with annoying either Christian or Heathen, except in Necessarie Defence, or Iust Reuenge: Neither doe they shut vp the Seas to the Inhabitants: They plant Factories, not Fortresses, on the Land; whereby Others ouer-awe the Nations, proue vnfriendly to their Friends, secke to eat out other aduenturing Nations, and make prey of Christians and Ethnikes vnprouoked.

And is it not a profit to our Nation, to vent Clothes, Iron, Lead, and other Commodities? To let on work: so many of all Trades and Professions? To employ so many Mariners? To build so many, so able, so capab Ship? To enrich the Kings Coffers and publike Treasuries, the State hath so many more seruiceable Members for the good of the whole Bodie?

And is it not for the Honor of our Nation, that the English Name hath pierced the remotest Countries, and filled the Indians with admiration of the English? That Asia clothes vs with her Silkes, feedes vs with her Spices, cures vs with her Drugges, adomes vs with her Jewels, and almost adores the English Valour? That Turkie is made to neere, whiles our Indian Ocean makes our way to the Persian, the Mogoll, the Iapan Monarchs, Awfull Names of Greatnesse, not heard of by our Ancestors, now delighting in our new Amities, These and other mightie Easterne Potentates entertaining Commerce of Letters, and Embassies, with Great Brittaines Greatest Soueraigne? And is it not for the Honor of our Nation, that the Mariner, Merchant, and Souldier, here together conspire the English Glorie? Every one in this Action as it were trayned in all three Functions, and becoming at once a Mariner (in so long Navigation) a Merchant (where a little Stocke promisseth great Gaine) and (in necessary Defence by Sea and Land) an exercised Souldier? Oh, how doth my Soule honour those glorious Exploits in the Indian Ocean, by those two worthy Generalls, Best and Downton, in the years 1612. and 1614. the Sea becoming an Amphitheatre; where the Easterne World might bee Spectators of the Westerne Worth; the Asian Shores filled with Troupes, to behold the Tragickall Euent of those Terrible Fights: which all, with all the Numbers, Gallantie, Malignitie, Subtiltie, Iniquitie, Indignation, Resolution, Preparation, and strength of the Countrey, serued to encrease the english Victory and Glory. The is fitter in another place: but the Honor which there was gayed by our Nation, hath filled the Mogols huge Dominions with Admiration, pierced to the Persian Court (where our Nation hath since procured Priviledges) and extended beyond the large Extents of India. Yea, the Persian Gulfe hath bene awed, and the Arabike or Red Sea firmed, in requitt of the Turkes and Buluches Trecheries: not by invading Violence, but Christian Iustice:

Go on! Himselfe hath honored this Action also with prosperous successe, rewarding the English with Honor and Profit, their Aduersaries with Losse and Confusion: besides, a large fewer Casualties by shipwrack, or other Disasters, then Other aduenturing Nations haue sustained. Neither are we able only with these Nauike long Armes to reach the Worlds remotest parts, but at home also are more dreadfull to all daring Attempters: where, to

Nauie Royall, such Successuriata Copie are adioyned; the Ships of the Societie continually encreasing, and being able to furnish a puissant Armada of themselves; which but few (at a few) forraigne, of Ships Royall, can equall. I add, that in the present estate of Things, I Necessitie may bee alledged for a Vertue. For doe we not see want of Trade? The Merchant waunting Traffique, and consequently, the Mariner employment, whiles Barbarie is many yeeres together trodden vnder foot by barbarous Ciuill vnciuill Warres; the Straits brought into Straits, by loosefence and abundance of Turkish Robbers, and Christian vnchristian Routes; the Spaniard and Portugall forbid Trade to both the Indies; the Russian Warres because vs of Russian Warres; should I adde Diuisions of our Merchants at home? Or should I not rather fixe mine eyes on Others neere our home; which can preoccupate our Mariner by cheaper Seruice; haue followed our Trade into Turkie and other places, by vs frequented; take more libertie in remote Seas, making prize and spoyle of Portugalls, and others; by their Trade into the Indies, haue weakened our Turkie, and weakened this India

Trading (selling their Spices at cheaper rates then the Turkie Merchant could afford;) yea, haue haunted vs euen into Greene-land, and followed English Examples round about the World? Let none traduce me as a depraver of their Actions, whose Noble Ambition I honour: but I speake in defence of the Indian Traffique; without which, our needie Mariner must haue sued to serue them at Sea, no lesse then our needie voluntary Souldier hath done on Land; which, without the profits now reaped, would haue procured the inconueniences, so much quarrelled.

Or must not our Mariner^a either die at Wapping, or other dismall place of Justice, for Injustice? Or else liue to the Death, or losse of Honelt men, thriving in vnrchristianlike and Pyracies? Or else (most of them) want employment? Or be forced to serue Forciners? Better a death at Bantam, then in other places more infamously fatal: and better this bad Adventure there, for Englands Wealth, then Forrell^{2c} ners. And yet with due sobriety and temperance (not wracking themselves on their Rack^{2c} a very Rack^{2c} or on their Quick-sands, filthy diseased Women, extremely both deare and vile) how many of those dying many, might escape? Better that our Men should carrie forreine p Silver into Those parts, to bring Money and Wares for the publike benefit, then all this Money to be intercepted by strangers (for it growes not in England) Europe no lesse disunished, and we to buy those Wares with more expence of Money at a worse hand. Non est laus ista hominis sed temporum, sayd Tully^{2c} of Attilius Regulus, his returning vpon Oath to the Punike Tortures; Non est fraus ista hominum sed temporum. I may answer touching these losses of Men and Money, which in Dutch, or other Employments, and Transporting, would happen, though England held no Commerce with India. And yet if our Mynts^{3c} lacke worke, let vs examine our store of Plate, encreasing with our Pride, our Clothes of Silver, Gold, Tissue, and rich-metalld Stuffs, our Laces and Embroideries; from the Hand-band to the Shoo-strings, exhausting so much Silver and Gold in the Materials, that I speake not of the communicating it to Others, now happily vntied vnto vs; which all cannot but diuert worke from the Mint, especially since our Men of Warre haue had so little out of American spoiles. And for Men, how prosperously hath Captaine Newport made two Returnes to the Indies? If Mariners are lost, are not Mariners made and bred in this Employment? Must wee not disarme our selues^{4c} of shipping, and leaue our Ilands waterie Walls destitute of their Mouing Bulwarke, if our Sea-Trade faile, which without Gain and Glorie (Non est alit Artes) must faile and fall too? SAVL and IONATHAN onely may be armed (the Kings Royall Naue royally furnished) but (for Merchants ships wanted Assistance) not a Sword nor a Speare found in the hands of any of the people: they might sharpen their Attacks, Weeding, Hooker, and Axes, amongst the Philistines. But a SMITH in Israel doth far far better, that can fit vs with Weapons of Warre, than wee shall not need borrow of strangers.

And long so (and not on other Conditions, but Israels flourishing) may our SMITH flourish in our Israel. If say thinke these feares fantastical, let him but looke on the face of Things before this Trade was well settled; how many, in little space, of the best Merchant-ships were alienated into Spaine and Italy; the Alcedor, the Benic, the Royall Merchant, the May-Flower, the Prosperous, the Susan Parnell, the Gold Noble, the Conquest, the Concord, if fluxes and diseases pursue vs in the Indies, haue they not so done? Iname not Kentish and Essex Marishes, and other vnholefome English Habitations) in Ireland? O Ireland, the Land of fire indeed, in the death of so many Commanders and Souldiers, by Warre and Diseases, in the late Rebellion: yea, euen still, neither solo, solo, solo, gente, non mente, like our owne Homes, which yet how many are glad to leaue, there to trie their fortunes? There? Where not prodigall^{5c} of their best blood, in Dutch, Danish, Sweden, Poland, Russian Warres? For small stipends voluntarily adventuring more certaine Deaths, then in this Indian Adventure; no lesse (perhaps more then some of the former) iustifiable to a scrupulous conscience. What should I speake^{6c} of the highest Worke of Conscience, in propagating Christian Religion, and warning vpon the Regions and Legions of Infernall Powers, captiuizing filly soules in Ethnick darkenesse? And O that our Merchants would mind this Merchandize, the gaine of soules; setting learned Ministers in their Factories, to bee Factors for Christ; then might wee looke for a Blessing: Yea, now wee haue great^{7c} Hopes, that that Iapan may yeeld silver; and if men prove better in soule, their bodies may lesse miscarry.

How euer, my prayers shall be to GOD ALMIGHTIE, for His Blessing vpon their Endeauours. For my selfe, I haue bene bold to say this in their Defence, as a most indifferent looker on, lesse then others (more able, more interested) haue, or can, and not more then Reason and Religion may admit: which I would haue interpreted with the same Equitie, with which, for which, it is written; not imputed to itching busie fingers, sick of the Scribling disease; nor to base insinuating Flattery of Ours; nor to malicious Intimations, and barking against Forreiners (whose worthy Exploits I honour) but let Themselfes (the prouoking Portugall, and not-prouoked Flemming) be Iudges, that I call not the Admiring

10 Ethnike to honour the English Worthie, if our Trade hath not bene the farthest from first offering, from suspicion of iniurie, and therefore nearest to Innocence and Iustice; the true cause of (that which they need not) this ruder, but iust and true Apologie. As for other Obiections, they are frivolumous, and either ridiculous, or impetely accidental: and it is Puritanisme in Politie, to conceit any great Good, without some Euills attendaunt, in any Enterprise whatsoever; where the Heavens Great Lights are subiect to Eclipse, the longest Day hath a Night, the Summer yeelds vicissitude to Winter, all Bodies are mixed and compounded, and in the greatest Lustre make an apparant Shadow. Apparant Shadows are, the obiectioned expence of Victuall (as if these mouths would not exceed farre more in quantitie and qualitie at home;) of Timber (as if this be not the most honourable vse thereof, though Ireland yeelds supply in this kind;) of eclipsing or sinking other Trades: (sic inter Stellarum argentea Luna minores) will they be angry, that so few Starrs appeare, when Aurora is preparing the Sunnes Chariot? They adde, Oppressions, and Dealing cruelly; I know not whether this be a cruell lye: and many other, alledged against these Indian Navigations; bee but English Knauightions. This I know, that the Wisest hath forbidden, to answer a foole according to his foolishnesse, lest thou also bee like him. Easie it is for fooles, to moue Scruples in the Actions of the Wisest; and not hard for euill miſdes, to make that, which they find not, euill. But Christians are to imitate Him rather, which commanded the Lights to shine out of Darkenesse; with a candide Mind (the true Image of GOD) alway contriuing doubtfull things to the best; which the best will doe: to whom, and for whom, this is intended.

30 As for Cailliers, they haue their Dos here, according to Salomons Precept, Answer a foole according to his foolishnesse, lest he be wise in his owne conceit.

§. IIII.

The Conclusion with commendation of the Mariner, &c.

Now that I haue after my ability answered the obiections, and produced so many Arguments (the most of which are Store-houles, and Heads of many) Let this be the last argument, which to me was not the least, and here was placed first, the Increase of learning and knowledge by these worthy Discoueries of Marine Worceries. How little had we knowne of the World, and the Wonders of GOD in the World, had not the Sea opened vs a Passage into all Lands. Pegasus the winged Horse, which (the Poets fained) with the stroke of his foot, first made Helicon the Muses Well to spring, was the issue of Neptune, and that snaky-headed Monster Medusa. The Mariner seemes rough-hewen and rude, according to the Ocean that breeds him; but hee that can play with those dangers which would transforme others into stones, and dares dwell within so few inches of death; that calls the most tempestuous Elements his Parents; Hee (I say) is the true Pegasus that with his wing-like Sailes flies ouer the World; which hath helped to deliuer 50 Andromeda (Geography) before chained to the Rockes, and ready to bee deuoured of that Monster Ignorance; and our of whose salt waters wisely distilled, Clio, Urania, and the best of the Muses, drinke their sweetest and freshest liquors. Howsoeuer Others, My Selfe must confesse, and this Booke will witness, that My Helicon hath in great part flowne from the footing of this Pegasus. And let it be the Honour of Our Honourable S^t I^t H, that His hand hath firste this Fount of Pegasus to his Indian Iourney, whither he is now carrying you: at whose Fount and Aquill haue bene hammered so many irons for Neptune; not like Xerxes his Arrogance, which proudly cast Fetters into the Hellepont, but with true effects of Conquest. Me thinks I here see the Steernehatch with little Locall stirring Stiernehatch so many Ships to so many Ports visited by your Pilgrim.

§. I.

Of Cauchin, China, Camboia and the Laos.

a *Maagrim.*b *Discourse of*c Ch. Hist. Ben.

Auchin-China * is an Indian Kingdome, situate between the Province of Canton on the North, and Camboia on the South, in the bottome of a great Bay, diuided into three Provinces, and as many Kings, but one of them is Paramount. It ^b aboundeth with Gold, Silver, Aloes, Porcelaine, and Silke. They are Idolaters and Pagans, and ^c haue had some deuotion to the Popish Christianity, moued thereto by certaine Pictures of our Lady, of the last Iudgement; and Hell (a new kind of preaching) and haue erected many Crosse amongst them, of which the Friers report (after their fashion) some miracles. Their Religion seemeth little to differ from that of the Chinois, to whom they are also Tributaries, and vse their Characters.

Richard Cocke.

One Richard Cocke Englishman, in a Letter dated December the tenth, 1614. from Firando in Iapan (where hee was left in Factory by Captaine Saris) writes of an unhappy accident which befell Master Tempest Peacocke, who with Walter Carmarden arrived not long before with our Kings Letter, in Cauchin-China, with a Present also, and goods to the Value of seven hundred and thirty pounds. But whiles he with some principall Hollanders (who were there likewise entertained) was passing by water, they were set vpon and slaine with harping ions, together with their interpreters and followers, Iapanders: neither had they heard further what became of the rest of the Company. The cause was reported to be a quarell against the Hollanders for fraud and violence, deceiving them with false money, and burning a Towne. Here is much of the wood called Palo Daguilla, and of the most sweet wood Calamba, with other merchandize of China. Betweene this and the Ile Aynao ten miles from the land is a fishing for Pearles.

To the South of this Kingdome is Champa; the name of a Kingdome, and chiefe Citty thereof, of great Traffique, especially of Lignum Aloe, which groweth there in the Mountaines, prized at the weight in Silver, which they vse in Bathes, and in the Funerals of great Princes. In Religion they are as the former. This Tract beares also the name of Camboia.

Camboia on the North abutteth on Cauchin China, on the South the Kingdome of Siam; on the East the Sea. It is a great and populous Countrey, full of Elephants and Abada's (this Beast is the Rhinoceros;) Here also they begin to honour the Croffe, as Frier Silvester (a man, as they say, much reuerenced by the King, and honoured of the people) hath taught them. When the King dieth, 4 his women are burned, and his Nobles doe voluntarily sacrifice themselves in the same fire. The women are generally burned with their husbands at their death. The Camboians dealt treacherously with the Hollanders, Anno 1602, whom they invited to the shore, with promise of certaine Buffolos, and then cruelly slew them. They detained the Admirall on shore, to be redeemed with some of their Ordnance. When they intend a journey, they vse diuination with the fete of a Hen, to know whether it will be lucky, or no; and as the Wizard shall answer, they dispose of themselves, either to goe or stay.

This Land hath much of the sweet Wood Calamba, which being good, is wayed against silver and gold. Through this Kingdome runneth the River Mecon into the Sea, which the Indians name Captaine of all the Riuer; for it hath so much water in the Summer (their Winter) that it drowneth the Countrey as Nilus doth. The people of Camboia beleue that all Creatures, both Men, and Beasts of all sorts doe here receiue reward for their worke, whether it be good or bad. Upwards in the Land are the Laos, a great and mighty people, the Auos and Bramas also, which dwell further vp by the Hills; and the Gneoi vpon the Hills, which liue like wilde men, eat mans flesh, marke all their bodies with a horne upon the gallant brauery.

Gaspard de Crue mentioneth that People called Laos, North wards from Camboia, which come thither downe to a River, which hath his beginning in China, and is of eight, fiftene, and twenty fadoms depth: it passeth thorow desarts, whete are Elephants and Bados, or Rhinoceroses, the males of which beasts haue a horne arising out of their snout, accounted good for the Piles. This River comming to Cudurmuch, twelue leagues from the principall Citty of Camboia, makes a passage to another River, which descendeth from a great Lake, in the midst of which one cannot see Land. When the great waters come downe from the Laos River, they enter that other River with such violence, that it reuerfeth and turneth backe the streame, with a swift current, and ouerfloweth all Camboia, leauing no passage for Trauellers, but by Boat, their houses also being in the lower roomes ouerflown, themselves remaining in the higher roomes, with their household. This River runneth vpward from Iuly to September. The Portugals shewed our Autho^r a great Hill, ouer which a ship had failed, being of sufficient burden to haue passed from India to Portugall. These Laos bring Musk from Camfi, being the flesh and blood (as he saith) of a certaine beast. They goe naked from the waste vpwards, trussing vp their haire like a cap. Their Priests weare yellow cloaths and yellow Copes, with certaine folds and seames: Their Religion is as in Siam.

Iarrie writes of these Laos or Laios, that they liue about the springs of Mecon, in Cottages of Timber, and in open boats, neere the banks and Lakes of the River, which is said to extend foure hundred Leagues within the Land, neere the Tartarian and China confines. These Laos about the yeare 1578. defended the River in great multitudes, with an army of two hundred thousand, which all were slaine, drowned, or captiued in fight with the Camboians. In this battell the King of Camboia was slaine also. He left behind him a yong sonne, which became vassall to the King of Siam. This Kingdome hath great Townes, and many Temples, which haue Bonziz, Priests or Religious Men after the maner of Iapan and China, but lesse superstitious then the Iaponians. As for the Laos, they are rude and barbarous, but rich in Gold. The King of Camboia in the yeare 1598. sent to the Iesuits: for some of their Society, to liue and preach amongst his people, and bestowed vpon Iames Velloso a Portugall which had serued him in the warres against the Siamites, a Peninsula stretching

In this side of Camboja, is Siam, Sion, or Silon, Mother-City of a Kingdome bearing the same name, in which are reckoned thirty thousand families of Moores, besides the Naturals. In these parts are huge Woods, harbours of Lions, Tigres, Ownces, and (they tell also) Mariches, which haue Maidens faces and Scorpions tails. Here issueth Menan out of that huge Lake Chiamay, which yeelcth this and other Rivers of like Nature to Nilus in Egypt.

Gaf. B. cap. 35.

For this cause, Baldi affirmeth, that they build their houses in Silon (so hee termeth it) very high, and every house hath a boat belonging thereto for passage and transportation of the familie in that their Winter-time, or annual deluge. And some poore persons haue slight houses of Reed, or timber set vpon planks tied together, or Litters, which they can remove whither they please, as moveable shops to buy and sell; which is there done most by the women. This name of Sion, Silon, or Siam, may worthily mooue a Quere to Geographers, whether this be not the Sina mentioned by Ptolemy, Marcianus, and other Ancients: the rather because China is a name vnkowne to the Chinois, and their Countrey abuts on the Sea Eastward, and the Cities thereof haue more Northerly Situation, then those by them ascribed to the Sma; which name is heere little altered, and in other things this seemeth rather to agree therewith. But let the curious enquire, and the learned iudge.

of China, p. 350.

They haue amongst them many Religious Mch, which lead an austere life, and therefore had in great reputation of Holiness. These live in common: they may not marrie, nor speake to a Woman (which fault is punished with death) they goe alway bare-foot, in poore array, eating nothing but Rice and Greene herbes, which they begge from doore to doore. They craue it not, nor take it with their hands, but goe with a wallet at their backs alwayes, with their eyes modestly fixed on the ground, and calling or knocking, stand still, till they receiue answer, or some thing be put in their wallets. Many times they see themselves naked in the heat of the Sunne notwithstanding that himselfe, with such direct beames, together with his frie (whole armies of Gnats) doe their utmost malice on them. They rise at midnight to pray vnto their Idols, which they doe in Quires, as the Friars doe. They may not buy, sell, or take any Rents, which, if they should doe, would bring on them the imputation of Heretiques. Some Merchants of Siam being at Canton, and hearing that Frier Martin Ignatio and his companions, were there imprisoned, for entering that Chinian Kingdome without License, they visited them, and seeing their poore Friers Wee'dge, they, besides other almes, offered to pay their ranome, if money would doe it.

The Siamites commonly hold, that God created all things, rewardeth the good, punisheth the bad: That Man hath two Spirits; one good, to keepe; and the other euill to tempt, continually attending him. They build many and faire Temples, and place in them many Images of Saints, which sometime liued virtuously, and now are in Heauen. They haue one Statue fifty paces long, which is sacred to the Father of men. For they thinke that he was sent from aboue, and that of him were borne certaine persons that suffered Martyrdom for the loue of God. Their Priests are clothed in yellow long garments. (This colour is esteemed holy: and euery yellow thing, for the resemblance which it hath with Gold, and so with the Sunne, is hallowed to God.) Besides that which is before said of their strict orders, they may not pourth Henne; because of their female Sexe. To drinke Wine, is punished in their Priests with stoning. They haue many Fasts in the yeare, but one especially, in which the people frequent the Temples and their Sermons. They haue their Canonical houres by day and night for their holy things. They hold, that the World shall last eight thousand yeares, whereof six thousand are passed, and then it shall be consumed with fire: at which time shall be opened in Heauen seven eyes of the Sunne, which shall drie vp the Waters, and burne vp the Earth. In the ashes shall remaine two Eggs; whence shall come forth one Man and one Woman, which shall renew the World. But there shall be no more Salt, but fresh Rivers and Lakes, which shall cause the Earth, without mans labour, to abound in plenty of good things. The Siamites are the finke of the Easterne Superstitions, which they deuote to many Nations.

G. affr

Gasper de Cruz ^k testifieth that the Bramenes in Siam are Witches, and are the Kings principall seruants. They worship one god called Probas Alifur, which (say they) made Heauen and Earth: and another called Prabonfur, who obtained of a third, named Praifur, that power vnto Probas Mifur. Another called Praput Prasur Metrie. He thinketh the third part of the Land to be Priests or Religious persons. These Religious are proud, the fesiour worshipping their superiours as gods, with prayer and prostrating. They are reuerenced much of the people, none daring to contradict them: so that when our Frier Gasper preached, if one of those Religious came, and said, This is good, but ours is better, all his Auditors would forsake him. They number in their opinion, seuen and twentie Heauens; holding that some of them are (like Mahomet's Paradise) fraught with faire women, with meate, also and drinckes; and that all liuing things which haue soules goe thither, euen Fleas and Lice. And these lousie heauens are allotted to all secular persons which enter not into their rule, and habit of Religion. They haue higher heauens for their Priests which lue in wildernes, ascribing onely this felicitie to them, there to sit and refresh themselves with winde. And according to the higher merits they assigne other higher heauens among their gods, which haue round bodies like bowles, and so haue these that goe thither. They hold also that there are thirteene Hells, according to the differing demerits of mens finnes.

Of their Religious men, some are supreme and sit about the King, called Massanchach: a second Order they entitle Nasendachet, which sit with the King, and are as Bishops: a third and lower ranke sit beneath the King, named Mistres, which are as Priests, and haue the Chapmies and Sages, two inferior degrees, vnder them: all reuerenced according to their place. Except the Priests and Religious, all are slaues to the King, and when they die, their whole state deuolueth to him, how hardly soeuer the wife and children shift: which was caused through a rebellion against the brother of the King, which then reigned when the Frier writ this.

In the yeere 1606. Balsasar Sequerius a Iesuite, landing at Tanassary, passed from thence partly by goodly Riuers, partly ouer cragged and rough Hills and Forrests, stored with Rhinoceroses, Elephants, and Tigres, (one of which tare in pieces one of their company before his eyes) vnto Oda. Conferring with the Talipoies or Religious men, he learned their conceits: That there was now no God in the world to gouerne it: Three had bene before, now dead, and a Fourth is expected, which deserreth his coming. In the meane while, left this huge Frame should wane, a Ruler, it is ordered by a certaine ¹ Bubble or Brooch which some of the Former Gods had left. The vulgar people heare these bubbles, babies, and fables with great reuerence and silence, holding vp their ioyned hands. They obserue their Festiuals, according to the course of the Moone: and then open their Temples, whither the people resort to doe their deuotions. These are built strong and stately, with Art and Beautie: hauing their Porches, Cloisters, Quires, and lower Iles, great Chappels being annexed on both sides and large Church-yards. In one of these hee saw a Statue of eightene Cubites length, dedicated to the great God. They are of marueilous abstinence, and thinke it a great sone to taste wine. In their Quires, they haue singing men, which after the European fashion sing there, especially in the shutting in of the Euening, and about midnight. Very early in the morning, warning is giuen for them to goe to beg from doore to doore. They haue their funerall Holies and Obits for the dead. The carkasses are burned, being put into painted Coffins, with great solemnitie (if they be great men) with Musicke and dances, and great store of victuals to be bestowed on the Talipoys. Thus farre Sequerius.

The Inhabitants of this Kingdome are much giuen to pleasure and vnot: they refuse the vse of Manuall Arts, but addict themselves to Husbandry. They haue ^m publike Schooles, where they teach Lawes and Religion in the vulgar Language: other Sciences they learne in a more learned Tongue. They worship innumerable Idols, but especially the foure Elements: according to which his Sect, each man maketh choise of his buriall. They which worshipped the Earth, are therein buried; the Fire burneth the dead carkasses of them which obserued it: in the Ayre are hanged (to feast the airy-winged people with their flesh) those which adored the Ayre, being aliue. The Water drowneth those which had aloue bene drowned in that Waterie Religion. Every King, at his first entrance to the Crowne, erecteth a Temple, in which he adorneth with high Steeples, and innumerable Idols. In the Citie of Socotay is one of mettell, fourescore spans high.

The Kingdome of Siam, comprehendeth that Aurea Regio of Ptolemy by Arrianus in his Periplus (the Map whereof Ortelius set forth 1597.) called Aurea Continens: nigh to which is placed that Aurea Chersonesus, then (it seemeth) by a necke of land ioyned to the Continent: since ⁿ it supposed to be by force of the Sea separated from the same, and to be the same which is now called Siamatra: which Tremellius and Iamius iudge to bee Salomons Opbar. The Land tendeth long and narrow, and containeth siue hundred leagues of Sea-coast, coast, compassing from Champa to Tausy. But of this space the Arabians, or Moores, have usurp'd two hundred, with the Townes of Patane, Pahan, Ior, and Malacca (now in possession of the Portugals) and the Kingdomes of Aua, Chencran, Caipumo, and Brama, haue shared also therein. Oda is the chiefe Citie thereof, containing foure hundred thousand households, and serueth the King with fiftie thousand Souldiers; and to the River Caipumo (on which it standeth) belong two hundred thousand vessels. This King hath nine Kingdomes subiect to him, and thirtie thousand Elephants, whereof three thousand are trained to the warres: His Nobles hold their Lands in a kinde of Knights-service, like the Turkish Ti-mars (yet onely for terme of life) without the Kings pay serue him, whensoever hee appointeth, with twentie thousand Horse, and two hundred and fiftie thousand Foot. The Country is compassed with the high Hills of Iangoma, Brama, or Brama, and Aua, and is it selfe plaine, in situation and fertilitie (caused by inundation) like to Egypt. The Lai are tributaries to Siam, for feare of the Gueoni, Caniballs, and Man-eaters, liuing in the Mountaines adjacent; against whom the Siamite defendeth them, and invaded those Gueoni one time with twentie thousand Horse, two hundred and fiftie thousand Footmen, and ten thousand Elephants, for Carriages and Warre.

Cesar ⁴ Frederike reporteth, That in the yeere 1567, the King of Pegu besieged the King of Siam his chiefe Citie, with an Armie of one million and foure hundred thousand men, and lay before it one and twentie moneths, and had siue hundred thousand fresh Souldiers sent him in supply, end yet had not preuailed, if treason had not mote furthered his desires then force. The gates were one night set open, and the Peguans entred; which when the Siamite perceiued, hee poysoned himselfe, leauing his children and Kingdome a prey to the Conqueror: whose triumphall returne, Fredericke (then in Pegu) beheld. Since that time the Kings of Siam haue been tributaries to Pegu. Alter this Peguan had reigned seuen and thirtie yeeres, he left his Kingdomes, but not his fortunes, to his sonne: who taking displeasure against the Siamite, his vassall, sent for him to come to him, which he refused. And thereupon he entred into his Country, with nine hundred thousand men, and besieged him in his chiefe Citie: which hee, seeking politike delays, made semblance still to deliuer, vntill in the third moneth after (which was March) the Riuer overflowed the Country fixe score miles about, after his yeerely custome, and partly d. owned, partly committed to the Siamites (attending in Boats for this booty) to be slaughtered, that huge Army; of which, scarce three-score and ten thousand returned to Martauan, and those without Elephants and Horfes. And when the King of Pegu proceeded in his attempts with like successe, the Siamite at last besieged him in Pegu, his royall Citie, Ann. 1596. But hearing a rumor of the Portugals coming to helpe him, hee raised his siege. These are the reports of Franciscus Fernandez, a Iesuite. Of the Peguan we shall speake more in the next Chapter.

my Pilgrimes,
To. 1. lib. 3. cap. 14.*

Peter William Floris a Dutchman, which liued long in the East Indies, employed first by his Country-men, afterwards by the English; hath giuen vs the latest intelligence of these parts. When Siam (saith he) was tributarie to Pegu, the two brothers sonnes to the King of Siam, brought vp in the Court of Pegu, made an escape home. Where the eldest (called in the Malaya tongue Raia Api, that is, serie King, by others, the blacke King) had such successe against Pegu, as yet haue heard: and Pegu falling, raised himselfe to high fortunes, subiecting the Kingdomes of Camboia, Laniangh, Lugor, Patane, Teneferay, and diuers others. This victorious King deceased Ann. 1605, and dying without issue, left the Throne to his brother, which was termed the White King, of peaceable and milde disposition. He lying on his death-bed, Ann. 1610, by the instigation of Lockymenay, one of his principall Lords, (who sought to deriue the succession vpon himselfe) caused his eldest sonne to be slaine, being a young man of great hope. Yet his brother, the second son succeeded, and gaue Lockymenay his desert. This man had besides other slaues, two hundred & eightie Iapanders, which to reuenge their masters death ran in ioynt furie to the Court, and possessed themselves of the young King, whom they compelled to commit vnto their massacring hands foure chiefe men, as the authors of their masters death: and after many other abuses, forced Him to subscribe to a composition of their owne making, and to giue them some of the chiefe Palapos or Priests for hostages, and so departed with a great treasure; vsing much violence at their departure, the Siamites as meere spectators daring nothing to the contrary. (The King of Siam sent to the Japanese Emperour to complaine of this insolence, who promised to send faw the Japanese to Him, there to receiue their due punishment. Generall Saris then in Iapan saw the men going to the Court as hee came from thence.)

Vpon this newes the Kingdomes of Camboia and Laniangh rebelled, and also one Banga de laa a Peguer, who in the yeere 1613. revolted to the King of Aua, and came to him with fifty thousand of his country-men, before subiect to the King of Siam. The King of Laniangh made also an Expedition into Siam, within three dayes journey of Oudija, hoping to find the Country

Country still intangled with the Iaponian slaues; but was met by the King of Siam, and forced to retire. But the report was (saith hœ) that the two Kings had combined in league against the Siamite to dispossesse him, being then of two and twentie yeeres, which yet without intestine rebellion, they are not able to effect.

On August the fourth, 1612. the English arrived at Siam, the town being thirty leagues up the river: September, seventeenth, they had audience of the King, who granted them free trade, and a faire house. The Country at this time of raining was covered with water, October the twentie six, they had such a storme, that old folkes had not seene the like, which besides other harmes, blew downe the Kings fathers faire Monument. Their ship was neere a wrack, but by great care and paines was saued, five of the company being drowned, of which many supposed one to be deuoured of a Whale. The Kings in the Indies are all Merchants: none at Siam might buy any commodities till the King had first serued his owne turne.

§. III.

Of the Kingdome of Malacca.

Malacca is now subiect to the Portugals (if not since our last intelligence taken from them by the Kings of Achin and Ior, who held it in siege, as the same went, conquered by Alphonso Albuquerque, or Albuquer (so King Emanuel in his Letter to Pope Leo, containing all this exploit, termeth him) who was their greatest Conquerour in the Indies, subduing more to that scepter then all before him or since. John de Barros relates at large the founding and proceeding of this City, who writes that some two hundred and fiftie yeeres before the Portugals arrival in the Indies, it was first founded. Anciently Cingapura was the chiefe place of trade & habitation in all that coast, which lies in the most Southerly point of all Asia, about halfe a degree North from the Equinoctiall; then resorted to by the Merchants of China, Camboia, and the rest of the continent, & many Islands to the East and West, which they called Dibananguin and Atazanguin, that is Leuant and Ponent, or, under the winds (West) and beyond the winds (East) all the Nauigation in those parts being by the Monsons or certaine winds which obserue their set seasons of the yeere. In those times reigned in Cingapura, one Sangefinga, and in the neighbouring parts of Iaua one Paramisfa, who dying, left to the care of his brother his two sonnes: which slaying the eldest, & making himselfe King, by his tyrannies caus'd diuers of the Iauan Nobilitie to forsake their Country. Amongst the rest Paramisfa fled to Cingapura, who with his many followers was entertained kindly by Sangefinga, whom not long after he vngratefully slew, and by the helpe of his Iauans possessed himselfe of the state. The King of Siam (whose tributary and son-in-law Sangefinga had bin) forced him to leaue his ill gotten throne, and to seek new habitation one hundred and fortie miles thence, where he settled himselfe at the iuer Muar with two thousand followers, some of which were called Cellati, men that liued on the Sea by fishing and pyracie: these he would not receiue into his new fortresse of Pago, as not well trusting them, though before they had made him lord of Cingapura. These therefore seated themselves fiftene miles from Muar, in the place neere which Malacca now standeth, joyning with the Natiues, halfe Sauages, whose language is called Malayan. The place growing strait, they remoued three miles vp the riuer, where was a Hill called Beitan with a large plaine, the commodiousest whereof inuited Paramisfa to leaue Pago, and to ioyne with them in this new foundation, which was after called Malacca, signifying a banished man, in remembrance of this Iauans exile. In succeeding times the merchandize and Merchants too remoued from Cingapura to Malacca, Saquem Darfa then succeeding his father Paramisfa, who subiected himselfe as vassal to the King of Siam, which assigned to his obedience all the Country from Cingapura on the East to Pulo Zambilan, which is to the West of Malacca one hundred and twentie miles, all which space of coast is two hundred seuentie miles by Sea. The Monsons or winds in these parts continue West and North-west, from the end of August to the end of October: Nouember begins Northerly winds and Northeasterly, which blow till the beginning of April. From May till the end of August the South and Southwest beare sway, according to which the Mariner must direct his course, and take his proper season.

The situation of Malacca is vnwholsome, by reason of the marishes and neerenesse to the line (little about two degrees to the North) else it would haue bin the most populous Citie in the Indies. The successors of Saquem Darfa by little and little eased their shoulders of the Siam subiection, especially after the Moores, Persians, and Guzurats had conuerted them to Mahomet's sect, and at last vsurped absolute Souerainty. But the King of Siam nine yeeres before the Portugall conquest, sent a Fleet of two hundred saile, and therein six thousand men against Mahumet King of Malaca, the General of which Fleet was Poisan his Vice-roy of Lugor, to whom the Gouverneurs of Patane, Calantan, Pan, and other Coast-cities were to pay their tributes for the King of Siam. From Lugor to Malaca is fix hundred miles sail along the coast, much subject to tempestuous weather, which divided this Fleet; some of which fell into Mahumets hand by treachery, to the overthrow of the rest. The Siamite in revenge prepared a great Armie by Land, and Armada by Sea, soute hundred Elephants, and thirtie thousand men: but without expected event, by the insolencie of some of his Souldiers in Rapes and Robberies, which raised the Country against them, whiles Poisan was in the siege of Pan or Pam, another Citie in rebellion. The King of Siam further enraged, sent two Armadas, one by the way of Calantan, the other by the way of Tenaz-zary, one on the East side, the other on the West of this long tract of land, but before Mahumet could be punished by the Siamite, the Portugall had prevailed against him.

King Emanuel had sent Diego Lopes de Sequeira from Lisbon, Anno 1508. who came the next yeere to Malaca, and there vnder faire colours of traffique, Himselfe and his whole Fleet were in danger of betraying and murdering, by these perfidious King and his Bendara civill Justice. This ruled all cases Civill, the Lac-famua or Admirall, all Marine, and the Tamungo or Treasurer all the Revenue, and these three the whole government; which treachery in the yeere 1511. was requited by Albuquerque, who by his proper valour, and wonted Fortunes, with secret intelligence amongst the Malaysans, conquered the Citie, expelled the King (who in few dayes vomited His soule after this pill) and built there a Fortresse and a Church, establishing the Portugall Lawes, but so as both the Ethnikes and the Moores had their owne Magistrates, appeale referred to the highest. The most remakable things in this exploit were, the Chaine which one Nasobeguen (one of the principall conspirers against Sequeira, now encountered in a Sea-fight by Albuquerque in his voyage to Malaca) wore on his arme, with a bone of a Iauan beast called Cabal therein by vertue whereof, notwithstanding many and wide wounds, he lost not one drop of blood, till that Chaine being taken off, his veines suddenly and at once emptied themselves of blood and life: the store of artillery of which they tooke three thousand Peeeces, of eight thousand, which the Portugals affirmed had beene there: their venomed Arrowes, and Calthrope strowed in the way, the payson whereof once touching the blood, made them mad, with other symptoms, as in the biting of a mad dog, which they learned after to heale by chewing the leafe of a certaine hearbe growing in the Country: the undermining the street of the Citie to blow it vp together with the Portugals: the disadvantage of the fight with Elephants, which being here enraged with wounds, would not be ruled, but brake the ranks of their owne side: the treacherie of this people first to the Portugals, then to their King, after that to the Portugals againe: the prey and spoile (besides all that the King and they which fled carried away, and all the Gold, Silver, provision of warre and concealments excepted) amounted to two hundred thousand ducckets for the Kings due, which was the fifth part.

Alodinus the sonne of King Mahomer busily bestirred himselfe, but in vaine, to recover his lost Patrimoine, neither the Ile Bintam, which he fortified, as he did also Pagus, nor force nor stand being able to defend him from his fathers fates and fortunes. The Moores haue envied this successe to the Portugals, and often haue attempted to deprive them of Malaca. The Hollanders also vnder Cornelius Matelinius, Anno 1608. laid siege thereto, whiles the Portugall was seeking new conquests at Achen, who in their returne might easily have defeated them, had they not beene vnadvised in too long aduising. When the Portugals went to Malaca, the King of Pans marriage with the daughter of Mahomer was to bee solemnized, a banquetting house of timber covered with silke, sumptuously prepared to this purpose on thirtie wheels, to be drawne with Elephants, the Principals of the Citie being therein. But this Kings affection was soone cooled by these disasters.

From Singapura to Pulo Cambilan, there is no other habitation of any reckoning, but a few Puts where Fisher-men dwell, and a few Villages within Land. This is the Centre of the Eastern Traffique. They are proud of their language (which some say was deuised by the fountaines;) wherein they deuise many Sonnets and amorous Poesies. The Malays, or Country people, goe naked, with a cloth about their middle, and a little roll of cloth about their heads. Loonico Barthema (who was there before the Portugals knew it) supposed, that here arrived more ships then in any Citie in the world. The River Gaza neere therunto, is more after his reckoning, then fiftene miles ouer. The people in the Country lodge in Trees, for feare of Tygres.

It is strange that S. Barros writes of these Tygres, that in the height of eight yards they will reach and deuoure men: their chiefe preferuatiues against them are their night fies: the multitude is such that many enter by night into the Citie for prey, of which hee tells that after the Portugals had taken it, that a Tygre leaped ouer a high wall, and carried away three flaves tied to a piece of timber, together with the wood, leaping againe vpon the wall with admirable lightnesse. The Countrey being barren, the Citie abounded neuerthelesse with plenty of necessaries, exceeding those places whence they were brought.

After that Alphonso Albuquerque had conquered Malacca; the Moores dispossessed there, seated themselves in diuers places along the coast, & some of them vsurped the title of Kings.

Of Patane and the neighbouring petie Kingdomes.

PATANE is a Citie Southwards from Siam, chiefe of that Kingdome, whereto it giueth name, in the height of seven degrees. The buildings are of Wood and Reed, but artificially wrought. The Melquit (for many of them are Mahumetanes) is of Bricke. The Chinois are more then the native Inhabitants. They are of an Ash-colour. They vse three languages; the Malayan (which to them is naturall) the Sian, and Chinan. The first is written like the Hebrew, from the right hand; the second, like the Latine from the left, and almost in like Characters; the third, from the right to the left, with a descent from the top to the botto me. The Chinois haue Idolatrous Temples, and so haue the Sians, wherein are many golden statues; the Priests which attend them are clothed in yellow. They haue sacred youths which are their Oracles. The people when they enquire of them, fit a convenient distance from the Images, and obserue the young mans geitures (who with his haire disheuelled lyeth prostrate before the Idoll) singing and playing on Instruments, vntill he arise, and standeth vp. For then, as possessed of the Deuill, he runneth vp and downe with a terrible countenance, and maketh a sturre, as if he would kill himselfe, and them that stand by, with a sword which he hath in his hand. Then the people prostrating themselves, request him to declare the Deuils Oracle, and he answereth as pleaseth him; his lies being accounted Oracles. Adulterie is here a capitall offence, the father of the malefactor being the Executioner, or his next kinsman, if he be dead: yet is this vice common (notwithstanding this rigor) by reason of the womens vnbridled lust.

The Kingdome hath bin gouerned many yeeres by a Queene, who gaue good entertainment to the Hollanders, James Necij and his fellowes, At 1662. after their double misfortune and madnes, which had befallen them, the one in iest, the other in earnest; this at Macao in China, where they were, and knew it not, and setting twentie men on ¹ shoare, neuer far from Auaella Falca, in 11. degrees and an halfe, where they found the Tract of Carts, and footings of beasts, but could not see a man, nor shoot a beast. They ghesied that the people liued as the Tartars, wandering in Carts and Tents, without any settled dwelling. The place was by them called Sotternym, by reason that many of their company had lost the vse of reason, and became mad with eating a certaine fruit there growing like to Plums, with a tender stone, which continued till they had slept. Had they knowne then the easinesse of the cure, it had bin better then any Comedie to haue tickled their Splene, and prouoked laughter, to see one fighting against the enemies, which assailed him at his Cabbin: to heare another with piteous shrieks cry out on the multitude of Deuils and Hobgoblins, which affrighted him; a third sees strange sights, and cries out, The ship is full of strangers; and whilst one, in more pleasing distraction, enioyeth (and ioyeth in that distracted pleasure) the sight of God and his Angels, another (transported by this humoured Baron) with dreadful and gasty looks, and trembles at his supposed sights of the Deuill, and his hellish associates. It were a madnesse to relate how exceedingly this their madnesse was diuersified, and how many Ads this Tragical Comedie had, till sleepe had dispersed those fumes, where-with that fruit had distracted their braines. From thence (as is said) they came to Patane, where the Queene entertained them in good sort, and to their contentment.

As the difference of their writing, in such neerenesse of dwelling, is very much, so no lesse is found in their Religions. The Pataneans are Mahumetanes. The Chinois and Siamites are Ethniks, in that diuersitie of Rites which you haue heard. Whiles the Hollanders were there, one of those youths, in that Propheticall distraction before mentioned, warned them to depart from thence; for a great fire would otherwise consume them; whereupon many forsooke their habitation, and yet no fire happened. They also saw the execution of their seuer Law against Adulterie, on two noble Personages; whose lewd familiaritie being detected, they chose to bee strangled, and hee to bee stabbed (the Law permitting them their choice of the kindes of death) which by the fathers of the parties was executed on them. In single persons it is accounted no crime. And if a foreine Merchant come to trade there, they vse to

i. The Hollanders saw many men & women of Chins in their boats, which were Fishers, and dwelt in them; but saw not a Portugall, nor could procure any of the other, at any time, to deliver them a letter on shoare. The Samitans that liue here, weare two or three ¹ balls of Gold or Silver, as bigge as a Tennis-ball, in their yards, as we shall after obserue in Pegu. The Mahumetans weare them not. The Queene keeps her selfe close at home among her women ; of which some may not marry (but yet may doe worse) others may, hauing first obtained the Queenes licence. It is seldome that shee is seene ; yet sometimes shee rideth on an Elephant in Progresse, for her recreation. And for Elephants, they haue a deuice to take them in this sort. Some ride into the ^m woods on a tame Elephant, and when they espie a wilde one, they prouoke him to fight. Whiles these are fastned in the encounter by the teeth or tuskes, each striving to overthrow the other, some come behinde the wilde Elephant, and fasten his hinder feet, and so either kill him for his teeth, or by famine tame him.

Beter Williams for Ioria.

Anna 1611. June the two and twentieth; Some of the English came to Patane, with a Letter from His Maistie to the Queene, accompanied with a present from the Merchants of six hundred Rials of Eight. This Letter was deliuered in great pompe, being laid in a bason of Gold, caried on an Elephant, furnished with many little Flags, Launces, and Minstrels ; The Queenes Court also being sumptuously prepared to this businesse. They obtained grant ²⁰ of a Trade on like conditions to the Hollanders, who had their Factory their ten yeeres before that time, and their House in that space twice burned.

The Iaponikes had twice destroyed Patane by fire in fife or six yeeres space. The Countrey adioyning was also full of wartes : the King of Ior ouer-runne, and burned in September that yeere, all the Suburbes of Paan : those of Camboya, Laniam and Jagoman, ioyning their forces against the King of Siam. On the one and thirtieth of December, the Queene of Pantanie went to sport Her selfe, accompanied with six hundred Prawes, where wee (saith Floris) visited Her, being a comely old woman, about sixtie, tall and full of Maistie, such as they had seene few in the Indies. Shee had in company Her sister, which is Heire apparent, commonly called the young Queene, vnmarried and about fortie six yeeres of age. The Queene had not bene forth of her house in seven yeeres before, and now intended to hunt wild Bulls and Buffes, of which there is great abundance. The waters this yeere were extraordinarily high, carrying away many houses. The Queenes younger sister was married to the King of ^o Pahan, whom shee had not seene in twentie eight yeeres, notwithstanding Her often Embassies to that purpose. At last, prouoked with the Kings dallying and delaying to send Her, shee sent out a Fleet of seuentie Saile, with foure thousand men to Pahan, to bring her Sister by force, in April 1613. Hee (being distressed by wartes which the King of Ior had made on him, burning his Houses, Barnes and prouisions ; and the Queene of Pantanie making stay of all Lunkes of Rice laden for Pahan) arriued there, Iuly the twelfth, with the Queene, Sister, and her two sonnes : and all the Dogs were for his sake killed, because hee could indure none. August the second, hee was entertained with a feast, at which the English were invited guests, where they saw a Comedie played all by women, after the manner of Iaua, with amique apprell, very pleasant to behold. Once before, in the Queenes presence they had seene twelve women and children dance very well, after them the Gentlemen, and last of all the Hollanders and the English were requelled to doe it. This Queene is well monneyed, both the English and Dutch tooke vp money of Her at vse : this and merchandise, being in the Indies the practice of Kings.

n Pan or Pam, or Pate. This King promised much assistance to the English, if they would resort to his Citie, which is in a little Island

o Gouvernor or chiefe over them.

On the fift of October, there happened a lamentable Fire on a strange occasion. Two great men, Datoe Besar, and Datoe Laxmannu, dwelling peete together, both rich in Slaues, hee sold out that Besar (hearing that his Iauan Slaues had treated to kill him with Laxmannu and others) caused two of his most suspected Slaues to be bound : which the ^o Ponyonla of the Slaues would not suffer, and thereupon was stabbed by him with his Creefe, His Iauan Slaues seeing this, would haue taken him, but by rescue of his other Slaues, hee escaped. They neuertheless slew all that came in their way, and presently set the houses on fire. Laxmannu Iauan Slaues could not by any threats be detained from ioyning with them, and set all on fire as they went, so that the whole Towne except the Queenes Court, the Meskit, and some few houses, were burned. The Iauans tooke such Bond-women, as they best liked, away with them, and fled into the Countrey. Few of them could be taken.

Iohor or Ior, in this yeere 1613, was taken by the forces of the King of Achen after twentie nine dayes siege. The Hope (a Holland ship of six hundred Tun, which set saile from Bantam in March, with eightie men, twentie foure Peeeces, and seuentie thousand Rials of Eight in Silver, and the worth of ten or twelve thousand in Cloth) had the ill hap to come to this Riuer of Iohor, and some went vp to the Towne : but before they could returne, the

Achin Armada came to this Siege; so that twenty three of their men were taken. The rest came October the one and twentieth to Patanie. Master Copland then at Achin with Generall Best, writes, that the Kings Armada returning, arrived Joly the third, Gallies and Frigats a hundred and twenty, or more, with which Laxaman the Generall had subdued the Kingdomes of Ioar and Siak, bringing with him both the Kings and two of their brethren, which he saith, were honourably sent backe, and remained tributaries to Achin.

The Hollanders have had much trading at Patane; and the King of Iohar or Ior moved with their good successe against the Portugals, joyned his Navie to theirs, to chase them out of those parts. Yea, they have braued the Portugals even before Goa, the Seat of their

- 10 Vice-Roy; and in November, 1604. at Calcutt entered into solemne league with the Samaryn, (at least offered it Larrie denies the acceptation) against them: and the next yere they wonne from the Portugals, the Castles of Amboyne and Tidore, not to mention many other Prizes taken from them by the Hollanders at Macao, one ship worth a Million; at Sincapura, &c. In the yere 1605. Cornelius Matelinius was sent to the Indies with twelve Shippes, and the next yere after Paulus a Caerdyg, with twelve more. And Matelinius besieged Malaca, as before is said. But in this attempt they had not successe answerable to their desire: and yet not so ill as was likely. For the Portugals upon this newes returning from Achin, upon espiall of a Flemish Saile, called a Counsell, and made it the next day before they came vp; in which space the Hollander had leisure to bring all his Ordnance (then on shore for battery) aboard his Ships, and to prepare himselfe for fight, which he held two dayes with the Portugall with two Ships losse on each side, the Portugall giving way. So little counsell is sometimes in consultation, and easily is opportunity lost in the very seeking.

Larrie writeth that the Hollanders having taken the Fortresses of Amboin and Tidor, entered League with ten neighbour Kings, enemies to the Portugals, and with eleven Ships, seven Barkes, came before Malaca in the end of April 1606. The Kings Confederate had of all sorts of Shipping, three hundred twenty saucen, with foure thousand men. The Hollanders which were then in Malaca upon affaires of Merchandize, did performe good service for the distressed Portugal. The Siege continued almost foure moneths, in which the citie endured fiftie thousand great shot, before the Vice-Roy Alphonse Castries freed the same: He leaving the charge of Goa to the care of Menesius the Arch-Bishop, with a great Attamada set forth in the beginning of May, ignorant of this Siege: and set upon the Acheners by the way, where hee got blowes and shame. Sixe leagues from Malaca the Hollanders fought with him August the eleventh. The first day was little difference, the next day one Holland Ship was burnt, and the Admirall fired; two Portugall ships burned, one of them the Admirall. On the third and fourth the Portugall had the better: but so as neither party were absolute Conquerours. Hee that will not onely read, but in manner see, the moit of these exploits of the Hollanders, with other rarities of the Indies, may resort to Theodorick

- 30 * and Israel de Bry, who have in lively stamps expressed these Navigations; with the observations of Linschoten, and others.

40 Floris their Country-man complaines, that they suffer and assist Moores and Ethnikes in this Indian Trade, which they forbid to their Servants, Countrey-men and Brethren, upon paine of Death and losse of Goods. They have in the Easterne Islands done much harme to the Portugals and Spaniards. Capayne Schot tooke the Castle and Land of Solor, with a great quantitie of Sandelwood, and sent the Portugalls to Malacca.

He mentioneth one Fleet of theirs in the Moluccos of two and twenty saile, and that they expected the next yere (1614.) fourteene saile more. Bangam nameth seven and thirte Facories, and twenty Forts and Castles of theirs all beyond the Cape Comorin. In some places where they have Castles, hee saith, they threatened to carry such (as Prisoners) to their thought to speake here of the Hollanders, who haue worthily fought & found much Honour, especially by their Marine exploits, round about the world; which if it bee attended with some vneighbourly quarrels with Ours, and other soyle of couetousnesse, in this humane frailty, and their proper thifineesse is no great wonder.

Baldi mentioneth an Iland on this Coast called Carnalubar, the Inhabitants whereof goe from one Iland to another (as the Caribes were wont) to hunt men for their cruell diet. For the most part they live on fish, goe naked, without Law, and had almost seized on him and his company. David Middleton * affirmeth the like of another Iland called Seran, which provoked by wrongs from the Portugals, cate all Chritians they can get, robbing them alive, without regard of any ransom.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Kingdome of Pegu, or Brama, and the subiect and neagbouring Kingdomes.

§. I.

a G. Hist. B. Ch.

F the Kingdome Brama, or Brama, the Citie Royall is Pegu, the Nation where began the greatnesse of the late Kings. These Bramans inhabited neere the Lake Chiamay, among whom the King of Pegu had his Lieutenants or Viceroyes: one whereof (the Deputy of Tangu) about threefore and ten yeares since, rebelled against him, and surpris'd the Kingdomes of Prom, Melintay, Calam, Bacam, Mirandu, Aua, all peopled with the Bramans, trending Northwards a hundred and fiftie leagues. Hee after attempted Siam with an Armie of three hundred thousand, and spent three monthes in making way through the huge Woods and inaccessible Places, but achieued not his purpose. After his returne hee assayed Pegu, and conquered it; and then returned the second time 1667. as in the former Chapter is mentioned. Hee subiected to his Seignorie twelue Kingdomes, which Fernandez thus rehearseth: The Kingdome of Cuelan, where are the best Rubies and Saphyres. Secondly, that of Aua, the bowels whereof are filled with Mines of Copper, Lead, and Siluer: The third Bacam, enriched with Mines of Gold: Tungran, the fourth aboundeth with * Lac and Lead: such is Prom, the fifth: the sixth is Langoma, stored with Copper, Muske, Pepper, Silke, Siluer, Gold: Luran, the seuenth, hath Beioin enough to lade ships: the eighth and ninth are the Kingdomes of Trucon, Staples of China-Merchandize: the tenth and eleventh are the Diademes of Cublan, betwene Aua and China, powdered with precious stones: Siam, whence wee last came, is the last of the twelue; in the inuasion whereof hee armed a million and threefore thousand men (which number is short of Fredericks reckoning, except wee ascribe that surplusage to Victuals, Voluntaries, and Scrutants and Attendants on the baggage;) which Armie (saith Fernandez) hee tyed out of his people, taking one only of ten.

Fredericke then in Pegu saith hee had sixe hundred thousand, sent him in supply of those which were slaine and lost of the first Armie, which consisted of * fourtene hundred thousand men: after one and twentie monthes siege, hee preuayled by Treason of the Siamites, which opened one of their Gates in the night, and received his Forces into the Citie: whereupon the King of Siam poisoned himselfe, leaving a rich bootie to the Conqueror. Hee saw at the Kings returne the Elephants ordered in a triumphall square, laden with Gold, Siluer, Jewells, and with the Great Prisoners of Siam. This King (saith the same Author) hath no power by Sea, but in the Land, for People, Dominions, Gold and Siluer, hee farre exceeds the Great Turke. He hath diuers Magasins full of Treasure, which is euery day increased without diminishing, besides that hee is Lord of the Mines of Rubies, and other Jewells. The King in his Feasts vsed to ride on a triumphall Chariot all gilded, drawne by sixteen Horses, it was high with a goodly Canopy over it, twentie Lords attended the same, holding in their hands a Rope, fastned to this Chariot, to keepe it vpright. The King sits in the middle, and about him stand foure of his chiefe Faworites. Before marcheth the Armie, in the midst, all the Nobilitie, and round about the Chariot, exceeding pompously and orderly. The King hath one principall Wife, three hundred Concubines. The voyage from Saint Thomee used by the Portugals, is by Negrais, where on the left hand stood a Varella all gilded, serving for a Sea Marke, the Sunne shining thereon causing it to bee scene farre off: Neere thereto is the Island of Flies, so called of the store of Flies, caused by the multitude of Fishes there salted, Thence Balby passed to Cosmi, the Territory whereof is full of Woods, and these full of Tygres, wild Swine, Partats, Apes, and other Creatures. Cosmi is in sixteene Degrees, one third part, the Houses are of Canes, covered with thatch, much annoyed with Tygres, which enter often into the Towne and deuoure Men or Beasts. From hence they passe in Paros or Barkes by diuers Villages alongst the Riuer to Iacobell a great Citie, and a little beyond to another called Tegiatden. Dian is a great Towne a little further, where they make Barkes or Vessells as bigge as Galeasses, hauling on both sides quite through; rooms for Merchandize, and in the midst a kinde of dwelling-house, where they trade: they passed further by Bedagiamana, Lagapala, Purdabin, Gungicbin (where they anchored in the midst of the streame, for feare of the Tygres, which in the water sometime assault men.) Coilan a Citie fouresquare, each square three miles; Tuasnedan another Citie full of Varellas or Temples and Images; Lenagon a pleasant Citie full of Palme-trees; Siluanpedi, where many victualling Barkes are made, and serue for dwelling and victualling downe to the Sea; Dala, where the Kings stables for his Elephants were; Dogon, the most Religious; Meccao, where they vn-laded their goods to passe by Land to Pegu. All this way is by fresh Riuers with swift Tides, the houses on both sides, many built vpon Timbers ascended by Ladders, to preuent Tygres, for which cause also some keepe Buffals in their houses, the sent of whom the Tygres cannot endure. All this way they vse Mattains in stead of money, made of glasse. The Varellas or Temples in this way, are innumerable, of diuers fashions. This King held himselfe the greatest King in the World, and caused himselfe to bee entituled, The liuing God vpon earth: which the LIVING GOD in heauen aueraged on him, as you shall heare. Caplan is the place where they find Rubies, Spinels and Saphires, digged out of high Hills, to which none may haue access but by leane. It is six dayes journey beyond Aua, The Buffals in these parts are of Ash-colour, so great that they are like Elephants. In any great solemnitie the foure white Elephants went before the King with furniture all of gold, their teeth also in a iewelled sheath. Hee hath much artillery, but wants men to manage them; much marcellals for shipping, but wants Shipwrights and Mariners. His Jewells are inestimable, Balby saw him weare two Rubies, each as bigge as two Dares, but not so long, of admirable lustre. Hee so abounded with wealth, that a hundred ships, fraught with Rice, seemed to diminish nothing of the plentie. The fields are said to yield three harvests in a yeere: and of Gems the store is beyond estimation, and almost maketh them there short of the estimation of Gems. But this wealth, then wanting no store, had, when Fernandes writ this 1598, a contrary vicissitude, of no store, but of want, even of those things which Nature exacteth, as necessary props of life. Scarcely of so many millions were left seuen thousand persons, Men, Women, and Children, to participate in the Kings imprisonment, or siege, in his Tower, and those feeding on mans flesh, the Parents requiring of the Children that life which before they had giuen, to sustayne their owne, and now layed them not in their bosome, but in their bowels; the Children became liuing Sepulchres of their scarce-dead Parents. The stronger preyed vpon the weaker: and if their flesh was eaten vp before by their owne hunger, leauing nothing but skin and bones to the hungrie assault of these Raueners, they ripped the belly, and deuoured their inward parts, and breaking the skull, sucked out the braynes raw. Yea, the weaker sexe was by the strength of famine, armed with no lesse butcherly despight, against whomsoever they could meet in the streets of the Citie; with their knives, which they carried about them, as Harbengers to their teeth, in these in-hospitall inhumane humane banquets.

And thus did the besieged Citizens, while the King endured in his Tower no small part of like misery, besides the indignitie, so to bee by his owne Vassals straitened, and after slaughtered. But such is the iust hand of the King of Kings, who regardeth not persons, but as Hee sheweth Mercy to the Mercifull, so doth He reserve Vengeance for Cruellie and Tyrannie. Par-donne me, Reader, if on this spectacle I cause thee, with my selfe, to stay a while and wonder. The Sunne, in his dailly journey round about this vast Globe, saw Few equall (that I say no more to this Peguan Greatnesse, and yet in a small space He that is higher then the highest, bath abated and abased this Magnificence lower then the lowest of his Princes.

Of the destruction and desolation of Pegu.

After the death of that Braman Conqueror, his sonne, in the second moneth of his succeeding reigne, hearing that the King of Aua, his Tributarie and Vncle, was plotting some Conspiracie, committed to prison fortie of his Nobles, Partners in that new Project, & bringing them all with their Parents, Wiues, Children, Friends, y There were destroyed by this flame and execution 4000. persons, Arthur pag. 326. & Gaspar Balby, c. 37. hath the same number, saying, That all the Citizens of Pegu were enioyned to be present at the execution. He calls the place not a Wood, but a Prison. He was then at Pegu.

and Acquaintance into a Wood, set fire thereon, commanding to cut them in pieces, whosoever escaped out of the flame. This kindled another fire in the hearts of his discontented Subjects, which was not quenched but with his overthrow. Hee warred on his Vncle, the King of Aua, with no great advantage, till they both agreeing to trie it by single combat on Elephants, Pegu obtained the Conquest. Their fight was first with Harquebusses, after with Darts, lastly with Swords. By the helpe of his Elephant Pegu prevailed, yet so as their perished about two hundred thousand of the three hundred thousand hee led forth in this Expedition, and almost as many of the Auan side. Of his Elephants teeth which dyed in this battell, were made little Images or Idols. In the meane time the Siamite with an Army marched to the borders of Pegu, divulging rumors, That he came to succour his Lord against the Auan Rebelle. The King enraged hereat, sent presently part of his Forces to take him, and present him Captiue: but the Souldiers refused to follow the Generall in this enterprise, and returned to their owne houses. The King, after his returne, sent to Siam, by faire speeches to persuade him to come to him: he refused his presence, but denied not his wonted Tributes.
 Hereupon the King, after two yeres prouision for the war, made that vnhappy Expedition in the former Chapter mentioned. And there the waters taking part with the Siamite, hee tried once and againe the like fortunes of warre. He sent his brother the King of Langoma, and his owne Son, twice; which did much harme to the Siamites, and receiued no little themselves neuer returning without losse of halfe their Armie, & of his owne Son, in the last inuasion slain with a shot. Relentlesse hee (inflamed rather with his losses) determined another Expedition in his owne person; and therefore laid vp store of prouision in Barnes at Martauan, Murmul-an, Taauy, and Tanasarin, three yeeres together, purposing then to employ all the Peguans in this enterprise. But they weary of forreine calamities, hid themselves in Woods and Wildernesses, and some turned Talapoies: so they call their Religious persons. Many sold themselves slaves. The King persisting, in his Person gaue order to his Vncle Xmibegay, to take a muster of all the People, and to entertaine halfe of them for the warres. But hee missing so many, which had by those new courses prevented this service, acquainted the King therewith; who enioyneth the late professers of Talapoies to resigne their habit, the young-men to be compelled to warfare, the old men to be exiled to the Bramans, where after hee caused them to be exchanged for horses. He caused all the Peguans also to be branded in the right hand, that they might be knowne. This made them entertaine thoughts of Rebellion, which was first practised by the Cosmians, who set a new King ouer them.

z The cruel tyrrannie of the King of Pegu.

The Peguan sent an Armie against them, with charge to burne or bring away all they could find amongst them, which they did, together with many of the People of both sexes, which hee (after his manner) setting wood about them, burned. And when the rest (not able to warre against their King and Famine at once) submitted themselves, with exquisite torments hee slue them all. Hee then sent to his Son, the King of Aua, to transplant those People of euery Age and Sexe, to people these forlorne desolations of Pegu. They, vnacquainted with this ayre, brake forth in diseases, wherewith they infected also the naturall Inhabitants: which plague made such hauoke, that many in impatience cast themselves into the Riuer. The Murmulans with helpe of the Siamites, seized on their Castle, whom the King besieged a yeere together, and then was forced from thence by the Siamites sudden irruption, with losse of the most of his People, the Horfes, Elephants, and Countie it selfe remaining their recompence. And the Peguan Captaines also, fearing their Masters tyrrannie, became subiects to the Siamite, whose whole Families this tyrant with Fire and Water destroyed; so that all the Traict from Pegu to Martaua and Murmulan was made a Wildernesse. These things done, hee sent for his younger Sonne, the King of Prom, and commanded him to the siege of Murmulan, who, utterly milking the attempt, conueyed himselfe in the night homewards, with purpose of rebellion.

The King of Siam not ignorant of this Peguan estate, invaded the country in Haruesttime, and therefore that which they could they conueyed into Barnes, the rest was fired. Hee proceeded and laid siege to Pegu; in which at that time was a hundred and fiftie thousand Men, and three thousand Peeeces of Ordnance, a thousand whereof were Braffe: but

(as is said) for feare of the Portugalls, which were reported to haue entred into Siam by the way of Cambaia, he departed, leaving Famine behind, as Lieutenant of his Warres, which caused the Forreigners, then in Pegu for the defence thereof, to get them to their owne homes. Those few which remained, liued with prouision from Tangu. The King sent to his Deputie in Tangu, to come to him with all the Inhabitants of the Countrey and their store, leaving his Wife, and some few to guard the Citie. He answered, That he would send halfe, and to demand all was unreasonable. The King sends four Noble-men, with Soldiers to force him hereunto. But he slayeth the Leaders, and seizeth on their Followers. Thus the Famine increaseth, and the People eating one another, the King numbeth the Citizens, among whom he findeth seven thousand Siameses, whom he commanded to be slaine, not leaving about thirtie thousand of all sorts in the Citie. His sonne, the King of Prom, which had now flood out three yeeres, began to relent and sue for pardon, with promise to bring the Promans (to the number of fiftie thousand) to the Citie, wherest his Father reioyced, and sealed his pardon, which he sent him with many gifts. But his chiefe Counsellor, Author of this Rebellion, fearing all the blame would be laid on him, poysoned the Prince; himselfe aspiring to the Kingdome, was within one weeke destroyed: and the Nobles, every man seeking to seize the State to himselfe, caused that of those fiftie thousand, within two monthes past, whiles every weeke they had a new Prince, scarce remained fiftie men fit for Warre, which departed to Pegu, three or foue in a ship, leaving their Countrey to the habitation of wild Beasts.

The Natives of Pegu are not quite extinct, but many of them are fled into other Kingdoms; of whom, and of the Bramans, Iangoma numbred a hundred and twentie thousand; Oracan, twentie thousand; Siam, a hundred thousand; and the King of Iangoma is able (they say) to arme a million of Men.

The Talapoyes persuaded the Tangoman to depose his brother of Pegu. He: alledged his Oath unto his Father, while he lived. They reply, that No Oath might prohibit, if he placed his brother in a Vahat (or golden Throne) to be adored for a god. And partly with this (I may not call it) Reason: and partly, as Xerxes alledged for himselfe, because that his elder Brother was borne before his Father was King, and because his Mother was the former King of Pegu's Daughter, he: persuaded himselfe that it was lawfull.

And thus was the State of this mighty Kingdom, in the yeere 1598. brought to one Ciate, which also was now become a withered carcaske, and well-neere the Sepulchre of it selfe. and (as mischiefe come not alone) besieged by Magus, King of Orracan.

Andreas a Bones (in his Letters the eight and twentieth of March 1600.) thus finisheth a And. Bones.

this Tragedie. When the King of Pegu law himſelfe in ſuch ſtraits, beleeged by the King of Orracan, or Arracan, and Tangu, in his Caſtle of Macao, in Decemb. 1599. hee yeelded himſelfe to the King of Tangu; who dealt treacherouſly with him, and cut off his head, as he did to the Queene likewiſe, and the Prince. He then haſted to the Tower of Pegu, where he did to the Queene his wife, and the Prince. He then came to the Tower of Pegs, where he found as much Gold and Jewels as laden ^b six hundred Elephants, and as many Horses, besides Silver and other Metalls of smaller price, which he left behind. The King of Arracan then absent, and angrie that the King of Tangu (contrary to promise) had seized all the treasure to himselfe, purposed to invade his Kingdome, and to that intent, had the ayde of many Portugalls (amongst whom this Iesuiste was one) who saw the wayes and fields, lately

so fertile, now full strewed with Dead mens bones and skulls, and in the Rivers all passage of Ships hindered by the carkasses of Men. The King of Arracan found in the Towne aforefaid, three millions of Silver, with two and thirtie hundred Peeces of Ordnance, and then remained Lord of Pegu. But the Kings of Siam and Iangoma prevented his enterprife for Tangu, which they invaded, to deprive him of his Treasures. The King of Siam twice affai-led Martauan with repulse, whereupon he caused two of his cowardly Captaines to be cast into Cauldrons of scalding Oyle: and the third time conquered that Kingdome.

Peter Williamson Florio hath given vs later relations. Hee reports that the King of Pegu had in his Conquering conqueste twentie Kings subiect to him, which fell to the Siamite, had in his flourishing grannelle twentie Kings subject to him, when he to the Spaniards Rain Api before mentioned. He besieged Vnxa or Pegu two Moneths without effect.

Death and death made Pegu refigne himselfe to the King of Tangu, that so he might also prevent the King of Arracan, who comming with his power tooke the Citie and the Coun-treys. The King of Tangu agreed with him to restore certain Treasures, the white Elephant, and the Kings daughter (both which I saw, faith Floris in Arracan, Anno 1606.) and the King of Pegu, or else that he himselfe would kill him; which he afterwards did with a pylon where-

10 Thus came this Empire after the destruction of many millions of Peguans, to desolation, that at this day there is no remembrance of it. The King of Arracan gaue the Towne or Fort of Nicote, whom hee killed Xenga, that is, honest: who scarcely so proued: for three or foure yeeres after taking this Kings sonne prisoner, hee made him ranfome him at 110000. Tangans, and ten Galeas of Rice, after that growing inolent and caring for no bodie. But in March 1513, the King of Aua tooke Sirlangh, and slew all the Portugals, and spited, or otherwise tortured (as the Fame went) this Philip de Brito. This King gaue order for the building vp againe of the old Towne, and called together the Peguets, making them many faire promises, and so went forward to Tenesleryn, where Banya came to him with fiftie thousand Peguans, before subiect to Siam. Thus larre Floris.

Some tell of this white Elephant, (for so they speake as if there were but one, whereas Fitz. Balbi and Frederike law foure, but it seemes one was of principall estimation) that it was obserued with no lesse honour then the King, and came not abroad without great pompe. It hath bene a dismal and disastrous Beast to five or six Kings, which had the possession thereof, all hauling Tragically ends. The King of Arracan, Anno 1599. returned home in triumph, this white Elephant richly adorned going before, the Brother and two Sonnes of the King of Pegu following.

Larrie writes that the King of Pegu yielded himselfe, his Wife and thirteene children (three other, the King of Arracan had two sonnes in hostage, and a daughter in marriage) to his sisters husband the King of Tangu, trussing the rather to his fidelitie, because when his eldest Sonne had forsaken him, and gone to Tangu in hope of the Queene his Aunts fauour, She caused his losse of loyaltie to be punished with the losse of his head. Tangu killed all this royall Family.

Marcauan, before mentioned, was a goodly Peguan Kingdome, but by wars was brought into like miseries. The Region was so fertile that it yielded three Harvests in a yeere, and sent yearly fiftene Ships to Malaca, as many to Cochín, laden with Rice: the Woods abound with excellent fruits, the Hearbes and shrubs were generally odoriferous or medicinal: diuers kinds there grew of Rices not like to ours: store of Pines and Tecoma Wood not subiect to rottenesse. A Countrey rich in Mines of Iron, Lead, Steele, Brass, Silver, Gold and Rubies, Springs and Riuers, Indian Palmes, and Sugar-Canes. The Forrests had Buffalos, Hares, Boares, wild the Hauen open at all times of the yeere, and not choaked with sand, as vsually in the Indian Winter. The Citie stands in 16. degrees: of great trading, a temperate ayre (the Megrim is unknowne nor Physicians.) The King Bannalain ninetie nine yeeres of age, who with his Heire apparant were chased out of the Kingdome, and hid themselves in the Forrests, as before that time about two hundred thousand of their Subiects had done, onely three thousand staying with the King.

Thus haue you heard of the power and subuersion of this great Monarchie: so much the more lamentable, because their fall was from such a height. The Countrey is so fertile, that at what time soeuer corne be put into the ground, the payment is good with increase. I haue seene with mine eyes (saith Cesar Fredericke) that they haue eaten Serpents, Scorpions, all manner of hearbs, and grasse. Such fertility, and such stomacks, as they make credible reports of their huge Armies, so doe they make more terrible the reports of their desolations. This that I speake of their dyet, I vnderstand not of their extremitie and famine, but ordinarily. Master Fitch saith the same, that they eate Roots, Hearbs, Leaues, Dogs, Cats, Rats, and Snakes; they refuse almost nothing.

§. III.

Of the Peguan Rites and Customes.

It is about a hundred yeeres since Vertomannus was there, who in company of a Persian Merchant went to visit the King, who then had wars in Aua. They went in a Boat all of one piece of wood, fiftene or sixteene paces long. The Oares were Canes, and the Mast was one Cane as big as a Herring Barrell. The King wore as many Jewels as were worth a great Citie, which made him in the night time to shine as the Sunne. Hee had a sacrifice to doe to the Deuill, and the next day the Persian presented him with rich Corralls, which hee tooke in so good worth, that he gaue him as many Rubies as were worth a hundred thousand Duckets. Some yeeres before, Hieronymo de Sancto Stephano found him in the same warres with Aua, and saith of him, that hee had ten thousand Elephants, and bred or brought vp euery yeere five hundred.

The King, that liued when M. Fitch was there, Sonne to the Conqueror, had one Wife, and three hundred Concubines: of whom hee was said to haue fourescore and ten Children. Hee sat in iudgement almost euery day. They vse no speech in their Sutes, but giue vp their Suppli-and having agreed with their parents, hee may for the time of his abode, use her as his slave, or his Concubine, without any discredit to her. Yea, if hee come againe, after shee is married, hee may, for the time hee stayeth there, demand her in like sort to his wife. And when a man marieth, hee will request some of his friends to lye the first night with his Bride. There are also among them that sell vp the priuie part of their Daughters, leaving onely passage for Urine; which, when they marry, passe vnder the Surgeons hand for remedie. Gasser Bally, and Get. Arthas, tell of another custome of their Virgins, if that name may bee given them. For, saith hee, Virgines in hoc regno omnino nullas reperire licet: Puella enim omnes statim à pueritia sua medicamentum quoddam usurpant, quo muliebria dissolvuntur & aperta continentur: idque propter globulos quos in virgine viri gestant: illis enim admittendis virgines arduiores nullo modo sufficerunt. Their money is called Ganza, and is made of Copper and Leade, which every man may stampe that will. Gold and Silver is merchandise and not money. The tides of the Sea betweene Martauan and Pegu by F. Caesar Fredericke are reputed the greatest wonder which hee saw in his travels; being so violent, that the ayre is filled with noyse, and the earth quaketh at the approach of this watery element, shooting the Boats that passe therewith as arrowes, which at a high water they suffer not to anchor in the Channell, which would betray them to the deuouring fawes of the returning tide, but draw them toward some Banke, where they rest in the ebbe on dry land, as high vpon the Channels bottom as any house top. And if they arrive not at their certaine stations, they must backe againe whence they came, no place else being able to secure them. And when it encreaseeth againe, it giueth them their calls or salutations: the first waue washeth ouer the Barke from stemme to sterne: the second, is not so furious; the third, raiseth the Anchor. In Negrais in Pegu 8 diuers people dwell in Boats, which they call Paroes; the Countrey being full of Riuers, in which they goe to and fro with their Families: as strange is the dwelling here on the Land; their houses being set on high posts, and their going vp on Ladders for feare of Tygres. From hence to Pegu is tenne (as is said before) or eleuen dayes iourney by the Riuers, as before is expressed, where their Markets are (as their dwellings) vpon the water in Boats, with a great Sombre, like a Cart-wheele, to keepe off the Sunne made of Coco-Leaves. They vie in riding to carry bite in their mouths, which make them swell: and puffing cheekes. The husbands buy their wives, and if they mislike, put them away. And if the wives Parents will take away their daughters, they must restore that which was given in price for her. If a man dies without children, the King is his Heire. And if hee hath children, the King hath a third, they the rest. They vie to carrie men somewhat after the fashion of Congo, in a kind of Couerlet of Cotton, called Delingo of diuers colours, made commodiously to keepe off the Sunne, and Raine, and easie to lie on as a bed, carried by four men, which alway runne from morning to night, resting onely once in the day. The wife, children and slaves of the Debtor are bound to the Creditor: who may carry the Debtor to his house, and shut him vp, or else sell the wife, children and slaves. The Noble and Ignoble obserue one fashion of attire, differing in the fineness of the matter, which commonly is bombast. One peece for a shirt, another large and painted, tied vp betwene the legges; On their heads a kind of Mitre, of the same, and some like a Hiue: they goe bare-foot, but the Nobles vsually are carried in Delingos, or on Horse-backe. The women weare a smocke to the girdle, from thence a strait cloth, of purpose to shew that they are Women, in sort before related. They goe bare-foote, their armes laden with Hoopes of Gold and Jewels, and their fingers full of precious Rings, with their haire rolled vp about their heads. Many weare a cloth about their shoulders in stead of a Cloake. In Pegu they vie much Opium. Aracan is mid-way betwene Bengala and Pegu, on the Coast. Hee is able (saith Fredericke) to arme many Aufts by Sea, and by Land hath certaine Sluces, with the which, if the King of Pegu his greatest enemy, assaulted his Countrey, hee could at pleasure couet a great part with waters. In Pegu they haue a custome of buying and selling by Brokers, which vndertake for the performance on both sides. Also that others standing by may know what is bidden for commodities, they haue their hands vnder a cloth, and by touching the fingers, and nipping the ioynts (each finger and ioynt hauing his proper signification) they make vp their bargaines.

CHAP. V.

Of the Religion in Pegu, and the Countreys sometime subiect thereto.

THeir Varellas or Idol-Temples in the Kingdome of Pegu are many. ^a They are made round like a Sugar-Loafe, or a Bell: some are as high as a Church, or a reasonable Steeple, very broad beneath: some a quarter of a mile in compasse: in the making of them, they consume many Sugar-Canes, with which they couer them from the top to the bottome. Within, they be all earth, done about with stone. They spend thereon much gold, for they be all gilded aloft, and many of them from the top to the bottome: and euery ten or twelue yeeres; they must be new gilded, because the Raine consumeth off the gold, for they stand open abroad. Were it not for this vaine custome, gold would there be good cheape. About two dayes iourney from Pegu, there is a Varelle, ^b or Pagode, which is the Pilgrimage of the Pegues. It is called Dagonne, and is of wonderfull bignesse, and all gilded from the foot to the top. This house is fifty five paces in length, and hath in it three Iles or Walks, and forty great Pillars gilded, which stand betwene them. It is gilded with gold within and without. There are houses very faire round about for the Pilgrims to lie in; and many goodly houses for the Tallipoyes to preach in, which are full of Images, both of men and women all ouer gilded: I suppose it the fairest place in the world. It standeth very high, and there are four waies to it, which all along are set with Trees of Fruits in such wise, that a man may goe in the shade about two miles in length. And when their Feast-day is, a man can hardly passe by Water, or by Land, for the great prease of people, which resort thither from all places of the Kingdome. There are on the shoares of Dagon two Statues, which from the head downward represent young men, but haue the faces of Devils, and two wings on their backs. In Pegu there is Varelle, or Temple, like to this, which the King frequented to doe his Holies therein, mounting vp staires, at the foot whereof were two Tygers, gaping wide, seeming as if they had beene aliue. Besides the many Magazins (or Treasuries full of Treasure) which the late Braman King had, hee had neere vnto the Palace a Court walled with stone, the gates whereof were open euery day. Within this Court are foure gilded Houses, couered with Lead; and in euery of them certaine Idols of great value. In the first house was a great Statue of Gold, and on his head a Crowne of Gold, beset with rare Rubies and Saphires, and about him foure little children of Gold. In the second House is another of Siluer, as high as an House, set as it were sitting on heapes of money, crowned, his foot is as long as a man. In the third house there is the like Idoll of Brasse and in the fourth, of Ganza (which is their Monymetall, tempered of Lead and Copper.) In another Court, not farre from this, stand foure other Colosses, or huge Images of Copper, in Houses gilded faire, as they are themselves, saue the head. Bally ^c tells of fiue made of Ganza, so monitrous, that the toes of their feete were as big as a man, and sitting cross-legged, were yet as high as one could hurle a stone, and were all gilded. Fernandes ^d relateth of threescore and seuen Images of Gold, richly adorned with Jewels, and three hundred threescore and fixe Combaleuges, or Gourds of Gold, molten by the Kings Father, each weighing a hundred & fourescore pound, besides his other Treasures; to conceale which, he slew two hundred Eunuchs his attendants.

Their Tallipoyes, ^e before they take Orders, go to Schoole till they be twentie yeeres old, or more: then they come before a Tallipoy, appointed for that purpose, whom they call Rowli. Hee (as chiefe and most learned) examineth them many times, Whether they will leaue their Friends, and the company of all Women, and take vpon them the habite of a Tallipoy. If hee be content, then hee rideth vpon an Horse about the Streets, very richly apparelled, with Drums and Pipes, to shew, that hee leaueth the riches of the World to bee a Tallipoy. In few dayes after, he is carried vpon a Thing like an Horse-litter, which they call a Serion, vpon ten or twelue mens shoulders, in apparell of a Tallipoy, with Pipes and Drums, and many Tallipoyes with him, and all his friends; which accompany him to his House, standing without the Towne, and there leaue him. Euery one of them hath his House (which is very little) set vpon fixe or eight Polts, to which they ascend on a Ladder, of twelue or foureteene steps. These Houses are commonly by the High-ways side, and among the Trees, and in the Woods. They goe strangely apparelled, with one Cambolme, or thin Cloth, next to their bodie, of a browne colour; another of yellow, doubled many times vpon their shoulders. These two bee girded to them with a broad Girdle; and they haue a Skin of Leather hanging on a string about their neckes, whereon they sit, bare-headed and bare-footed, with their right armes bare, and a broad Sombroero, or shadow, in their hands, to defend them in Summer from the Sunne, and in Winter from the raine. They are shaven on their heads, beards^f, and all their bodies. They observe perpetuall Chastitie, and are modest in their going. When one of them dies, his body is kept many dayes with Feasts, and after is set on a high Scaffold, many Tallapoys feasting about it. Thus it is carried to the place of burning, by a great number of people, where it is consumed with sweet Woods to the bones, these buried neere their Houses, and the ashes cast into the water. Bally resembles them in Habite and Ceremonies to their Friers.

They goe with a great Pot made of Wood or fine Earth, and covered, tyed with a broad Girdle vpon their shoulders, which commeth vnder their arme; where with they goe to beg their Victuals which they eate, which is Rice, Fish, and Hearbs. They demand nothing; but come to the doore, and the people presently doe giue them one thing or other; which they put together in their Pot. They keepe their Feasts by the Moone; and at a new Moone is their most solemne Feast: and then the people send Rice and other things to that Kiack, or Church, of which they be: and there all the Tallipoys of that Church meet, and are that which is sent them. They Preach against all abuses, and many resort vnto them. When they enter into their Kiack, at the doore there is a great latre of Water, with a Cocke or a Ladle in it, and there they wash their feet, and then enter in, lifting vp their hands to their heads, first to their Preacher, & then to the Sun, and so sit downe. When the Tallipoys preach, many of the people carry them gifts vnto the Pulpit, where they sit and preach. And there is one that sitteth by them, to take that which the people bring, which is diuided among them. They haue none other Ceremonies nor Seruite that I could see, but onely Preaching.

Bamferus a Franciscan, and after him Boterus, say, That they hold an innumerable multitude of Worlds, from all eternitie succeeding one after another; and also an innumerable number of Gods, but not all at once. They imagine, that five haue gouerned this present World, whereof foure are passed aboue 2090. yeeres agoe. Now they are without a God, and expect the fifth many Ages hereafter: after whose death, they conceiue, that the World shall perish by fire, and then another World shall follow, and others Gods to rule it. They reckon likewise in the number of their Gods certaine Men, which yet haue first passed into Fishes, Beasts, and Birds, of all sorts. After death they beleue three Places; one of Pleasure, Seum, (like the Mahumetane Paradise); another of Torment, Naxae; the third of Annihilation, which they call Niba. The Soules, after their phantasie, abide in the two former places, whence they returne so often into this life, till at last they be holden worthy that Niba. Hee addeth, that they haue Couents or Colledges of Priests, which liue three hundred together, or more, in one place, haue no use of Women, are harbourers of Strangers, and liue some of Almes, some of Rents. They haue like Nunneries also for the Women. There is supposed to be in one Idol-Sanctuary (whereof they haue many) 120000. Idols. They fast thirte dayes in the yeere; in which they eat nothing till night. They are of opinion, That he which in this world robbeth another man, shall in the next world be his seruant for recompence. They hold it a sin also to kill a liuing creature, although this be not strictly obserued amongst them. Some Iewes are of opinion, That this people descended of those Israelites which Salomun sent to Ophir, which they place in this Kingdome. But the Peguans themselves ascribe their Religion to a Dog, and a China woman, which escaped shipwracke.

The Deuill is highly worshipped of these Peguians, to whom they erect a stately Altar, and adorne it with varietie of Flowers, and Meates of all sorts, so to feede and feede him, that hee should not hurt them. This is principally done when they are sick: for then they make Vowes, and build Altars, which they cover with Clothes and Flowers. They entertaine him also with diuersitie of Musicke, and appoint him a Priest, whom they call the Deuill Father, which procureth his Rites and Musicke. Some, as soone as they rise from their beds, bring a basket of Rice, and meates, and a burning Torch in their hands, running vp and downe in the streets, openly professing to feede the Deuill to preuent harme from them that day. And if Dogs follow them, they hold them to be sent of the Deuill, to deuoure those meates in his name. Some will not eat till they haue first cast something behinde their backs to the Deuill. And in the Country Villages some of the richer inhabitants leaue their houses furnished with store of food three moneths space to bee inhabited of him, keeping meane while in the fields: that so the other nine moneths they may bee out of his danger. And howsoeuer the Tallipoys preach against this deuillish deuotion, yet they cannot reclaim the people. The Tallipoys euery Munday arise early, and by the ringing of a Bason call together the people to their Sermons, which are of Iustice to man, but nothing of Religion to God. They wash themselves once a yeere, and the water wherewith they are washed, the people account holy, and referue it for their drinke, as a holy potion. They hold that all which doe well, of whatsoever Religion, shall be saved, and therefore care not, as Bally affirmeth, if any of their Nation turne Christian.

They have many Feasts very solemnly observed. * One Feast (called Sapan Giacbia) is kept twelve leagues from the Citie; whither the King rides in a triumphall Chariot, with his Queene in exceeding pompe (so adorned with Jewels, that the eye cannot endure their shining) his Nobles attending. Another ¹ is kept in Pegu, against which day all the Courtiers provide them certaine Pillars or Images of diuers formes, kept closely, that none may see what others haue provided, till the Day. These are made of Indian Reedes, carued and gilded, and on the Festiual presented to the King, who praiseth the most artificiall of them. All that night huge lights of Wax are burnt in honor of their Idoll, whose Feast it is, that all may see to haue access to him; to which end the Citie gates are left open. But none may ⁴ approach vnto him empty-handed. They haue ⁵ a Feast of Watering celebrated in the old Citie, where the King, Queene, and his Children, with Rose-water sprinkle one another. And all the Capitaines likewise besprinkle each other, that they seeme as wet as if they came out of a River. It is said of the last King's Father, that when the people were thus washing, he would send amongst them an Elephant, which slew many of them, whereat he laughed; the people lamented. Another Feast ⁶ they haue, wherein they haue a trial of their Ships, which can saile best: this Feast lasteth a moneth. A fifth Feast ⁷ is called Guanosgienon, in honor of a certaine Idoll. They haue many other Feasts, but these the most solemn. Antony Correa a Portugall, concluding a league with the King of Pegu, the Kings Deputie, caused the Articles of accord, written in Portugall and Pegu-languages with golden Letters, to bee read aloud, and then rent the scrole, and with a few leaues of an odoriferous tree, caused the same to bee burned to ashes, vpon which hee laid both hands of the Priest, who in the Name of the King, sware to those Articles. These things being done with great attention and silence, Correa, loth in a superstitious fancie, to defile Holy Writ, with confirmation of an Oath to a Gentle, sware on a Booke of amarus Sonnets to keepe inuiolable the said Articles.

In the yeere of our Lord 1589. the King of Aua rebelling (as is before shewed) the King of Pegu, by single combat, slew the Traitor. The fight was on Elephants: in which, the Peguians Elephant, and the Aua Prince, died. The liuing Elephant was preferred to the place of the former; but in fiftene dayes space (let the beaillinesse of Men imitate the humantie of a beast) hee sorrowed so for his Master, that nothing might comfort him. And although hee had continually two seruants attending him, and telling him of his amended estate vnder a mightier Master, yet would hee scarce cease to weepe, or begin to eate, till his fiftene dayes exequies were finished.

Bomferrus, a Franciscan, spent three yeeres in learning the Pegu's Language, and Mysteries, that hee might preach the Christian Religion amongst them; but was soone forced to giue ouer, and returne into India: For they could not endure to heare any better Knowledge than they had. This was Anno 1557.

Crocodiles and Apes are accounted holy and sacred creatures: for which cause, Apes multiply exceedingly; none taking them, except for the vse of their Varellers, or Temples, where they tye them, and keepe them with diligent respect. And though the Crocodiles in the Towns ditch deuoure men daily, yet in a blind zeale they will drinke no other water, accounting this holy, and account their soules certainly sau'd, whose bodies are thus certainly lost and deuoured of those Beasts, which sometimes are thirtie foot in length: one of which, Bally saw draw in a woman; and not a day, but some were said to be deuoured, till the King caused one of those, which was offered to be most manslaying, to be slaine.

The Kings, subiect to the King of Pegu, did their homage, and presented themselves before him, kneeling; yea, they not only kneeled to him, but to his white Elephants also. When the King dyeth, they make two Ships, with golden couers, and betwixt them erect a golden Theatre, in which they place the corpse, applying thereto Musk, and the most sweet Woods, with other things; and so set forth the same to Sea, setting that Theatre or Pageant on fire. In one of the Ships of Tallapois, which sing till they rinke the bodie to be consumed to ashes. Then doe they make a masse of these ashes and milke, and commit the same to Sea in the Hauens of Sirian, at an ebbing water: The bones which remaine, they carrie to another place, and there erecting a Chappell, doe burie the same therein. After this, they returne to the Palace, and, according to the accustomed Rites, inaugurate the new King. The father of that King (whose Tragedie yee haue heard) had his bones buried in Dogon.

In Tamahy, or Langoma, (foue and twentie dayes iourney from Pegu) when the people be sicke, they make a vow, to offer meat vnto the Deuill, if they escape: and when they be recovered, they make a Banquet, with many Pipes and Drummes, and many other Instruments, and dancing all the night. Their friends bring them presents, Cocos, Figges, Avocates, and other Fruits; and with great dancing and reioicing, they offer to the Deuill, and say, They giue the Deuill to eate, and driue him out: and to this end, in their dancing, they crye and hallow very loud. Likewise, when they be sicke, a Tallapoie, or two, euery night doth sit by them, them, and sing, to please the Deuill, that hee should not hurt them. When one is dead, hee is carryed vpon a great Frame (as is said before of the Tallipoyes) made like a Tower, with a cowering all gilded, made of Canes, carried by fourteene or sixteene men, with great Minstrelse, to a place out of the Towne, and there is burned. He is accompanied with all his friends and neighbours, all Men: and they giue to the Tallipoyes, or Priests, many Mats and Cloth; and then returne to the house, where they staid it two dayes: which being expired, the Women accompanie the wife to the place where hee was burned, and there spend a while in mourning: Then doe they gather the pieces of bones, which bee left vnburied, and burie them, and then returne to their houses. The neere of kindred doe also shauie their heads, both men and women.

§. I.

Of Bengala.

He Kingdome of Bengala ^a is very large, and hath of Coast one hundred and twentie leagues, and as much within Land. Francis Fernandes measureth it from the Confines of the Kingdome of Ramu or Porto Grande to Palmatine, ninetie miles beyond Porto Pequeno, in all six hundred miles long. The Riuer Chaberis (which some call Guenga, and thinke to bee the ancient Ganges) watereth it: it is plentifull in Rice, Wheat, Sugar, Ginger, Long-pepper, Cotton and Silke; and enioyeth a very wholesome ayre. The Inhabitants neere the shoare, are (for the most part) Mahumetans, and so also was the King, before the Great Mogore (one likewise of his owne Sect) conquered Him, Gouro the scit Royall, and Bengala are faire Cities. Of this, the Gulfe, sometimes called Gangeticum, now beareth name Golfo di Bengala. Chatigan is also reckoned amongst their Cities. They are ^b a most subtil and wicked people, and are esteemed the worst slaues of all India: for that they are all Theeues; and the Women, Whores; although this fault is common through all India, no place excepted. They haue a custome, neuer to dresse or seeke meat twice in one pot, but haue euerie time a new one. Whensoever they are found in Adulterie, they haue their ^c Noses cut off, and are thence forwards narrowly looked to, that they keepe not each others company. The Portugalls haue here Porto Grande, and Porto Pequeno, but without Forts and Gouernments euery man liuing after his owne lust: and for the most part, they are such as dare not stay in their places of better Gouernment, for some wickednesse by them committed.

In Bengala are found great numbers of Abdus or Rhinoceroses, whose horne (growing vp from his snout) Teeth, Flesh, Blood, Clauies, and whatsoeuer he hath without and within his bodie, is good against poyson, and is much accounted of throughout all India. The skinn vpon ^d the upper part of this Beast, is all wrinkled, as if hee were armed with shields. It is a great enemy of the Elephant. Some thinke that this is the right Vnicorne, because as yet there is no other by late Trauellers found, but onely by heare-say. Onely Ladonicus Vertamannus ^e saith, he saw a couple of those other Vnicornes at Mecca; one whereof had a horne of three Cubits, being of the bignesse of a Colt of two yeeres and a halfe old; the other was much lesse: both sent to the Sultan of Mecca, for a rare present out of Ethiopia. Gesner in his Booke of Foure-footed Beasts, citeth this testimony, and some others, whereby he perswaded, that there are diuers sorts of these Vnicornes: but it cannot seeme otherwise then then our before; none of credit (that I haue heard) hath affirmed himselfe to haue seene this Vnicorne, but in picture. And in picture they haue lately abused M. T. Coryate, who writing that he saw Vnicornes at the Mogors or Mogols Court (which, as some that were there, told me, were Rhinoceroses) they haue published the same with picture of the Painters Vnicorne, with a long horne out of his forehead, whereas this groweth out of the middle of the Nose and is but short, the length of a mans hand being a large Hornes measure. That which is reported of their vertue against poyson, proceedeth from the hears which Bengala yeldeth: ^f 60 for in other places they are not neere the price of these. There are here also certain wild goats, whose hornes are in account against venome: as I my selfe (saith Linschoten) haue proved.

The Kings of Bengala, in times past, were chosen of the Abassine or Ethiopian Staues, as the Soldans of Cairo were sometime of the Circassian Mamelukes. Northward from Bengala lieth the Kingdome of Arracan, before mentioned. The great Cah subdued these parts and the Kingdome of Mien, about the yere 1272: while Marcus Paulus liued there, Arracan, Chandidan, and Siripur are by Fernandez placed in Bengala, as so many Kingdomes: Patane or Patenau by Fredericke and Fiteb reckoned to another Bengalan Kingdome; which our Country-man Master Fitch, calleth the Kingdome of Gouren: so that vnder this name, Bengala, are comprehended many Seignioties; all, or the most part now subiect to the Mogor.

§. II.

Of Ganges, and the Superstitions there observed.

VE Maps seeme not to describe the Riuer Ganges (so will wee here terme it with Orelins, Castaldus, Barrius, and all our later Travellers, both Merchants and Iesuites) according to the due course thereof. For Chaberis they bring from the North, enclining to the East, Guenga from the West; but Master Fitch, which continued five months in passing downe first in Iamena from Agra, which falleth into Ganges, and then in Ganges it selfe to Bengala (although he confesseth it may be done in shorter time) saith, it cometh from the North-west, and runneth East into the Sea. Some call Chaberis, Ganges; and some hold Guenga to be Ganges; and some make but one Riuer of them both: and hence may happily arise in part, that seeking of Ganges so farre off. Both Ganga and Ganges are in sacred account (saith S. Barros) and therefore the Mahometan Kings, will not suffer the superstitious washing of the Ethnikes therein without a Customs or Imposition.

There is in Ganges a place called Gongasagie, that is, the entrie of the Sea, in which are many Fishes called Sea-Dogs. They which are weary of this World, and desire to haue a quicke passage to Paradise, cast in themselues here to bee deuoured of these Fishes; persuading themselves, that the next and readie way thither, is by their jaws.

h. Bally, cap. 43.

Ganges overflowing his bankes, in times past drowned many Villages, which so remaine; and hath changed his wonted channell: the cause that Tanda (a Citie of trafficke, where the people goe naked to the waste) standeth now a league from the Riuer. It waereth a fruitfull Countrey and populous, and (as the Oceans high Collector) receiueeth into him many Riuers by the way, some no lesse then it selfe, so that in the time of raine, you cannot see from the one side of Ganges to the other. The superstitious opinion conceived in those parts, of this Riuer, appeareth by the reports of all. Emanuel Pinner at Cambaia observed many to resort thither on Pilgrimage, sometime out of that Citie foure thousand; and was told by the Governour of Bengala, vnder the Mogor then at Lahor, that there came thither sometime three hundred thousand, or foure hundred thousand Pilgrims. And adde, That not long before his coming to Cambaia there assembled there, to this deuout iourney, fiftie thousand people. Happy they esteeme that man which washeth himselfe therein, and secure of saluation, if at the point of death hee may drinke of this water. Hee conferred with one Gedacham, a great man, which had been on this holy voyage, and had there weighed his Mother three times; first, by her weight in Silver; secondly, in Gold; thirdly, in Pearles; all which he gave to the poore. A brother of his, called Ran, being to goe to the great Mogor, offered one hundred and fiftie thousand Pardans, that his Pagodi or Idols should send him good successe. They make an Image also to this Riuer, whereunto they doe diuine honor. The King of Calecut, and the other Kings of Malabar keepe a solemne feast euery twelve yeeres, in honor of this Riuer; because that long since a certaine Brachmane falsely accused vnto Ganges, & there led an austere life twelve yeeres, worshipping that Stream and his Idoll, to whom, when hee purposed to returne home, after those twelve yeeres expired, that Image of Ganges appeared, and said, That on the last day of February he would appear in a Riuer of his owne Countrey, and cause the Waters thereof to arise, and run backward in witness of his innocencie, and bade him assemble all the Lords of Malabar to the sight, which accordingly came to passe, and the memorie thereof is by this Feast solemnized.

Banaras is a great Towne on Ganges, to which the Gentiles out of farre Countries come on Pilgrimage. The men are shauen all but the crowne. Alongst the water-side are many faire Houses, in which stand Images of euill fauor, made of stone, and wood, like Leopards, Lyons, Monkeys, Men, Women, Peacocks, and Devils, with foure armes and hands, sitting close-legged, and holding somewhat in their hands. There are diuers old men, which on places of earth, made for that purpose, sit praying, and they giue the people (which by breake of day, and before, come out of the Towne, to wash themselves in Ganges 3 three or foure straws which they take, and hold them between their fingers where they wash themselves: and some fit to make them in the foreheads, and they haue in a cloth a little Rice, Barley, or Money, which they giue to these old men. After that, they goe to diuers of their Images, and giue them of their sacrifices, those old men in the meane while praying; which maketh all holy. They haue one Idoll called Ada, with foure hands and clawes. On certaine great carued stones also they powre Water, Rice, Wheat, &c. They haue a great place like a Well, with steps to goe downe, wherein the water standeth foule, and stinketh, by reason of those many flowers, which they continually throw there into. Many people are alwayes therein, with imagination of pardon for their sinnes, because GOD (as they blaspheme) washed himselfe therein. They gather vp the Sand in the bottome, as a holy Relike. They pray not but in the water, and wash themselves ouer-head, lading vp water with both their hands, and turne themselves about, and then drinke a little of the water three times, after which they go to their gods in their houses. Some of them will wash a place which is their length, and then pray vpon the earth, with their armes and legs at length out, and will rise vp and lye downe, and kisse the ground twentie or thirtie times, but wil not stirre their right foot. Some vse fiftene or sixtene Pots, little and great, ringing a Bell, while they make their mixtures, ten or twelue times; and make a circle of water about their Pots, and pray: others sitting by, one of which reacheth them their Pots. They say ouer these Pots diuers things 20 many times, which done, they goe to their gods and firew their Sacrifices, which they thinke are very holy, and make many of them, which sit by, in their foreheads, esteemed as a great gift. There come fiftie, and sometime an hundred together, to this Well, and to these Idols.

About their Idols, in some houses, sitteth one in warme weather, to blow the winde with a Fan vpon them. And when they see any company comming, they ring a little Bell, and many giue them their almes. None of these Idols haue a good face. Some are blacke, and haue clawes of brasse; and some ride on Peacocks or other Fowles. One there is alwayes attended with his Fan, to make winde, which (they say) giueth them all things, both food and rayment. Here some are burned to ashes, some scorched in the fire, and throwne into the water, when they are dead: the Foxes presently eat them. The Wiues doe burne with their Husband when they dye: if they will not, their heads are shauen, and neuer any account is made of them after. If a Man or Woman be sicke, and like to die, they will lay him before their Idols all night: and that shall mend or end him. And if hee doe not mend, that night his friends will come and sit a little with him, and crie, and after will carrie him to the water side, and set him vpon a little raft made of reeds, and so let him goe downe the Riuer. The chiefe Idols are very cuill-fauoured, their mouthes monstrous, their eares gilded, and full of Jewels, their teeth and eyes of gold, silver, glasse, coloured blacke, with Lampes continually burning before them. Into their Houses or Temples you may not enter, with your shooes on. When the scorched Indians are throwne into Ganges, the Men swim with their faces downwards, the Women with their faces vpwards; which I had thought they had by some meanes 40 caused but they denied it. The people goe all naked, with a little cloth about their middle. Their Women are exceedingly on their necks, armes, and eares, decked with Rings of Silver, Copper, Tinne, and Iuorie hoopcs: they are marked with a great spot of red in their foreheads, and a stroke of red vp to the crowne, and so it runneth three wayes. Their marriages are in this sort: The Man and the Woman come to the water-side, where standeth a Bramane or Priest, with a Cow and a Calfe, or a Cow with Calfe: these all goe into the Water together, the Bramane holding a white cloth of foure yards long, and a basket crosse bound with diuers things in it. This cloth he layeth vpon the backe of the Cow. And then he taketh the Cow by the tayle, and saith certaine words. Shee hath a Copper or a Brasse pot-full of water. The man holdeth his hand by the Bramans hand, and the wiues hand by her husbands, and all haue the Cow by the tayle. Then they powre water out of the pot vpon the Coves 50 taile, which runneth thorow all their hands, and they lade vp water with their hands, and then the Brachmane tyeth their clothes together. After this, they goe round about the Cow and Calfe, and giue some what to the poore there attending, leauing the Cow and Calfe for the Bramans vse, and offer to diuers of their Idols moony: then lying downe vpon the ground, they kisse it diuers times, and goe their way. Betwene this and Patanaw are diuers 1 hecuer, like the Arabians, without certaine abode.

Of Patane, Couche, Orix, Botanier, Candean.

PATANE or Patanaw is a great Towne and long, with large streets, simple houses of earth, couered with chatch, the people tall and slender, many old; sometimes a Kingdome, now subiect to the Mogor. They haue gold, which (as in America) they dig out of the Pits, and wash the Earth in great Bolls. The Women here are so decked with Siluer and Copper, that it is strange to see, and by reason of such Rings vpon their Toes, they can weare no shoes. Here I saw a dissembling Prophet, which sat vpon an Horse in the Market-place, and made as though hee slept, and many of the people came and touched his feet with their hands, and then kissed their hands. They tooke him for a Great Man, but I saw he was a lazie Lubber: and there I left him sleeping. The people here, are great Praters and Dissemblers. As I came from Agra downe the River Iemena, I saw also many naked Beggars, of which the people make great account; they call them Schische. Here I saw one, which was a monster among the rest, wearing nothing on him, with a long beard, the haire of his head couering his priuities. The nayles of some of his fingers were two laches long: for he would cut nothing from him. Neither would he speake, but was accompanied with eight or ten which spake for him. When any man spake to him, hee would lay his hand vpon his breast, and bow himselfe, but speake he would not to the King. The King of Patanaw was Lord of the greatest part of Bengala, vntill the Mogoll slue their last King. After which twelue of them ioyned in a kinde of Aristocratie and vanquished the Mogolls (it seemes this was in the time of Emmampaxda) and still notwithstanding the Mogolls Greatnesse, are great Lords; specially he of Siripur, and of Candean, and about all Almaafudalim. Nine of them are Mahumetans. Thus Fernandes. These Pataneans seeme by the Iesuites report to come of the Tartars.

In those parts they had many strange Ceremonies. Their Bramans or Priests come to the Water, and haue a string about their necks made with great Ceremonies, and lade vp Water with both their hands, and turne the string first with their armes within, and then one arme after the other out. Here also about Iemena, the Gentiles will eate no flesh, nor kill any thing. They pray in the Water naked, and dresse their meate and eate it naked: and for their penance they lye flat vpon the earth, and rise vp and turne themselves about thirtie or fortie times, and vie to heaue vp their hands to the Sunne, and to kisse the earth, with their armes and legs stretched out along, their right leg being alwayes before the left. Euery time they lye downe, they score it with their fingers, to know when their stint is ended. The Bramans marke themselves in their foreheads, eares, and throats, with a kinde of yellow geare which they grinde; euery morning they doe it. And they haue some old men which goe in the streets with a boxe of yellow powder, and marke them which they meet on their heads and necks. And their Wiues doe come, ten, twentie, and thirtie together to the water-side, singing, and there doe wash themselves, and vie their ceremonies, and marke themselves on the fore-heads and faces, and carry some with them, and so depart singing. Their Daughters bee married, at, or before the age of ten yeeres. The men may haue seuen wiues. They are a craftie People, worse then the Iewes. The way from Bannaras to Patanaw is a faire and fertile Countrey, beautified with many faire Townes.

I went from Bengala into the Countrey of Couche, which lieth fise and twentie dayes iourney Northwards from Tanda. The King was a Gentile, named Suckel Conste: his Countrey is great, and lyeth not farre from Cauchin-China. All the Countrey is set with Canes made sharpe at both ends, and driuen into the Earth; and they can let in the water, and drowne the Countrey knee-deepe. In time of Warre they poyson all the waters. The people haue eares which be marvellous great, of a span long, which they draw out in length by deuices when they bee young. They are all Gentiles, and will kill nothing. They haue Hospitals for Sheepe, Dogs, Goats, Cats, Birds, and all other liuing Creatures. When they be old and lame, they keepe them till they dye. If a man catch or buy any quick thing in other places, and bring it thither, they will giue him mofy for it, or other victuals, and keepe it in their Hospitals, or let it go. They will giue meat to the Ants. Their small money is Almonds, which oftentimes they eat. We passed thorow the Countrey of Gouren, where we found but few villages, and almost all Wildernesse (for wee chose this Desert way for feare of theutes) and saw many Buffes, Swine, and Deere: grasse longer then a man, and very many Tyges.

Orix is the next Countrey, which hath bene a Kingdome, but conquered by the King of Patanaw, and both since, by Echebar. Orix stands fixe dayes South west from Satagan. There is much Rice, cloch of Cotton, and cloth made of grasse, called Yerus like silke. (They speake speake of the like in Virginia.) Through this Kingdome (Fredericke writes) a man might have gone with Gold in his hand without danger, while the old King reigned, who so befriended Merchants that he tooke no custome of them. And there were laden in the Port of Orisa yearly, five and twentie or thirtie Ships, with Rice, Lacca, long Pepper, Ginger, Mirabolins, and the Yerca afore said, made of an herbe growing in the Woods wild, then gathered when the boll is growne round, as bigge as an Orange. In the Hauen of Angeli are yearly many Ships laden with many kindes of commodities. Satagam is a faire Citie (for a Citie of Moores) and very plentifull, sometime subiect to Patanaw. In Bengala such is the estimation of Ganges, that they will fetch of it a great way off, though they haue good water neere; and if they haue not sufficient to drinke, they will sprinkle a little on them, and then they are well. From Satagam I travelled by the Countrey of the King of Tippara, with whom the Mogor hath continuall warre. The Mogores, which be of the Kingdome of Recon and Rame, be stronger then this King of Tippara. Foure dayes journey from Couche is Botanter, and the Citie Bottia: the King is called Dermaine: the People are tall and strong; the Countrey great, three moneths journey, and hath in it high Mountaines, one of which a man may see, fixe dayes journey off: Vpon these Mountaines are people with eares of a span long; otherwise they account them Apes. Hither resort many Merchants out of China, and Tartaria. From Chatipan in Bengala, I went to Bacola, the King whereof is a Gentile; thence to Senepare, and after, to Simergan, where they will eate no flesh, nor kill no beast; and thence to Negrais in Pegu and Colmin. Thus farre hath our Countrey-man led vs in the view of so many superstitions of these Bengalans, and their Northeily Neighbours.

p. Histor. Relat.
Mogor.

In that part of Botanter, which is next to Lahor, and the Mogor, the People are white, and Gentiles. Their garments are close girt to them, that a wrinkle or pleit is not to be seene, which they neuer put off, no not when they sleepe, as long as they are able to hang on: their head attyre is like a Sugar-loafe, sharpe at the top. They neuer wash their hands, lest, say they, so pure a Creature, as the Water, should be defiled. They haue but one Wife; and when they haue two or three children, they liue as brother & sister. Widowers and widowes may not marry a second time. They haue no Idols, nor Townes, nor King, in those parts of Botanter. They haue their Sooth-sayers, which they aske counsell of. When any is dead, they resort vnto these Wisards, to know what is to be done with their dead. They searce their Bookes; and as they say the word, they burne them, or bury them, or eate them, although they usually feed not on mans flesh. They also vse dead mens skulls in stead of dishes, as in Tibet, we haue obserued the like custome. They are liberall Almes-giuers. They liue on Weauing and making Clothes, which they sell at Calamur and Negariot in Summer, for in their Winter they cannot passe for Snowes. They are like in colour and haire to men of these parts.

q. Lingbat.

The Bengalans have a Tradition or Fable amongst them, That this Riuer cometh out of Paradise, which was proued by one of their Kings, who sent men vp the streame, till they came to a pleasant Ayre, still Water, and fragrant Earth, and could row no further. Hence happily grew this conceit, That this Water should wash away sinne, and that without it they cannot be saued. This Riuer hath in it Crocodiles, which by water are no lesse dangerous then the Tygres by land, and both will assaile men in their Ships. There is also a little small Beast, which by his barking maketh the Tyger to run away.

r. N. Piment.

The King of Candecan (which lyeth at the mouth of Ganges) caused a Iesuite to hearse the Desalogue: who when he reproued the Indians for their polytheisme, worshipping so many Pagodes: Hee said, That they obserued them but as, among them, their Saints were worshipped: to whom how fauourly the Iesuites distinction of Sakia and Nurpia was for his satisfaction, I leaue to the Readers iudgement. This King, and the others of Bacala and Arracan, haue admitted the Iesuites into their Countreys, and most of these Indian Nations.

§. IIIL.

ca. Frederick.

Betwixt the King of Arracan and the Portugals haue beene late warres, not vnworthy Relation, because they serue for better knowledge of all the Countreys adiacent. The King of Arracan or Rachim (so Fredericke calls it) had giuen to Philip de Britto the keeping of Syrian, as before is exprest, which he fortifying, became suspicious to the King: this was one cause of war; and another the Portugals surprisall of the Ile Sundiua, fixe leagues distant from the Continent of Bengala, ouer-against Siripur. This Iland, Fredericke admires for the cheapnesse and plentie of necessaries, where he bought two salted Kine for a Larine, which is twelue shillings and fixe pence, very good and fat; foure wilde wilde Hogs readie dressed at the same price ; a fat Hen for a peny (and yet the People said they paid twice the worth) & other commodities at like price. It belonged to the Kingdome of Bengala ; distant a hundred and twentie miles from Chatigan , the people Moores. It is thirtie leagues in compass , so strong by Nature , that they may hinder any from landing.

Two hundred Ships are yearly laden from hence with salt. The Mogols with the Conquest of Bengala had possessed Sundiua , Cada-ragi still continuing his Title , vnder colour whereof Carnalius and Mamu two Portugals conquered it, An. 1602. Heereat the King of Arracan was angry , that without his leaue they had made themselves Lords of that which hee challenged to belong to his protection ; fearing that by this meanes , and the fortification of Sirian , he should finde the Portugals vn-neighbourly Neighbours. Hee sent therefore a Fleet of a hundred and fiftie Frigats or little p Galleys , with fiftene Oares on a side , and other q greater furnished with Ordnance : and Cadaray (which they say was true Lord of) sent a hundred Cosli from Siripur to helpe Him. The Portugals prevailed and became Masters of a hundred and nine and fortie of the Eoemies Vessels.

In this time Britto had built his Fort at Sirian , and founded a Towne for the dispersed Peguans , which had here assembled to the number of 15000. The Saracens enuying heereat , That for the Mogol would swallow all (Manasingua the Gouvernour of Bengala having promised to King Achebar to bring Him the White Elephant in Arracan) adding great gifts to the King and his Councillors. At the same time a Peguan Bagna (that is , a Great Man or Ruler) by the Kings Command and Letters commendatorie to Britto kept in Pegu ; But Britto fearing the Peguans would cleave to their Countrey-man , An. 1603. besieged and taketh his Fortresse , slayeth three hundred of his Companie , Captiur'g nine hundred. Whereupon the Peguans which had followed him revolted to Britto , viz. two hundred Ships r , twentie Horses , and great store of prouision , with the Haruest which the Bagna had sowne , then on the ground. Hee with fiftene of his Company escaped ; perhaps the same which before out of Floris wee have mentioned. Britto now grew great , and in the Portugall name made League with the Kings of Tangu , Iangoma , Siam , and Prom , for their ioynt ayde against Arracan , if he should be besieged. He went also to Goa to acknowledge fealtie to the Crowne of Portugall for the Kingdome of Pegu , whence he brought with him sixteen Gallies , and three hundred Portugals : to the defence of Sirian , with which and a hundred others of the Portugals (threecore at Sundiua ; thirrie at Arracan , and ten at Chatigan) he easily thought to become Master of those Seas. A matter of great consequence , where they might have all matter for shipping (which caused the Great Turke once to provide here , at an easier charge carried from hence to Sues , then from Alexandria) and here they might both build their Fleets , and be furnished of sustenance , might send at any time to all places in the South (which from Goa cannot be done but with the Monsons) and might cause that no Ship of Moores should lade Pepper , Cinamon , or other commodities at Martauan , Reitau , Iuncalao , Tanasserin , and Queda , for Surat or Mecca , but with custome to them and passe from them.

The King of Arracan foreseeing such a storme , provided a Naue of a thousand saile , the most Frigats ; some Greater , Catures and Cosles , and assailed the Portugall Fleet at Sundiua vnder Carnalius , who had but sixteene of diuers sorts of shipping which staid by him , and yet got the victorie , nere two thousand of the Enemies being slaine , a hundred and thirrie of their Vessels burnt , with the losse but of six Portugals. Which so vexed the King of Arracan , that he put many of the Captaines in Womens habit , vpbraiding their effeminate courages , which had not brought one Portugall with them aliuie or dead. Yet were the Portugall Ships so many , that they were forced for feare of another tempest , to forsake the land , and to transport that which there they had to Siripur , Bacala , and Chandecan in the Continent , and thus Sundiua became subiect to Arracan : Carnalius staid at Siripur (where he had thirte fusts or Frigates) with Cadary Lord of the place , where he was suddenly assaulted with one hundred Cosles , sent by Manasingua Gouvernour under the Mogol , who hauing subiected that Tract to his Master , sent forth this Naue against Cadaray , Mandaray a man famous in those parts being Admirall : where after a bloudie fight Mandaray was slain , & Carnalius carried away the honor. From thence , recovering of a wound in the late fight , He went to Golin or Gullum , a Portugall Colony vp the streame from Porto Pequino , where hee won a Castle of the Mogors kept by foure hundred men , one of that company onely escaping. These exploits made Carnalius his Name terrible to the Bengalans , inasmuch that one of the Arracans , Combander of fiftie Arracan Ships , dreaming in the night that hee was assaulted by Carnalius terrified his fellowes , and made them flee into the Riuer ; which when the King heard , colt him his head.

But this Day had an end , and this Sun was set in a Cloud , For whiles the King of Arracan having lately achieved to great matters in Pegu, and added Sundiua, and the Kingdome of Baccala, intended to annex Chandecan to the rest of his Conquests: the King of Chandecan thought to purchase his peace with Carnalius his head; which hee treacherously accomplished, sending for Him, that they might ioyne together against Arracan, and watching his oportunitie, tooke Him in his Palace with others of his companie, after that inuading and spoyling his ship.

Britto remayned in his Fort at Sirian, against whom in the yeere 1604. the King of Arracan sent a flecte of five hundred Frigats, and fortie Catars, vnder the conduct of his eldest sonne, with fiftene thousand men. The Portugals had eight ships well provided, and one hundred and eights Souldiers in the Fort. Neere to Negrais the Armadas met, the Portugall obtaining the victorie, slaying and drowning almost one thousand of the enemies. This at Sea; and waiting a better oportunitie in the Riuer, they left not one Vessell to carrie nywes thereof to Arracan. The Prince with his Souldiers fought to returne by land, but Penurie pursued him, separated his companie, and betrayed Him to two hundred and fiftie Portugals and Peguans, which to these Straights had added the locall Straights of a certaine passage, where the Prince with some of the chiefe yeelded; redeemed at a great summe, (as before is mentioned) and couenants of Peace on both sides ratified by Oath. One of the Articles was the deliuerie of Sundiua, for the performance of which Britto sent his sonne Marke with two Captaines to take possession, which all were treacherously dispossessed of their liues, and three thousand Portugals captiued. Hee prepares for a new 20 siege, but in the midst of these designs, that part of his Palace where the white Elephant stood, and his chiefe Oratorie were fired with lightning: which some Talipois interpreting of Diuine vengeance for breach of Oath, went to the King, and told him these things prelagged further disasters. It so presaged indeed to Them, who for this preface were presently, to the number of thirtie of the chiefe of them slaine. Twelue hundred ships (so we call them all by a generall name, though not comparable, for the most part, to our European) the King of Arracan set forth in this new expedition; of which seuenate five were of greater burthen, each hauing twelue Peeces of Ordnance, and well furnished; the rest Fusts, or Frigates. In this Flecte were thirtie thousand Souldiers and Sea-men, Patana- 30 men, Persians, and Malabars; of them eight thousand with Hand-gunnies, and three thousand five hundred greater Peeces of diuers sorts. The King himselfe, his sonne, and best Souldiers, were therein, accompanied with the King of Chocor. Britto sent forth that Naue which hee had (but twelue ships in all) vnder the command of Paulus Regius, a famous Sea-Captaine; which meeting them at the Cape of Negrais, the Admirall of Arracan, Marucha, was with his Fust, taken and slaine: and the Night parted the Fight, or rather renewed the Fight; many of the Arracan ships mistaking and warring vpon their fellows, to the losse of diuers ships, and (in the whole fight) of almost two thousand men. Four days after, the fourth of Aprill, they encountered the second time, and the Portugall Admirall ranne her selfe vpon pyles vnder the water; whence shee could not bee freed: and when another Portugall ship came to relieue them, Rhegius would not bee 40 perswaded to flirre, till fire entring the Gunners roome, blew vp him and his companie, and the other Captaine, which moued him to remoue. The Portugall ships betooke them to their Fort: whither the King of Tangu had sent his sonne, with sixe hundred Horse, eightene Elephants, and fixteene thousand Men, to besiege it. But both these and the Arracan forces doing their utmost, in May following were forced to depart without effect, leauing the Towne and Fort in a deformed case, and most of the people wounded. Yet greater was Arracans losse: onely twelue greater, and two hundred and fiftie 50 lesser of those twelue hundred ships remayning, the rest drowned, forsaken, or burnt, partly by the Portugals, partly by themselves wanting men to guide them. Most of the Ordnance they buried in the Sands. Ten thousand men they lost in the siege. The Portugals lost of their Nation (besides helpees) eightie sixe, ten Captaines, and the Admirall. The next yeere their Fort was fired, and their dwelling Houses; Temple, Household, and Provision. Britto himselfe escaped hardly with his wife. His courage yet remayned, and resolved to build it in an higher and stronger place. Easily had Arracan with this advantage effected his designs, had not the Portugals elsewhere molested him, and taken Dianaga. And thus farre haue wee followed the Iesuite Iarrie, in these Arracan affaires: If with iarring from truth in any place, I haue named my Author, nor can accuse, or excuse him. Further he cannot guide vs.

CHAP. VII.

§. I.

Of the Mogors Countreys and of; MELABDIN ECHESAR.

THe Great Mogor (according to Boterus) hath vnder his subiection seuen and fortie Kingdomes, which lie betweene Indus and Ganges on the East and West, and betwixt ^a Imaus and the Ocean, contayning all that which the Ancients called India intra Gangem, or India Citerior. Hee is called of the people the Great Mogor, for the same cause that the Ottoman-Turkes are called Great. The stile of him that was King ^b, when the Iesuites imparted to vs these Relations, was Mahumeth Zelabdim Echegar, King Mogor, or Mogoll; for so they call him in the Countrey, and not Mogor, as the Iesuites. This Mogoll seemes to argue their Tartarian Originall from the Moai Tartars; of which, see our Tartarian Relations. The true Mogors, or Mogols, liue on the hither side of Indus, in the Kingdome of Quabul, or Cabul, which is vnder the brother of Echegar; against whom, Anno 1582. hee led a strong Armie, in which the Iesuites say, were fise thousand Elephants armed. These wear plate of Iron on their foreheads, carrie foure Archers, or else foure Gunners, with great Peeces; and goe not before the Armie, lest they should hinder their sight, or (being hurt) disturbe the ranks; and therefore are set in the Rere, a Sword bound to their trunk, and Daggers fastened to their great teeth. King Echegar was borne in the Prouince of Changuata, which hath Indostan on the South, Persia on the West, the Tartars East. Their Language is Turkish; but the Courtiers to this day speake Persian. Baburza his grand-father chaled the Parthians vnto Bengala, before possessors of the Region of the Mogors; after whose death, the Parthians, or (as they are now called Pataneans, of Patanaa before mentioned) recovered themselves, and warred on his sonne. Their descent is from ^c Tamerlan, whose third sonne was Mironcha, grandfather to Abusayd, who slue Abdula; successor to Abdelatif which had slaine Olegbek, the sonne and successor of Mirzab Charrak, the fourth sonne and first successor of Tamerlan. Sultan Hamed, sonne of Abusayd, obtayned Maurenahar, and after him Babor his sonne, which in the yeere 1500. was dispossessed by the Vsbechs, yet still possessed Gaznehen, and some parts of India; succeeded by his sonne Hemayen, the father of this Achabar. Thus Merkend. The Iesuites say, they are Parthians, descended of Cingis (therefore rather to be called Tartars;) Achabars grandfather they call Baburza, which by his sword entred Induttan, and chased those Tartars into Bengala. But they againe preuailed after his death: in somuch, that Achabars father Emmanpaxda (as the Iesuites report) being driuen to great straights by the Parthians, Tartars, or Pataneans, was driuen to aske aide of the Sophi, or Persian King; which he obtained, with condition of submitting himselfe to the Persian Religion. The Mogors speake the Turkish language. The Empire of this Mogor is exceeding great, contayning the Countreys of Bengala, Cambaya, Mendao, and others, comprehended by some vnder the name of Induttan. This Mendao is said to be tenleagues in circuit, and that it ^d cost the Mogor twelue yeeres siege. Agra and Fatipore are two Cities in his Dominion, great, and full of people, much exceeding London; and the whole space betweene, is as a continuall populous Market. Many Kings he hath conquered, and many haue submitted themselves and their States voluntarily to his subiection. Twentie Gentile Kings are numbred ^e in his Court, which attend him, equalling the King of Calcut in power. Many others pay him tribute. In his Countreys are many Spices, Pepper, Ginger, Cassia, and others: many precious Stones, Pearles, Merals of all sorts, Silkes, Cotton, Horfe, and other Commodities, which yeld enlarged, Eleuen great Riueres run through his Dominions: Taphi, Haruada, Chambel, Iamena, Ganges: the other fixe, are Indus, or Schind (as they call it) and Caramul, Cebucha, Ray, Chenaou, Rebeth, tributaries to Indus. The whole Mourarchie enuironeth nine hundred

hundred leagues. King Ecebar hath many Lords; each of which is to maintaine eight, ten, twelve, or fourteene thousand Horse in readinesse for the warre, besides Elephants; of which, in the whole Kingdome are said to bee fiftie thousand. Himselfe can further bring of his owne into the Field fiftie thousand Horse, and Foot-men innumerable. To those Lords hee alloweth certaine Prouinces, for such Militarie seruice; for hee is Lord of all: nor hath any else possession of any thing, but at the will of the King. Once a yeere they appeare before the King, where they present a view of those their enioyned Forces. Many millions of Reuenue doe besides accrew vnto his Coffers: yet his Port and Magnificence is not so great, as of many other Princes, eyther for Apparell, Diet, or the Maiestie of his Court-seruice. Hee cannot write or reade, but heareth often the Disputations of others, and Histories read before him, being of deepe iudgement, piercing wit, and wise fore-cast. In execution of Iustice hee is very diligent; in somuch, that in the Citie where hee resideth, he heareth all Causes himselfe: neither is any malefactor punished without his knowledge; himselfe giuing publike Audience twice every day: For which purpose, he hath two wide Halls, or rather open Courts, and in them Royall Thrones, where hee is attended with eight Councillors, besides Notaries. Yet doth hee stand, and not sit: and at other times sit on Carpets, after the Turkish manner, notwithstanding his Chayre of Estate standing by. He hath twelve Learned men alway about him, which ordinarily reason and dispute in his presence, or relate Histories. Hee is a curious discouerer of all Sects. Hee is both Affable, and Maiestically Mercifull, and severe; delights himselfe in diuers Games, as fights of Buffals, Cockes, Harts, Rammes, Elephants; Wrestlers, Fencers, Dances, Comedies, and in the Dances of Elephants and Camels, thereto instructed. In the midst of these Spectacles he dispatcheth serious affaires. He delights in Hunting, vsing the Panther to take wild Beasts, Hunting Dogs hee had none. They vse tame Harts to take the wild, with Nets fastened to their hornes; wherewith they intangle the other. When hee goes to warre, hee will cause a whole Wood to bee round beset with men, hand in hand; sending others in, which raise the Beasts, and driue them into the others armes; which, if they let them goe, are punished, to make sport that way. He was skilfull in diuers Mechanical Trades; as, making of Gunnes, casting of Ordnance, hauing his Worke-house in the Palace for that purpose. But we haue obserued, that this is common to all Mahumetan Priests and Princes, the Great Turke, yea, the Great Chalfa himselfe (as Tudelensis writes of his Times) praefising some Mechanical Mysterie, Theeues and Pyrates He punished with losse of the hand; Murderers, Adulterers, Robbers by the high way, with empaling, hanging, or other deaths; not executed, till the Sentence had bene thrice pronounced: Loued and feared of his Owne; Terrible to his Enemies; Affable to the Vulgar; seeming to grace them and their Presents, with more respectiue Ceremonies then the Grandes; of sparing Dyet, scarce eating Flesh aboue foure times in the yeere, but feeding by Rice, Whit-meats, and Elecuiaries; sleeping but three houres in the night; curiously industrious.

This King detesteth the Mahumetan Sect, which, as you heard, his Father embraced for his aduantage; and therefore hath ouerthrowne their Moschees in his Kingdome, razing the Steeples, and conuerting the rest to Stables, and more trusteth and employeth the Gentiles in his affaires then the Moores: whereupon many of them rebelled against him, and stirred vp the Prince of Quasul, his Brother, to take Armes against whom Ecebar opposed himselfe (as is said) and caused him to retire into his owne Countrey. It is vncertaine what Religion hee is of, some affirming him to bee a Moor, some a Gentile, some a Christian, some of a fourth Sect, and of none of the former. Indeed it appeareth that hee wauereth, vncertaine which way of many to take, able to see the absurdities of the Arabian and Gentile professions, and not able to belecue the high mysteries of the Christian Faith, especially the Trinitie and Incarnation. Hee hath admitted the Iesuites there to preach, and would haue had them by miracle to haue proued those things to him, which they elsewhere so much boasting of Miracles) wisely refused. For hee demanded that the Mulla's, or Priests of the Mogores, and they, should by passing thorow the fire, make tryall of their Faith. Hee hath many Bookes and Images, which the Christians there doe vse, and seemeth to haue great liking to them, vsing the same with great reuerence. But his Religion is the same (it seemeth) with that of Tamerlane his predecessor, to acknowledge One God, whom varietie of Sects and Worshippings should best content. Hee caused e thirtie Infants to bee kept (like that which is said of Psammethichus, King of Egypt) setting certaine to watch and obserue, that neither their Nurles, nor any else, should speake vnto them, purposing to addicth himselfe to that Religion which they should embrace, whose Language these Infants should speake; which accordingly came to passe. For as they spake no certaine Language, so hee is not hee settled in any certaine Religion. Hee hath diuers Idols sometime brought before him: among which, is one of the Suane; which early euery morning, and three other times a day, d The vncertaine of his Religion, partly tells of reports amongst the Portugals, of the conuersion of this King, and of the Kingdome of China also to Christianity: both with like truth, and fitting Popish reports.

day, at noone, eueing, and in the night, he worshippeth. He worshipped also the Image of CHRIST, and our LADY, which hee set on the crowne of his head, and wore Reliques about him. He is addicted to anew Sect, as is said, wherein he hath his followers, which hold him for a Prophet. The profit which they haue by his gold, addiceth them to this new Prophet. Hee professeth to worke Miracles; by the water of his feet curing diseases. Many Women make Vowes vnto him, either to obtaine children, or to recouer the health of their children; which if they attaine, they bring him their vowed Deuotions, willingly of him receiued: yea, euery morning, as he worshipped the Sunne, so he delighted to be worshipped himselfe of the people: to whom hee made shew of himselfe at a window; and they kneeling, performed like Ceremonie to him, as to their Idols: and he was thought to entertaine men skillfull in diuers Sects and Religions, that of euery one he might take somewhat to the constitution of a new one. He hath three sonnes; Selec the eldest, which is honoured with the title Gio, and called Seiecgio, that is, the Soule, or Person, of Seiee; he much fauoureth the Iesuites: the second, Pahari: Dan, or Daniel, is the youngest. Some call them by other names. His Presents are exceeding, besides his Tributes and Customes. Hee mentions One, which in their presence offered him Vassalage, and withall a Present, valued at two hundred thousand crownes and more; a Horse with furniture of Gold and Jewels; two Swords, and the Girdles of like worke; Camels, Carpets, &c. taking himselfe dignified in the acceptation of his Present. Himselfe after often bowings, and touching the ground with his head, comming neerer, was searched, whether hee had any weapons, and then was admitted to touch his foot, Echebar laying his hand on his necke, and allowing him to stand with his other Nobles. The Kings sonne, Sultran Morad, at the same time offered a Present of fiftie Elephants, worth a hundred and fiftie thousand Duckats; one Chariot of Gold, another of Silver, others of Mother of Pearle, with other things of great value. The Vice-Roy, or Gouverneur of Bengala, followed with another Present, esteemed worth eight hundred thousand Duckats, viz. three hundred Elephants. Almost dayly hee receiueth such Presents, especially at a certaine Feast, called Nerofa; in which, one Great Man was thought to present him with nere the worth of one Million of Gold.

Of the Conquests and death of Echebar, and of his Sonne and Successour SEELIN, now reigning.

Vr Relations of Echebar or Achebar, his Rites Humane and Diuine, as also of his Possessions and Greatnesse, we haue already seemed long; yet cannot be so satisfied, without further satisfaction to the Reader, if he be (such as he of whom we write) curious and desirous to know remote Affaires and farre distant Occurrences. Great Echebar added vnto that Greatnesse which his Father left him, the Kingdome of Caxemir, of Sinda, of Guzzarat, of Xifchandan, and a great part of Decan, with all the Tract of Bengala. Such was his felicitie, that it grew into a Prouerbe, As happie at Echebar; seldom attempting any thing, without prosperous successe: I speake of worldly happinesse. Euen in Natures treasures hee was rich, both Wit and Memory: this so happie, that of many thousands of Elephants which hee had, hee knew the names; yea, of his Horses (to each of which hee gaue names) of his wilde Beasts and Harts, that hee kept in a place appointed; and euen of his Pigeons, which hee kept for sport. Yet, was not this happinesse so perpetuall, but that hee had some, especially domestick, Croffes. His second sonne, Sultran Morad, being sent into Guzzarat, against Melie King of Decan (sometime Lord of Chaul) was slaine, with many other Commanders: which newes was then brought to Echebar, when hee was celebrating their New-yeeres Festiuall (the day that the Sunne enters into Aries) whereupon hee sent thither another of his sonnes. Another time, when hee was solemnizing the Sunnes Festiuall, on Easter day, 1597. (about which time the King of China sustained the like Casualtie) Fire fell from Heauen vpon his Tent, richly adorned with Gold and Jewels, and consumed it to ashes, with all the Tents adioyning, together with his Throne of solide Gold, valued at 100000. Duckats, consumed or melted: from whence it proceeded to the Palace; which being of Timber, was for the most part brought into ashes. Some millions of Treasure there referred, could not bee there preferred from this flame, which made a Streame of Gold and Silver, mixed with other Metals, runne alongst the streets. For this cause hee forsooke Lahor (where hee had built the Iesuites Church, and where hee kept his Court, as hee did before at Fatapore, and sometimes at Agia) and went to Caximír, or Calsimír, a Kingdome which a little before he had subdued. This yeelds not to any Indian Region, in goodlinesse and whole-nesse, being encompassed with very high Mountaines, covered most part of the yeere with Snow: the rest a delicate Playne, diuersified with Pastures, Fields, Woods, Gardens, Parkes, Springs, Riuers, euen to admiration. It is coole, and more temperate then the Kingdom of Rebat, which adioyneth to it on the East. Three leagues from Caximir is a Lake, deepe, and beset round with Trees, in the midst thereof an Island, and thereon hee built a Palace.

The Countrey hath store of Rice, Wheat, and Vines, which they plant at the foot of the Mulburie, the same Tree seeming to beare two Fruits. Had they not bene at Contentions amongst themselves, hee could neuer haue conquered so strong a Kingdome. In times past they were all Gentiles; but three hundred yeeres before this, the most of them became Ma-humetane. This Countrey he left when Summer was past, and returned to Lahor, losing many Elephants and Horses in the way, both by Famine then oppressing the Countrey, and the difficultie of the Passages; the Elephants sometimes, in the ascent of Hills, helping themselves with their Trunkes, leaning and staying themselves, being burthened, thereon, as on a staffe. The Prince, which is now King, was assaulted by a fierce Lionesse, as he rode on a Female Elephant, which yett he wounded first with a Dart, then with a Shot, and lastly, smote her with the hand-Gun it selfe; wherewith being ouerthrowne, a Souldier came in and slew her, but with losse of his owne life.

The next yeere, 1598. Echebar went to Agra, chiefe Citie of a Kingdome, which hee had also conquered, a hundred leagues from Lahor towards the South, passing that way to Decan. Hee had eight hundred Elephants, and seuen thousand Camels, to carrie his Tents and Prouisions: yea, his Secretarie had at the same time seuen hundred Camels, and seuente Elephants for his owne furniture; and therefore it is lesse maruile of the Kings.
The King conducted in this Expedition aboue a thousand Elephants, instructed to fight, and a hundred thousand Soldiers. Hee passed the Mountaines of Gate, by almost impassable Passages, spending sometimes a whole day, in passing the space of a Musket-shot. One of his Captaines went before with fiftie thousand, who tooke one of the Decans strongest Holds, and made easie way to the Conquest of the rest of Melics Dominions, which hee left in the Government of his sonne. Bramptore fell into his hands, being destitute of defence. This was Anno 1600. Miram the King thereof had forsaken it, and betaken himselfe to Syra, a strong Hold both by Nature and Art. It was seated on the top of a Hill, which reacheth fye leagues, enuironed with a triple Wall, so built, that one might bee defended from the next. Within, was a Well of running Water, and all necessarie Prouisions for threecore thousand persons, for many yeeres. It had three thousand great Peeces of Ordnance. In this Castle (according to the Countrey custome) the next of the Bloud Royall were kept, with their Families; nor might depart, except (the Throne emptie) the next Heire was hence deliuered, much after that which is written of Amara, in the Absissens Countrey, and it seemes borrowed from thence; so many slaues of those parts being here entertained, and some in the highest Employments. At this time, besides King Miram, there were seuen of these Princes. The Gouernour was an Abassine, with seuen other Vnder-Commanders, all renegado-Mahometanes. The Mogoll layde siege thereto, with almost two hundred thousand men: but more prevailed (as before in Melic Countrey) with Bribes and Promises, then Force. Thus inuited Miram to a Conference, swearing, By the Kings head (accounted an inuolable Oath, as is that, By their Father's head) that hee should bee permitted safe returne: Some of his Councellours perswa-ded him to goe; hee went, with a kinde of Stole on his necke, hanging to his knees, in token of subiection: And comming before the Mogoll, bowed himselfe, but was cast to the ground by some of his Captaines, and forcibly detained. The Abassine Gouernour sent his sonne to demand performance of Achebar his promise, who being questioned of this Father the Abassine, and the hopes to obtaine the Castle, freely answered for his Fathers fidelie-tie, and that if Miram were not restored, they should not want a Successeur; with which libertie hee prouoked the Mogoll to cause him to be slaine: which his Father hearing, frangled himselfe. And the walls were soone after battered (at least entered, and a breach made through the open gates) by golden shot; none of these seuen for feare of treason, daring to take the Royall Soueraigntie. These with the King, were dispersed into diuers parts of his Kingdome and maintenance allowed them. Thus remained Echebar Lord of these parts, and longed to adde the rest of India, whatsoeuer is betwixt Indus and Ganges: euen to the Cape Comori, to his Dominion.

He writ a Letter about this time to the Vice-Roy of Goa, beginning thus (I mention it to

Man*

Manſer Government amongst all the Princes of the World, His Ambaſſage to ARIAS DU SALDAGNA, &c. The ninth day of Fraward (the firſt moneth of the yeere beginning at the Aquinoſtiall Vernall) in the forty ſixe yeere, viz. of His Reigne.

At this time dyed the Gouverneur or Vice-Roy of Labor, which left to the King (who is Heire General and Succellour of every mans wealth) three millions of Gold coyned, beſides other Gold, Silver, Jewels, Horſes, Elephants, furniture and goods almoſt invaluable. This alſo for a ſtale of the meanes accrewing to this Kings Treſure. Echebar returning to Agra, gave libertie to the Jeſuites to convert as many as would to Chriſtianitie.

The King of Candacar or Candahar, not able to defend himſelfe againſt Abdurna King of the Uſbecks, ſurrendered himſelfe and his Kingdome to Echebar. The particulars of his other Conqueſts I cannot relate: His laſt victory I know not whether to impute to his happineſſe or not. It was againſt his Sonne, in which the grieve to have ſuch an enemy could not but be more then the glory of the exploit. This happened, Anno 1602. Echebar, being forced to give over his Decan Conqueſt, by his Sonnes untimely challenge of the Scepter, who weary of his Fathers long life, ſtiled himſelfe King, and his Father the Great King. Armies were gathered on both ſides; on both ſides were ſent Letters and Meſſengers. The Mother of Echebar, being nintie yeeres old, laboured a peace, but not prevailling, fell ſicke, which cauſed him to returne from this expedition againſt his Sonne. But her body not able to overcome the diſeaſe, yielded to death. Her Sonne ſhaved his head, beard, and eye-browes, and mourned after the Country ſiſhon in blue, his Nobles doing the like three dayes. Her huge Treſure which ſhee had bequeathed to her children and Nephewes, the King ſeized on. The Prince was perſwaded to come to his Father without an Army, which he did, and after ſome rebuke, was reconciled, and remained content with the Kingdome of Cambaia or Guzzerat. He ſeemed much addicted to the Jeſuites, and obtained his Fathers Licence for a Temple at Agra, to the building whereof hee gave a thouſand pieces of Gold.

On the twentie ſeven of October, Anno 1605. Echebar dyed in the Climaſtericall yeere (63.) of his age, and ſiftie of his reigne. In his ſickneſſe, Selim the Prince (whom ſome ſuſpected of dealing as the Turkiſh Selim had done with his Father Baiaſet) came not into the Preſence; and much conſultation was amongst the Great ones to conferre the Succeſſion vpon Cuſſero his ſonne. But the iſſue was, that vpon his Oath to maintaine the Law of Mahomet, and of full pardon to his Sonne and all his Partakers, hee was brought into his Fathers preſence. Echebar was paſt ſpeech, but made ſignes that hee ſhould take the Royall Diademe, and gird himſelfe with the ſword hanging at his beds head. The Prince performed the ſolemn Jordan, or Rite of Adoration, with the head bowed to the Earth, and, his Father ſigning with his hand that hee ſhould depart, did ſo: as did his Father preſently after out of the world. His body was carried on the ſhoulders of his Son and Nephew out of the towre where he lay, the wall being broken (after the faſhion) for paſſage, and a new gate there erected: and being brought into his Garden a league from thence, was interred with ſmall attendance, neither the King, nor his Nobles (except Cuſſero and a few others) wearing mourning habit. So little was he in his Weſt, a little before the great Terroure of the Eaſt.

Selim poſſibly need Baiaſet.

Eight dayes after Echebars death, the Prince entred the Palace, and ſeated himſelfe in the Throne, the people crying Padauſa, or Padaſha lamat, God ſave the King. His firſt endeavours were to give contentment to the Mahumetans; cauſing their Moſchees to bee purged, and their Rites to bee eſtabliſhed: yea, hee tooke a new Name, NVRDIN MOHAMAD, IAHANVIR, that is, the Splendour of MAHOMETS Law, Subduer of the World. And by this Name IAHANVIR, or (as our Country-men, lately come from thence, pronounce it) IAHANGERE, hee is uſually called, and not by his ancient Name SELM.

McClarke, and McWhittington.

In April after, his ſonne rebelled, and (taking the Title of SWLTAN IA, that is, Sultan the King) brought into his partie two Great Men, and ſo went to Labor, which (not being admitted entrance) hee beſieged eight dayes; or (as others ſay) preſented himſelfe with his Forces (about twelue thouſand) before it, without any great hoſtilitie offered him. His Father in perſon purſued him, which being rumored, ſo diſmayed the ſonne that he fled, hauing euen then put ſome of the Kings men to rout. For by a notable ſtratageme hee loſt the day, the aduerſe General ſending many with flying tales into the Princes Armie, buzzing the neceſſitie and Greatneſſe of the Kings power, and ſeconding the ſame (like GIDBONS Policie) with multitude of Trumpets and Drummes, ſcared them, and notwithſtanding the Princes gaine-ſaying, hee was by his owne almoſt compelled to flight. Hee took his way towards Cabul, and being to paſſe a Riuer, the Captaine of the place cauſed all Boats to be taken away, and commanded the rowers, that if the Prince came, they ſhould ſatten the Boar (as by miſchance) on a Shelfe or Iland of ſand in the middle of the Riuer, which being done, they ſhould ſeeme to call for helpe, and ſo giue notice.

This

This was done, and the Gouetnour came, and after due reuerence (promising all fidelitie and securitie, wherein hee was vnfaithfully faithfull) brought Him into the Caille, and sent the King word thereof, who sent presently and brought Him in letters, together with his company. The King bitterly checked him, committed him to prison. Some adde, that hee sealed vp his eyes: Others say, that his eyes were put out. But their eyes were not put in (only eares put on) that say so; for hee hath lately bene freed, and hath the vse also of his eyes, as I haue bene tolde from the eyes of diuers. His two great Captaines had a strange punishment, the one sowed vp close in an Oxe-skinne, the other in an Asse-skinne, both new slayed, that drying they might withall straightly pinch in their Prisoners in a close and narrow Little-case. The next day they were carried through the Citie on Asse, their faces to the taile-wards, the one conspicuous with his Oxe-hornes, the other with his Asse-eares: The shame and ignominy so pierced one of them, that hee fell downe dead; his head was cut off, and the pieces of his dismembred bodie were set vp in diuers places. The other by way of fauour, was permitted to haue water powred on his hide, which brought a worse euill, by the heate of so neere a Sunne, causing a filthy flinke, and multiplication of Vermin, till at last his pardon was procured. Two hundredth of the Princes Souldiers were set on both sides the way, as hee should passe to be executed. He caused his second Sonne to be proclaimed Prince, as his Father had before transferred the Title from him to This his Son.

There was a famous Prophet of the Ethnikes, named Goru, esteemed there of his Sectaries as the Romish Pope is of the Popish Romanists: with him, as a man famous for Sanctimony did the Prince consult, who in adulation adorned his head with a Diadem, which in an Ethnikke to a Mahumetan was strange: but hee coloured it with the Gentilisme of the Princes Mother. Vpon this Goru was committed, but vpon promise by an Ethnikke of 100000. pieces of Gold to bee payd to the King, hee was pardoned. Hee that undertooke this, hoped on the Kings pardon, or that Goru would procure this summe, which failing, hee seized, on all hee had, not sparing his wife and children: adding tortures also to extort money from him, and taking away his meate, thinking him rather a miser then a begger. Thus in varietie of misery the flattering Prophet lost his life: and his Suretie also thinking to escape by flight, was taken and slaine, his goods also confiscate.

This King at first made great shew of zeale to Mahomet, which since is cooled, and his Religion seemes to bee the same with Echebars. Contrary to the Mahumetan practice, hee delighteth much in Images, as of CHRIST, the Virgin, and other Saints, with which his chambers and publicke roomes are stored: and to all his Letters and Charters, besides the Kings Seale, addes the Images of CHRIST, and the Holy Virgin, engrauen in a paire of tongs (as it were) of Emeralds, with which hee seales his Letters on both sides the pendent waxe. The last newes that wee haue from the Iesuites (of whom wee haue borrowed almost all the former Relations) is of Captaine Hawkins comming to the Court, and kind entertainment of the King, who made him (say they) a Gentleman of foure hundred Horse, and assigned him thirtie thousand Rupies stipend: adding other reports of his pride, obstinate heresie, and supplantation by the Portugals; with other things of Him, and those of the Ascension, were wracked, partly true, partly false. I haue thought good to set before you in the next seruice, some of Captaine Hawkins obseruations whiles hee staid there, and after of other our Country-men, which now haue a seuled trade in these vast Dominions. Obserue by the way that the Iesuites to the last, doe accuse Captaine Hawkins of his obdurate heresie, contrarie to the calumnies of some that say hee became devoutly Popish at their perswasion.

They say hee presented the King with the worth of 5000 crowns, one jewell being worth 10000.

b Emmanuel Pinnere.

After William Hawkins being Captaine in the Ship called the Hector, after a long and tedious voyage (from March 1607. to the foure and twentieth of August 1608.) arrived at Surat, subiect to the Mogor or Mogel (so he calleth him) and after much kindnesse offered, and indignities suffered, by reason and trealon of the Portugals (who had by bribes and slanders wrought the Vice-Roy or Deputie, called Macreb Chan against him) passed thence to Agra, to the Court, as Embassadour, with a Letter from the King of England. Peniero a Iesuite, before in this Booke mentioned (obserue the Conuersion) and consultations of that Societie in those parts) like a worthy Factor for his 60 Nation, had proffered to Macreb Chan foure thousand Rials of Eight, to send them to Daman, that hee might become their prisonet, and the English negotiation might bee hindered:

- hindered: and now, when the name of an Embassadour had protected him from such courses, plotted with him to ouerthrow his journey, both by detraction of necessarie forces to assist him in a way so full of Out-lawes and Rebels, and suborning his Tudge-man and Coach-man, to payson or murder him by the way; which was not farre from effecting. The Portugals had also dealt with the Lord of Cruly, to bee readie with two hundred Horle-men to assault him in the way: so that hee was forced to hire a strong conuoy for the securitie of his person. Being come to Agrá, hee was brought with great State to the King, who kindly entertained him, and sware by God, and by his Fathers soule, to performe the Kings Maiesties request, in the Letter contained, notwithstanding the depuration thereof by the Iesuite, to whom the King had giuen it to reade. He promised also to allow him three thousand and two hundred pound a yeere, or foure hundred Horle (for so they reckon all their fees, much like the Turkish Timariots) and caused him to take a wife of the Countrey, the daughter of an Armenian Christian, called Mubarikgha, sometimes a Commander in the warres of Ekkar Padsha, c Father to this present Mogor, or Mogol, whose name is Selim.
 This King is so fickle and inconstant, that what hee had solemnly promised for an English Factory, was by the Portugals meanes reuerfed, and againe promised, and againe suspended, and a third time both granted and disannulled: so that the second of Nouember, 1611, Captaine Hawkins departed from Agrá, and the last of December came to Cambaya, where hee heard of English shipping, in which hee passed first to the Red Sea, after to Sumatra and Bantam, d and dyed on the Irish shoare in his returne homewards. Whiles he kept at Agrá, his liuing assigned him by the King was much impaired by the Officers, who appointed to him such places where Out-lawes and Rebels liued, so that hee neuer receiued aboue three hundred pound. His attendance whiles hee was in fauour, was honourable and neere the King; so that the Mahumetans enuying a Christian such dignitie, became his priuite enemies, and assistants to the Portugals: which was increased by a Present the King sent him publicly, being a wilde Boare, killed in his hunting. Progresse, and by him and his eaten.
 The insolencies of the Guzarares, if they may bee suffered, and as much baseness of their dejected cowardly courages, being kept in awe (which is also the disposition of all the Indian Ethnikes, both white and blacke) the Portugals pride and treachery: the fittest places for our Indian traffique, whether wee follow the colours of Mars or Mercury: and other his diligent obseruations I omit. But so I cannot, the rarities of the Mogols Court, customes, puillances, wealth, and gouernment (norwithstanding our former Discourse) having met with so rare a guide. For the greatnesse of his State; hee reporteth that his Empire is diuided into sixe great Kingdomes, the first named Pengab, the chiefe Citie whereof is Lahor:
 the second, Bengala, and Sonagham the mother Citie: the third, Malua, the chiefe Seat Va- gain: the fourth Deccan, in which Brampott is principall: and so is Amadauer in the fifth Kingdome, which is Cambaya. Hee hath fixe principall Castles for the keeping of his treasure, at Agrá (which is in the heart of all his Kingdomes) Guallier, Nerui, Ratamboore, Haffier, Boughtaz. There are three Arch-Rebels, which with his forces hee cannot call in, 40 Amber i Chapu in Deccan; in Guzerat, the sonne of Muzaffer, sometime their King, called Bahador; and Raga Rabena in Malua. Hee hath fixe sonnes, Sultan Chiffero, Sultan Pernis, Sultan Chorem, Sultan Sharier, Sultan Bath: two young daughters, and three handred wiues, of which foure are principall. None hath the title of Sultan, but his sonnes. Mirza is also ascribed to his brother and children; Chan, as a Duke. Their degrees and titles are according to their proportion of Horles allowed them: foure are of the same of twelue thousand, the King, his mother, eldest sonne, and one of the blood Royall, called Chan Azam. Of the same of nine thousand Horle are three; these are at Dukes; Marquesses of five thousand, of which are eightene; Earles of three thousand; Vicounts (so may wee parallell them with our titles of honour) two thousand; Barons of one thousand Horle; Knights, foure hundred; 50 others fewer, to twentie: all which are called Manfhdars, men of liuing or Lordship, of which are three thousand. Of Haddies, which receiue monethly pay, from fixe Horle to one, are h five thousand. Officers of Court and Campe, fixe and thirtie thousand, as Gunners, Porters, Water-men, Cookes, Gardiners, keepers of Horles, Elephants, &c. whose wages are payed them monethly, from ten to three Rupias. A Rupa is two shillings i of our coyne.
 His Captaines or Manfhdars are to maintaine vpon their allowance, and haue in readinesse at a seuen nights warning, three hundred thousand Horle.
 The Kings reuenue of his Crown-land, is fiftie Crou of Rupias: euery Crou is one hundred Leckes, and euery Lecke a hundred thousand Rupias: all which in our money is fiftie millions of pounds: a summe incredible, and exceeding that which is said of h Chine. His daily 60 expences are fiftie thousand Rupias, for his owne person, as apparell, victuals, and other household expences, with the feeding of sundry sorts of beasts, and of some few Elephants:
 his expences on his women by the day amount to thirtie thousand Rupias.

In his Treasurie of 1 Agra are in Gold, of Seraffins Echei (which are ten Rupias a piece) threecore Leckes. Of another sort, which are one thousand Rupias, each twentie Rupias of Gold pieces; and ten thousand of another sort, halfe the value. Of Toles (euery Tole is a Rupia of Silver, and ten of those Toles is the value of one of Gold) thirtie thousand. Of another sort of ten Toles, five and twentie thousand. Of another sort of five Toles, fiftie thousand.

In Silver, of Rupias Echei thirtie Crow. Of a kinde of coyne worth a hundred Toles a piece, fiftie thousand. Of another halfe as much, one Lecke. Of thirtie Toles a piece, thirtie thousand pieces. Of ten Toles a piece, twentie thousand pieces. Of five Toles a piece, five and twentie thousand. Of Sauoy (each of which is a Tole and a quarter) two Leckes. Of Iagaries (whereof five make five Toles) one Lecke.

In Jewels of Diamonds one Batman and a halfe: a Batman is five and fiftie pound weight English: these are rough, and of all sorts and sizes, but none lesse then two Carrets and an halfe. Of Ballase Rubies, two thousand. Of Pearles, twelue Batma.s. Of Rubies of all sorts, two Batmans. Of Emeralds of all sorts, five Batmans. Of Eshime, which stone comes from Cataya, one Batman. Of stones of Emen, a kinde of red stone, five thousand. Of all other sorts, as Corall, Topazes, &c. the number is innumerable.

Of Jewels wrought in Gold, two thousand and two hundred Swords, the Hilt and Scabbards set with rich stones: two thousand Ponyards. Of Saddle Drums of Gold, set with stones, ysed in Hawking five hundred. Of rich brooches for their heads, in which their feathers are set, two thousand. Of Saddles of Gold and Silver, set with stones, one thousand. Of Tunikes, five and twentie. This is a great Lance covered with gold, and the fluke set with stones: and are carried when the King goeth to warres in stead of colours. Of Kittasoles of State to shadow him, twentie. None else in his Empire may haue any of any sort carried for his shadow. Of Chaires of State, five, and of other sorts which are of silver and gold, one hundred. Of rich glasses, two hundred. Of Vases for Wine set with Jewels, one hundred. Of drinking Cups, five hundred, of which are fiftie very rich, as of one stone, &c. Of Chaines of Pearle, and other Chaines, of Rings with Jewels, &c. are infinite, which the Keeper onely knows. Of all sorts of Plate wrought, as Dishes, Cups, Basons, &c. Two thousand Batmans. Of gold wrought, a thousand Batmans.

Of Beasts: twelue thousand Horses: as many Elephants, five thousand with teeth, the rest female and young. Camels, twentie thousand: of Oxen for seruice, ten thousand. Of Myles, a thousand. Of Deere for game, three thousand. Ounces for game, four hundred. Hunting-Dogs, four hundred. Lyons tame, an hundred. Buffles, five hundred. Hawkes, four thousand. Pigeons for sport, ten thousand. Singing-Birds, four thousand. He hath also Armour to arme five and twentie thousand men at an houres warning.

All this concerning his Treasurie, expences, and monethly pay, is in his Court or Castle of Agra: and euery one of the Castles, aboue named, hath a severall treasure: and so hath Lahor also, which was not mentioned. And if any censure this Story for want of truth, and mee for want of iudgement, in relating such fulsome so fully: forie, I must leaue it to the Authors credit; for my selfe, I was induced by the raritie of the subiect (not easie in this distance to be knowne, nor by Trauellers, except such as this Author, whose Embassage, and exceeding grace with the King, for the greatest part of his residence, might further his Intelligence herein) besides the rareness of the Copie, whereof I know but one, and that written by himselfe. Time may make further trial. Nor may any measure those parts of the Indies for wealth in these kindes, with our Europzan, or any other: and that which for many Kings and States had in many ages stored together, by the euent of warre became Echei, the father of this Selm: of which you haue heard of the incredible wealth of the King of Camabai alone. Besides, if you obserue his customes, it makes it so much neerer credite. For when any Noble-man dies, all deuolueeth to him: and well is it with the wife and children, if he bestoweth the Land, and what he pleaseth, on them, and the fathers Title on the eldest sonne. One dyed in my time (saith our Author) named Raga Gaginat, on whose goods the King seized, which besides Jewels and other treasure, amounted to threecore Maunes in gold, euery Maune is five and fiftie pound weight. None likewise may come before the King with any Petition emptie-handed: and on certaine Festiuall dayes they bring him rich Presents, as before is said. India, besides Mines, must needs be rich in money, for all Nations bring it, and carrie commodities for it: so that once in twentie yeeres it cometh to the King. All Lands in his Monarchy are his, giuen and taken at his pleasure. Escheats are many by reason of his feueritie. And of those lands which hee giueth in Fee, the third part still remaines to the King; and of the Crowne Lands two thirds, the rest to the Occupiers. For Presents and Mortuaries, wee haue before giuen diuers instances. And my ielousie hath made mee verie inquisitiue of such as haue liued there in the Minnisterie, nisterie, Factorie, Souldiorie, all which affirme that Captaine Hawkins hath written with the least.

Of all sorts of his wealth (except Coyne) is brought daily a certaine quantitie before him, for which purpose his Beasts, and all things of value, are diuided into three hundred and threescore parts: so that the same things come but once in the yeere to his view. Hee hath three hundred Elephants roiall for himselfe to ride on, which are brought with pompe, richly couered; twentie or thirtie men going before with Streamers, his female with her yongling or yonglings following, besides foure or five other yong ones attending as Pages. These are disperfed amongst the great ones to ouer-see them, the King allowing them for it, but scarcely sufficient, and they dare not make shew of them in euill plight. One of them eaten Ropias euery day in Butter, Graine, Sugar, Sugar-canes, &c. they are very tame. I saw one take vp the Kings owne son by his appointment, being a child of fouen yeeres. There are thought to be in this Empire fortie thousand Elephants, ^a of his, and his Nobles; of which, twentie thousand are trained for warre.

saith 50000.

When the King rides in progresse, his Tents are in compasse about as large as London, two hundred thousand people usually following his Campe. This King is esteemed the greatest Emperour in the East. Hee hath many Dromedaries, whose swiftnesse auailed his Father much in his sudden Expedition of warre. Those valiant Captaines which Echbar had, Selim hath by tyranny much diminished. Five times a weeke hee commands his Elephants to fight before him, which often in their coming in, or going out, kill many: & if any be but wounded, and might escape, yet hee commands him to bee cast into the Riuer, saying, Hee will curse him as long as hee liues, and therefore best to dispatch him: Hee delights to see men executed, and torne with Elephants. Of these tyrannies he reckons many particulars which hee saw: and some for no fault, but for his lust set to fight with the Lyon, and one valiant man to buffet with a very fierce Lyon, without any weapon offensive or defensive. If any of his subiects haue any precious stone of value, and make not him the offer of it, it is death to him: hee must haue the refuall of all, and yet gines not the worth by a third part. That Iewell hee weareth this day, is not worn againe till that day twelue-month: all his Jewels being proportioned to such a course. All his feruoritie and tyranny cannot cleere (perhaps this causeth them) his Countrey of Out-lawes. There is one betwene Agra and Amdaudaur, which commands as much Land as a good Kingdome; he is strong, twentie thousand Horse, and fiftie thousand Foot, and keepe on the Mountaines. Men can scarcely trauell for Out-lawes. The often shifing of men from their lands, makes them exact more cruelly in the time they hold them, grinding the face of their poore Tenants in ruefull manner. If they continue but fixe yeeres, they raise a great state; sometimes they hold not halfe a yeere: If any be employed in warres or busineses in another place, he must forgoe his land here, and be assigned it there. The Kings allowance otherwise is exceeding, as for euery Horse twentie Ropias a moneth for the warres, and for so many more which hee hath of Farme, hee is allowed two Ropias a moneth for the maintenance of his Table.

Concerning the Kings Religion and behaviour, it is thus. In the morning about breake of day, hee is at his Beades, his face to the Westwards, in a priuate faire roome, vpon a faire Iet-stone, hauing onely a Persian Lambe-skinne vnder him. Hee hath eight Chaines of Beades, euery of which containeth foure hundred: they are of Pearle, Diamants, Rubies, Emeralds, Lignum aloes, Eshen and Corall. At the vpper end of this Iet-stone, are placed the Images of Christ and our Lady, grauen in stone. Hee turneth ouer his Beades, and saith so many words, to wit, three thousand and two hundred, and then presenteth himselfe to the people to receiue their Salames or good morrow; for which purpose multitudes resort thither euery morning. This done, hee sleepeeth two houres more, then dineth and passeth his time with his women: at noone, he sheweth himselfe againe to the people, sitting till three or foure a clocke to view his pastimes, by Men and Beasts, euery day sundry kindes. At three all the Nobles in Agra, whom sicknesse detaineth not, resort to the Court: and the King comes forth in open audience, sitting in his Seat-Royall, euery man standing in his degree before him; the chiefe within a Red raile (which was allowed to our Author, hauing but five before him) the rest without. This Red raile is three steps higher then the place where the rest stand. Men are placed by Officers: there are others to keepe men in order. In the midst, right before the King, standeth an Officer, with his master Hang-man, accompanied with fortie others of the same profession, with hatchets on their shoulders, and others with whips. Here the King heareth causes some houres • euery day: and then departs to his house of prayer; which ended, foure or five sorts of well dressed meates are brought him, whereof hee eateth what hee likes, to stay his stomacke, drinking once of his strong drinke. After this he comes forth into a priuate roome, where none may come, but such as himselfe nominates. Two yeeres together our Author was one of the Attendants.

tendant. In this place he drinke other five cups, which is the portion that the Physicians allow him, after which he eateth Opium, & then layes him downe to sleep, every man departing home. When he hath slept two houres, they awake him, and bring his supper to him, shuffing it in his mouth, not being able to feed himselfe. This is about one of the clocke at night; and so hee slepeeth the rest of the night. In this cup-space he doth many idle things; but nothing without writing, be he drunken or sober. For he hath writers by course, which write all, not omitting his going to the stoole, or how ought he lieth with his women, and with whom to the end, that when he dieth, those writings may be brought forth, and thence what is thought fit may be inserted in their Chronicles.

When any poore men come to demand Justice of the King; they goe to a certaine rope ^{IC} fastened to two pillars, neere where the King sits: this rope is full of Bells, plated with gold, and with shaking the rope, the King hearing the sound, sends to know the cause, and doth Justice accordingly.

While our Author was with him, hee made his brothers children Christians, not for zeale (as the Iesuites thought) but in policie (to disappoint a Prophecie of certaine learned Gentiles, which fore-told their succession in the Kingdome) to make them odious to the Moores. God take the wife in his craftinesse, and convert this peruerse policie to their true Conversion.

One of his sonnes, Sultan Sharier, of seuen yeeres, could not by diuers cruelties purposely inflicted on him by his father, be forced to cry, pretending his Nurfes instructions to ^{2C} the contrary.

Feasts.

Hee keeps many Feasts in the yeere, but some principall: one called Nourous, or New-yeeres day. Then hath he a rich Tent pitched, curiously and costly wrought, two acres of ground in compasse, so richly spread with silke and gold Carpets, and preciously hanged, as is more admirable then credible. There are roomes also for his Queenes to see vsence, round about, so that in all it may bee five acres. Every Noble-man makes his roomes, each striving to excell other in cost. The King will come, to which of them he effects, and is sumptuously feasted and presented: But because hee will not receive any thing as a Present, he allowes as much as the Treasurer values it, which is halfe the worth: Thus all prouide and present. At this Feast commonly every mans state is augmented: it beginneth at the beginning of the Moone in March. Some foure months after is the Feast of his Birth-day, which every one striveth to honor with his richest Apparel and Jewels: after many Palace-pastimes, hee goeth with the greatest pompe to his Mothers, to whom every Noble-man presents a Jewell. After banquet ended, hee weigheth in a ballance of gold against himselfe in one scale, other things of diuers sorts to the worth of ten thousand pound, which is given to the poore: but his richer Subjects present him that day tenne times as much. On his Fathers Funerall-day is solemnized a Feast at his Sepulchre, where himselfe meaneth to be buried with all his posteritie: at which time much meate and money is given to the poore. It hath bene foureteen yeeres in building, and is thought will not bee finished in seuen yeeres more; notwithstanding three thousand at least be daily at worke thereon. But one of our workemen will dispatch more then three of them. It is by his description three quarters of a mile about, made square, hath seuen heights each narrower then other, till the top, where his Hearse is. At the ymost gate before you come to the Sepulchre is a stately Palace in building; the compasse of the wals ioyning to the gate, &c. may be at least three miles: it is four miles from Agra.

The Kings custome is every yeere to make a hunting progresse of two moneths: but when hee comes forth of his Palace, if he mounts on a horse, it is a signe of his going to the war: if on an Elephant or Palamkin, it is but a hunting journey.

Mogols Sepulcher.

Couert saith, the matter is fine Marble, the forme nine square, the compasse two English miles about, & nine stories high, and that the King procelled he would beflow thereon one hundred millions.

2. IIII.

Of the settling of the English Trade in these parts, and of the two Sea-fights betwixt ours, and the Portugals.

Iarvis. Thesaur. Indul. 5. 423.

WE haue heard how by the Portugals working the English trade was disaunled in the Mogols Dominions, Captaine Hawkins despairing of any good that way, and leaving the Countrey. The Iesuites had closely wrought Mocrab Chaw against him, with other great men; and one of them (Pinnerius) was employed in publique Embassage betwixt the Vice-Roy of Goa and the Mogoll, to the same effect: The Portugals alledged the league was broken, because the English were entertained; Neither could the Mogoll easily lose their friendship, because they were then Masters at Sea: and could could have hindered him and his from all Marine trades. Andreas Hortadus de Mendosa, the Vice-Roy had forbidden the Merchants their Cambayan trade, and already hostile had begun on both sides: both ceasing with the departure of the English. Sir Henry Middleton came to Surrat, after his Red-Sea-disasters in expectation of trade, but found nothing but dissembling, so that after much losse of time, he was driven with his Ships to seek new adventures, to repair the losses which by Turkish treachery, & the Mogols in confidence and falsehood he had sustained. Hereupon he returned to the Strait of Aden, and intercepted the Ships that came from the Mogols Country to this Turkish Trade, easily stopping the mouth of the Turke, and cutting off the Mogols Nautike hands in hindring the mutual Traffike of their Subjects: so weak in those Seas are these Two, iustly called GREAT, the Greatest indeed, and most puissant Princes (all things considered) in the Vniuers. Yet did not the English make prize of them, only they set prices to them of their English commodities, and exchanging them at their prices for such Indian goods as they had brought thither (both estimated as they were worth in India) making them further allowance of two in the hundred. One Ship of this company, called the Reheme, had one thousand five hundred persons in her. Many have cauilled this forced trade, not considering that they had first found both fraude and force at the Turkes handes, and at the Mogols much expence and losse of time and goods contrary to Couenant, which I see not how the Law of Nature and Nations might not warrant them to make good; the King himselfe being wronged, and they armed with the Kings Commission, and their owne power. And perhaps others would haue taken all without any goods giuen in exchange. Certaine it is, that the euent (which those Mahometans make the rule of equitie) was good, the Cambayan Merchants so terrified, that when Gen. Best (ignorant of these passages) not long after came to Surrat with the Dragon, he was promised good dealing; Mill lessee, one of the chiefe Merchants of Surrat affirming, that they must else burne all their ships, and giue over their trade by Sea. So true was that obseruation of Capitaine Hawkins (an Actor, perhaps Author, in this businesse) of these people, insolent, if suffered, and base, if curbed.

On the third of October, 1612. Sheke Suffe, Gouverneur of Amadauaz, chiefe Citie of the Guzzurats came to Surrat, and thence to Swally, and on the one and twentieth, concluded vpon certaine Articles, with the English Generall, which I haue read in his owne Relations, too tedious to be here inserted. Not so the famous fights betwixt him and the Portugals, who had already in their insulting insolent hopes swallowed the English, but Dragons are harsh morsels, and of ill digestion. Master Canning, an English Merchant had beene prisoner with the Portugals, but in a confident brauery, the Vice-Roy commanded to set him on shoare at Surrat, that he might goe helpe his Countrey-men fight, and then wee will take their ship, and the rest of them altogether. But not altogether, nay, not at all, could hee performe this, with all his great Fleet of foure huge Gallions, with five or sixe and twentie Frigates: the Dragon being assisted onely with the Ofiander a little Ship (scarcely a Ship, I had almost called her a little Pinnasse) but of great performance in this Fight. Nunno d' Aencuna was Admirall of the Portugals, who by the Sabandore or Treasurer vnder the Mogoll in those parts, an experienced Man, who had a little before come aboard the English to spie out their strength, was counselled not to aduenture present fight, with such present courages, but to keepe betwixt them and the shoare, to hinder them from watering, and so (like another Cannizator) to weary the English, and force them from thence. But Aencuna high pride disdained stratagems, and scorned (forsooth) to spend a weekes prouision on his Men in hindring Ours, whom hee could force in an houre. Thus, on the nine and twentieth of Nouembet, came hee in fight with his Fleet, with Red colours displayed, where hee receiued an vnwelcome welcoming by the Dragon, which after the Generals encouraging speech, went to meet them, and when hee came betwene the Admirall and Vice-Admirall, opened his fierie mowths, and in a thundering Diabell gaue them the first salutation. The other two were not yet come vp, nor could the Ofiander get cleere of her Anchor. But the next morning the fight was renewed, and three of the Gallions driuen on ground, not a man of them daring to looke aboute Hatches, and had beene their left but for the Frigates; the Ofiander danced the Hay (saith one) about them, or played like a Salmon (my friend Mr. Nathaniel Salmon, was Master and Commander in her) swimming, frisking lightly (but not with light effect) leaping about these huge Whale carcases, which in the afternoone got a-float, and continued the fight till night. In the night they manned a Frigate, with sixe or seuen-score of their best men, thinking to haue fired the English, but found both Fire and Water conspire against themselves to their destruction: the Ofiander keeping diligent watch, and with a shot sinking them, there were eightie foure of them taken vp drowned. The shallownesse of the Bay gaue occasion to the Dragon, which drew much water, to remoue to the other side, neere va-ga Mendofrag, or Mediasrabadh, sometime a faire Citie, and walled, ruined by the Mogols gols warres. Here was a Castle of the Razbooches (some call them Reisbuti) which have bene the Native Lords of that Country, now as it were out-lawes, spoyling and robbing, besieged by Sarder Chan, a Great Man of the Mogols, who had many thousands in his Campe, which all became witnesses of the English valour, Spectators of the Portugals confusion. Sarder Chans Tent was stately and spacious, covered about with Cloth of Gold, on the floore with Turkie Carpets. Hee sent a Horle, and two Veils wrought with Silke and Gold to the Generall, and foure Veils for foure other of his company. Himselfe would not stirre out of his Tent, till he had taken the Castle, but gave Them licence to take view thereof. But the Portugals approaching with their force, the Mogols by many Arguments deterred the English from the fight, which yet they presently made good before many thousand gazing, admiring, astonished Eyes, the Portugals being forced to cut their Cables, and to escape by flight, being swifter of sayle then the English. Thus the Portugals wanted a Hercules for this Dragon (more watchfull then the Hesperidan, more terrible then the Lernæan) or, a Medæa to Charme this, as sometimes the Colchian (these three Dragons the Poets faine Monsters, begotten of Typhon, and Echidna, but none of them breathing Fire, nor roaring Thunders, like this fell Indian Dragon here spoken of.)

In these fights, after Master Salmons reckoning, the Dragon spent sixe hundred thirtie nine, and the Osander three hundred eightie seven great shot, besides three thousand small. The Great Mogoll, which before thought none comparable to the Portugall at Sea, much wondered at the English resolution, related to him by Sarder Chan. The Portugals lost by their owne Confession, one hundred and sixtie, by others report, five hundred men (the Sæbandar reckoned three hundred and fiftie) in these fights: the English three men, and the arme of another shot off. The Articles agreed on before by the Governour, were confirmed by the Kings Firma, which they received January the eleventh, Capitaine Best, returned to Swally, December one and twentieth, and sent Letters of this successe for England by land, but the Messenger & with his Indian, were both poysoned by two Friars in the way home-wards: another Letter sent by a Mariner, came to the Companies hands in very good season: and they sent sent forth foure ships hither, besides three to other places, under the Command of Generall Downton, viz. The New yeeres Gift, the Hector, the Merchants Hope, and the Salomon.

These leaving England in March, on October the fiftenth following, 1614. anchored at South Swally, not farre from Surat: where they found the Countrey in Armes against the Portugals, which had a little before taken a Ship of the Mogols, in which was said to bee three millions of Treasure, and two women bought for the Great Mogol. They also tooke a Guzzerate Ship worth one hundred thousand pounds, with seven hundred persons therein, at the barre of Surat (notwithstanding their owne Passe granted them) and sent them to Goa. The Decanims laid siege to Chaul, and Mocrob Chan was to doe his utmost for his Maister the Mogol. The Moores on all hands, fought their Destruction; and they were driven to send away many hundreds of the Banyans out of their Townes, to free themselves of vnpromisable Mouths: three Barks of which came to Surat, others to Cambaya. Mocrob Chan laboured very earnestly with the Generall, to ingage himselfe in that warre against the Portugall, which because he could not doe (except in a defensive quarrell) by his Commission, the Nabab (so they call this Mocrob Chan, then Vice-Roy or Governour of the Countrey about Surat: the Iesuites interpret Nabab, supream Judge) was strange to the English, and offered the Merchants some hard measure; yea, the Iesuites which were with Mocrob Chan, tooke occasion from this refusal to counterfeite a Letter from the Vice-Roy, threatening that except they yielded to peace, He and his friends the English would ioyne against Surat: which suspicion Master Aldworth, one of our Merchants, furthered, ignorant of the former; but threatening that their abuses would cause the English to ioyne with the Portugall. Thus ticklish were the termes on which they stood. December the sixteenth, the Generall received a Letter, that the Portugals had burnt & Goga, with many Villages thereabouts, and ten great Ships, one of which was the Rheme, with one hundred and twentie small vessels: hee read the Letter of a Iesuite, in which the King of Spaine commanded the Vice-Roy to burne Surat, if they received the English. On December the seven and twentieth, two and twentieth Portugall Frigates sought to lay the Hope aboard, but by force of hee would not put off. The Vice-Roy sent offer of Friendship to Mocrob Chan, on condition that hee would turne the English out of Surat, and suffer him to build a Fort at Swally, otherwise threatening bloudie warres. And so on January the fourteenth, came two Fleets of Frigates, and on the eighteenth, sixe great Gallions, with three lesser Ships. Two Gallies were yet behinde. The Frigates were threecore, some adde fiftene more. This great force made Mocrob Chan to feare, whereupon hee sent a Present to the Vice-Roy, with some Treatie of peace, whereof the Vice-roy made light account, thinking first to overcome vs (a thing not not hard in his conceits) and then to treat of peace on his owne termes. Much policie was used on both parts, the Nabab complementing, and sending Presents to the Vice-Roy, and our Generall also; the Vice-Roy promising much to himselfe, but reckoning without his host: and therefore when after the fight hee would haue concluded vpon the conditions that Azeroli had offered, hee was then refused with a scoffe, that hee would not make peace with so weak an enemy, that could not preuaile against foure Merchants Ships.

On the twentieth of January, their three smaller Ships had thought to haue Stemmed the Hope, then riding at an Anchor, neere the Barre of Swally; some distance from the rest; the laid her aboard on the Star-board side; and one Gallie, and five and fortie sayle of Frigates on their Lar-board: the Gallions followed as farre as the Sands would permit. The Admirall made to their helpe, and for the better speed cut their Cable; but the Enemies had already entered (with great shew of resolution) without feare or wit (saith one of the Hopes men) thirtie or fortie were entered on the Fore-castle. But the Gife in this fatall Moneth answered her Name, and gaue them for a New-yeeres-Gift, such Orations (orations yee may call them) that they were easily perswaded to leaue the Hope, and all Hopesse to coole their hore blouds with leaping into the Seas cold waters; where many for want of a Boat, made vse of Charons: those that were of most hope and courage, held still their possession of the entered Hope, but with entered hopes, and dispossession of their liues.

I know not what Salmoneste, Duo flammas Iouis & Iouis imitatur Olympi, or what Præmacheus hath taught these later Ages to steal Iupiter Fires; and instructed so many Cyclopan Artificers to imitate those heavenly, in helish Thunders, and sulphurous lightnings; these Metall-Deuils, as Angels of Death, with Brazen sides, and Iron Mouths, proclaiming Destruction and Desolation to the World. These Bullets are the true fire-breathing Bulls (such the Poets fained at Colchos) and this Ordinance the fire-foaming horses of Diomedes feeding on the flesh of men: which yet I know not whether very cruelitie haue made sparing, whilst the Terror hath made men sparing in the vse of it; this Age for this cause yielding fewee pitched battels, and in them fewer slaine numbers, then the former, which neuer heard of this cruell-marvellfull Engine.

Bueler vs leaue this Parenthesis. The Portugals, whether themselves by casualtie or industry, set fire on their ships, or that the fire which Master Mullomex, the Master of the Hope cast into one of them, after that by helpe of Fresh-men sent in the Pinace, they were got cleere of them; certaine it is, that all three driving away vpon the ebbe (the English had entered before and killed all they found) fell on fire, and running on the Sands, there offered vs themselves at once to all the Elements, the Sayles still standing embracing the Ayre, the Keels kissing her Mother Earth, till their more churlish brethren, the Fire and Water, put them out of possession, and shared all betwixt them. One of the Gallies lost her Nose with a thor, and was content after that, with their Other to looke on. The Gallions rode beyond the Sands. The Frigates could not but participate in their fellowes disaduentures: many of them, saith Leman, were funke and torne in pieces. Malham, another 4 of the Hopes Company, numbred five and twentie thus perishing. The Hope lost three men, and had foureteen wounded, the Hector lost two. One shot of stone, which the Hope received, was measured feiue and twentie Inches about: but the hurt was by fire in her tops, by one of her owne men there slaine, whilst he fought to fire the Enemy. The Portugals losse is vncertaine: three hundred and fiftie men were said to be carried to Daman to be buried, besides all that the Sea and Fire had shared betwixt them; which were thought to make vs fue hundred, some report of eight hundred; and yet themselves gaue out, not above fortie or fiftie, whereas the tide cast vp at one place eightene drowned carkasses.

After this they tried experiments: First by poyson, and this was the Iesuites Iesuitisme (I cannot call it Christianitie) who sent to the Mueccadan of Swally, to entice him to poyson the Water of the Well, whence the English fetched for their vse: but the Ethnik had more honestie, and put in quicke Tortoises, that it might appeare by their death, if any venomous hand had bene there. But when Virtus & virtus wanted virtus, Dolus is added, and the Vice-Roy having two ships sent him for supply, two lunkes, eight or ten Boates, these, or the most of them were employed with great secrecie and subtiltie to fire our ships by night two full of fiery entrailes on the ninth of February, the next night two others chained together and towed with Frigates, and after that in the same night foure other chained together, one of which being fired with an English thor, burnt her selfe and her fellowes, they put fire to all the rest which deuoured them all, without harme to the English. They tooke some of these Fire-workers, & one of which being examined, confessed after M. Prings Relation thus.

A Fly-boat of a hundred and fiftie Tuns, fourscore men, and foure Peeces. The two Gallies had five and twentie Oares on a side, and in both a hundred Souldiers. Threecore Gallies, with eightene, and twentie Oares on a side, in each fiftene Souldiers. So great their forces, and (blessed be God), so little their force. The Vice-Royes name was Dou Jeronimo de Saudo, sometimes Captaine of Mosambique, after that of Zeilan eightene yeeres, and now Vice-Roy, by the Kings strait command, and others importunitie drawne into this action. Every day was hee browed with the English Ordnance, but neuer adventured any other triall by fight: the English riding neere his great Fleet, and dispatching all their other affaires of Merchandise, and mending the Hope, which they sent home with this Newes when they departed from thence; they seemed to stay for them in the way, yet let them passe without any blowes.

This won them much glory among the countrey people, Mocrab Chan giuing flatly entertainment to the Generall in his Tents on shoare, which one faith were a quarter of a mile about, in the midst, his owne of Crimson Sattin richly embroidered with Gold and Pearle, and covered with Cloth of Gold; he had many Elephants: he gaue the Generall his Sword, made (said hee) in his owne house, the Hilt of masse Gold: (this is their custome to deterring Captaines) and he gaue him his Girdle, Sword, and Dagger, and Hangers of as faire shew, but lesse worth.

Nie. Withington.

Because I haue mentioned the Iesuites Arts in these parts, let this also be added, that Master Canning chiefe Merchant, and Agent for the Company, writ to Surat for some others to assist him, being in great feare of poisoning by the Iesuites at the Court, and before any could bee sent, hee was dead, May the nine and twentieth, 1613. One English-man dying a little before, was buried in their Church-yard, whom they tooke vp and buried in the highway, but were compelled by the King to lay him in his former place, threatening to cume them out of his countrey, and their buried bodies out of that Church-yard. But this later watteres brought them into further miseries: being denied their stipend, and therefore forsaken of their new Conuers, who bringing them their Beades, did vpbraid them the want of their pay, one of the best Arguments (though no great miracle) when with they had perswaded them to their Religion. A French Iesuit at Amadabar begged reliefe of the English, wanting necessary sustentance. Before, the King allowed the Superior seuen Rupias a day, and the rest three. But now this and their faire Church also is denied them, and they say their hoies in their chamber. Iohn Mildnall, an English Papist, had learned (it is reported) the Art of poisoning; by which he made away three other English-men in Persia, to make himselfe Master of the whole flock; but I know not by what meanes himselfe tasted of the same cup, and was exceedingly swelled, but continued his life many moneths with Antidotes, which yet here left him at Agra, where hee left the value of twentie thousand Dolars, after through the Kings Iustice recovered by the English.

Many other Sea-fights haue since happened in diuers parts of the Indies, betwixt Our men and the Portugals, as that by Captaine Ben. f. Iosph (in which hee was slaine, and Captaine Pepmel succeeded in the place and quarrell) with Mmanuel de Alencas, whose Carrack was consumed with fire by themselves (as was thought) rather then to great Treasures should be made English spoyle: also in the Persian Gulfe, s by Captaine Shilling (slaine therein) Captaine Blithe and others, which chased the assylying Portugals. Roy Frere de Andrade their Commander, called the Pride of Portugall getting a fall; and since that Ormus he selfe taken by the Persians; diuers other Portugall prizes, and that especially of the Richard, a small Pinasse of about twentie Tuns, which tooke a Portugall Ship supposed of two hundred and fiftie; that hauing about fourteen men and boyes, this two hundred and fiftie: These and other fights with them, and more vnsfortunate with the Dutch, in those parts I haue deliuered at large in my Pilgrim, or Bookes of Voyages, which now together with this cometh to the publike view of the World.

P. V.

Of the Trauels of diuers English-men in the Mogols Dominions.

OF the Trauels of Master Fitch in these parts, wee haue alreadie spoken: and of Captaine Hawkins. In the yeere 1609. the Ascension by wilfulnesse of the Master (as is reported) founded in the Sea, twentie leagues from shoare, which yet they attained, being fise and fiftie persons, in the Riuer of Gandewe, from whence they travelled twelue Course, or eightene Miles to Sabay, and twelue Course more to Surrat: from thence to Daytaotote, which Citie, hee saith, could not bee conquered by the Mogol, and yielded vpon composition, hauing still a Banyan King. Sixe and twentie Course further is Natherbery, a great Bazar or Market of Brazen wares, Armour and Beasts. Eight and twentie Course beyond is the Towne Saddisee on the Riuer Tyndee, which runs to Surrat, and diuideth the Bannians and Guzurate. Thence they travelled twelue Course to a Monasterie, and the next day came to Bramport, where the Great Generall called Can Cawanne liueth, who on the twelfth of October returned from the Warres, with fiftene hundred Elephants, thirtie thousand Horses, ten thousand Camels, three thousand Dromedaries. This Citie is faire bigger then London, of great Trade, and faire. From hence they went fiftene Courses to Caddor, fourteene to Sawbon, and thence with the Carauan many daies, leauing which they ioyned with a Can of the Countrey bound for Agra, travelling fise daies through a Desart, wherein are store of wild Elephants, Lions, Tygres, Cat of Mountaines, Porpentines, and other wild Beasts innumerable; but these they saw, and were forced to make fires in the nights about their Tents to guard them. These Desarts are a hundred Course long, each Course being a mile and halfe. They had in their way after they were past this Desart, the Citie Handee, where the King hath a Castle and Houle cut out of the maine Rock, and wrought with carued worke round about, in it fiftie Peeces of Ordinance, a Fort Impregnable, and made a Prison for great Men. Heere were also two Hospitals for Capitaines maymed in the Warres. The next day they came to Tamlico, which runneth into Indus, and two daies after to Agra.

He tells of Elephants fighting before the Mogol, parted with Rackets of wilde fire, made round like hoops, which they runne in their faces: some fight with wild Horses, fise Horses to an Elephant, which he kills with claspings his trunk about their necks, and pulling them to him, breakes their necks with his teeth. Hee hath also Deere, Rams, Veruathoes, or Be-zors, Lyons, Leopards, Wolves, that fight before him. Condemned persons may craue the combat with the Lyon: one he saw that at the first encounter felled the Lyon with his Fist, but was soone torne in peeces, before the King. Hee saw also Allegators or Crocodiles kept in Ponds for like purpose, one of which killed two stoned Horses at one time.

There are foure great Markets every day, where things are very cheape, a Hen for two pence, a Sheepe for two shillings, a good Hog sold by the Bannians for two shillings, and other things proportionable. They craued the Kings Passe for England, who granting it vnder his Hand and Seale, the Secretary went with them to the Third Queene (of which he is said to haue ten, and a thousand Concubines, and two hundred Eunuchs) which was Keeper of the Great Seale. Hence they passed fise in number to Fetterbarre a twelue Course, and twelue more to Banie, which is the chiefe Place for Indico in all the Indies, where are twelue Indico Mills. Indico growes on small bushes, like Goose-berry bushes, and beares a seed like a Cabadge-seed, and being cut downe lies on heapes for halfe a yeere to rot, and then brought into a Vault to bee trodden with Oxen from the stalkes, and so is grownd fine at the Mills, and lastly, boyled in Fornaces, refined and sorted, the best there worth eight pence a pound.

Thence they passed to Hendown, fise and twentie Course, an ancient faire Citie, to Mogol, a small Market Towne fourteene, to Hallot twelue, to Chatsoe twelue, to Ladanna twelue, to Mosabad eight, to Bandafon twelue. Thence to Paddar, a Riuer that runnes into the Persian Gulfe, and parts the Indostans and Hendownes. Twentie Course beyond, Roree, Buckar, and Suckar, in the Riuer of Damiadee which runnes into the same Sea. At Buckar lyes Allee Cah, Vice-Roy of the Bulloches, a stubborne People: this Towne stands like an Island in the Riuer. Suckar is a clothing Towne, the first of the Bulloches, and Roree the last of the Molans, which are Mahumetans. Here they staid foure and twentie daies for a Califa or Carauan (a great company of Merchants travelling together) because the Countrey was full of Theeues. Seuentene Course from Suckar is Gorra, a Towne of the Bulloches, which (he saith) worships the Sunne, and are Man-eaters, of Gyant-like proportion. ment, Aprill the first, 1610, they were beset with Theeues, twelue Fiddlers first meeting them, but their Musicke cost deere by bribes and composition, the Mogols passe hindering further outrage. Seenteene Course they travelled to Daddor; foure and thirtie ouer the Mountaines to Vachello; from thence seuen and fiftie ouer the Mountaines to Candahar, a great Citie of the Puttans, where Sander Can resided as Vice-Roy, where are continually seuen or eight thousand Camels occupied in Trade to and fro. The Gouernour hath fortie thousand Horsen in rediness for Warre.

Richard Still and John Crowther, were lately sent from Azmeire, Afimere or Agimere, where the Mogoll now resides to Spahan in Persia, to obtaine Trade for the English; by Sir Robert Sherkes means, which was effected. They passed by the way of Lahore, and therefore I would desire You to beare Them company, for better knowledge of the Countrey. Their way was first towards Agra, and Fetipore, which is a faire Citie, and hath in it a goodly House of the Kings, built by Eckebar, with many spacious Gardens; now it goes to ruine, Aprill the ninth, 1614. they come to Dillee, a very great and ancient Citie, where many Kings ly buried (and as some say the Rites of Coronation are still solemnized) many Nobles and Captaines haue their Houses of Pleasure, and their Sepulchres: the vulgar sort beggarly, most Banians. On the seenteenth, they came to Sinan an ancient Citie. On the one and twentieth to the old Citie Sultanpoare. Sixe Courses from it they passed a Riuer as broad as the Thames called Viaw, which runnes West into Sinda or Indus. Here was Puchie Can his Tents pitched like a little Citie: he was Embassadour into Persia. On the foure and twentieth they came to Lahore, Their Report of this agrees with Master Coryats, whose Relation thereof is lately published. They say it is the best of India, plentifull of all things, or in Master Coryats words, such a delicate and euen Trade of ground as I neuer saw before (and hee hath seene a great deale, besides his Europzan sights at Venice, & since at Constantinople, hauing added more Asian Titles to his before Admured Name, then the ancient Roman Scipio's or Caesars dreamt of, yea more then Iustinian in the Proeme of his Imperiall Institutions hath marshalled and mustered together; the furthest foot English-Traueller that our dayes haue had, and the longest English stile which our eares haue heard, with many rests for your wearied breath by the way, a stile indeed so high you can hardly get ouer, HEROSOLYMITAN-SYRIAN-MESOPOTAMIAN-ARMENIAN-MEDIAN-PARTHIAN-PERSIAN-INDIAN LEGGE-STRETCHER OF ONCOMB) Euen this our Ordombian Foot-Pilgrime, which makes your Pen-Pilgrime in I know not what liking or likeness, at the very mention of his Name to sympathize, and his braines to fall in Trauell as learnedly mad, scarcely able to containe wonted words and wits, in this extaticall gaze and mazz of that Propetike Foot: ready to admire, adore and kisse, and yet (O braines, No braines) to enuy that his lowest part: For who is able to know his better parts? He doubts whether the like be to be found, within the whole Circumference of the habitable World. A row of Trees extends it selfe on both sides the way from the Townes end of Lahore, twentie dayes iourney, to the Townes end of Agra: most of them bearing (saith Still) a kinde of Mulberry. The way is dangerous by night for Theeues, by day secure. Euery five or sixe Course there are faire Seras of the Kings or Nobles, for beautifying the way, memory of their Names, and entertainment of Trauellers, where you may haue a Chamber and a Place to set your Horses, with store of Horse-meat; but in many of them little prouision for Men, by reason of the Banian Superstition. When a man hath taken vp his lodging in one of these, no other man may dispossesse him. About day-broke all make ready to depart together, and then the Gates are opened, till then shut for feare of Theeues. After the Sun hath bene vp two houres, the heat makes trauell irksome.

Lahore is one of the fairest and ancientest Cities in India, standing on Indus: It containeth at the least (M. Coryat tells you) sixtene miles in compasse. Twelue daies before hee came there, he passed Indus, there as broad as the Thames at London. In the mid-way betwixt Lahore and Agra, ten miles out of the way on the left hand, a Mountainous people, are said to haue but one Wife to all the Brethren of one Family, as wee haue elsewhere spoken of the Arabians. Merchants resort to this Citie out of all parts of India, imbarcking their goods here in great Boats for Turra, the chiefe Citie in Sinda, a Trade of much importance in times of Peace to the Portugals, which by this way Traded to Ormus and Persia, and this way also furnishing India with Pepper, Twelue or fourteene thousand Camels lading yere-ly passeth from hence to Persia by Candahar, before the Wars with the Portugals but three thousand; this mountainous way, being in Winter cold, in Summer hot. The Carauans spend sixe or seuen moneths betwixt Lahore and Spahan, Spices are deere in Persia by reason of the long land-carriage from Mesulapatan this way. Still and Crowther departed from Lahore, May the thirteenth, and on the two and twentieth came to Multan, a great and and ancient Citie, within three Course of Indus, but poore; for which cause they detain the Carauans there, diuers dayes, eight, ten, or twelue, to benefit the Citie. They entered the Mountaines, the second of Iune, where they had brackish water: the third and fourth daies they travelled all night, climbing high Mountaines, and following water-courts, and so continued till they came to Chatcha on the tenth. In all these eight dayes travell, is no sustenance for Man or Beast, except in some places a little grasse, and therefore at Lacca in the beginning of this way they hired an Oxe to carry Barly for their Horses. On the nineteenth, they came to Duckce, another Fort of the Mogols, and the seven and twentieth passed the Darmas, or straits of the Hills, dangerous narrow wayes on both sides menaced by high Rocks, from whence a few with stones may stop great multitudes, and diuers Carauans are thus cut off. For the Agwans or Puttans, the Mountaine Inhabitants are a theuifish people. The second of Iuly, they came to Pefimga another Fort, and passing thence ouer a mightie Mountaine, on the seuenth came to Candahar. The Agwans are white, stout, strong, rob Carauans, sell all stragglers; but now with feare, and the gaine they get by selling their Cattell to the Carauans, they are more tractable.

Charcha, a Fort.

Conuert faith, they weare their beards long, are not Mahumetans; their Priests weare Sack-cloth, with great chaines about their middles, falling downe and praying in Sack-cloth and Ashes. At Candahar they hire Camels for India, or Persia: hence into Persia the Countrey is barren, and therefore they go in smaller companies, sometimes in two or three dayes trauell not seeing a greene thing: at their lodging-places, water, but often brackish and stinking. Hence they departed Iuly the three and twentieth, and on the five and twentieth came to Cusheenna, the vnmōst Garrison in the Mogols Frontiers, thirte Course from Candahar. On the seven and twentieth they came to Grees, a Castle of the Sophies, a Course from the River Sabba, which separateth the Persian and Mogoll Confines. The people of Grees are Theues, and the Captaine little better then a Rebelle.

From hence they reckon their way by parasang (a parasang fise of which make two Courses. They travelled = August the sixth, to Farra, a Towne walled with Sun-dryed Brick, and stored with Water, without which here is no store, and therefore they carry it in some places, if there be good ground, three or foure miles vader ground. Heere they vse men kindly as they goe into Persia, for feare of complaint, but in their returne to India very hardly, searching them to the skin for Gold, which to carry out, or any Silver coyne but the Kings, is death. On the twelfth day, they were faine to dig for water. On the two and twentieth, they came to Deuzayde, where they pretend all to be Religious people. On September the fifteenth (I fill follow Still) they came to Spahan, where they found Sir Robert Sherly, then dispatched in Embassage for Spaine from the King of Persia, by the way or Ormus for Goa, and thence to Lisbon. Hee procured the Kings Great Seale to all his Gouvernours of Sea-Ports, kindly to entertaine the English at Iasques, &c. dated September the thirtieth, 1615. the same day that Sir Robert and his Lady departed with great pompe to Siras.

John Crowther returned October the twentieth, towards Lahor, and he on December the second, towards Bagdat, and thence by Aleppo for England.

William Nicols, one of the Ascensions company, trauelled the Mogols Countrey Eastward to Melulopatan, where the Hollanders had then a Factorie. John Mildnall in his Letters, dated from Casbin in Persia, 1606. October the third, testifieth, that he had bene at Lahor and at Agra, where hee presented the King with nine and twentie great Horses, at fiftie or three score pounds a Horse, with diuers Jewels and Rings, and obtained Articles of Trading. Of his coming since into those parts, is before mentioned from Master Wingingtons Relations. And his Trauels are the next Trauels of our Pen; first, from Surrat to Amadabar, by Periano, Columbay, Barcho (a Citie walled, on a high Hill, a River running by as broad as the Thames, where are the best Calicoes in the Kingdome) Saringz, Carron, Boldra (a Citie fairer but lesse then Barcho, where Mussaf Chon hath three thousand horse) Nirand (a great Towne where they make Indico. These are in the way from Surrat to Amadabar, chiefe Citie of Guzerat, neere as great as London, strongly walled, situate in a plaine by the Rivers side, much frequented by Merchants, Christians, Moores, and Ethnikes. The Gouvernour is Abdala Chan of fise thousand Horse pay. From thence hee went to Cambaya. At Serkeffe three Courses from Amadabar, hee saw the Sepulchres of the Kings of Guzerat, very faire and well kept, much visited from all parts of the Kingdome. Their Temple is very faire. A Course from hence is a goodly Houle by the Rivers side, and a Garden a mile in compasse. It was built by Chon Chonnaw, the chiefe of the Mogol Nobilitie, in memorie of a great Victorie there obtained on the last King of Guzerat there captiued, and his Kingdome subdued, the battell was fought in this place. They lodged one night in this Houle, where none dwelleth. Only poore men are appointed to looke to the Garden. (commonly called Tutta) chiefe Citie of Sinda, hee was sent thither, and December the thirteenth, came to Calsumpato, and thence with a Caphilo trauelled on the fourteenth to Callitaloway a faire Caille, and the fifteenth to Calwalla, a prettie Village, which Echebar gaue to a company of Women and their Posteritie for euer, to bring vp their children in dancing, &c. They practised this in the Carauan, euery man giuing them money, and then impudently asked if any man wanted a bed-fellow. The next day they came to Carrya, a well-manned Fortresse, and staying a day for more company because of Theues, came the next to Deceanura, losing one Camell stolne from them, and a Man slaine. Thence to Bolodo, a Fort kept by Newlock Abram Cabrath, which that day came with a hundred and three score and nine heads of the Calies, a robbing Nation. The next day to Sariandgo another Fort, and on the one & twentieth to Radempoort, a great Town with a Fort, where they staid to make prouision of Water, & other necessities for their iourney through the Desarts.

Desart.

On the three and twentieth they went seuen Courfe, lay in the Fields, and met a Carauan which came from Tutta, robbed of all their goods: on the foure and twentieth, twelve on the five and twentieth, fourteene, lodged by a Well of water so salt that their Castell could not drinke it: the six and twentieth ten Courfe, to such another Well; and their gaue their Camels drinke, not hauing drunke before in three dayes: the seuen and twentieth fourteene courfe. The eight and twentieth ten, and came to a Village called Negar Parker. In this Desart they saw great store of wilde Ases, red Deere, Foxes, and other wilde Beasts. At Parker they met another robbed Carauan. This Towne payes Tribute to the Mogol. From hence till you come within halfe a dayes iourney of Tutta, they acknowledge no King, but rob and spare whom they please. When the Mogol sends any Armie against them, they fire their Houses (which are made of Straw and Mortar, in forme of Bee-Hiues soone reuilded) and flye into the Mountaines. They take for custome what they please, and then guard Passengers and Merchants, loth any should rob them but themselves.

From hence they went fixe Courfes, and lay by a Tanke or Pond of Fresh-water, and on the last of December, eight Courfes, and lodged by a brackish Well, January the first, they trauelled ten Courfes to Burdiano. The Water is brackish, and many were sicke of it; yet they were forced to make prouision thereof for foure dayes, the space of fortie Courfes; and on the fifth they came seuen other Courfes to three Wells, of which two were salt, the third not perfectly fresh: the next day ten Courfes to Nauraquemire a prettie Towne, where their Radingpore Caphila forsooke them. He and two other Indian Merchants, with their nine Seruants, ten Camels, and fixe Camel-men remained to goe for Tutta, whither they had now three dayes iourney.

From this Paradise (so it seemed after so tedious a Desart) they departed, January the eight, hauing hired one of the Ragi, or Gouernour his kindred for twentie Laries (which make about twentie shillings) to conduct and conuoy them, and went ten Courfes to Gundayaw, where they had bene robbed, but for their Guard. The next day were twice assailed, and forced each time to pay fixe Laries, came to Sarruna, a great Towne of the Razbootches with a Caille: whence it is fourteene Courfes to Tutta. Ragi Benma the Gouernour, is eldest Sonne to Sultan Bulbul, who had bene lately captiued by the Mogoll, and spoiled of his eyes, and two moneths before our coming had made an escape to these Mountaines, animating his kindred to reuenge that losse of his sight. This Ragi was kinde to our Author as a stranger, and made him sup with him: the occasion that they hired him for fortie Laries, with fiftie Horse-men to conduct them to the Gates of Tutta. Hereunto they were the rather perswaded by aduice of a Banian, which had then come from Tutta, who also told Master Winington, that Sir Robert Sherly had bene much abused by the Portugals, and the Gouernour at Lowribander, his House fired, and his Men hurt in the night: and arriving at Tutta thirteene dayes after, was there vnkindly vsed by Morfa Ryho the Gouernour. This Ragi led them fixe Courfes, where they lay by a Riuer side, and at two of the 50 clocke in the morning they departed, but were led a contrary way, and about breake of day brought into a Thicket, where he made them vnlade, tooke away their Weapons and bound them; suddenly with their Camell ropes drawne close with a Truncheon, hangd the two Merchants and their fixe Men, stripped and buried them. Mee (as a faire Countryman, not knowing the language) hee spared with my Pions or Seruants, but tooke my Horse (giuing me a lade) and fourescore Rupias from mee, sent mee twentie Courfes with my men vp to the Mountaines to a brother of his, where I continued two and twentie dayes a close prisoner, and then order was sent to conuey mee to Parker: but in the way was robbed of my clothes and all that I had: so that I and my men were forced to liue vpon the charitie of people by begging: onely my Horse, as not worth taking, was left me, for which I could get but foure mamoodes (four shillings) but chancing on a Banian whom I had knowne at Amadabar, I was relieued and sold not my Horse. Wee came to Radingpore May

May the nineteenth, and April the second, to Amadabar: thence to Cambaya, and (passing the River seven Courfes broad, yearly drowning many) to Saurau, a Towne and Castle of the Razboorches, and five and twentie Courfes further to Borocho, and passing that River, to Cassimba; and thence to Surat. In all this Countrey of Sinda, no Citie of greater Trade thence to Surat. The chiefest Port thereto is Lowribander, three dayes journey from thence, where is a faire Roade without the Rivers mouth, cleere of Wormes, which about Surat, and other places of the Indies infest the ships, so that after three or foure moneths riding, if it were not for sheathing, they were not able to returne. The Ports and Roades of Sinda are free of them. In two monthes they passe from Tutja to Lahor, and returne downe the streame in 10 one. And from Agra goods may be conveyed on Camels in twentie dayes, which is on Sinda River, and thence in fiftene or sixtene dayes aboard the Ships at Lowribander, as soone as to Surat, if Theeves did not make it lesse secure.

May the fourth, 1614. Master Whittington went from Surat to Brampore, where Sultan Parnise lyes. It is situate in a Plaine by a great River, having a large Castle; and thence to Agra: all which way is seven hundred Courfes. From Surat to Brampore is a pleasant and champaigne Countrey, full of Rivers, Brookes, and Springs. From Brampore to Agra very mountainous, hardly passable for Camels by Mando the neerest way: there are many high Hills and strong Castles in the way, Townes and Cities in every dayes journey well inhabited, the Countrey peaceable and cleere of Theeves. Betwene Agimere or Azimere and Agra, are a hundred and twentie Courfes: at every Courfe end a great Pillar erected, and at every tenth Courfe a Seraglia or Place of lodging for Man and Horse, with Hosts: to dresse your Victuall (if you please) three pence will pay for your Horse and Meate-dressing: there are also at every tenth Courfe faire Houses erected by Echebar for his Women, and none else may lie in them. The reason hereof is reported, that Echebar wanting Children went on Pilgrimage on foot to Asmere for that purpose, at every Courfe end saying his prayers, and lodging at the tenth. Agra is a huge Towne, situate by the great River Geminie or Iamena. The Castle is the fairest thing in it, compassed with the fairest and highest Wall that I have seene, two miles about, well replenished with Ordnance: the rest, except Noble-mens houses (which are faire and seated by the River) ruinous. Fatipore is decayed, but hath a very stately Temple built by Geometry; as Echebars Sepulchre, the fairest thing that ever I saw. I went to Ganges, two dayes journey from Agra, the Water whereof is carryed a hundred miles by the Banians for devotion, which say it will never stinke, how long soever it be kept. From Agra Master Fitch went to Satagam in Bengala by Water. So that if you observe all these Trauels of Fitch, Couert, Still, Whittington, and the rest of our Countrey-men, and adde thereto the journey of Goes from thence to China, with other Relations of the Jesuites before expressed, you shall have a better Corographie of this Countrey, then any of our Maps have yet deliuered. And their want hath made me thus full and tedious. I might adde the Trauels of William Clarke, one of the Ascensions Company, which served the Mogol in his Warres diuers yeeres (and returned in the last Ship, whilst these things are publishing)
10 against the Rasboots and Decans, having two Horse pay, which is neere fixe pounds a month, and had some moneths pay allowed him before-hand, that so hee might furnish himselfe: for they must buy and maintaine their Horses.

Master Walter Payton was Master in the Expedition, and carried Sir Robert Sherley, whom they had thought to have landed at Gauder or Guader in Masqueranno, in five and twentie Degrees, and six and twentie Minutes, but the people were then in Rebellion against the Persian, and by damnable treachery had possessed themselves of the Ship and all the goods, had not one Hoge Comal, a Surgeon amongst them revealed this myserie of their iniquity: they had thus betrayed three ships before. By this villany of the Bulloches, they were forced to goe further to the mouth of Sinda, which is East and by North, in foure and twentie Degrees, and foure and thirtie Minutes. They landed the Embassador, September the nine and twentieth, 1613, at Diul, in the Mols Dominion, fiftene miles from the ships. The Portugals reported them to be Theeves, according to their custome. And when they fought for Trade in Sinda, the Gouvernour had yielded but for the Portugals, which threatened to depart if the English were admitted, whose custome hee was loth to lose, being worth, hee said, a Lack of Rupias, ten thousand pound English and more (which shewes the exceeding Trade of Sinda) by the yeere.

But this Countrey, and the disposition of their King, are most amply described to vs together, with the remarkable Rarities of those parts, by the Hon. industry of Sir Thomas Roe, Embassador for his Maiesie with the Mogoll, whose Map of those parts wee heere present you; as likewise by his learned Chaplaine, Master Edward Terry: both whose Observations wee have presented in our first Tome of Voyages. To them I referre the industrious Reader, for more ample relations of these parts, then in this Worke were couenient to insert.

Amongst other things, the Reader shall see the true course of Indus (which all Moderne Geographers have exceedingly falsified) and of Ganges. William Finch hath also written of those parts. I thought good here to add that which Master Steele and his wife told me of the Women of those parts. Master Steele having a project of Water-works, to bring the water of Ganges by Pipes, &c. carried five men with him to the Mogol, who gave them entertainment with large wages by the day, and gave to each an Arabian Horse. One of these was a Painter, whom the Mogol would have to take his picture, and because hee could not speake the language, Master Steele (who could speake the language of the Court, which is Persian) was admitted (a thing not permitted to Men) into the Mogols lodgings, where he did sit for the said Limner. At his entrance, the chiefe Eunuch put a cloth over his head, that he should not see the Women (which hee might heare as hee passed, and once also saw them, the Eunuch purposely putting on a thinner cloth over his head) there being of them some hundreds. His wife had more access to Chan Channas Court, whose daughter (sometimes wife to the elder brother of this Mogol, and living still a widow) had a desire to see the English-woman, and Chan Channa intreated her husband to permit it. Shee was fetched in a cloie Chariot drawne by white Oxen, attended by Eunuchs; and was first brought into an open Court, in midst of which was a Tanke or Well of Water, where sat many women, slaves to Chan Channas daughter, of divers Nations and complexions; some blacke, exceeding lovely and comely of person notwithstanding, whose haire before did stand up with right tufts, as if it had growne upward, nor would rustling disorder them; some browne, of Indian complexion; others very white, but pale, and not ruddy: many of them seemed goodly and lovely, all sitting in their slight, but rich garments on the floore covered with carpets. The Lady came forth in meaner attire, whereat they all arose and did her reverence, with their faces to the ground. Mistresse Steele made her three courtesies, after the English fashion (being also in English attire) and delivered her a Present (without which there is no visitation of great persons) and the Lady caused her to sit by her, and after discourse, entertained her with a Banquet and began familiaritie with her, continued and increased with often visitations, and rewarded with many gifts, as of womens vestments of of those parts; some of which I saw, the upper garment like a smocke, of thin Calico, vnder which they wear a paire of breeches close about, the neather parts very long and slender, loosely rustling about their legs, of thin stuffe also; the mans garment differing from the womans, by the fastning on the side vnder the arme, whereas the womans is fastened before, both tyed with ribbands. Chan Channa caused his Taylor to take view of Master Steele, and without other measure hee made him a cloake of cloth of gold, after the English fashion very comely, which I also saw.

§. VI.

Of the Rasboots, and other people subject to the Mogol, and of their Countries, Religion, and Rites.

HE have we delineated this huge Giantly Body of the Mogol Empire. The Soule or Religion thereof, is more inuisible. What lurking places and labyrinths the breasts of the Kings haue had in their vnkowne, curious, vncertaine Faith, yee haue heard, and may thereby guffe at the rest. As the people are manifold, so are their Rites; some of which, about Ganges, and in other parrs, haue already beene touched: and some hereafter, as the People and their Rites are diffused and dispersed in diuers Tracts of India, we shall elsewhere mention. Besides Christian Forreiners, the principall Religion is Ethioike, though that of the Prince be Mahumetan.

The Reibuti, Rasboots, or Rasboches, the ancient Inhabitants of the Countrey of Sinda, are Gentiles. How strong some of them is, you haue heard Captaine Hawkins report. His name, as I haue since learned of Mr. Rogers, Mr. Clarke, and Mr. Wilkington, is Ranna; some of them affirming, That hee is lately come in, and hath sent his sonne a pledge to the Mogols Court, who for this cause, and his sake, hath bene so long resident at Azmers. But Mr. Clarke, employed in these wars, saith, That it is not a subiection, but voluntarie friendship and neighbourhood, with acknowledgement of himselfe the Inferior. A Rebel or Outlaw he cannot be called, because hee was neuer subiect; accounting the Mogol Superior in power, but not his Lord. There are of these many Casts, or Tribes, each of which haue supreme and independent Lords: Nature building them, with little helpe of Art, impregnable Fortresses, or inaccessible Hills. One of which, called Dewras, is said to haue very many populations; able on the Hill tops to gather sufficient provisions for themselves, and the neighbourhood.

bout-Markets; impossible without corruption to be conquered. When any of these Casts, or Tribes, disagree, the Mogoll interpose himselfe, professing to take part with the right. Their Country lies in the direct way from Surat to Agra, the wayes by Amadaur, or by Brampore, both much about, yet frequented by Merchants, for feare of them. The Country people ^{b M. Wishing.} are rude, naked from the waste vpwards, with Turbants differing from the Mogol fashion. Their Armes are Sword, Buckler, and Lance. Their Buckler is great, in fashion of a Bee-hiue, in which they will giue their Camels drinke, and Horses prouender. Their Horses are good, swift, and strong, which they ride vnsadd, and back at a yeare old. A resolute people; which the Mogoll saith, knowes as well to die, as any in the world. They cate no Beefe nor Buffolo, but haue them in superstitious respect. The Rasbutche husband dying, the wife is burned. The manner is this: The wife accompanies the dead bodie of her husband in her best array, pompously attended with her friends and kindred, and with Musick. The fire being made, she compasseth the same twice or thrice: first hewayling her husbands death; and then reioicing, that she shall now liue with him againe; and then embracing her friends, sits downe on the top of the pyle, taking her husbands head in her lap, and bids them kindle the fire. This done, her friends throw Oyle and other sweet Perfumes on her, shee enduring the fire with admirable patience, loofe, and not bound. I haue scene many (it is M. Wingtons report) the first at Surat, the woman being but ten yeeres old, and yet a woman hauing not knowne her husband, who was slaine in the wars, and his clothes brought home. Yet would she needs burne with his clothes: and the Governour not permitting, because shee was a Virgin, her friends intreated and bribed him thereto, shee seeming impatient of that delay, and saying, her husband was a great way before her, with much blind ioy entring into endlesse sorrowes. The kindred of the decaised husband doe not force this vnkind kindnesse, but the wiues owne kindred; holding it a disgrace to their family, if she refuse, which she hath power to doe: but few will; and then shee must shauie her haire, and breake her jewels, and is not suffered to eate, drinke, sleepe, or company with any bodie, till her death. If, after purpose to burne, impatient of the flame, she leapes out, her father and mother will bind and burne her perforce. But such weaknesse seldom happens. In some places they obserue it, with Rites a little differing: carrying the woman in great pompe ^{R. Courti.} a Pageant, and binding her to a stake, all her kindred kneeling round about her, and praying to the Sun, and their other Idols. Shee hath betwixt her legs, and vnder each arme, a bag of Gun-powder; the fire made all of sweet Woods. Wee shall mention other Rites in other places.

The Handowes possesse the Country North from Afnere toward the Multans: degenerate Gentiles; and refusing no manner of Flesh or Fish. They pray naked, dresse and eat their meat naked; and where they dresse and eate their meat, make a Circle, within which, none must enter during that time. Their women are brought vp from their child-hood with shackles, some of Silver, some of Brasse, and some of Iron, on their legges, and Rings in their eares; all which encrease with themselves, being made bigger, as they grow; so that in time a man may thrust his hand through the holes of their eares. Also they wear Bracelets of Elephants teeth about their armes, from the wrist to the elbow. Wee haue already spoken of the Bulloches, their Northerly neighbours, Sunne-worshipping, Giantly biggnesse, and Inhumane humanitie, in eating mans flesh (and likewise of the Puttars, or Agwans.) The Bulloches in Sinda, and vpon the Persian Gulfe (it seemes of this generation) are Mahumetans, Robbers by Land, and Pyrats by Sea, whereto they adde the murder of those they rob; Their treachery to Sir R. Sherly, and the Expedition, is before mentioned; which had it had expedition according to their plot, they had murdered all but the Surgeon, the Musician, the Boyer, and the Women. When I was in Sinda (saith M. Wington) they tooke a Boat, with seuen Italians, and one Portugall Fryar, this ripped vp by them, to seeke Gold in his entrailes, the rest slaine in the fight. Yet there are very honest men of them in Cuzerat, and about Agra.

Touching other Superstitions of this Kingdome, thus writeth Ioannes Oramus, in the Narration of this Kingdome. Not farre from the Citie Lahor is an Idoll, resembling a woman, which they call Nazar Coto, framed with two Heads, & six or seuen Armes, and twelue or fourteene Hands; one of which brandisheth a Speare, another a Club. Hereunto resort many Pilgrims to worship; and hereof they tell many miracles: as, that many cut off their tongues, which are againe restored whole vnto them, but remaine mute. Some thinke our breath to bee our Soule. Some affirme, That all things are the same thing. Some, that God onely hath a being, other things are shadowes and apparances. Some thinke all things, and so some, the round Circle of the World; and some, themselves, to bee God. Almost all doe hold the commigration of Soules into the bodies of Beasts. They say, the World shall last foure Ages, or Worlds; whereof three are past. The first lasted seicenteene Lacthes (euery Laches contained an hundred thousand yeeres) and eight and twentie thousand yeeres. Men in that World liued ten thousand yeeres, were of great stature of bodie, and great fincintie of minde. Thrice in this space did God visibly appeare on the Earth: First, in forme of a fish, that hee might bring out the Booke of the Law of Brama; which one Causacar had hurled into the Sea: The second time, in forme of a Snail, that he might make the Earth dry and solid: Lastly, like a Hog, to destroy one that said he was God; or as others of them as truly say, to recouer the Earth from the Sea, which had swallowed it. The second World lasted ten Laches, and ninetie two thousand and six yeeres; in which, men were as tall as before, and liued a thousand yeeres. God did appeare foure times: First, in a monstrous forme, the vpper part a Lion, the lower a Woman, to repress the pride of one, which gaue out himselfe for God: Secondly, like a poore Bramane, to punish a proud King, that would by a new-deiued Art fly into Heauen: The third time, to becuenged of another King, which had slain a poore Religious man, he came in the likenesse of a Man, named Paracaram: and lastly, like one Ram, the sonne of Gioceras, which had slaine Paracaram. The third World continued eight Laches and foure thousand yeeres, wherein men liued five hundred yeeres; and God appeared twice in Humane likenesse. The fourth Age shall endure foure Laches, whereof are already passed foure thousand six hundred fourescore and twelue yeeres. They say God will also appeare in this Age. Others imagine, That he hath already appeared, and that Echabar is hee. Some hold, That those ten Appearances were but creatures, which had receiued Diuine power. They themselves easily perceiue the vanity of these Chimeras, and monstrous opinions, but will not leaue them, lest they should (at the same cast) lose their Wealth and Superstition together.

f. 8. Fitch.

In the Country of the Mogor they haue many fine Carts, carued and gilded, with two Wheels, drawn with two little Bulls, about the bignesse of our great Dogs in England, and they will runne with any Horse, and carry two or three men in one of these Carts. They are couered with Silke, or fine Cloth, and be in vse as our Coaches in England.

T. Coryas.

But we will that vp this too great discourse of the great Mogols Greatnesse, in the words of the Worlds Greatest Foot-post. He tels vs, from the very Mogols Court, That this present Prince, is a man of three and fiftie yeeres of age, of complexion middle, betwixt white and blacke, in a more expresse Epitheton, Olive; of a seemely composition of bodie, of stature little vntoquall to Mine, but much more corpulent (hee neuer travelled so much on foot, nor ten moneths together with fiftie shillings expence.) His Dominion is little lesse then foure thousand English miles; which, if it come short of the Turke in Geometrical dimension of ground, it is with a great pleonafme supplied by the fertillitie of his Soyle, and in the vni-on of all his Territories. Againe, hee exceedeth him in Reuerue (a great deale more then M. Coryas reckoning) hee presenteth himselfe thrice euery day: at the rising of the Sunne, which hee adareth by the elevation of his hands; at noone, and at fue of the clocke in the evening: but he standeth in a roome aloft, alone by himself, and looketh from a window that hath an embroidered sumptuous Couerture, supported with two siluer Pillasters, to yeeld shadow vnto him. In feeding of his Beasts, hee spendeth at the least ten thousand pound sterling a day, and keepeth a thousand women for his owne body, whereof the chiefe is Normal. I haue bin in a Citie in this Country, called Detee, where Alexander ioynd battell with Por, & in token of his victory, erected a brasle Pillar, which remaineth there to this day. There arrived foure English Ships at Surat, and in the same Sir Thomas Rowe, the English Embassador to the Mogol; the newes whereof came to Asmere, O Rob. 8. 1611, and did much recomfort M. Coryas spirits (as did M. Brownes verses from Amadavars) and so I hope will yours.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Cambayans.

Although we might seem to haue spoken sufficiently of the Cambayans already, in our former Mogol-Relations; yet, both as better knowne, and because such was our Order in the former Editions, we haue allowed them a Chapter here by themselves. Cambaya is also called Guzarat, containing in length, from the Riuer Bate to Circam, a Persian Region, five hundred miles of Sea-coast, being on other parts enuironed with the Kingdomes of Dulcinda and Sanga, on the North; Mandao, on the East; on the West, Nautacos, or the Gedrosians. The Sea; and the Confines of Decan are the Southerly bounds. It hath in it, by estimation, three score thousand Populations, or inhabited Places, wated with many Streames, the chiefe whereof is Indus, which diuideth it in the middle, running from Caucasus, or Naugrocot, and after nine hundred miles journey, with two navigable mouths disemboquing it selfe into the Ocean. This Countrey is very fertile, not yeelding to any other in India, in the fruits which the Earth and Trees bring forth, besides their store of Elephants, Gains, Silke, Cotton, and such like. The people are of an Olive-colour, and goe naked, except about their priuie parts. They eat no Flesh, but Rice, Milke, Barley, and other life-lesse Creatures. The Inhabitants are, for the most part, Gentiles; and so were their Kings, until the Mahumetan Superstitions prevailed. There are v^p within the Land, People called Reisibuti, which are the natural Nobles of this Kingdome, chased by the Moores to the Mountaines, whence they make often excursions and spoyle in the Countrey; and the Cambayans pay them tribute, that they might liue in peace: of these is spoken already. Their chiefe Sea-Townes are Daman, Bandora, Surate, Rauellum, Bazuinum; and within Land, Cambaya, Madabar, Campaniel, Tansa, &c. Surat (now an English Factory) hath a Cattle of 4 Stoue, with good Ordnance: The Houses are faire, of Stone and Brick, square, with flat roofes: they have goodly Gardens, with Pomegranats, Pome. Citrons, Melons, Limons, Figs all the yeere long, curious Springs of fresh Water. The people neat, tall, louing, graue, iudicious, clothed in long white Calico, or Silke.

10 Cambaya hath bestowed the name on the whole Kingdome, which they call the Indian Cairo, for the excellencie thereof: it standeth three miles from Indus. The Tides here increase not, as with vs, at the full, but in the decrease of the Moone they are at the highest. Of this River Indus, Ptolomey and Arrianus in his Periplus of the Erythrean Sea, reckon seuen Mouthes of Entrances into the Sea; and Theues (I know not with what Friar-like, and Lyar-like boldnesse) nameth seuen at this day: but Arrianus saith, in those times six of the seuen were ouer-grown, and but one navigable. But Dianysius, Pomponius, Strabo, and the other Arrianus, which writ the life of Alexander, ascrib but two vnto it: which is confirmed by the Portugals, Arrianus hath in his eight Booke largely described the Voyage of Nearchus and Onerisius, from this Riuer, about the Coast into the Persian Gulfe, employed by Alexander the Great. It is not 160. yeeres since Machamus, a Moore, expelled the Guzarat King. This Machamus deserueth mention for one thing, wherein the Sunne hath scarce beheld his like. Hee so accustomed himselfe to poysons, that no day passed wherein hee tooke not some; for else hee himselfe had dyed, with Barbosa, as it saith with Amsian or Opinus, the yfe whereof killeth such as neuer tooke it, and the disase, such as haire. And beyond that which we reade of Mubridates in the like practice, his Nature was transformed into so venomous a habit, that if hee did meane to put any of his Nobles to death, hee would cause them to be set naked before him, and chewing certaine fruits in his mouth, which they call Choselos and Tambolos, with lime made of shells, by spitting vpon him, in one halfe houre deuoured him of life: if a Fly saie vpon his hand, it would presently fall off dead. Neither was his f loue to be preferred to his hatred, or with women was his dealing lesse deadly. For hee had three or foure thousand Concubines, of whom, none liued to see a second Sunne, after hee had carnally knowne them. His Mustaches (or haire of his vpper lip) was so long, that hee bound it vpon his head, as women doe with an haire-lace; and his beard was white, reaching to his Waite. Every day when he arose, and when hee dined, fiftie Elephants were brought into the Palace, to doe him reuerence on their knees, accompanied with Trumpets and other Musick.

Calus Rhodiginus mentions the like of a Maid, thus nourished with Poysons, her Spectle (and other Humours coming from her) being deadly: such also as lay with her carnally, presently dying. Auicenna hath also a like example of a Man, whose Nature, infected with a stronger Venome, poysoned other venomous Creatures, if any did bite him. And when a greater Serpent was brought for triall, he had by the biting thereof a two-dayes Feuer; but the Serpent dyed: The other did not harme him.

Mamudius, the Successor of King Machamus, was a great enemy to the Portugals. Baderius succeeded in state and affection, and exceeded in greatnesse and ambition. Hee invaded Mandao, and Sanga, where hee besieged Citor: then gouerned by a warlike woman; which not able to hold out longer against him, fled, and left the people in forlorne plight; who in a desperate resolution (like Sardanapalus) heaping vp their Treasures, set fire thereto, and then cast themselves therein. This fire continued three dayes, and consumed three score and ten thousand persons.

Hence Baderius triumphantly marched against the Mogor, whom Massius calleth Mtramudius, with an Army of an hundred and fiftie thousand Horse, whereof thirtie thousand were were barded; and five hundred thousand Foot-men: of great brazen Ordnance, a thousand; whereof foure Ballistikes were drawne (such was their weight) by so many hundred yokes of Oxen; with Shot and Powder hee laded five hundred Waynes, and so many with Gold and Silver, to pay his Souldiers. These Forces, with this provision, might, read the Ayre with Thunders, might make the Earth to shake with Terror; might dry and shrink up Rivers of Water, might frame another fiery Element; of Arts inuention; but could not either terrifie the Mogor, or save Badurius from a double ouerthrow; first, at Daceri; next, at Mandoa, where hee loseth his Tenus and Treasures; and shauing his beard, flyeth disguised to Diue in which, that the Portugalls might be engaged in the same warre, hee gave them leave to erect a Fortresse: A thing of such moment vnto them, that John Borelino (confinde before vnto India, for crimes objected) thought, by being the first Messenger thereof in Portugall, to purchase his libertie: whereof he might well bee reputed worthy, who in a little Vessell, scarce eighteen foot long, and sixe wide, with vndaunted courage concerning that wide, long, and tempestuous Ocean, arrived with his small companie, great newes, and greater admiration, at Lisbone. Badurius after altering his minde, and therein entertaining a treacherous Protest against the Portugalls, coloured the same with kindeesse, and he (which feared all men, no lesse then hee was feared, as guiltie to his owne Tyranny, which sometime made Dionysius of a King, a Barbar, and now this, a King of others, and his owne Cooke, trusting no man to dresse his meat) adventured to visit the Portugall Vice-Roy in his ships, professing great friendship, with great dissimulation, and by a meane Mariner, at his returne, was slaine; whereupon the whole Island submitted it selfe to the Portugall yoke. And because we haue in this Chapter mentioned so many Wonders, let this also haue place among (if not about) the rest, which presently happened. While the Portugalls were busie in their Buildings, a certaine Bengalan came to the Governour, which had liued, as hee affirmed, three hundred thirte five yeeres. The old men of the Countrey testified, That they had heard their Ancestors speake of his great age, and himselfe had a sonne fourescore and tenne yeeres old, and not at all Booke-learned, yet was a speaking Chronicle of those passed times. His teeth had sometimes fallen out, others growing in their places; and his beard, after it had beene very hoatie, by degrees returned into his former blacknesse. About an hundred yeeres before this time, hee had altered his Pagan Religion into the Arabian or Moorish. For this his miraculous age, the Sultans of Cambaya had allowed him a stipend to lue on; the continuance of which hee now sought, and did obtaine of the Portugalls. Friso Ioane dos Santos tells a long story of one yet alive, Anno 1605, of whom the Bishop of Cochin had sent men to inquire, who by diligent search found that hee was then three hundred eightie yeeres old, and had married eight times, the father of many generations. They say his teeth had thrice fallen out, and thrice renewed: his haire thrice hoary, and as oft black againe. Hee could tell of nineteene successeiue Kings, which reigned in Horan his Countrey in Bengala. Hee was also borne a Gentile, and after turned Moore, and hoped, he said, to dye a Christian, rejoycing to see a picture of Saint Francis, saying, Such a man when hee was twentie five yeeres old had foretold him this long life.

But to returne; Mamudus, succesor to Badurius, fought with all his forces to driue these new Lords out of Diue, as Selyman had done before, by a Naue and Armie sent thither; but both in vaine: of which Wars, Damianus à Goes, hath written diuers Commentaries. But this whole Countrey is now subiect to the Mogor. It was, in Alexanders time, peopled by the Massani, Sodraz, or Sabracz, Prætz, and Sangadz, as Ortelius hath placed them; where Alexander (as in diuers other places hee had done) erected a Citie of his owne name, called Alexandria. Daman another Key of this Bay, and entrance of the River Indus into the Sea; fell to the Portugalls share.

The Land of Cambaya is the fruitfullest in all India; which causeth great traffique of Indians, Portugalls, Persians, Arabians, Armenians, &c. The Guzarates, or Cambayans, are the subtilest Merchants in all those parts, They haue amongst them many Histories of Darius and Alexander, which sometime were Lords of this Indian Province. The Portugalls haue at diuers times conquered diuers of the chiefe Townes in this Kingdom, some whereof they keepe still. The women in Diue, by Art dye their teeth black, esteeming themselves so much the more beautiful, and therefore go with their lips open, to shew the blacknesse of their teeth, drawing away the couer of their lips, as if they were lip-lesse, giuing the price of Beautie to a double deformitie, Blacknesse, and a Mouth O Helpe wide. When a Cambayan dyeth, they burne his body, and distribute the ashes vnto the foure Elements (of which man consisteth) part to the Fire, part to the Ayre, to the Water allo and Earth their due portions, as Balth hath obserued.

M. Patrike Copland (Minister in the Dragon, with Captaine Bess) writes, that hee rode in this Countrey, from Medhaphrabad to Surat, in a Coach drawne with Oxen, which is the most

Of the Kingdomes of Decan.

F the Decans we haue spoken before, in the Mogol conquests, Decan is the name of a Citie, fixe leagues from which is a Hill, out of which the Diamond is taken. This Hill is kept with a Garrison, and walled about. Of the Decan Kingdomes, Barros hath reported, That about the yeere 1300. Sa Nofarado reigned in Dely, or Delin, and invaded the Kingdome of Canara (which reacheth from the River Bate, North of Chaul, vnto the Cape Comori) and wonne much from the Ancestors of the King (now termed) of Bifnaga. At his returne, he left Habsda his Lieutenant, who added to the former Conquests, gathering a Band of all mixtures, Gentiles, Moores, Christians. His sonne was confirmed in the Government, therefore called Decan, and the people Decanins, because of this confusion of so many Nations, of which, his Fathers and His forces consisted: for Decanins signifies Bastards. He shooke off allegiance to his Lord, and acknowledged none Superiour. Hee also much encreased his Dominions. His name was Manudasa. Hee appointed eigheteene Captaines or Commanders, allotting to each, severall Prouinces. These Captaines hee made, were but slaves, that so hee might the easier hold them in subjection. He commanded, that each of them should build a Palace at Beder, his chiefe Citie, and there reside certaine moneths in the yeere; his sonne remayning there in perpetuall hostage. These, in proesse of time, grew fewer, and therefore greater; the King holding nothing but his Royall Citie; all the Empire being in the hands of these slaves: which, when the Portugals came thither, were no more, but Sabay, Niza-Malucco, Madro Malucco, Melie Verida, Coge Macadam, the Abessine Eunuch, and Cota Malucco. The mightiest of them was Sabay, Lord of Goa: His sonne was Hidalcam. Thus Barrisa Garcia ab Horto writes, That the Mogors had possessed the Kingdome of Dely: but a certaine Bengalan (rebellling against his Master) slue him, vsurped his State, and by force of warre added this of Canara also to his Dominion; he was called Xabolam. This King made his sisters sonne his Successor, who was much addicted to Forreiners. He diuided his Kingdome into twelue parts, or Prouinces, ouer which, he set so many Captaines: Idalcam, from Angidaua to Cifarda: from thence to Negatona, Nizamalucco: Ouer Balaguare, or the vp-hill Country (for Bala in the Persian language signifieth The toppie, and Guate a Hill) Imadmalucco, and Catalmalucco, and Verida, &c.

These all rebelled, and captiued Daquem their King at Beder, the chiefe Citie of Decan, and shared his Kingdome amongst themselves, and some Gentiles, partners in the conspiracy. They were all forreiners, but Nizamalucco. This, and the other names, before mentioned, were Titles of Honour, giuen them, with their Offices, by the King, corrupted by the vulgar in pronouncing. Idalcam, is Adel-bam; Adel in the Persian language, signifieth Infirior; Ham is the Tartarian appellation, signifying a Prince, or King (whose name might well be the Reliques of the Tartarian conquests in those parts) so Adel-bam, is King of Infirior. Nexa in the Persian (which Scaliger saith is of like extent in the East, as Latine in the West) is a Lance; Malucco signifieth the Kingdome. Nexa, or Nizamalucco, the Speare or Lance of the kingdom, so Cotamalucco the Tower of the kingdom, Imadmalucco the Throne of the Kingdome, &c. Nizamalucco is also called Nizamoxa: which Xa or Scha, is a Persian title (signifying * as Monsieur in France, Don in Spaine) and giuen by Ismael the Sophi, and Tamas his sonne, to all those Kings that would communicate in their Sect, which Nizamoxa only yeelded to, Other of them made shew, but soone recanted. Thus saith Garcia.

The Decan * Kings being now ten or twelue, make joynt warre against the Mogoll, hauing one Lieutenant Generall, which is Amber Chapu an Abassien slave (before mentioned, out of Captaine Hawkins) who hath many Lecks of Rupias in ready money, and is Protector of the Kingdome of Amdanagar, the titular King being a child. One Robert Johnson an Englishman turned Moore, and was entertained with much respect of one of the Decan Kings, but died eight dayes after his Circumcision. So were Robert Claxton, and Robert Treilly, voluntarily robbed of that which they neuer had (Faith and Religion) and turned

Moore. The Decans dominions reach from the West Sea to that of Choromandel, or very nere thereto. The chiefe reason of their Mahumetan Religion was that Conquest by Nasradin, and his successors Moores: that there are so many Kingdomes proceed from that diuision before mentioned.

P. III.

*Bridals.
At Wittington.*

The Religion in Cambaya is partly Moorish, partly Heathenish. The Banians are many, in Sinda and other Countiees of the Mogol. There are some thirty Casts of them in Sinda (this is the Countrey which Indus last forsaketh, inhabited by Beloches, and Rasbooches, and Banians, the great Townes and Cities gouerned by Mogols.) These are of thirty different Sects, which may not eate with each other. They must also marry in their owne Cast, Tribe and Sect, and which is more, in the same trade, as the Sonne of a Barber with a Barbers Daughter. These marriages are made when they be young, sometime almost before they be. For when two women are pregnant, the Parents will make a match betwene their Children, if death or the sexe disappoint not. When they are three or foure yeeres old, the Parents which haue agreed on a match betwene their Children, make a great feast, and ser this young couple on horsebacke (a man behind each of them to hold them) in their best clothes, accompanied with the Bramenes or Priests, and many others according to their state, and so leade them vp and downe the Citie where they dwell, and then to the Pagode or Temple. After Ceremonies there done, they come home and make festiuall cheere certaine dayes, as they are able. At ten yeeres of age they lic together. The burning their dead is common to all their Sects. They are of the Pythagoreans, or he was rather of their fancy, which he learned of the Indians. When the husband dies, the wife shauers her head, and wears her jewels no more, so continuing till death. Thus farre Maister

Marriages solemnized between infants.

R. Covert.

Wittington, M. Covert relateth that they haue God in pictures of stone, hanging their Beades on the heads of the pictures, and then with their faces towards the Sunne doe worship it, saying all their comforts proceed from it. I saw a Kow adorned with Jewels and a Veil of gold, her head bedecked with garlands & flowers, and then being brought to a buriall place, where they vse to make Sermons, they kisse her feet and worship her. I asking why they did so they answered that she was the mother of beasts, & brought them milke, butter, cheefe, and the Ox to till the ground, and lastly, her Hide did make leather to make their shoes. Moreover they say, she is blest by the Mother of God to be honored aboue all beasts.

Ambrin.

Another writes that these Banians are the wisest Merchants in the East, exceding the Iewes, very rich, some worth 2. or 300000^{li}. He addes that they pay a great summe to the Mogol to prevent killing of Oxen: and when our men haue shot a Turtle-doue through the wings, they will giue a Riall of eight to redeeme and preserve it. Generall Downton in his last Iournall writes, that when they would haue obtained a Bazar or Market by the shoares answer was made that they might, but not for Bullocks. For the Mogol had granted his Firma to the Banians for a mighty summe yearly to saue their liues. For Souldiery these are but shewes of men, all their Fortitude smoking out in these superfluous speculations, and therefore an easie prey to any Inuader. So true a metempsychosis haue they sustained, being metamorphosed and transanimated from men to blokes, and liuing statues, or to ghosts. Beniamin Day nameth one of their Sects called Alb-men, whose bodies being most part naked, are couered with ashes, whereby they looke like ghosts or dead men. They liue idly on reliefe not so much as begging. One of these was in great account, with haire hanging to his feett platted together, his nailes five or sixe inches long. Vermannus is Author, that they worship not Idols, or Pagodes. Others report, That this way, and others, they are exceeding religiously deuoted. They obserue a strict kind of fasting, which lasteth with some eight dayes, with others fiftene, twenty, or thirty dayes: in all which space they eate not a bit; onely, when they thirst, drinke water. One could not see when to make an end of this penance, till his left eye fell out of his head, as both had done before out of his heart. In Cambaia they had one Bramene in such reputation of holiness and honour, that they would salute him before they meddled with their worldly affaires. One affirmed to this Iesuiste, That if his Bramene should command him to distribute all his goods to the poore, he would doe it, yea, he would lay downe his life at his command.

On the eight day of Ianuarie, in that Citie, were giuen in almes twenty thousand Pardawes, (which is in value about a Flemish Dollar;) one man had giuen five thousand thereof, another three thousand, another fiftene hundred. The cause was, because that day (as their their Bramenes affirmed) the Sunne departed from Sur to Horte. Of their Pilgrimages is spoken before; some Eastward to Ganges; some Westward to Mecca, to wit, the Moores; not men alone, but women also: and because Mahomet hath forbidden all unmarried women this holy Journey, they will marrie before they set forth, and dissolve the same marriage againe, after their returne. Hereby they thinke to purchase merite with God.

I went one day (sayth Pinnerus) to the publike Hospitall, which the Citizens of Cambaia had founded for all kindes of Birds, to cure them in their sicknesse. Some Peacocks were there incurable, and therefore might have beene expelled the Hospitall. But (alacke for pitee of so rufull an accident) a Hawke had beene admitted thither for the cure of his lame legge, which being whole, hee inhospitably slae many of these co-hospitall weakest Fowles, and was therefore expelled this Bird-Colledge by the Master thereof. For Men they had not an Hospitall, that were thus hospitall to Fowles.

They have certaine Religious persons, called Vartees, which live in a Colledge together, and when I went to their House, they were about sitte in number. They ware white cloth, were bare-headed, and shaued; if that word might bee applied to them, who pull off their haire on their heads and faces, leauing onely a little on their crowne. They live on almes, nor receiue they but the surplusage of the daily food of him that giueth them. They are wickelesse. The Orders of their Sect are written in a booke of the Guzarates writing. They drinke their water hot, not for Physike, but deuotion, supposing that the water hath a Soule, which they should slay, if they dranke the same vnsodden. For the same cause they beate in their hands certaine little brushes, with which they sweepe the floore, before they sit downe, or walke, lest they should kill the soule of some Wonne, or other small creature. I saw their Prior thus doing.

The Generall of this Order is said to haue an hundred thousand men vnder his canonically obedience, and is newly cholen euery yeere. I saw amongst them little boyes, of eight or nine yeere old, resembling the countenances of Eutope, rather then of India, by their parents consecrated to this Order. They had all in their mouth a cloth foure fingers broad, let thorow both their eates in a hole, and brought backe againe thorow their eares. They would not shew me the cause; but I perceiued it was, lest some Gnat or Flie should enter thither, and so bee slaine. They teach that the world was made many hundred thousand yeeres agoe: and that God did then send three and twentie Apostles, and now hath sent the foure and twentieth in this third age, two thousand yeeres since, from which time they haue had writing, which before they had not.

The same Author in another Epistle saith, That the most of the Inhabitants of Cambaia are Banians. They eat no flesh, nor kill any thing, yea they redeem the beasts and birds maimed or sicke, and carry them to their Hospitals to be cured. In Guzarat he had seene many Gioghi, a religious Order of Monks, which yeld to none in Penance and Poueritie. They go naked in cold weather: they sleep on the dung-hills vpon an heape of ashes, with which they couer their head and face. I saw the place where one of these Gioghi kept in the midst of the Citie Amadeba, to whom, in conceit of holinesse, resorted more numbers of people then to the shoares of Lisbon at the returne of the Indian Fleet. This Gioghi was sent for by the Prince Sultan Morad, sonne of the Mogor, and refused to come, bidding that the Prince should come to him: It is enough that I am holy, or a Saint in this end. Whereupon, the Prince caused him to be apprehended, and (being soundly whipped) to bee banished.

This people killeth not their Kine, but nourisheth them as their mothers. I saw at Amadeba, when a Kow was ready to die, they offered her fresh grasse, and draue the Flies from her: and some of them gaue this attendance two or three dayes after, till shee was dead. A league and a halfe from this Citie, I saw certaine Cimiterium or burying-place, then which I had neuer seene a fairer sight, wherein had beene buried one Cassi, the Master of a King of Guzarat, who had erected this fabrike, and three other were buried in another Chappell. The whole worke and pavement was of Marble, contayning three Iles: in one whereof I told foure hundred and fortie pillars with their chapters and bases of Corinthian worke, very royall and admirable. On one side was a Lake, greater then the Rozzie at Lisbon; and that building was curiously framed with faile windowes, to looke into the Lake.

Balbi tellethe of a certaine Temple at Cape Bombain, not farre from Chaul, which is cut out of a Rocke: ouer the said Temple growe many Tamarinds, and vnder it is a Spring of running water, whereof they can finde no bottome. It is called Alisante, is adorned with many Images, a receptacle of Bats; and supposed the worke of Alexander the Great, as the period of his Peregrination. And hereto agreeeth the report of Arianus in his Periplus of many memorials and monuments of Alexander's Expedition to these Parts, his old Chapels, Altars, Canping-places, and great Pits. These hee mentioneth about Mungara, which Ortelius in his Map placeth here-away.

Linfchoten ^a affirmeth the same things of their Pythagorean error, and addeth that they sometimes buy Fowles or other beasts of the Portugals, which meant to haue dressed them, and let them flie or runne away. In the High-ways also and Woods they set pots with water, and cast Corne or other graine vpon the ground, to feede the Birds and Beasts. and (to omit their charitable Hospitals before mentioned) if they take a Flea or a Loufe, they will not kill it, but put it in some hole or corner in the wall, and so let it goe: and you can doe them no greater iniurie, then to kill it in their preſence, which with all intreatie they will resist, as being a hainous ſin, to take away the life of that, to which God hath imparted both ſoule and body: and where words will not p̄cure ſeile, they will offer money. They eate no Radishes, Onyons, Garlike, or any kind of Herbe, that hath red colour in it, nor Egges, for they thinke there is blood in them. They drinke not Wine, nor vſe Vinegar, but only Water. They would rather ſtarue, then eat with any, but their country-men: as it happened when I failed from Goa to Cochīn with them in a Portugall Ship, when they had ſpent all their ſtore, the time falling out longer then they made account of; they would not once touch our meat. They waſh themſelues every time they eate, or eaſe themſelues, or make water. Vnder their haire they haue a ſtar vpon their foreheads, which they rub every morning with a little white Sander tempered with water, and three or foure graines of Rice amongit, which the Bramenes ſo do as a ſuperſtitious ceremony of their law. They fit on the ground in their houſes, vpon Mats or Carpets, and ſo they eate, leauing their ſhoes (which are piked and hooked) at the doore: for the which cauſe the heeles of their ſhoes are ſeldome pulled vp, ſo labour of vndoing them.

The Moores ^a amongst them will ſometimes abuſe the ſuperſtition of theſe Cambayans to their owne couetouſneſſe, bringing ſome Worme, Rat, or Sparrow, and threatening to kill the ſame, ſo to prouoke them to redeeme the life thereof at ſome high price. And likewiſe if a malefactor be condemned to death, they will purchaſe his life of the Magiſtrate, and ſell him for a ſlaue. The Moores will ſometimes make ſemblance, as if they would kill themſelues, that the fooliſh Guzzarates may ſee them in like ſort. They will go out of the ſhip, if they light on an Ant-hill, left they might happily treade on ſome of them: they ſup by day light, left their candle-light ſhould occaſion the death of ſome Goat or Fly. And when they muſt needs vſe a Candle, they keepe it in a Lanthorne for that cauſe. If Lice doe much annoy them, they call to them certaine Religious and holy men, after their account: and theſe Oberuants ⁷ will take vpon them all thoſe Lice which the other can find, and put them on their head, there to nourish them. But yet for all this louſie ſcurple, they ſticke not at coozenage by falſe weights, meaſures, and coyne, nor at wrury and lies.

Some are ſaid ^a to be ſo zealous in their Idol-ſeruice, as to ſacrifice their liues in their honour; whereunto they are perſwaded by the preachings of their Priests, as the moſt acceptable deuotion. Many offer themſelues, which being brought vpon a ſcaffold, after certaine ceremonies, put about his neck an Iron collar, round without, but within very ſharpe: from which hangeth a chaine downe his breaſt, into which, ſitting downe he putteth his feet, and whiles the Priest muttereth certaine words, the party before the people with all his force ſtrecheth out his feet, and cuts off his head: their reward is, that they are accounted Saints.

orders, and established Statues of Nature, ^a at the same time, vnder the same elevation of the Sun, diuiding to Summer and Winter, their seasons and possessions. For whereas cold is banished out of these Countries (except on the tops of some Hills) and altogether prohibited to approach so neere the Court and presence of the Sun; and therefore their Winter and Summer is not reckoned by heate and cold, but by the fairenesse and foulennesse of weather, which in those parts diuideth the yere by equall proportions: at the same time, when on the West-part of this Peninsula, betwene that ridge of Mountaines and the Sea, it is after their appellation Summer, which is from September till April, in which time it is alwayes cleere skie, without once or very little raining; on the other side the hills, which they call the coast of 10 Choromandell, it is their Winter; every day and night yeelding abundance of raines, besides those terrible thunders; which both begin and end their Winter. And from April till September in a contrary vicissitude, on the Westerne part, is Winter, and on the Easterne, Summer; insomuch that in little more then twentie leagues iourney in some place, as where they crosse the Hills to Saint Thomas, on the one side of the Hill you ascend with a faire Summer, on the other you descend attendant with a stormy Winter. The like, saith Linschoten, hapneth at the Cape Rasalgate, in Arabia, and in many other places of the East.

Their Winter also is more fierce then ours, euery man providing against the same, as if he had a voyage of so many moneths to passe by Sea; their ships are brought into harbour, their houses can scarce harbour the Inhabitants against the violent stormes, which choake the Rivers with Sands, and make the Seas vnnavigable. I leaue the causes of these things to the further scanning of Philosophers; the effects and affects thereof are strange. The Sea roareth with a dreadful noyle: the Windes blow with a certaine course from thence: the people haue a Melancholike season, which they passe away with play. In the Summer the Wind bloweth from the Land, beginning at Midnight, and continuing till Noone, neuer blowing about ten leagues into the Sea, and presently after one of the clock vntill midnight, the contrary winde bloweth, keeping their set-times, whereby they make the Land temperate, the heate otherwise would bee vnmesurable. But this change commonly causeth diseases, Fluxes, Feuers, Vomitinges, in dangerous (and to very many, in deadly) manner, as appeareth at Goa, where, in the Kings Hospital (which is onely for white men) there die fye hundred in a yere. Here you may see both the North and South Starres; and little difference or none is found in the length of day and night throughout the yere.

30 Dely, is the next Kingdome to Camboia, now not the next, but the same; the Mountaines which before diuided it, not prohibiting the Mogors Forces to annex it to his Crowne. Of it is spoken before in the Chapter of Cambaya, as also of Decan, which lyeth along the Coast, betwixt the Rivers Bate and Aliga two hundred and fiftie miles. Here ^b was, as is said, sometimes a Moore King; who, leading a voluptuous and idle life, by his Captaines was dispossessed of his State: the one of these was called Idalcian; whose Seat Royall is Visapore, who in the yere 1572. incamped before Goa, which the Portugals had taken from him, with an Army of seuentie thousand Foot, and fye and thirtie thousand Horse, two thousand Elephants, and two hundred and fiftie peces of Artillerie. The other was Nizamawco, which resideth in Danager, & besieged Chaul (now belonging to the Portugals) with not much lesse forces, against a Captaine of the Venazarie, which are a people that liue on spoyle, as the Resbuti in Cambaia, the Belemi in Dely, Canara or Concam, seemeth to haue beene a part of Decan, but is possessed by the King of Narsinga, whose state is on the East side of the Mountaines. It hath in it the Coast-townes of Onor, Batticalsa, Mayander and Mangalor, famous for trafficke, but eclipsed by the Portugals neighbourhood.

The Religion of these parts is partly Mahumetan, partly Heathenish. These haue their proper Iolatries, as wee haue before noted, peculiar Idols and Sects to peculiar Tribes and Trades. They haue also more common Rites, worshipping the Images of diuers Beasts, Elephants, Kine, Apes, and the like, to which they dedicate Pagodes or Temples. They haue other common deuotions, & haue appropriated to War, to Sege, to Fortune, to Life, to Death, seuerall Deities. The Deuill they worship in horrible forme, as we shall after see; for in this confusion the Reader must pardon; if we do not keep exact order alway, besides that in seuerall places the Rites some what differ in these which are accounted of one Sect. They paint him blacke, because to that colour they ascribe beauty: and in more solemne Festiuals with Oile, Suer, and fat Grease, and make them as lothsome to the Sent, as to the Eie. So senselesse is their Religion, and yet addicted the sense, and sensible Images (as they do their Temples they call these Pagodes) and sacrifice there to Goates, Shreep, and other Beasts, but not Kine; 40 which they doe account sacred, and worship the same, esteeming that man most happy that dyeth in the presence of that beast or touching the same; perswading themselves, that the departing soule passeth into one of these creatures. They will performe more pietie (let Piety

Goa is the Seat of the Vice-Roy, and of the Arch-Bishop, and of the Kings Council for the Indies, and the Staple of all Indian commodities. It standeth in a little land, in vinctene degrees, called Tizuarin 9 nine miles long, and three broad, in circuit one and twentie. Bardes on the North, and Salsette are both in like subiection to the Portugalls; the King letting them to Farme, and employing the Rents to the payment of the Arch-bishop, Cloysters, Priests, Vice-Roy, and other his Officers. Salsette is nine miles from Goa, being a Peninsula twentie miles about, containing fixtie fixe Villages or Townes, and about fourescore thousand Inhabitants. Antoniuss Norogua the Vice-Roy, destroyed therein two hundred Temples, some of them sumptuous, 1567. and many Pagodes, which caused them to rebell, and afterwards they slew some of the Jesuites and their company.

Barros 9 relates, that the King of Bisnaga, having warres with the Moores of Decan, and being then Lord of the Ports of Batecala and Onor, where hee had store of Horses out of Arabia, and Persia, brought thither by Merchants, scrviceable for his Warres: the Moores in those parts forsaile the Market, and sold the Horses to the Decans his Enemies. Whereupon he commanded the King of Onor his Vassall, to kill all the Moores in the Countrey, which was effected to the death of ten thousand Moores. The rest that escaped gate them to the Iland of Tizuarin, and first peopled this Citie of Goa, translating the Mart from Onor thither: but the King of Onor by a power at Sea forced the trade to be kept still at Onor, till the Portugalls came into those parts. This murder of the Moores was done, An. 1499. The Founders name was Melique Hacen. This is to be understood of this New Towne, for of the Ancient there is no memory. It seemes by a Crosse there found, that it had beene inhabited by Christians. It stands in that part which is reckoned to the Kingdome of Canara. Sabaius (one of those Decanine Captaines, which shared their Masters state, as before is deliuered) when he died, left his sonne Idalcun very young; whereupon his Subiects rebelled, and the King of Narsinga warred vpon him, to dispossesse him of his Dominion. Albuquerque taking that opportunitie, besieged, and vpon composition, tooke Goa with the Iland. Which was soone after recovered by Idalcun, comming with a strong Armie thither, the Portugalls flying away by night. But when the King of Narsinga againe invaded Idalcun. He was forced to resist the more dangerous Enemy, leauing a strong Garrison at Goa, which yet Albuquerque ouercame, and sacked the Citie. Euer since, as standing in the middest of that Tract of land, from Cambaia to Comori, it hath beene thought the fittest Staple for Merchandize, and Seat for the Vice-Roy, the Chiefe of the foure chiefe Cities in the Indies. The three other, Ormuss, Diu, and Malaca.

There dwell in Goa of all Nations and Religions. The Gouernment is as in Portugall. Onely publike use of forraigne Religion is forbidden them: but in their houses priuately, or on the maine land, they may practise the same. The Portugalls many of them are married with Indian women, and their posteritie are called Mullickes, and in the third degree, differ nothing in colour and fashion from naturall Indians. Of the Portugalls they reckon two sorts, married Men, and Souldiers, which is a generall name to all Batchellers, although they are at their owne command. Of these are many Knights, and are called Casalquiero Fidalgos: for if a man doe any thing worth reckoning, presently his Captaine imparteth this honour to him; whereof they much boast themselves, albeit this Knight-hood hath defended to Cooke boyes. Many of the Portugalls liue onely by their slaues. They vse great Ceremony or Pride (whether you will call it) in their behauiour: the particulars whereof let Linschoten, that there liued amongst them, teach you.

29. 30. 31. 32.

Besides both Abassine and Armenian Christians, Jewes, and Moores, here are many Heathens. The Moores eat all things, but Swines flesh, and dying, are buried like the Jewes. The Heathens, as Decarijuss, Guzarates, and Canarijuss, are burnt to ashes, and some women aliuie are buried with the Gentlemen or Bramenes, their husbands. Some will eat nothing that had life; some all but the flesh of Kine, or Buffes. Most of them pray to the Sunne and Moony yet all acknowledge a God that made all things, & ruleth them after this life, rendering to all according to their works. As for the Idols or Pagodes, they worship them, faith Balby, euen even as wee adore in the Images that which they represent vnto vs. A good Argument for Image-worship.

But they haue Pagodes, which are Images cut and framed most vgly, and like monitrous Deuils, to whom they pray and offer: and to Saints which here haue liued holy, and are now Intercessours for them. The Deuill often answereth them out of those Images, to whom al- to they offer, that he should not hurt them. They present their Pagode (when a marriage is Bal. c. to be solemnized) with the Brides mayden-head; two of her neckst kinf-women forcing her vpon the Luoy pin or member of stone (leasing the bloud there for a monument) of hat Deuillish Idoll; the husband herein applauding His happineffe. Not much unlike the Priest- ly custome of the Romane Daemes,^e which being newly married were caused to sit on Præ- pu his but I But who can honestly name that which they dishonestly doe? They haue for the most part, a custome to pray vnto the first thing they meet withall in the morning, and all that day they pray vnto it; be it Hog, or any other thing. But if they first meet with a Crow (whereof there are great store) they will not for any thing stirre out againe that day, after a vnclucky a signe. They pray likewise to the New Moone, saluting her first appearance on their knees. They haue Jogos or Hermites, reputed very holy. Many Iuglers also and Witches, which shew deuillish tricks. They neare goe forth without praying. Every Hill, Cliffe, Hole, or Den, hath his Pagodes in it, with their Furnaces hard by them, and their Ci- sternes alwayes full of water, with which euery one that passeth by, wafeth his feet, and then worshippeth and offereth Rice, Egges, or what else their deuotion will afford: which the Bramene eateth. When they are to goe to Sea, they will feast their Pagode with Trum- pets, Fires, and hangings, fouerteene dayes before they set forth, to obtaine a good voyage: and as long after their returne; in which they vse to doe all their Feasts, Marriages, Child- biths, and their Haruest and Seed-seasons.

The Indian women in Goa, when they goe for, haue but one cloth about their bodies, which couereth their heads, and hangeth downe to the knees, otherwise naked. They haue rings thorow their noses, about their legs, toes, neckes, and armes, and fuen or eight bracelets vpon their hands (according to their abilitie) of glasse or other small. When the woman is fuen yeeres old, and the man nine, they marry, but come not together till the woman is able to beare children. Mr. Finch mentioneth the solemnitie of these marriages, and the cause to be the burning of the mother when the father is dead, that they might haue a father-in-law to bring them vp.

Toleau Goa with this Island. The Canaras and Decanjins wear their beards and haire long, without cutting, as the Bramens. They except from food, Kine, Hogs, and Buffies. They account the Oxe, Cow, or Buffie to be holy, which they have commonly in the house with them, and they belemere, stroke, and handle them with all friendship in the world; feed them with the same meat they eat themselves; and when the beasts eat themselves, they hold under their hands, and throw the dung away: they sleepe with them in their houses, he by thinking to doe God service. In other things they are as the Bramens. For those are the Laitie, these are the Spiritualite. When they take their oathes, they are set within a circle of ashes, on the pavement, and laying a few ashes on their heads, the other on their breasts, sweare by their Parodes to tell the truth.

The Canarijs and the Corumbijans are the tuffickes, and Countrey-husbandmen, the most miserable people of all India : their Religion is much as the other. They couer onely their Priuities, and eat all things, except Kine, Oxen, Buffies, Hogs, and Hens flesh. Their women binde a cloth about their Nauell, which reacheth halfe way the thigh : they are deliuered alone by themselves, without other helpe : their children are brought vⁿ naked, till they be seuen or eight yeeres old, without any trouble about them, except washing them in a little cold water, and lye to be an hundred yeeres old, without head-ache or losse of teeth. They nourish a tuft of haire on their crownes, cutting the rest. When the man is dead, the wife breaketh her glasse-jewels, and cutteth off her haire ; his bodie is burnt. They eat so little, as if they liued by the ayre : and for a penny would endure whipping.

In Sallette are two Temples, or holes rather of Pagodes, renowned in all India: one of which is cut from vnder a Hill, of hard stone, and is of compasse within, about the bigneſſe of Village of foure hundred Houſes; with many Galleries or Chambers of theſe deformed ſhapes, one higher then another, cut out of the hard Rocke. There are in all three hundred of theſe Galleries. The other is in another place, of like matter and forme. It would make a mans haire ſtand vpright to enter among them. In a little Hill called Pory, there ſtandeth a high Hill, on the top whereof is a hole, that goeth downe on the Hill, digged and carued out of the hard Rocke; within, as large as a great Cloſtrey, round ſet with ſhapes of Elephants, Tygres, Amazons, and other like worke, workeſmanly cut, ſuppoſed to be the Chinois handy-worke. But the Portugals haue now ouerthrowne theſe Idol-Temples. Would God

God they had not set new Idols in the roome; with like practice of offerings and Pilgrimages, as did these to their Pagode.

u Linschoten

Once ^u went into a Temple of stone, in a Village, and found nothing in it, but a great Table that hung in the middle of the Church, with the Image of a Pagode thereon painted, hellishly disfigured with many hornes, long teeth out of the mouth downe to the knees, and end beneath his naucell with such another tusked and horned face. Upon the head stood a triple crowne, not much vnlike the Popes. It hung before a wall, which made a partition from another Chamber, like a Quire, close without any light: in the middle whereof was a little doore, and on each side of it a furnace within the wall, with certaine holes, thereby to let the smoake or sauer of the fire to enter into that place, when any offering should bee made. Whereof wee found there some Rice, Corne, Fruits, Herbs, and such like. There issued thence such a filthy smoake and stinke, that it made the place black, and almost choaked such as entre'd. We desired the Bramene to open the doore, which with much entreatie he did, offering first to throw ashes on our fore-heads, which wee refused, so that before hee would open vs the doore, we were forced to promise him not to enter beyond the doore. It shewed within like a lime-kill, being close vaulted, without hole or window: neither had the Church it selfe any light but the doore. Within the said Cell hung an hundred burning Lampes, and in the middle stood a little Altar couered with Cotton Cloth, and ouer that with Gold; vnder which, as the Bramene told vs, lay the Pagode all of Gold, of the bignesse of a Puppet.

Hard by the Church wthout the great doore, stood within the earth a great fouresquare Cistern, hewed out of freestone, with staires on each side to goe downe into it, full of greene, filthy, and stinking water, wherein they wash themselves, when they meane to enter into the Church to pray. In the evening they carried their Pagode on Procession, first Ringing a Bell, wherewith the people assembled, and tooke the Pagode out of his Cell with great reuerence, and set it in a Palamkin, which was borne by the chiefe men of the Towne; the rest following with great deuotion, with their vsuall noyse and sound of Trumpets, and other Instruments; and hauing carried him a piete circuit, brought him to the stone Cistern, washed him, and placed him againe in his Cell, making a foule smoake and stinke, and euery man leauing his offering behind him, intended to the Pagode, but consumed by the Bramene and his family. As we went along by the wayes, we found many such shapen vnder certaine couertures, with a small Cistern of water hard by, and halfe an Indian Nut hanging thereby, to take vp water withall, for the Trauellers to wash and pray. By the said Pagode doe stand commonly a Calfe of stone, and two little Furnaces; before which they present their offerings. My fellow leaping on one of those Calues in the Church, the Bramene called out, and the people came running, but we stayed their fury, by gentle perswasion of the Bramene before. And thus much of these deformed formes, and misshapen shapen, with their worshippings and worshippers futable. Like lips, like lettice, Vaine Rites, stinkingunks and smoakes, vgly Idols, conspiring with Internall Darkenesse of the Mindes, and Externall Darkenesse of their Temples, to bring an Eternall Darkenesse to the Followers, that all may shut vp (as they are begun) in an hellish period.

Dou Duart de Menezes. He summe^rth the publick or ordinary expenses of the Port in India, at 114,99, 16-5-11, doo^r. x in Salt, are five Churches, 5. F.

I haue seene in Mr. Hakluyt's hands a large Treatise, written by Dou Duart de Menezes of the Customes, Courts, Officers, Expenses, and other remarkable obseruations, for knowledge of the Portugall State and Affaires, in the East Indies. He saith, that the Island Tilosore (so he writeth it) in which Goa standeth, hath thirte two Townes and Villages therein. The Iesuite Colledge in Salsete enioyeth x the Rents before belonging to the Pagodes, being two hundred and fiftie pound yeerely, besides their Glebe-lands of Rice grounds, and other commodities: also the Paisihs subiect to them are worth two hundred ninetie eight pounds, and sixteen shillings. In Goa they receiue seuen hundred and fiftene pound, twelve shillings, and six pence per Annum, and their yeerely Presents amount to three hundred seuentie five pound. In Cochlin also they have three hundred thirte seuen pound. The Monastery of Saint Francis in Goa hath Rents six hundred and thirtene pound and ten shillings, and one hundred fortie three pound twelve shillings and six pence in other duties. The Dominicans receiue five hundred pound, and fourescore and ten pound in other rights. The Friars of Saint Augustine fourescore pound twelve shillings and six pence. The Inquisition one hundred three pound and ten shillings (besides the Rents of the Hospital, one thousand eight hundred seuentie five pound, and an Almshouse for Widowes and Orphanes two hundred and fiftie pound.) These things I thought worthy relation, not so much to satisfie the curious, as to answer the ordinary drags of that World-wandering Generation, pretending Morification to the World, strictness of their Vow, loue to Religion, and compassion to the poore Pagans; when as they haue such Golden chaines to draw them thither. Whereunto if wee adde the bountie of Christians in those parts vnto these pretended holy Fathers, Fathers, their gaires from the pearle-fishings, the vowes of such as become of their Societie, and many other wayes accruing to their Coffers, together with those nouelties and rarities, wherewith euery sence in varietie is here presented; wee may see the World a sufficient argument to lead them about the world, whatsoeuer other pretences notwithstanding. But this hath bene learnedly handled against them by others already: amongst others and before others, Our most Reuerend and learned Metropolitan, in unmasking the reasons of Hill for Popery, hath shewed both this our Hill to be an ignorant Mountbanke, and our Iesuites in India rather enrichers of their owne Societie in Europe with Gold, Pearle, Spice, and other Indian wares, then of those Asian Proselytes with sound European Christianitie; besides that, they seeme necessary to their Nation for the establishing of their Trading and ciuill affaires, vnder colour of Religion, winning estimation with the Pagans; and remaining there as well for Intelligencers, and as it were Leeger Embassadors with their Kings, as for Conuersion of the Heathens. For me, what I can shew against this their allegation, belongeth to another taske.

§. III.

Of the Indian Bramenes, both Secular and Religious.

Lingher.

THe Indian Wisemen may be diuided into two Sects, the Banieres, of whom is already spoken; and the Bramenes. These obserue the Indian Heathen custome, that no man may change his fathers trade, but must succeed in the same, and marry a wife also of the same Tribe. The Brachmanni, or, as they are at this day called, the Bramenes (who haue their shops, as well as other Merchants, throughout the Cities) are the chiefe Tribe, and of best reputation, and weare in signe of their profession (from the shoulder, croste vnder the arme, vpon their naked body, do vne to the girdle) three strings like sealing theeds; which for their liues they will not, nor may by their vow put off. They are naked, sauing that about their middles they haue a cloth bound to hide their priuities. And sometime when they goe abroad, they cast a thin Cowne ouer them. Vpon their heads they were a white cloth, wound twice or thrice about therewith, to hide their haire, which they neuer cut off, but weare it long, and turned vp as the women doe. They haue commonly hanging at their eares, Gold-rings. They are very subtil in writing and accounts, making other simple Indians beleue what they will. Whatsoeuer they meet first with in the streets, they pray to all day after.

When the Bramenes die, all their friends assemble together, and make a hole in the ground, in which they throw much sweet Wood, Spices, Rice, Corne, and Oyle. Then lay therein the dead body; his wife followeth with Musick, and many of her nearest friends, singing praises in commendation of her husbands life, encouraging her to follow him, which accordingly she doth. For parting her Jewels among her friends, with a cheerefull countenance she leapes into the fire, and is presently couered with Wood, and Oyle, whereby shee is quickly dead, and with her husbands body burned to ashes. And if it chanceth (which is seldome) that any woman refuseth this Fiery Coniunction, they cut the haire cleane off from her head; neither may shee after that weare a Jewell, but is accounted a dishonest woman. This custome is (as may appeare) very ancient, and supposed to haue bene ordained because of the libidinous disposition of the Indian women, which for their lusts would poyson their husbands.

The Bramenes obserue Fastings, dayes with so great abstinence, that they eat nothing that day, and sometime not in three or foure dayes together. They tell many miracles of their Pagodes. They hold the immortallitie of the Soule, both of Beasts and Men, and that so often mentioned Pythagorean succession, and reuining of mens soules in beasts; and contrariwise. They by the direction of the Deuill (the author of their miracles) frame such deformed Statues to their Idols.

Esoter faith, the Bramenes also worship a One Parabramma, and his three sonnes, and in honour of them weare those three theeds aforesaid. He affirmeth that the Ischi wander vp and downe through India, abstaining from all carnall pleasure, but a certaine time; which being expired, they are past possibilitie of further sinning, and are then called Abduti, as the Illuminated Elders of the Familists, polluting themselves in all filthinesse. The Bramenes haue Images of the Trinitie, and haue in religious estimation the number of Thre. They acknowledge and pray to the Trinitie in Unitie; but affirme many Demi-gods, which are his Deputies in gouerning the World. They honour the Portugals Images also, as approaching to their owne superstition. They marry but one wife, and admit no second succeeding marriage;

riage. The Bramenes must descend of the Bramene Tribe, and others cannot aspire to that Priesthood: but some are of higher account than other. For some serve for messengers, which in time of warre, and among theeues may passe safely, and are called Fabbers. They will not put a Bramene to death for any crime. Hermius reporteth that they have bookes and Prophets, which they alledge for confirmation of their opinions: that they thinke God to be of blacke colour: that they worship the herbe Amatacus or Marioram with many superstitious Ceremonies: that they haue in their writings the Decalogue, with the explanation thereof: that they adure all of their Society vnto silence touching their mysteries: that they haue a peculiar language (as Latine in these parts) wherein they teach the same in their Schooles: that their Doctōrs hallow the Sundayes in diuine worship, adoring the God which created heauen and earth, often repeating the sentence, I adore thee, O God, with thy grace and aide for ever: to take food from the hands of a Christian, they account as sacrilege.

When they are seuen yeeres old, ⁴ they put about their necke a string two fingers broad, made of the skinn of a beast called Cressumengun, like a wilde Ass, together with the haire: which he weareth till he is fourteene yeeres old, all which time he may not eate Betelle. ⁵ That time expired, the said string is taken away, and another of three threds put on, in signe that hee is become a Bramene which hee weareth all his life. They haue a Principall amongst them, which is their Bishop, which correcteth them if they doe amisse, They marrie but once, as is said, and that not all, but onely the eldest of the brethren, to continue the Succession, who is also heire of the fathers substance, and keepeth his wife straitly, killing her, if he finde her adulterous, with poison. The yonger brethren lie with other mens wiues, which account the same as a singular honour done vnto them; hauing libertie, as Bally affirmeth, to enter into any mans house, yea of the Kings no lesse then of the Subiects, of that Religion: the husbands leauing the wiues, and the brethren their sisters vnto their pleasures, and therefore departing out of the house when they come in. And hence it is that no mans sonne inheriteth his fathers goods, (and I knowe not whether they may inherit that name of father or sonne) but the sisters sonne succedeth, as being most certaine of the blood. ⁶ They eate but once a day, and wash before and after meate, as also when they make water, and goe to stooke.

They haue great reuenues belonging to their Churches, besides offerings, and at set houres of the day resort thither to sing, and doe other their holy Rites. Twice in the day, and as often in the night, their Pagode is taken out of the Altar, and set on the Bramenes head, looking backward, and is carried in Procession three times about the Church; the Bramenes wiues carrying lights burning: every time they come to the principall doore of the Church, which is on the West side thereof (some Churches haue two doores on a side) they set it downe on their offering-stone, and worship it. Twice a day they bring it to eate of their sod Rice, as often (it seemeth) as the Bramene is hungry: When they wash them (which is often) they lay a little ashes on their heads, foreheads, and breasts, saying that they shall returne into ashes. When the Bramenes wife is with childe, as soone as he knoweth it, he cleareth his teeth, and abstaineth from Betelle, and obserueth fasting till shee bee deliuered. The Kings of Malabar will scarce eate meate but of their dressing. They are of such estimation, that if Merchants trauell among theeues and robbers, one Bramene in the companie secureth them all: which Bramene will eate nothing of another mans dressing; and would not become a Moore for a Kingdome. Nic. di Conti saith, ⁸ he saw a Bramene three hundred yeeres old: hee addeth that they are studious in Astrologic, Geomancie, and Philosophie. To be short, they are the Masters of Ceremonies and the Indian Religion, in whose precepts the Kings are trained vp.

The Bramenes haue (it seemeth) much familiaritie with the Deuill, so strangely doe they foretell things to come, though they bee contingent. They also interpret Prodigious, Lots, Auguries, and thereby growe into great credit, the people depending on them, and the Kings becomming of their Order. They perswade the people that their Pagodes doe often feast together, and therefore would haue such dainties offered, which they and their deuoute threaten if they be sparing and niggardly, plenty of Plagues and diuine wrath.

Besides these Secular, There are other Religious or Monasticall Bramenes, which are called Iagues, ⁹ anciently called by the Greekes, Gymnosophists, because they went naked; and so they still doe, professing much austeritie of life, at least for a time, with long Pilgrimages, and much bodily exercise little profiting the soule, possessing nothing but want and beggarie, seeking thereby to winne credite to themselves and their Sect. The Verres I take to bee another Sect, the religious Votaries of the Banians or Pythagoreans. Both those and these are kinds of Ethnike Monkes, which profess by strict penance and regular obseruations, to expiate their finnes, and procure saluation to their soules. There are ¹⁰ also some that live as Heremites in Deserts, some in Colledges, some wander from place to place begging: some (an vnlearned kind) are called Sanasses: some contrary to the rest, nothing esteeming Idols, observe chastitie twenty or fiftie and twenty yeeres, and feed daily on the pith of a fruit called Carvee, to preferue in them that cold humour, neither doe they abstaine from fish, fith, or wine, and when they passe along the way, one goeth before them crying Poo, Poo, that is, way, way, that women especially may auoid: for their vow will not permit the sight of a woman. These weare not the three threads which the other Bramenes weare, neither are their bodies burned after death, as of the rest, yea, the King himselfe honoureth them, and not they the King: some live inclosed in iron Cages all filt with asies, which they strew on their heads and garments: some burne some part of their body voluntarily. All are vain-glorious, and seeke rather the shell, then the kernell, the shew, then the substance of holinesse.

Xanerius once in conference with the Bramenes, demanding of them what their God commanded to those that would come to Heauen, was answered; Two precepts, one to abstaine from killing of King: in whose shape the Gods were worshipped: and the other to obserue the Bramenes, the Ministers of their Gods. But they haue more mysticall learning, which one of them secretly disclosed to the Iesuite. This was of a famous Schoole, Colledge or Vniuersity of those Bramenes, all the Students whereof at their first Admission, he said, were sworn by solempne Oath vnto their Doctores, neuer to reueale any of their secrets: First, that there was one God, maker of Heauen & Earth, who alone, & not the Pagodes, ought to be worshipped: after that, they were instructed in precepts necessary to saluation. Xanerius asking what? he repeated the Ten Comandments in order as we do, and that in a mysticall language known to few, which their Doctores obserue in their holy things. But the Bramene pronounced and explained them in the vulgar. Further, that the eighth day, or Sunday is to be kept holy, & then often to repeat the prayer Oncery Narains Noma (the same which before is related and interpreted out of Henninius) this to be spoken with a lowe voice that they breake not their Oath: likewise that their old bookes foretell of a time when all shall be of one Religion.

Fenicius another Iesuite learned of one of their Doctores, other their mysteries contained in their Bookes, that God produced all this world out of an Egge: out of one part thereof the Land, Sea, and inferior creatures: out of the other, the Heauens for habitation to the Gods; that this World was founded on the end of a Buffals horn, and because this beast leaned on one side ready to fall, a huge Rocke was placed vnder him to support him. But as before, so here also followed some notice of better things. For there was a Malabar Poet which writ 900. epigrams against their Pagodes, each consisting of eight verses; wherein he speaks many things elegantly of the Diuine Providence, of Heauen, and the torments of Hell, and other things agreeing to the Christian Faith; that God is present euery where, and giues to euery one according to his estate, that Celestiall blessednesse consists in the vision of God, that the damned in Hell shall be tormented 400. millions of yeeres in flames, and shall neuer die: The Bramenes he calls fooles and blockes. By this booke, and by Mathematicall doctrine of the Sphere, which they had scarcely euer heard of, he made way for conuerting the people.

I haue thought good to say thus much together of them, as in one view representing the Bramenes; a name so anciently, so vniuersally communicated to the Indian Priests, although some particulars before haue bene, or hereafter may be said touching some of them in other places, according to the singulartie of each Nation in this so manifold a profession, which they all demonstrate in their singular Superstitions.

Malabar extendeth it selfe from the Riuer Congeraco to the Cape Comori; which some take to be the Promontory Cory, in 2 Ptolomey; Maginus doubteth, whether it be that which he calleth Communia Extrema. In the length it containeth little lesse then three hundred miles, in bredth from the ridge of Gale to the Sea, in some places, fiftie. From Congeraco to Puripatan are 60. miles of Coast; therein Cota, Colan, Nilichilan, Marabia, Bele-

Main,

Main, and Perapatan. From thence to Chatua is the Kingdome of Calicut fourescore miles in coast: therein Pandarane, Colete, Capocate, Calicut in 11. 15. Chale a Portugall Fortresse, Patangale. Tanora Citie Royall, Pananc, Baleancor and Chatua. Then followeth the Kingdome of Cranganor. Next to that the Kingdome of Cochín: then that of Porca without a good Port in her foure and fortie miles coast. Coulan is next, and then that of Trauancor, which the Portugals called the Great King, as being greater in State then the former, subject to the King of Narsinga. It is full of people, diuided into many States, by variety of Rivers, which cause Horles to be vnseruiceable in their Warres, and nourish many Crocodiles, enrich the soyle, and yeeld easie transportation of commodities, which are spices of diuers kinds. They haue Bats, in shape resembling Foxes, in bignesse Kites. The chiefe Kingdomes in this tract are Kanonor, Calicut, Cranganor, Cochín, in bignesse Kites, and Trauancor. About e seuen hundred yeeres since it was one Kingdome, gouerned by Seta, in which he proued so deuout, that he would end his dayes at Mecca. But before his departure he diuided his estate into these pety Signiorities, among his principall Nobles and kindred: leauing vnto Coulan the spirituall preeminence, and the Imperiell Title vnto his Nephew of Calicut, who onely enjoyed the title of Zamori, or Emperour, and had prerogatiue of stamping coyne. Some exempt from this Zamorin Empire and Allegiance, both Coulan, the Papall See of the high Bramene, and Canauor: and some haue since by their owne force exempted themselves. This Perimal died in his holy Voyage: and the Indians of Malabar reckon from this diuision, their computation of yeeres, as we doe from the blessed Natinitie of our Lord. He left (saith Castaneda) to himselfe but twelue leagues of his Countrey, which lay nere to the shoare, where he meant to imbarque himselfe, neuer before inhabited: this he gaue to a Cousin of his then his Page, commanding that in memorie of his imbarquing there it should be inhabited, and the rest to take Him for their Emperour (except the Kings of Coulan and Cananor) whom yet with the rest he commanded not to coine money, but onely the King of Calicut. For Calicut was therefore here built: and the Moores for the imbarquing tooke such deuotion to the place, that they would no more frequent the Port of Coulan, as before (which therefore grew to ruine) but made Calicut the Staple of their Merchandise.

Calicut, the first in order with them, shall bee so with vs. The Citie is not walled nor faire built, the ground not yeelding firme foundation, by reason of the water which issueth if it be digged. This Kingdome hath not aboute fise and twenty leagues of Sea-coast, yet rich both by the fertilitie of the soyle, which yeeldeth Corne, Spices, Cocos, Iaceros, and many other fruits: and by the situation; as the Staple especially before the Portugals vnfriently neighbourhood, of Indian merchandise, and therefore in her varietie of Merchants, being a Map (as it were) of all that Easterne World. The ⁴ Egyptians, Persians, Syrians, Arabians, Indians; yea euen from Catay the space of fixe thousand miles journey, here had their trade and traffique. The Palace also contained foure Halls of Audience, according to their Religions, for the Indians, Moores, Iewes, Christians. Of their Bramenes or Priests we haue already said. They yeeld diuine honours to diuers of their deceased Sain's, and build Temples vnto beasts. One of which (dedicated to an Ape) hath a large Porch for cattell, to the vse of Sacrifice, in which are (saith e Massau) seuen hundred marble Pillars, not inferiour to those of Agrippa in the Roman Pantheon. It seemeth that the ground in that place is not of so queasy and watery a stomacke, but that it can digest deepe foundations. To Elephants they attribute like Diuinitie: but most of all to Kine, supposing that the soules of Men departed doe most of all enter into these beasts. They haue many bookes of the Grecians: and diligently conceale the same from vulgar knowledge, except some Bramene Prophyte doe detect those mysteries. They belecue one God, maker of Heauen and Earth, so but adde that he could haue no pleasure in so weighty a charge of gouerning the world, and therefore hath delegated the same to the Deuill, to reward euery man according to his workes; Him they call Demmo: they name God Tamarani. The King hath in his Palace the Chappell of Demmo, carued full of Deuils, and in the midst sitteth this Image of metall in a Throne of the same matter, with a triple Crowne, hooked hands, and feet like a Cocke. In each corner of this square Chappell is a Deuill set in a fiery Throne, wherein are many in Soules, the Deuill putting one with his right hand into his mouth, and taking another from vnder him with his left hand. This Idoll is washed by the Bramenes with sweet water, incensed, and worshipped euery morning. Sometime in the weeke they sacrifice on this manner: They haue an Altar strewed with flowers, on which they put the bloud of a Cocke, and coales of fire in a filuer Chasing-dish, with much perfumes incensing about the Altar, and often ringing with a little Bell of siluer. They hold in their hands a siluer Knife, with which the Cocke was killed, which they dip in the blood, and put into the fire with many Apist gestures. All the blood is thus burned, many Waxe-candles burning meane-while. The Priest hath on his wrists and legs as it were Morrice-bells, which make a great noise, a certaine Table hanging at his necke: and when he hath ended his Sacrifice, he taketh his hands full of Wheat, goeth backward from the Altar (on which hee alwaies fixeth his eyes) to a certaine Tree, and then hurleth the Corne vp ouer his head as high as he can: after which he returneth and vnformeth the Altar. The King of Calicut eateth no meate, before foure principall Bramenes haue first offered thereof to the Deuill, which they do lifting both their hands ouer their heads, and shutting their fists draw back the same with their thumbe, presenting of that meate to the Idoll, and then carrie it to the King on a great Lease, in a Treene Platter. The King sitteth on the ground at his meate, without any thing vnder him, attended with Bramenes, standing foure paces off, with their hands before their mouths in great reuerence. And after the King hath eaten, those Priests carry the Reliques into the Court, where they clap thrice with their hands, wherat presently certaine Crowes resort thither to eate the Kings leauings, which Crowes are hereunto accustomed, and may not bee hurt of any.

When the King marieth a wife, * one of the principall Bramenes hath the first nights lodging with her, for which he hath assigned him by the King foure hundred or five hundred Ducats. The King and his Gentlemen, or Nayros, eate no flesh without license of the Bramenes. The King committeth the custodie of his Wife to the Bramenes when he traueleth any whither, and taketh in too honest part their dishonest familiaritie. But for this cause, the Kings Sonne succedeth not in the Crowne, but his sisters Sonne, as being certainly of his blood. These sisters of the King chooe what Gentleman they please, on whom to bestow their Virginitie; and if they proue not in a certaine time to be with child, they betake them to these Bramene-Italians.

The Gentlemen and Merchants haue a custome to exchange Wives, in token of great friendship. Some women amongst them haue sixe or seuen Husbands, fathering her children on which of them shee best pleaseth. The Men when they marry, get others to vie them (if they bee Virgins) fiftene or twentie dayes before they themselves will bed them. This Author affirmeth, that there were a thousand Families of Christians in Calicut, at the time of his being there, a hundred and twentie yeeres since.

If a Debtor breake day with his Creditor, and often disappoint him, hee goeth to the principall of the Bramenes, and receiveth of him a Rod, with which he approacheth to the Debtor, and making a Circle about him, chargeth him in the name of the King, and the said Bramene, not to depart thence till he hath satisfied the Debt, which if he do not, he must starue in the place: for if he depart, the King will cause him to be executed. The new King for one yeeres space eateth neither Fish nor Flesh, nor cutteth his Haire or Naailes, vntill certaine Prayers daily, eateth but one meale, and that after he hath washed, neither may hee looke on any man till he hath ended his repait. At the yeeres end, hee maketh a great Feast, to which resort about ten thousand persons to confirme the Prince and his Officers: and then moueth Almes is giuen. Hee entertaineth tenne thousand Women in diuers Offices in his Palace. These make to the King (after his fasting yeere is out) a Candlemasse Feast, each of them carrying diuers lights from the Temple (where they first obserue many Idoll idle Ceremonies) vnto the Palace with great Musicke and other iollitie.

Of the King of Calicut.

F the election and erection of the Zamoryn, we haue spoken in the beginning of the Chapter: let vs here adde out of Castenede ^b concerning his deuotion. Hee saith, that this King of Calicut is a Bramene, as his Predecessors also. And for that it is a custome that all the Kings die in that Pagode, or Idoll Temple, hee is selected for that cause. For alwaies there is and must be in that House a King to serue those Idols; and when hee that serueth there dieth, then must the King that then reigneth leaue his Empire, and goe serue in that place as the other did; another being elected to succeed him in the Kingdome. And if any refuseth to forsake his Court for the Pagode, they enforce him thereunto.

The Kings of Malabar bee browne men, and goe naked from the girdle vpward, and from thence downward they are couered with cloth of Silke and of Cotton, adorned with Jewels.

For their Children; the Sonnes inheric not, but the Brother, or if there bee none, the Sisters Sonne. When their Daughters are ten yeeresold, they send out of the Kingdome for a Nayro, and presenting him with gifts, request him to take her Virginite: which having done, hee tieth a lewell about her necke, which she weareth during her life, as a token that from thenceforth she hath free power of her bodie to doe what she will, which before the might not. After their death * these Kings are carried forth into a plaine Field, and their burned with sweet wood very costly, their kindred and all the Nobilitie of the Countrey being present: which done, and the ashes buried, they shawe themselves, without leauing any haire excepte on the browes and eye-lids, even on the least child: and for the space of thirteene dayes cease to eate. ^d Betele (his lips are cut that doth it) and all that time is an Inter-regnum, wherein they obserue if any will come in to obiect any thing against the new future King. After this * hee is sworn to the Lawes of his Predecessor, to pay his debts, to recouer whatsoever belonged to his Kingdome being lost; which Oath he taketh hauing his Sword in his left hand, and in the right a Candle burning, which hath a Ring of Gold vpon it, which he toucheth with two of his fingers, and taketh his Oath. This being done, they throw or powre vpon him a few graines of Rice, with many other Ceremonies and Prayers, and he worshippeth the Sunne three times: after which, all the Caymailes or principall Nobles sweare their fealtie to him, handling also the same Candle. The thirteene dayes ended, they eate their Betele againe, and Flesh and Fift as before: the King except, who then taketh thought for his Predecessor, and for the space of one whole yeere (as is before obserued in part out of Barboſa) eates no Betele, nor shaueth his beard, nor cutteth his nailes: eateh but once a day, and before hee doth it, walbeth all his bodie, and obserueth certaine houres of Prayer daily. The yeere being ended, he obserueth a kind of Dirige for his Predecessors soule, whereto are assembled 100000. persons, at which time hee giueth great Almes, and then is confirmed. All these Malabar Kings haue one speciall Man, which is the chiefe Administrator of Iustice, who in matters of gouernment is obeyed no lesse then the King himselfe. The Souldiers are Nayros, none of which can be imprisoned or put to death by ordinarie Iustice: but if one of them kill another, or else kill a Cow, or sleepe with a Countrewoman, or speake euill of the King: the King after information giues his Warrant to another Nayro, who with his Associates kill him whereſoeuer they find him, beewing him with their Swords, and then hang on him his Warrant, to testifie the cause of his death. These Nayros may not wear their Weapons, nor enter into combate; till they be armed Knights, although that from the Age of seven yeeres they are trayned vp in Feares and practise of Armes. He is * dubbed or created by the King, who commandeth to gird him with a Sword, and laying his right hand vpon his head, muttereth certaine words softly, and afterward dubbeth him; saying, g Hano a regardo kippo iſeſe Bramenes, and their Kine. These are the two Great Commandements of the Bramene Law. The King sometimes commits this Ceremonie to their Panicall or Master in the Peas of Armes, whom they euer honour as their Father, and next to the King most reuerence. They teach them to Run, Leape, Fencing, and managing of Weapons, and anoint them with Oyle of Gergelin, to make their linewes pliant for all winding and tumbling gestures. They begin to goe to Schoole at seven yeeresold. ⁴ In fight they are valorous, and account it no shame to flee; but will doe it in policie; and yet when they yeeld themselves to any mans seruice, they bind themselves to die with him, and for him, which they faithfully performe; fighting till they bee killed: They are great Southerers, haue their good and bad Dayes, worship the Sun, the Moone, the Fire, and the Kine, and the first they meet in the morning. The Deuill is often in them (they say it is one of their Pagodes) which causeth them to vtter terrible wordes; and then hee goeth before the King with a naked Sword, quaking and cutting his flesh, saying with great cries: I am such a god, and I am come to tell thee such a thing; and if the King doubteth, he roareth louder, and cutteth himselfe deeper till he be credited. The Portugals haue much eclipsed the greatnesse of the King of Calicut, and caused many other alterations in all the East in this last Age of the World. Of whose exploits, Castaneda, Barrina, Maffana, Oſorino, and others haue written at large. Our English-Indian Societie haue killed a Factory at Calicut, touching the conditions and condition whereof you may read at large in Roger Hawes his Iournall, deliuered amongst other our Pilgrimes. He telleth of the perfidiousnesse of this people; how hardly they could get in debts, they chusing rather to spend much in bribes then to pay debts. Ours made vie of their Superstition to Iustice: for vnderstanding that they would neither eate nor wash whyles using meane while Nayros for their Guard. Thus Injustice made them ruff, and vncharitableness part of their debts, so that they got fifty Escus (kind of Coine) of one, 100. of another, but one not without sending their three dayes abode, would pay nothing: it is termes, equally prophane, superstitious and vniust.

P. III.

Of their differing Sects.

Arbosa reckoneth eightene Sects that have no mutuall conuersation, nor may marrie, but in their owne ranks or order. Next to the King and Bramenes, * he placeth the Nayros, which are Gentlemen and Souldiers, and are not professed Nayros (notwithstanding their blood) till they be by their Lords or by the King made

Knights or Souldiers. And then hee must neuer from that time goe without his Weapons, which commonly are a Rapier and a Target, and sometimes Peccets or Bowes. They neuer marry, but lye with such of the Nayros Women or Daughters as like them, leauing his Weapons meanwhile at the doore, which forbid any man else, although it be the Goodman himselfe, to enter, till he hath ended his businesse and be gone. And if one of the common people once touch a Nayro, it is lawfull for the Nayro to kill him: and he is also vnclane, and must be purified by certaine washings. And for this cause they cry as they goe in the streets, Pa, Po, that the baser Raskality may giue place. They haue a Pit of standing Water at their doores, hallowed by the Bramenes, wherein euery morning they wash themselves, although it bee greene, stinking, imagining thus to be cleansed of their sinnes. They are brought vp altogether to Feats of Armes and Actiuitie, from their Child-hood, admirably able to wind and turne themselves, and are very resolute and desperate, binding themselves by oath to lue and die with their King or Lord. No Nayro's women may enter into Calicut but one night in the yeere, when the Citie is full of Lights: and then they goe with the Nayros, to behold and gaze their fill. They intend nothing but their lust, and thinke that if they die Virgins, they shall neuer enter into Paradise.

The Biabari are another sort, and are Merchants Gentiles, and enioy great priuiledges. The King cannot put them to death, but by sentence of the principall of themselves. They were the only Merchants before the Moores traded there, and still enioy many possessions. These marry one Wife, and their Children inherit, and they may touch the Nayro's. The Cugianem are a Sect of the Nayros, hauing a Law and Idols by themselves, which they may neuer alter. They make Tiles to couer the Temples and the Kings Palace. The Nayro's may lue with their women, but must wash themselves before they goe home.

Another Sect is called Manantamar, which are Landerers, nor may they or their Posteritie be of other function: nor may they mingle themselves with any other Generation. They haue Idol-ceremonies and Temples by themselves. The Nayros may vse their Wines (or Women rather.) Their Brethren or Nephewes are their Heires. The Calen are Weauers, and haue a distinct Idolatrous Sect; otherwise are as the former.

Besides these of better condition, there are of baser sort eleuen Sects, which may not marrie nor meddle with others. The first of these are called Tibera, Husbandmen; the second, Moger, and are Mariners; both hauing their proper Superstitions, and vse their women in common: the third are Astralogers, whom they call Canim. Great men aske their counsell, but may not touch their persons. The Aggeri are Masons and Workmen in Metals. The Mucboa or Mucboa are Fishers, dwelling in Villages by themselves; the men Theeues, the women Harlots, with whom they please. The Betna are Salt-makers: the Paernu are Iugglers, Inchanters, and Physicians (if such damnable Deuillish practices may deserue so honourable Name) which, when any are sicke and require their helpe, vse Coniuration to cause the Deuill to enter into some of them, and then by his suggestion declare the euent of the Disease, and what Sacrifices or other things are to be performed. They may not touch or bee touched of other men.

The Rouolet are a baser sort of Gentiles, which carry wood into the Citie to sell, and herbs. The Puler are as excommunicate persons, and lue in Desarts, where the Nayros haue no occasion to passe, and when they goe neere any of these Nayros, or any of the better sort, they cry as loud as they can (as the * Lepers among the Iewes) that others may auoid them. For if any touch them, their Kindred may for such action or passion slay them, and as many of these Puler also, as may make satisfaction for such disparagement. Some nights they wil goe of purpose, seeking to touch some of the Nayro women with hand, stick, or hurling of a stone: which if they effect, there is no remedie for the woman but to get her forth and sing with these Villaines; or to be sold, to escape killing by the hands of her Kindred. These Puler are Theeues and Sorcerers. The Paernu are of worse esteeme, and lue in Desarts without commerce of any, reputed worse then the Deuill. These ten sorts (or eleuen, if you reckon two sorts of the Tibera, as our Author doth; whertof one are Warriors, distinguished by a certaine cudgell, which they must carry in their hands; from the Nayros, are as well differing in Religions,

* Maffels reckons foure orders. The Cry, males, or Nobles, the Braj menes or Priests, the Nayros or Souldiers, the Valgar. The Nayros, ligions, as matters of common life: though for their severall Rites, it were wrong to the Reader at large to recite them, if we had the particulars to deliver. But this is common in India, that each Trade and Tribe distinguish a new Sect.

There are besides these Gentiles, Naturall of Malabar, many strangers of Indians, Moores, and Christians. But in other Kingdomes of Malabar, the Heathenish Religion is little differing from that in Calicut.

Cranganor.

Cranganor is a small Kingdome: the Inhabitants of the Citie, which giueth name to the Region, are Christians of Saint Thomas profession, about seventie thousand in number. Cochin is now growne great by the Portugals traffique and friendship. Of the rest there is not much worth the recitall. The Papall honour among the Bramenes, was by ordination of Perimal, which placed there the Supremacie of the Bramenes, because He to whom he gave Coulam, was a greater Man then the rest. This Papall title was Cobrium, a dignity which the King of Cochin still retaineth to be supreme Head of the Bramenes. For the ancient Kings of Coulam remoued their seate to Cochin, which was then in their Territories. But Warres haue since much altered the face of things in those parts. ^b In these parts are now many Christian Profelites of the Iesuites Conversion, besides many of the olde Thomas Christians. Both Men and Women in Cochin, account it a great Gallantry to haue wide Eares, which therefore they stretch by Art, langing Waights on them till they reach to their shoulders.

h Bar. Det. 1. 19.

Porca is a Kingdome Southwards from Cochin, but little we can say of it. In Tranancor betweene Coulam and the Cape were many Christians, if they may be so called, which want Sacraments. For in fifty yeeres together they had not seene a Priest, only they had the priuiledges and name of Thomaan-Christians. These Thomaans are now, as the Iesuites report, reduced to their Catholicisme.

The King of Tranancor Dominions stretcheth beyond the Cape Comori, (where Malabar endeth) on the East-side foure score and ten miles, as farre as Cael: which diuers great Lords hold vnder him. Among the rest is the Signiory of Quilacare. In the Citie of Quilacare is an Idoll of high account, to which they solemnize a Feast euery twelfth yeere, where the Gentiles resort as the Popish Christians in the Romish Iubilee. The Temple sacred to this Idoll hath exceeding great reueneue. The King (for so he is called) at this Feast erecteth a Scaffold couered with silke, and hauing washed himselfe with great solemnity, he prayeth before this Idoll: and then ascendeth the Scaffold, and there in presence of all the people cutteth off his Nose, and after that his Eares, Lips, and other parts, which he casts towards the Idoll, and at last he cutteth his throat, making a butcherly sacrifice of himselfe to his Idoll. He that is to be his Successor, must be present hereat: for he must vndergoe the same Martyrdom, when his twelue yeeres Iubilee is come. Along this Coast dwell the Parani, simple people, and Christians, which liue by fishing of Pearles. The Nayros make such holes in their Eares, that ¹ Cesar Fredericke sayth, hee thrust his arme vp to the shoulders in one of them. They are prodigal of their liues in the honour of their King. Oforim is tellect of some, which, like the renowned Decij, had vowed themselves to death, and not to returne from the enemy without victory. Aloisius Goncanni numbred in the Sea Coast of Coulam three and twenty towne, of which nineteene had Christian Churches.

The Malabars are generally of one Language, and one kind of writing. This their writing was in leaues of Palme, which they call Olla, two fingers broad, and long as the matter they intended, written on both sides with a stile of Iron, which they binde vp in Bookes betweene two boords in greater or lesser formes they please. Their writing is from the left hand to the right. They reckoned their times before the Portugals came into the Indies, from the departure of Perimal. There are two sorts of Moores, one Messicos of mixed seed of Moore-fathers and Echnike-mothers, called Naitaeni, Mungrels also in their Religion: the other Forreiners, which come thither in trading. There are also many Lewes, which haue almost lost their Iudaisme, minding more their merchandize then superstition.

Malabar.

Besides these former Sects, Stephanus de Brito speaketh of the Maleas which inhabit small Villages in the Mountaynes, which are Hunters of Elephants: amongst whom are no thefts or robberies, and therefore they leaue their doores open when they goe abroad. They haue no Idoll amongst them; only they obserue their Ancestours Sepulchres. These haue no Commerce with their Neighbours, nor are much subiect to Kings, only pay them a kinde of tribute, hauing Arelli set ouer them as Iudges or Magistrates, vnder each of them fise or sixe thousand men. Their houses are made of Indian Canes dawbed with earth, and some liue on trees laying beames from one tree to another, and so building their lofty Cottages free from Tygres and wilde Elephants, whereof the Mountaynes are full, which they take in Pits couered ouer with leaues. They haue fertile fields and Valleys, but not diligently husbanded. They are content with one Wife, which they carry with them whithersoever they goe, though but a Hunting-voyage. They are as other Malabars naked from the waste upwards, a long garment hangs thence to the ankles, and on their heads a Turbant as the Moors. Their necke, eares, and nostrils, are laden with gold. For the Malabars wear gold as well for nose-rings, as eare-rings. These Malcas are of better estimation then the base vulgar, nor is it accounted a pollution to touch them, no more then other Nairos or Thomzai Christians. They haue their Pipes and Tabors on their Feasts. They are also Sorcerers and diuine by familiar Spirits, but vse not to kill or hurt men by Witch-craft, as other Indians and Malabars doe. A witty, docible, honest people, perhaps descended of those Malliani, which Plutarch and Curius mention in the life of Alexander.

- 10 Of the Feast which all the Malabar-Kings hold euery twelfth year in honour of the Riuer Ganges, we haue there spoken. where we haue discouered of the Riuer. This Feast lasteth eight and twentie or thirtie dayes with great solemnitie: the Samorin euery day washing himselfe and offering Sacrifices to Ganges: after which hee returns to his Palace with innumerable troupes of men, riding vpon an Elephant in great pompe: and three dayes after in the morning and euening with greatest Royaltie, makes shew of himselfe in a high Throne, many Lampes of gold and silver burning about him, many Peecces discharged, with other ceremonie of State. The King prostrates himselfe on the ground, and three times doth reuerence to the People, and they to Him, the Kings Vassals then doing him homage. After this, many Champions exercise their Fencing-skill before him, and at the sound of Instru-
- 20 ments, the chiefe Nobles by two and two in a ranke, with their faces to the ground, doe reuerence: the Elephants are likewise to honour Him. Twentie thousand Crownes are spent on this solemnitie by the King. Another more diuellish rite followes. About the year 1520. the Zamorin slue a certaine King. In memorie whereof the Successors of that King send a certayne number of their Souldiers to reuenge his death, themselves being sure to be slaine: these are called Amocz, which are Clients to that King, and are either to come to them slues, or to send so many Souldiers, to the number of thirtie, which rush among the People, and kill as many as they can; themselves certayne to be killed of the Kings Souldiers.

CHAP. XI.

Of their Funerall and Idolatrous bloudie Rites.

From those places where our feet last rested (or touched rather) vnto the Cape Guadauerin ^a, betwixt that ridge of Mountaines called Gate, and the Ocean (which is there named the Gulfe of Bengala) trendeth the Kingdome of Narsinga, or Bishnagar; those two Royall Cities contending which shall giue name to this mightie Empire, containing two hundred leagues of Seacoast. The King hath in continuall pay forty thousand Nairos. But as occasion serueth, he can bring into the field many many thousands more: as in that Expedition against Idalkan, specified by Barrus and Boetas; in which, was a world of people (seuen hundred thousand foot, fortie thousand horse, seuen hundred Elephants, twentie thousand harlots.) Hee sacrificed also vnto Idols twentie thousand seuen hundred and threescore head of Beasts and Fowles in nine dayes space, which in Idoll-deuotion were all bestowed after on the poore.

- 3 In the year of our Lord 1565, Bishnagar ^b was sacked by foure Kings of the Moors (as Frederike) naming them Dialken, Zamalus, Cotamalus, and Viridy, through treason of two more Captaines, which had seuen or eight score thousand Souldiers vnder them; but being of the same Religion with the Kings of Decan, betrayed their owne King, forsaking him in the midst of the battaile. This was a iust reward of treason to the true King of Bishnagar. For three Captaines had kept the King thirtie yeares as prisoner, once a year shewing him to the people, themselves ruling the State. When he dyed, then Ramaragio exalted himselfe to the Throne. Temiragio, the second, swayed the government, and the third Bengabe was General of the Armie. Onely Temiragio escaped and returned (when the Decans had sacked the Citie, and were gone) to Beznegar, and sent to Goa great promises for Hor-
- 4 ses, if any Merchants would bring any. Whereupon Frederike went with other Merchants, which carried store of them, but brought no store of money in payment; the Tyrant accepting the Horles, but paying nothing. Temiragio temoued his Court from Beznegar to Penegorde, eight dayes journey within Land. And his sonne put to death the sonne of that King before mentioned, which had bene imprisoned, as this also had bene, till Death by a murdering hand freed him. Hence grew many broyles, the Nobles refusing to acknowledge this New King; and thus Berneger being forsaken, remained after this an Habitation for Tygres and wild Beasts, containing in circuit foure and twenty myles, as our Author (that stayed there seven months) affirmeth. He neuer saw Palace exceeding that of Bisnagar. It had nine Gates with guards of Souldiers. Here hee observed their Rites in burning the women, so often mentioned, which after his and Babys his relations are thus. (I haue declared the like for substance before; this, as in some Rites differing, I adde also.)

e The solemnitie of burning of the wife after her husbands death. The Ancients mention this Rite. Vid. Ektour. Hist. 7. c. 15. Hier. ad Iou. 1. 1. See the same described in Purchacis Fama. Antich. Tan. 17.

The woman is taketh two or three monthes respite after her husbands death: The day being come, she goeth early out of her house, mounted on a Horse or Elephant, or else on a Stage, carried by eight men: apparelled like to a Bride, adorned with Jewels, and her haire about her shoulders; holding in her left hand a Looking-glasse; in the right an Arrow; and singeth as shee passeth through the Citie, saying, That she goeth to sleepe with her husband. She is accompanied with her friends, untill it be one or two of the clocke in the afternoon: then they goe out of the Citie, passing by the Rivers side to the burning-place, wher is prepared a great square Cane, full of Wood. Here is made a great Banquet, the woman eating with ioy, as if it were her wedding-day; and after, they sing and daunce, till the woman bid to kindle the fire in the Cane: then she leaueeth the Feast, and taketh her husbands nearest kinsman by the hand, and goeth with him to the banke of the River, where the strippeth her of her cloathes and jewels, bestowing them at her pleasure, and couering herselfe with a cloth, throweth herselfe into the River, saying, O wretches, waite away your finnes. Comming out of the Water, shee rowleth herselfe into a yellow cloth; and againe taking her husbands kinsman by the hand, goeth to the said Cane, by which is erected a little Pinncle, on which she mounteth, and there recommendeth her children and kindred to the people. After this, another woman taketh a pot with oyle, and sprinkleth it ouer her head, and therewith annoynteth all her bodie, and then throweth it into the Furnace, the woman going together with the same. Presently after the woman, the people throw great pieces of Wood into the Cane, so that with those blowes, and the fire, she is quickly dead, and their great mirth is on a suddaine turned into great lamentation and howling.

When a Great man dyeth, all the women of his house, both his wife and slaues, with whom hee hath had carnall copulation, burne themselves together with him. Amongst the baser sort, I haue scene (saith Master Frederike) the dead man carried to the place of buriall, and there set upright: the woman comming before him on her knees, casteth her armes about his necke, while a Mason maketh a wall round about them: and when the wall is as high as their neckes; one comming behind the woman, strangleth her; the workeman presently finishing the wall ouer them: and this is their buriall.

Ludovicus Vertmannus relateth the same Funerall Rites of Tarnasseri (as in other parts of India) saying that there fifteene or twentie men, in their idolatrous habit, like Diuels, doe attend on the fire wherein the husband is burned; all the Musicians of the Citie solemnizing the Funerall pompe: and fifteene dayes after, they haue the like solemnitie, at the burning of the woman; those diuellish fellows holding fire in their mouthes, and sacrificing to Demmo, and are her intercessors to that Diuell for her good entertainment.

f Odricius.

The cause of burning their wiues, is by some ascribed to their wonted poisonings of their husbands, before this Law; by others, that the husband might haue her helpe and comfort in the other world.

g Odricius.

Odricius telleth of a strange and vncouth Idoll, as bigge as Saint Christopher, of pure Gold, with a new band about the necke, full of precious stones, some one whereof was of value (if hee valued iustly) more then a whole Kingdome: The roofe, pavement, and ceiling of the walls, within and without the Temple, was all Gold. The Indians went thither on pilgrimage, some with halters about their neckes, some with their hands bound behind them, some with knives sticking on their armes and legges; and if, after their pilgrimage, uour. Neere to the Temple was a Lake, where-into the Pilgrims cast Gold, Silver, and Gemmes, for honour of the Idoll, and reparation of his Temple. At euery yearly Feast, the King and Queene, with the Pilgrims and People, assembling, placed the said Idoll in a rich Chariot, and with a solemn procession of Virgins, two and two in a ranke, singing before him, and with Musickall Instruments carrie him forth. Many Pilgrims put themselves vnder the Chariot wheeles, where they are crushed in pieces. More then five hundred persons vied thus to doe, whose carkasses were burned, and ashes kept for holy Reliques. Otherwise also they will devote themselves to such a martyrdom in this manner: The parents and friends assemble and make a Feast to this Votarie, and after that, hang five sharpe knives

knives about his necke, and so carrie him before the Idoll; where he taketh one of his knives, and cryeth, For the worship of my God I cut this my selfe; and cutting a piece, casteth it at the face of the Idoll; and so proceeding, at the last sayth, Now doe I yeeld my selfe to death in the behalfe of my God; and being dead, is buried as before.

Our Country-man ^{b Sir Iohn Manducille,} Sir Iohn Manducille reporteth the same Historie of their Idoll-Procession, and the ashes of those voluntary Martyrs; which they keepe, to defend them against tempests and misfortunes. He also sayth, That some Pilgrims, in all their peregrinations, not once lifted vp their eye-lids; some, at every third or fourth pace fell downe on their knees, to worship; some whipped; others wounded themselves; yea, killed themselves (as is before said.) ^{i Nic. di Conti} Nicolo di Conti ^{k Limbobot, l. 14 cap. 44.} reporteth the same in his time.

Neither is this bloody custome yet left, as ^{k Limbobot, l. 14 cap. 44.} Limbobot ^{i Nic. di Conti} affirmeth, by report of one of his chamber-fellows that had scene it. They haue (sayth he) a Waggon, or Cart, so haue, that three or foure Elephants can hardly draw it, which is brought forth at Faires, Feasts, and Processions. At this Cart hang many Cables or Ropes, wherewith all the people hale and pull, of deuotion. In the vpper part of the Cart standeth a Tabernacle, and therein the Idoll: vnder it sit the Kings wiues, playing on Instruments. And while the Procession passeth, some cut pieces of their flesh, and throwe at the ^{l Babby cap. 30.} Pagode; some lay themselves vnder the wheels of the Cart, with such euent as you haue heard.

^{l Babby cap. 30.} Gasparus Balby ^{& Arilus Dant. Hist. Ind. Or. c. 2.} relateth the same, and addeth, That the Priests, which haue care of this Idoll, and certaine women, are consecrated to these deuotions from their Cradles, by their Zeale-blind parents. And the women prostitute their bodies, to gaine for the Idoll whatsoeuer they can get ouer and aboue their owne maintenance. This filtheth the Citie with Strumpets; there being of this Sacred (you may interpret it ursed) crue, foure hundred in one place of the Citie. These haue their place in the Idoll-procession, some of them in the Chariot which is drawne by men; every one accounting himselfe happy, that can touch or draw the same. This he sayth was at Negapatan.

He further affirmeth, That not farre from the Citie of Saint Thomas is the Towne Casta; where the Wife is not burned (as at Negapatan) but a great Graue being made for the deceased Husband, they place the liuing Wife by the dead corps, and their neereft kindred cast earth vpon them both, and stampe thereon. They which marry, wed in their owne degree, as a Smith to a Smiths daughter: and they powre out their prayers at the Image of some Kow, or a Serpent, called Bittia di Capella. Their Bramenes burne Kowes duog; and if they intend any warres with other Nations, they anoint their Nose and Forehead with those ashes, not washing themselves till the euening. They which sacrifice themselves to the Pagode, when they haue wallowed a long time in luttfull pleasures, shoot into the aire pieces of their flesh tyed to Arrowes, and diuersly mangle themselves; at last, cut their owne throats, so sacrificing themselves to the Pagode.

There are also certaine people called Amonchi, otherwile Chuani, which perceiuing the end of their life ^{m De perate dying.} approach, lay hold on their weapons, which they call Chiffe, and going forth, kill every man they meet with, till some body (by killing them) make an end of their killing. They are loth (it seemes) to come into the Deuils presence empty-handed, or to goe to Hell alone. Some of them worship Gon in the likenesse of a Man; some in the images of Kine and Serpents; some inuoke the Sunne and Moone, others, some Tree or Riuer.

Among many Feasts which they celebrate in the yeere, one in Autumne is most solemne, in which they take some great tree, and fasten it in the ground, hauing first fashioned it like a mast of a Ship, with a crosse-yard, whereon they hang two hookes of iron. And when any one by sickness, or other miserie, hath made a vow to their Idoll or Pagode, hee cometh thither, and being first admonished by the Priests to offer his sacrifice, they lift him with those hookes by both the shoulders, and there hold him to the Idoll, till he hath three times saluted the same, with clapping his folded hands to his breast, and hath made some sport thereto with weapons which he hath in his hand. After this he is let downe, and the blood which issueth from his shoulders is sprinkled on the Tree, in testimonie of his deuotion. Then they draw him vp againe by the middle, to giue thanks to the Idoll: and then giue him leaue to heale himselfe, if he can. They which are in great miserie, or seeke some great matter at the hand of their Idoll, doe this. They haue another Feast, celebrated in the night, continuing eight nights: in which many Candles were scene burning thorow the Citie. Three or foure runne from one end of street to the other, and hurling Rice, and other meates after them, say, they offer it to the Deuill which followes them; not daring to looke behind, lest he should slay them. In other places also they haue those Idoll-chariots, like vnto Towers, to the drawing whereof, many thousands of deuout persons put their helping-hand.

^{o An. Dotti 1598.} Anno 1598. there was a great contention, whethet the signe of Perimal should be erected erected in the Temple of Cidambaram. This signe was a gilded Mast, with an Ape at the foot thereof. Many Embassadors were there about this quarrell; some vring, some refusing this deed. But the Prince (called the Naicho of Gingi) would haue it set vp, notwithstanding the Priests greatest vnwillingnesse. The Priests therefore, both regular (which are the logues) and secular Bramenes ascended vp the rooffe of the Church, and thence threatened to hurle downe themselves, which twenty of the logues did, and theret threatened to follow. But the Naicho caused Gunnes to be discharged at them, which slue two, and caused the rest to retire and breake their couenant (rather then their necks) with their fellows. A woman also of this faction cut her owne throat for zeale of this new superstition.

These Kings of Bifnagar haue, as sayth Barrius, a great part of the Westerne coast subiect vnto them, all betwene the riuers of Aliga and Cangerecora: in which space are these coast Townes, Ancola, Agorapan, Mergeru, Onor, a Royall Citie, Baticala, Bendor, Bracelor, Bacinar, Carara, Carnate, Mangalor, Mangliran, Cumlara, and Cangerecora. From this Citie standing on a Riuer of the same name, Southwards vnto the Cape Comori is reckoned the Malabar coast. And although Goa and Calecut much hinder those his Ports, yet to salute and shake hands, with both Seas, argues a great State, specially where the adioyning are so small. There are three Naichi or Tributary Kings subiect to Him; such in power, but in title Naichi, that is, Deputies or Presidents, of Madura, Gingi, and Tanalar. The Naicho of Madura is Lord of the Fishing coast. The people are called Badage, and despite the Portugals, because they drinke Wine, cate Beefe, and suffer themselves to be touched of the Paraz, and carried on their shoulders. For these in their Bramene zeale, would not endure to touch or talke with the baser vulgar, and their Bramenes would die rather then eate that which a Bramene had not dressed. And therefore Robert Sforce a Iesuite coming amongst them, professed himselfe of the Bramene or Rape blood, that is, of Noble race, procured a Bramene to dresse his meate, abstained from Fleish, Fish, Wine, and Egges, after their Countrey manner, and attired himselfe in the habite of a Sauasse (one of their votaries) and in preence of chastitie stirred not out of his house in a whole yeere, nor would be spoken with by euery one, alleaging somtimes his deuouter conference with God, so to winne credite with these Ethnikes. He learned by conference with a Bramene, that they maintayned that Philosophicall axiome, that Nothing could be made of nothing, and held three Beginnings or Vniuersall Causes, the first Padi, that is God, the second Pain, the Matter of which they say the Soules are made, the third Passan, the Corporall matter. They maintayned also the pythagoricon or Pythagoricon passage of Soules out of one body into another: for else (say they) how could there be such diuerstie of Men, one a King, another a Seruant; one a Bramene, another a Para? They are also Patonikes, holding the Soule not to be the forme of the Body, but enclosed therein as a Bird in a Cage.

The Bramenes weare ashes on their heads. It seemes they are zealous Banauenes. Their Saneastes are Asses indeed for literature, only as Hermites, they vow chastitie. The Gorupi or Gorupi are the Doctors of their Law. The Iesuites professed the Doctorship of these, in the habite of the former; which is a white Garment to the ankle with another of the same colour but thinner ouer it, a red cloth cast ouer the shoulders, one like a Cap or Hat on his head: from his necke hangs downe a corde of fve threds, three of gold, and two of white like, they eate but once a day.

Their Bramenes haue a proper language and mysticall (as Roman for the Romish holies) called Gueradan, which the Iesuite learned, and thereby out of their books, that there had bene in these parts foure Lawes or Sects, three of which the Bramenes still obserued, to wit, of Vesmu, of Brama, of Rubren; the fourth meerely spirituall, partly mixed with others, and partly lost, tending to the saluation of the Soule, which he said that He brought now vnto them; their Almes and Bodily chastisements, without this, not being effectually to their saluation. Any might learne and choose a Doctour for any of the other three, but none was able to teach this. When they become Schollers to such Doctours, they doe a triple reuerence vnto the ground, lifting vp their hands aloft, then letting them downe to their heads; and must (like the Pythagoreans of old, which was learned of the Indians) rest satisfied with his Masters bare Assertion, without questioning or further disputing. He was once brought before a Conisitorie of the Bramenes, and accused for his new Doctrines. Some Articles were, That he should affirme that the walling in Remanancoor and Ganges were to no effect; That the Bramenes are inferior to the Raj or Princes; That they should be all damned; notwithstanding there were of them many Nhanuig and Sansses (the Nhanuig also vow chastitie and to forsake the World.) The President of this Councell cleared the Iesuite vpon the Apologie of another Bramene. For that of Remanancoor, it is a corner of the Fishing Region, wherein is a Temple famous through all the East, which hee that shall visit and wash himselfe in the Sea iust by, shall bee cleared from all his finnes, aswell as if it were done in Ganges.

Id Madura and the Territorie thereof are numbred a hundred thousand Bramenes, the chiefe of which is Chocanada, as their Bishop or Pope: He would haue this Iesuite expelled the Countrey, for that this Franke (so euer since the Expedition to Ierusalem vnder Duke Godfrey of Bullen, all Westerne Christians are called in all the East a name, it seemes which the Saracens communicated to the Echinikes) had eaten with another Franke. Hee meant 30 Fernandes, another Iesuite, that had not thus acted the Sansses and Gurupis amongst them. He alledged also that His Temple was built in the ground of His Pagode. But this Iesuite with Gold stopp'd this Bramenes mouth, and had the soyle of the Church granted him in peace, with promise of all fauour. One thing that holds them intangled in this error, is, that they hold it vnlawfull to copie out their Lawes and Religion in writing, so that they which wil learne them, must (like the Dryades) from their youth learne them of some Doctour, and commit them to memories in which they spend tenne yeeres and more. And if any should write them, they would pull out his eyes.

Emanuel Leitanus, another Iesuite, coming to Madura in the like Sanssian Habit, obserued the Gurupian order, and fell downe before Sorce to the ground. Hee sitting in a Chaire couered with red; because some of the Madurians were present. The Bramenes in the Kingdome of Bilnaga are of such power, that nothing is done without them; and of the huge Councillors of State, foure are Bramenes: yea, with their face to the earth, all men, and the King himselfe, adore the Bramen-Pope: nor doth the King admit any to conference in the morning, before hee hath seene two Bramenes. In Chandegrin is a Clocke that strikes not foure and twentie houres, but sixtie and foure, according to their diuision of the Night and Day, each into foure parts, and those subdiuided into eight. The Iesuites conceiue that these Bramenes are of the dispersion of the Israelites, and their Bookes (called Samsereetan) doe somewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they vnderstand them not. They haue some prophetically phrases, and some of them asume that God made Adam the first man, and being pressed acknowledge one God. The King and his Nobles speak the learned and sacred tongue of the Bramenes.

Anno 1679. One of his Great men rebelling against him, and fortifying the Castle of Vellur, the King besieged him, and on his submission pardoned him; but so as hee turned his Fort (which had stood the Rebell in an hundred thousand Crownes) into a Palace, besides 20 twentie Pannes, each worth an hundred thousand Crownes, and innumerable Horles and Elephants. The same yeere did the King write to the King of Spain in commendation of the Iesuites, with promise to assit the Vice-roy against the Moores and Hollanders, which had obtained to build a Fortresse of the Naichus of Tanauapatan, desiring the same friendship, that since the King of Narsinga dayes had bene betwixt both their Ancestors, subscribed,

 Thus you see the same King directly entituled according to the Citie Royall, yea I finde him called (of the Castle before named) King of Vellur; so Floris styles him, saying that in June 1614. He granted trade to the English, as likewise did Obiana Queene of Paleacatte. One of his Wiues which (it seemes) gouerned that Citie; On Iuly the nine and twentieth, his Abaskian was sent, being a white cloth where his owne hand is printed in Sandall or Saffron, and another the like from the Queene of Paleacatte. The Kings Letter was written vpon a leafe of Gold, wherein hee made excuse of former wrongs, gaue them libertie to build a House or Fort, with other priuiledges. He gaue Floris the English Merchant a Towne of foure hundred Pardawes yearly reuenue, notwithstanding the Hollanders (his Countrey 40 men) did what they could to hinder it. Wengali (Floris his man) had bene in the Kings presence, who laid his hand vpon his head. But on the eight and twentieth of October following, news came that this King was dead, hauing reigned about fittie yeeres. His three three wiues, of which Obiana Queene of Paleacatte was one, burned themselves with his corpe, and great troubles were expected. The Hollanders had presented this King with two Elephants of Seilan. Cotabaxa the King of Badaya and Lellengana, his Neighbour, died not long before. Mahmud Vmin Cotabaxa his Brothers Sonne succeeded. Mushlipatan is in his Dominion, Golconda is the Metropolitan Citie. But hee is a Moore of the Sophi his Sect. Golconda is the Citie Royall.

With the Natibo or King of Gingi (vassall to the King or Emperour of Bifnagar) the Isa suites found good entertainment. Heere some of the Isagues distributed the water of Ganges out of certaine vessels covered with foule and filthie clothes, which yet the people for deuotion kissed. These Isagues with admirable patience endured the Sunnes heate: and one among the rest enclosed himselfe in an Iron Cage, with his head & feet onely out of the Cage, that he could neither sit nor lie downe at any time: and on the Cage were hanged an hundred Lampes, which foure other Isagues his companions lighted at certaine times. And thus walked he in this his perpetuall Prison, as a Light vnto the World, in his vaine glorious opinion. They reasoned with certaine Bramenes; some of which held the Sunne for God, and yet sometime to haue bene a man, and for his merits so promoted. Some denied a multitude of Gods, onely allowing that priuledge to Pyrama, Viduna, and Vaitir, one of which maketh, another keepeth, the third destryeth all things.

Neere to Madure is an Idoll called Chocanada: which by night appeared in a vision to a Priest, and bade him goe fay to the Natibo of Madure, that hee or I must abide in this house: whereupon he went to the Idoll with his Priest, but resigned the Palace to him. His deuotion is such, that every day, while hee sitteth in iudgement, a Bramene euer and anon foun-deth the name of Araganassa in his eares: and when one is wearie, another succedeth in the same Office, neuer ceasing this Idols remembrance, although hee there sitteth fure or fixe houres.

I thought meete to mention one custome, which some report of the Brama, or Pope-like Bramenes in these parts, who by his authority dispense with many of their Lawes, and dissolueth Mariages: giuing libertie to his pleasure to the woman to marrie another; which his Dispensation is sealed on her right shoulder, with a marke of a hote Iron.

Handagrin is the Royall Seat of the great King of Bifnagar. The chiefeest Families therein are the Bramenes, Raias, and Cretins. They asseme that their Idoll Perimal did bring forth the Bramenes out of his head (as the Poets tell of Minerva) the second out of his breast; third out of his belly: and all other inferior Families out of his feet. The Bramenes haue some opinions, not altogether difsonant from the Scriptures. They say, That God onely by his thought made a man, which they call Adam.

On the tenth day of Iuly, Anno 1600. happened an Eclipse of the Sunne, which the Bramenes said was by means of the Dragon (which they make a Celestiall Signe) his byting of the Sunne and Moone: whereupon the King and others neither ate nor dranke that day: deploring their misery, because the Dragon deuoured the Sunne. In the Citie Prepeti, three miles from Chandagrin is the Feast of Perimal, in remembrance of his Mariage: at which the Offerings amounted to two hundred thousand Crownes: and the Chariot of the Idoll was drawne forth a mile and a halfe in Procession by ten thousand men. They haue another Feast of the Kine, because they suppose Perimal to bee the Sonne of a Cow, and then the wayes and streets are full of that cattle. They haue a Feast in honour of the Sunne, which lasteth eight dayes, solemnized by the Emperour himselfe, and he is iudged a Traytor which is not present thereat. Then they cast lots, the King first, and after the rest, diuining by Arrowes the next yeeres destinie. An Arrow light on a Tree, and being plucked out, causeth a called liquor to follow, it prognosticateth Warres; if white, Peace. Not farre hence is an Idoll called Tripiti, to which are great Pilgrimages and Offerings; alwayes they goe, some begin, and the rest answere, and so all continue to resound the name of the Idoll Gaia. Before they enter into the Temple, they shoue and wash themselves. The Heremites, which they call Sonasses, lue in Deserts, and at sometimes appeare before the people naked, which they call about a great port, and neuer goe forth on foot. The Idoll Tripiti is seated on a Mountain, do about which are fertile Valleyes, stored with Fruites, which none may touch, as being consecrated.

There

There are in the Woods great abundance of Apes so tame, that they will take meate out of mens hands: the people esteeme them a diuine Race, and of the familiaritie of Perimal the chiefe God, whom they worship in many colours and shapes, as of a Man, Oxe, Hart, Lion, Hogge, Ducke, Cocke, &c.

Francis & Fernandez saith, that Cidambaram is the Mother-citie of their Pagan Rites, wherein are many stately Temples, and the reueneue of the Bramenes amounted to 30000. Ducats, but now they are payd but 12000. yeerely.

Here happened a strange accident, the same day the Iesuits departed, the occasion of which was this. There is in this Citie a Temple of Perimal, wherein they worship an Ape called Hauumant, whom they report to haue bene a God, and (for I know not what) together with many thousands of other Gods, to haue remained there, being all transformed into Apes. Now when this principall Ape was forced to passe into the Iland Zeilan, and wanted a ship, he leaped, and at every leape left an Iland or heape of Land behind him, so making way for his Apish traine to Zeilan. The tooth of this Ape was kept for a great relike in that Iland, with great resort of Pilgrims thereunto: and in the yeere 1554. was by the Portugals (who made a roade thither, in hope of great bootie) taken away. The Indian Princes offered the Vice-roy three hundred thousand (or as Linschoten telleth, tenn hundred thousand) Ducats, for the ransom of this Apes tooth, but the Archbishop dissuaded the Vice-roy; who thereupon burnt the same before those Indian Embassadors, and threw the ashes into the Sea. Not long after, a Beniane of Cambaya perswaded the Indians, that hee by Diuine Power had taken away that holy Tooth, being inuizibly present, and had left another in the roome which was burnt. Superstition is credulous, and the King of Bijnagar gaue him a great summe of Gold for that Apes Tooth, wherewith hee thus Apishly had bitten and mocked them, which was after holden in like veneration as the former. But to retorne to our Cidambaran Historie.

They tell, That an holy man, in great penance, had many yeeres held his foot pierced thorow with a peece of Iron; and when he was often by God commanded to leaue that selfe-rigour, he flatly refused, vnlesse that hee might see God dancing about him, which also hee condescended vnto; and with the Sunne, Moone and Starres, which played the Musicians, appeared dancing: And as he danced, a Chaîne of Gold fell from his foot, whereof this Towne tooke name. For Cidambaran signifieth a golden Chaîne.

As Vraga & Rieu, two Iesuits, travelled to Chaudegria, they came to Trauilur, where they say they saw the Idoll, with a white Banner on his back, and after him three sacred Kine, with Drummers on their backs, and after them Trumpeters and many Musicians of blither sorts. Then followed twentie women dancing, which were also consecrated to the Idols seruice, and might not marry, but yet prostitute their bodies: these were richly attired, and carried Lights. The Priests followed with the Idoll, and were followed by the people with Lights. At their returne they set downe the Idoll, and set sodden Rice before him to eat; & others meane while driving away the flies, and others covering him that hee should not bee seene eating: and at last, one maketh a long Oration of the worthy acts of their God, and then see him againe in his place. This lasted foure houres; and in the meane space many reasoned with the Iesuits, and some held vaine Discourses of the Creation: as that there were seuen Seas: one of Salt-water, the second of fresh, the third of Honey, the fourth of Milke, the fifth of Tair (which is Creame beginning to fowre) the sixth of Sugar, the seventh of Butter that the Earth had nine corners, whereby it was borne vp by the Heauen: Others dissented, and said, that the Earth was borne vp by seuen Elephants; the Elephants feete stood on Tortoises, and they were borne by they know not what.

When the Naisio of Tangoor died, 375, of his Concubines willingly offered themselves to the fire, to honour his Funerall, so much can Custome harden to delicate and soft-hearted a nature.

The Temples in the Country haue great reuenues, which in some places are encreased by the detraction of women, which prostitute themselves to gaine for their Idols: and many young Girles are brought vp for this purpose. Many are in these parts, of the Sect of the Gauvaters, which kill no quicke thing, as is spoken. Some haue a stone hanging about their necks, as bigge as an Egge, with certaine lines drawne thorow the middle thereof; and this they worship, and call it Tambarana: they keepe every Friday holi-day.

The Kingdome of Orissalath on the Sea-coast 350. miles, betwixt the richer Kingdomes of Bengala and Bijnagar, poore of Ports and Traffique. Frederike writes that before the King of Patane had conquered Orissa, there was great Trade for Oile of Zerzeline, Lacca, Long Pepper, Ginger, Mirabolans, and cloth made of herbs, which grow with a bowle as bigge as an Orange, yielding silke. The Countrey was so safe, that a man might haue travelled with his Gold in his hand. The King was a Gentile, and resided in the Citie Calicut.

cha fixe dayes Iourney within Land. The King of Patane was soone after subdued by the Mogoll. The Inhabitants (except a few Moores) are Gentiles, little or nothing (that I can learne) differing in Rites from their Neighbours, of which yee haue heard. Some e alcribe to the Citie Orilla, as the name, to the Principallitie of the other Cities of this Kingdome.

In these parts is the Citie of Saint Thomas or Malepur; where they say Saint Thomas (after he had preached the Gospell to the Indians) was martyred and burned. The Legend which some report of his death, were too tedious to recite; and as little likelihood of truth is in that long tale of the miraculous Crucifixes here found, related by ^d Oforius, who likewise declareth the Rites of those Saint Thomas-Christians, of their Chaldean-Pope, Cardinals, Patriarches and Bishops; of which in another place we shall more fitly speake. On the first day of Iuly Saint Thomas Holiday is celebrated, as well by the Pagans as Christians; and his Sepulchre is had in deuout estimation, both of the Moores, Gentiles, and Christians; each e pretending the right of his owne Religion to the Church, where this Saint lieth interred, to which the Indian Christians goe on Pilgrimage, carrying with them a little of that earth for a great Relique. A Moore had the keeping of the Church, which was built after our fashion, and begged of the comers for maintenance of it, and of a light continually burning therein.

The Portugals f now inhabit this Towne almost desolate: the Iesuites also haue heere a Residence. The Church doores (by the Superstition of some) are almost cut in pieces, and carried away to set in Gold and Silver, and to wear about their neckes, as a holy relick; the Portugals herein being exceedingly vaine, and attributing hereunto many Miracles, verifying that Proverbe which the Spaniards vs, affirming the Portugals to be s Poco, foles, deuotos. One sent Linschoten a whole Bead-roll or paire of Beads thereof, the bringer affirming that those Beades had calmed a Tempest miraculously by the way. The Inhabitants in this respect haue driuen their Church-doors full of nailes: but Saint Thomas bones are now removed to Goa. Those doores are of such renowned holinesse, because they were made of that wood which Saint Thomas drew with his girdle out of the Hauen (which it choaked) and could not before this Miracle by any meanes be removed.

One thing I thought not to omit, that there bee h whole Villages and Kindreds of people, in other things like to other men, but are borne with one of their legs and one foot from the knee downwards, as thicke as an Elephants legges; which the common people imagine to be a curse by Diuine Iustice, inflicted vpon the whole Generation, for that their Progenitors murdered Saint Thomas. Linschoten saith, he hath seene and spoken with them, and could learne no other cause thereof. It is to them a deformitie, but no let or impediment otherwise.

The Gouernour of Musulipatan being of Mahomets posteritie, had agreed for custome to take foure per centum, and exacted twelue, Offering the English these diuers wrongs. Here the Gentiles haue in those parts a Feast when the New Moone comes vpon Munday, and then both Sexes wash themselves in the Sea, as a matter of much Indulgence for their finnes. And then after much indignitie, the Cape-Merchant Floris, performed a worthy exploit, deserting still to flourish, though he be dead. The Gouernours Sonne being set ouer the Custome, and at the Custome-houle guarded with his Souldiers, Floris entred alone as it were for business, and as he had plotted, a few English followed by diuers wayes, which seized on the weapons of the Guard, at the Custome-houle doore, and Floris laid hold of the Gouernours Sonne Wencatadra by name, which was suddenly conueyed into their Boat, three thousand people presently running to the shoare. But being vnder their ships protection, they both secured themselves, and for redemption of his Sonne, forced the Father to pay all debts by him detained, with satisfaction for wrongs offered. Yet such was his Superstition, that he almost first starued a shipboord rather then he would eate or drinke with the English. Thus s from the foure and twentieth of Nouember till the thirtieth, he kept a strict Bramene Fast, the English pitying his misery, and willing therefore to take pledges in his room. But after that weeke of cleane Lent without eating or drinking, he was redeemed, the debts being paid by his Father. And hence let the Reader iudge of bodily exercise, and opus operatum without true faith, how little it availeth.

In Narlapur Peta (a place not farre hence, where they Carened the Globe) happened in August that yere such overflowings of water, that many thousands of men and cattell were drowned, Townes, Fields of Rice and Salt-hills overflowne, foure thousand houses washed away, and two Stone Bridges ouer the Ruer, one of nineteene, the other of fifteene Arches, comparable to Rochester Bridge, standing three fadome aboue water. Many Portugals also be lue in the parts of Bengala adioyning like Wildmen; and Laric speaks of 1200. which thus obserue not Christianity, and therefore may be reckoned amongst these Heathens.

And thus have we finished our perambulation of the Continent of Asia. Some perhaps will marvel why I have not handled the Muscovites and Russians in this Asian Discourie: to whom I answer, That of the Tartarians subject to the Muscovites, I have already spoken; and the rest of the Muscovites Dominions, especially the most populous, civill, wealthy; yea, the Imperiall City it selfe, by most Maps, is ascribed to Europe: that I speake not of the uncertainty of that troubled Estate, now these many yeeres, whereof I would have more certaine and settled Relations to bestow on our Reader, which I hope with Gods helpe, in our European Discouery shall be performed.

Now let vs ship our selves over (for wee are not skilfull of Havimants leapes) vnto the I-lands: having first tasted you with the Fruits and other Rarities of Nature in India.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Creatures, Plants, Fruits, and Drugs in India.

Of their Beasts and living Creatures.

THE Elephant and Rhinoceros is already spoken: and of diuers others of their beasts. The Elephant is ^a of great vse, both for warre and peace. When the keeper employeth him in any burthen, he getteth first on his necke, and putteth his feet vnder the beasts eares, having a hooke in his hand, which he sticketh about betweene his eares, ^b where (hee sayth, I thinke it an error) his stones lie: they bind the burthen with a rope, which at his keepers bidding hee taketh in his mouth, and windeth it about his teeth, and so draweth the packe after him. The Elephants are said to keepe themselves chafly to one Female, which is thought to bring forth in a yeere or halfe, or (as Aristotle affirmeth) two yeeres.

^c William Clarke which serued the Mogol diuers yeeres in his warres, saith that he hath seene in one Army twenty thousand Elephants, whereof foure thousand for warre, the rest Females for burthens, young, &c. In the engendering the Female lyes on her backe: some say if any shall be witness of that Act, the Elephant will seeke to kill them. Their running mad once a yeere is in their season of lust, nor do they grow mad till they grow to a certaine age, and those Males. The wild ones keepe in Herds or companies, all of one Males breed keeping together: and sometimes perhaps more. For Andrew Baste liuing nine moneths in the Woods of Africke, hath seene (he sayd) in a Heerd hundreds of them. They beare, sayth Clarke, but three men, one before to guide, another behind to make them goe, the third in the midst for sight, to which end they have foure Peeces in a kind of Towre on their backes.

^d Christophorus Acosta, Linschoten, and other moderne Authors, as also Aristotle, Plinius, Alian and others of the Ancient, relate strange reports of the Elephant. For the Readers delight I will mention some. An Elephant being weary, halted home; his keeper after much entreaty not preuayling, told him it was for the King of Portugals service, which hee would haue him doe: the beast answering hee, hee (which in the Malabar Language signifieth I will, as Acosta interpreteth) fulfilled his request. The same Elephant wanting his meates his Master said it was, because his Kettle whereto he ved to boyle it was broken, and therefore willed him to carry it to the Tinker; which hee did, and brought it againe, but ill mened: whereupon he was sent againe, and the Tinker to try him, amended it worle. The Elephant carries it to the River which ranne by, to see if it would hold water, and finding it to runne, came backe with great noyse, and anger: the Tinker entreats pardon, and at the third time doth it well, which yet the Elephant would not beleue, till by tryall hee saw it held water, and then shewing it to the standers by that it would hold, carried it home. A Souldier hurled a Corro shell at an Elephant; which (because he could not then repay it) put the shell in his mouth, and a few dayes after seeing him in the street, at Cochim, he hurled the same out of his mouth at the Souldier againe. Another Souldier misred the keeper of an Elephant, which would haue reuenged the wrong, but was forbidden by his said keeper: but after espying the Souldier, when his keeper was absent; heooke him vp in his trunk, and ducked him diuers times in the water, and then set him downe where hee had taken him vp. They are very ambitious. One being vprayed of laziness by his keeper, when as his busines was to heauy for him to draw, and therefore they had bought another Elephant to help and Bengala some Goats, whose hornes are esteemed excellent against Poyson; which Linschoten affirmeth of his owne experience.

As for Fowles, they haue Parrots of many kinds: some reckon fourteene, and Nayrida more pleasing in beauty, speech and other delights then the Parrot, but they cannot be brought out of that Countrey aliuie. Of Bats they haue as bigge as Hennes, about Lana and the neigbour Ilands, Clusius bought one of the Hollanders, which they brought from the Isle of Swannes, Itha do Cerne, newly stiled by them Maurice Iland; it was about a foote from the head to the tayle, above a foot about, the wings one and twenty inches long, nine broad; the claw wherby it hung on the trees, was two inches, the pisse easily seene, &c. Here they also found a Fowle which they called Walgh-vogel, of the bignesse of a Swanne, and most deformed shape.

In r Banda and other Ilands, the Bird called Emba or Eme, is admirable. It is foure foot high, somewhat resembling an Ostrich, but hauing three clawes on the feete, and the same exceeding strong: it hath two wings, rather to helpe it running, then seruiceable for flight: the legges great and long; they say it hath no tongue, and that it putteth out the pille backwards, as the Camell: that it deuoureth Oranges and Egges, rendering the same in the ordure, nothing altered. It strikes with the heele like a Horle, will swallow an Apple whole as bigge as ones fist, yea, it swalloweth downe burning coles without harme; and in a contrary extreme, pieces of Ice.

Of the Birds of Paradise, elsewhere is shewed the falshood of that opinion, which conceiue them to want feet, whereas they goe as other birds, but being taken, the body (for the most part) together with the feete are cut off, and they being dried in the Sunne, are so hardened and cluded, as if Nature had so formed them. This is testified by Pigafetta, and the Hollanders, and my kind friend and louing Neighbour Master Henry Colborne, hath had of them whole. Of this, Clusius in his Amburium hath a large Discourse, shewing diuers kinds of them, a greater and lesse: and sayth that John de Weel, of Amsterdam sold one of them, which had feete, to the Emperour, 1605. But I would not herein be tedious. Of the Birds and Beasts of India, Acsia, Linschoten, Clusius, besides Gesner and others, can informe the studious.

They haue Crows so bold, that they will come flying in at the windowes, and take the meate out of the dish, as it standeth on the Table before them that are set thereat: and are such vexation to the Buffes, that they are forced to stand in waters vnder the necks, that they may berid of them. Pyrrard tels of the like Crows in the Maldives both deadlie and numberlesse, and of great trouble which they haue there by the Gnats, Rats, Mice, Dornice, and Palmires noy some beyond credit; as also Snakes and Sharks. He tels of Pugnyes, toules as bigge as Pigeons which fill the Aire and Earth in some Ilands that they can scarily see their foot feete: their Egges are hatched by the Sands, which are white and subtil like thae of an Houeglife, by reason of the heat. They haue Rats, which the Cats dare not touch, as bigge as young Pigges, which vndermine the foundations of houses in such sort with their diggings, that they sometimes fall to the ground. There are other little red Rats, which smell like Muske. Incredible is the scathe which they receiue in Goa by the Palmires, which with such huge multitudes will presenly assayle any thing that is fattie, or to be eaten, that they are forced to fet their cupboards and chests, wherein are their victuals and apparell, with a wooden Cisterne of water vnder euery of their foure feete, and that in the middle of the roomes. And if they forget to haue water in the Cisterne, presently these Ants are all ouer, and in the twinkling of an eye (sayth Linschoten) they will consume a loafe of bread. The like Cisternes haue they for their Beds and Tables: and for the Perches whercon they let their Canary birds, which else would bee killed by Palmires, yea though it hung on a string from the roofof the house. The poorer sort which want cupboards, hang their fragments in a cloth on the wall, hauing a circle of Charcoales about it; with this wall to keepe out this small creature, and great enemy. There are other Ants almost a finger long, and reddish, which doe great harme to fruits and plants. Great is the harme which Moths and Wormes do in mens Clothes and Bookes, which can very hardly bee kept from them. But more hurtfull is the Baratta, which flyeth, and is twice as bigge as a Bee, from which nothing almost can be kept close enough, and are to be esteemed as a plague among them, like to the Primres, and are commonly in all far wares and sweet meats, and when they come vpon apparell, they leaue their stinging Egges behind.

The Salamander is said to be common in the Ile of Madagascar, an Iland of Africa, by which they sayle to India. Of Serpents, they haue diuers kinds, and very venomous, besides one other kind as bigge as a Swine, which is destitute of poylon, and hurteth only by biting. But the superstition of the King of Calicut multiplyeth their Serpents. For he causeth Cottages to be set vp to keepe them from the raine, and maketh it death to whomsoever that shall kill a Serpent or a Cow. They thinke Serpents to be heauenly Spirits, because they can so suddenly kill men! So much hath that old Serpent, both at first, and since, delighted men by this venomous creature. There are Hogges with horns in the Moluccas; in Celebes; and Mandanae; Hogges, which besides the teeth they have in their mouths, have other two growing out of their snouts, and as many behind their Eares of a large spanne and a halfe in length.

Of fish they have great plenty and variety. They have of Hoyes or Tuberos, which devour men, especially such as fill for Pearles. And others bathe themselves in Catterpes, not daring to adventure the Rivers for them. One Thomas Smith an Englishman, riding before Saratel, entering into the water, had the outside of his thigh shared off by one of them: and though he escaped from the fish, yet not from death, by effusion of blood. Linschoten tells the like in his ship, that one had his legge bitten off, and putting his hand to the place, was presently deprived thereof: but this is too common. Of fish-monsters like men, and like an Hogge some write, and as monstrous is that, which Massau telleth of a Whale, which with the opposition of his huge body, stayed the course of a ship, sayling with eight other ships into India, with so great a noyle and shaking, as if they had fallen on a Rocke, Neyther could the winds, which filled the sayles, further her course. The Mariners, when they saw two Elements of wind and current, so strongly encountered, looked out and saw this Monster, with her fins embracing the sides of the ship, and enterlacing the steme with her sayles, applying her bodie to the Keel; which contained about y eighty foot in length. They thought presently that some hellish Fiend had bene sent to devour them; and consulted the remedy, at last sent out their Priest in his holy Vestments, with Crosses and Exorcismes: (who like the greater Devil) prevailed with these weapons; and the Whale forsooke them without further hurt.

There are certaine fish shells, like Scalop shells, found on the shore; so great, that two strong men with a leauer can scarce draw one of them after them. They have fish within them. A ship (called Saint Peter) fell upon sands, sayling from Cochin, and split. The men saved themselves, and of the wood of the old ship built a Canall, wherein to get the Continent; but in the meane while were forced to make a Scauce, and by good watch to defend themselves from certaine Crabs of exceeding greatnesse, and in as great numbers, and of such force, that whosoever they got vnder their claws, it cost him his life, as two Mariners of the ship told Linschoten.

No lesse strange is that which hapned to Captayne Saris in his way betwene Saint Laurence and Zeilan, in a darke night when they could not see halfe the shippes length before them, on a sudden they had a fierce gleame, and shining light from the waters, so that they might thereby see to steade. At the first they were afraid of broken grounds, but after found it to bee nothing but certayne shell fish in those waters, whose shells yielded to bright a lustre.

Crabs heere with vs have a sympathy with the Moone, and are fullest with her full tide: in India there is a contrary antipathy, for at full Moone they are emptiest.

They have Oysters, in which the Pearles are found, which are fished for by duckets, that dive into the water, at least ten, twenty, or thirty fathome. These men are naked, and have a basket bound at their backs, which being at the bottom, they take full of Oysters and durt together, and then rise vp and put them into Boats. They lay them after on the Land, where the Sunne causer them to open, and then they take out sometime many, sometime few Pearles, as each Oyster yeeldeth, which is sometimes two hundred graines and more. The King hath one part; the Souldier, a second; the Isolutes, a third; and the fishers themselves the fourth: a small recompence for so great a danger, in which many men every fishing time lose their lives. The Hollanders found Tortoyes so great, that tenne men might sit and dine within one of the shells.

P. II.

Of the Indian Trees, Fruits, and strange Plants.

Of the Indian Plants divers have written, both in their generall Herball, as Penn and Label, Gerard, with other Herbarists, and in peculiar workes of this lobied, Clusius, Gervais de Orie, Christopher Acosta, &c. Some also pretending themselves Natures Principall Secretaries, have found out in the earth and the like, not only temperatures, learned by experience, but a Signatures of Natures owne Impression, fitted to their severall and speciall uses in Physicke, finding out a strange harmony and likeness in the greater and lesser World: but leaving these speculations to better leisure, let vs take a little view of the Indian Trees, Plants and Fruits.

a Omsd. Cret. lino de signaturis

Of their Fruits, Ananas is reckoned b one of the best : in taste like an Apricocke, in shew a faire off like an Artichoke, but without prickles, very sweet of scent. It was first brought out of the West Indies hither : it is as great as a Melon; the Iuyce thereof is like sweet Milt : it is so hote of Nature, that a Knife licks iniebut halfe an houre, whenitis drawne forth, it will be halie eaten vp : yet moderately eaten, hurteth not a man. Iaca are bigger then the former, and grow out of the body of the tree : they are of many pleasant tastes, but hard to digest.

Of Mangas there are three sorts, they are as bigge as Goose-egges: The first sort hath flowers, which the second wanteth: the third is payson too deadly, that yet no remedy hath been found against it. Of the like biggnesse is the Caium, yellow, of good favour, full of Iuyce like Lemmons: at the end (as Apples have a stalk, so) this Fruit hath a Nore like the kidney of a Hare, with kernels toothsome and wholesome. The Jambos exceedeth in beauty, taste, smell, and medicivable vertue: it is as bigge as a Pearre, smelleth like a Rose, is redder; and the tree is never without fruit or blossomes, commonly each branch having both ripe and unripe fruits, and blossomes all at once: Linschoten saith, on the one side, this tree hath ripe fruits, and the leaves fallne, all the other covered with leaues and flowers, and it beareth three or four times in a yeere. The Langomas growe as a tree like a Plum-tree, full of prickles, and have power of binding. The Papais will not grow, but Male and Female together: but of these, also the Carambolas, Jambolins and other Indian fruits, I leave to speake, as not writing an Indian Herbal, but only minding to mention such things, which, besides their Country, have some variety of Nature, worthy the observation. For the rest, Gracilis us Floris translated by Carolus Clusius, Paladurus, Linschoten, Christophorus Acosta (writing particularly of these things) and others in their general Herballs, may acquaint you.

Of this sort is the Indian Figge tree: it may be called a tree, which is not above a mans height, and within like to a Reed, without any woody substance: it hath leaves a fathome long, and three spans broad, which open and spread abroad on the top of it. It yeeldeth a fruit in fashon of the clusters of Grapes, and beareth but one bunch at once, containing some two hundred Figges at a leaf, which being ripe, they cut the whole tree down to the ground, leaving only the roots, out of which presently groweth another, and within a moneth after beareth fruit, and so continueth all the yeare long. They are the greatest fuffenance of the Country, and are of very good taste, and smell, and in those parts men beleeve that Adam first transgressed with this fruit.

But of greater addition is the C. Congo tree, being the most profitable tree in the world, of which in the Ilands of Madagascar they make and furnish whole ships: for that (saie the men themselves) there is nothing of the ship, or in the ship, neyther tackling, merchandize, nor ought else but what this tree yeldeth. The tree groweth high and slender, the wood is of a spungy substance, faine to bee sowed, when they make Vessels thereof, with cydies made of Cacao. For this Nut (which is as bigge as an Edrige Egge) hath two sorts of huskes, as our Walnuts, whereof the vppermost is hary (like hempe) of which they make Otkam and Cordage, of the other shell they make drinking Cups. The fruit, when it is almost ripe, is full of water within; which by degrees changeth into a white harder substance, as is peneth. The liquor is very sweet, but with the ripening groweth lowre. The liquor extracte out of the tree is medicamine, and if it stand one houre in the Sunne it is very good Vineger, which being distilled, yeldeth excellent Aquavie, and Wine. Or if also they make, by beating it in the Sunne, Sugar. Of the meane of the Nut dryed, they make Oyle. Of the pith or leaue of the tree, is made paper for Bookes and Euidences. Of the leaues they make coverings for their Houses, Mats, Tents, &c. their apparell, their fringes, and the rest of sild Commodities which this tree (more plentifull in the Indies, then the Willowes in the Low Countries) yeldeth, would be too tedious to recite. They wilkeape the tree from bearing fruit, by curing away the blossomes, and then will bang some Vessell therat, which receiveth from thence that liquor, of which you have heard. It is the Camarines Hungry, and they will climbe up these trees, which yet have no boughs, but on the top, like Apes. This tree hath also a continuall succession of fruite, and is neuer without some.

No less wonder doth that tree 4 cause, which is called Arbo de yauy, the Tree of Ropes: Chufra calleth it (by Plinius authoritie) the Indian Fige tree: and Compuhi (which more confidently, then reason affirmeth it to be the Tree of Adam transgressing) its growth out of the ground, as other trees, and yeeldeth many boughes, which yeeld grayne threds of the colour of Gold, which growing down towards the earth, doe there take footing againe, making as it were new trees, or wood of trees, contrary by this means to the before said some of a mile in which the Indians make Galleries to walke in: The Fige tree is like the common, but not so pleasant.

The Arboreae * deserueth mention: It growes at Oom, brought thither (as is thought) from from Malacca: The Hollanders saw one at Achi in Samatra. In the day time and at Sunsetting, you shall not see a flower on it; but within halfe an houre after, it is full of flowers, which at the Sun-rising fall off; the leaves shutting themselves from the Sunnes presence, and the tree seeming as if it were dead. The flowers in forme and greatnesse are like to those of the Orange-tree, but sweeter, in Aesculap judgement, then any flowers which ever hee smelled: the Portugals have vsed all means to haue it grow in Europe, but our Sunne hath refused to nourish such sullen vnthankfull Malecontents.

And that yee may know the Indians want not their Metamorphoses and Legends, they tell that a man named Paristice, had a Daughter, with whom the Sunne was in loue; but lightly forsaking her, he grew amorous of another: whereupon this Damocell flue herselfe, and of the ashes of her burned carcase came this tree.

e The Plant
Bettile.

Bettile * is a leafe somewhat like a Bay leafe, and climbeth like Iue, and hath no other fruit: neither is any fruit more in vse then these leaues: at bed and boord, and in the streets as they passe, they chew these leaues; and in their gossipings or visiting of their friends, they are presently presented with them; and eate them with Arecca, which is a kind of Indian Nut. It saueh their teeth from diseases, but coloureth them as if they were painted with blacke blood. When they chew it, they spit out the iuyce, and it is almost the only exercise of some, which thinke they could not lue, if they should abstaine one day from it.

They haue an Herbe called Duroo, which causeth distraction, without understanding any thing done in a mans presence: sometimes it maketh a man sleepe, as if hee were dead the space of foure and twentie houres, except his feet be washed with cold water, which restoreth him to himselfe; and in much quantitie it killeth. Iarris calls it Doturo, and sayth that Pimarus the Iesuite and his Family at Lalor, were by means of this herbe (giuen them by a cheeuill seruant) distracted, and the goods then carried out of their house. The women giue their husbands thereof, and then in their fights will prostitute their bodies to their lewder louers, and will call them Corundor, stroking them by the beard &c. the husband sitting with his eyes open, grinning like a Foole, when he returneth to himselfe, knoweth nothing but that hee hath slept.

Plant in Guiana.

Another strange herbe is called Sentida, or feeling, f for that if any passe by it, and touch it, or throweth sand or any thing else on it, presently it becometh as if it were withered, and closeth the leaues; so continuing as long as the man standeth by; but so soone as he is gone, openeth fresh and faire; and touching it againe, it withereth as before. The Indians suppose it will procure loue, and restore Virginities: A Physician amongst them became mad with studying to find out the nature of this herbe. Pigafetta speaks of another sort, as after shall follow.

But the strangest plant (for so may we terme it) is, that at Goa the hornes of beasts slaughtered are throwne together in one place, lest they should bee occasion of indignation and reproach to any; the shewing or naming of a horne being there ominous: These hornes thus cast forth, after a certaine time, take root; and the roots grow two or three spannes in length.

Galiuano 8 telleth of a tree in Mindanao; the one halfe whereof (which standeth towards the East) is a good remedy against poyson: the Westerne halfe yeldeth the strongest Poyson in the World. There is a stone, on which whosoever sitteth, shall bee broken in his body. The Tree of Japan which thrives best which kills other Trees, and (in a Natural antipathy to Nature) is killed with that moisture which quickens others; and that in Ciumbubon whose leaues are said to haue teete and to goe: in their due places shall bee mentioned. But of all the most wonderfull is that Plant of Sambiro (an Island not farre being there with Sir James Lancaster) offering to pull vp, shrunke it kisse into the ground, as hauing sensitiue life and motion; neyther without greater force would it bee brought forth. The cause they found, that the Roote is a great Worme, which (as the Plant grows into a greater tree) dyes by degrees, or exchangerh that sensitiue into a vegetatiue life. The first growth is out of the mouth of the Worme, being then but a small twige, full of greene leaues as bigge as a Bay leafe; the Worme in proceesse of the growth turnes into this tall growing Tree. The Reader may smile; as it Virgils Polydorus, or some of Ouids Metamorphosis, thinking this incredible; but yet behold another change. They plucked vp some of these resisting Plants, to bring them home for rarities (as they did many) stripping off the leaues and bark: and thereby (I know not with what naturall horror) they after found that as it dried, it died beneath the name of Death, into a hard stone, like white Crall. Thus haue you a three-fold Retrograde in one thing: From that degree of life which hath locall motion to a Stipitanians or Equisetum, a sensitiue Plant, which moueth it selfe but not out of the same place, as Oysters and the like: from thence in a second remouee to a mere Plant or Tree : and in a third degree to a Tropiditie, and stonie lifelessefenesse. Nor doe thou deride this as monstrous, incredible, impossible : (I leaue the certaintie thereof to the Relators) but examine it in thy selfe thou findest not a greater and more manifold Retrograde in this storie of Creatures, what fitter to bee observed then M A N for whom the rest were Created :) in thy selfe. Homo is homulus, degenerate from that Man which God created after his owne Image and become the Diminutive of Himselfe : Nay lesse then that, not Homulus but Amulus, as the Horse and Mule, that hath no vnderstanding : A Mule! that is a profitable beast ; but of Men (not the Cretans alone) that of Ephemerides and Paul is true, exig. 3. 12. Asia. They are cull beasts, yea, cull wilde beasts, yea, cull, wilde, and venomous, (the word will beare it) Nay Saint Paul proceeds in further degrading this proud Man, zachas apay bellies, the worst part of the worst beasts, all bellies like Spiders ; Nay worke for their bellies worke nets to keepe them, but thele are slow bellies, idle, nay Idol-bellies ; slow except in deuouring, and therein the Gluttons God : quorum Deus venter. Magister artis, ingenique largitor Venter ; Euen till like Oysters wee haue but sense for sensuality, for touch and taste ; this Pinguis aquiliculus propenso sesquipedale extans, not scarcely suffering vs to moue from the Table ; and that alio a Great and bigge Prince in our dayes hath had cut with a great in-let for his great belly. The Belly ! as well a shapen Deitie, as the Vmbilicus of Iupiter Ammon ! But alas the Belly, and what Nature hath placed beneath it, hath placed vs beneath that sensitiue life which the Belly hath, and with this Plant heere mentioned, wee are Wormes not Men, Plants not Wormes, (Pöpuslus primä corruptiä is Populus) our corruption from our first state hath made the whole people of Blankinde as a Moorish ill planted Plant : Yea in the Greeke it hath a more fit name, * lath, our retrograde is into a hard stone. So vaine a thing is Man.

Of Spices and Drugges.

30 PEPPER (whereof there are diuers sorts) groweth at the foot of Arecas, or some other Tree, on which it climbeth, as a Betele or Luie ; growing in bunches like grapes, halfe a spanne long, and as bigge as ones finger, green like Luie when it is gathered, and in five or fixe dayes drying in the Sunne becomes blacke.

1 Histom. de
S. Stephano.

Cinamon is the inner barke of a Tree, as bigge as an Olive ; with leaues like Bay-leaues, and fruit like an Olive : The drying of the barke maketh it roll together. Within three yeeres after, the tree yeldeth another barke, as before. In Seylon is the best. They of Ormuz call it Darchina, that is, wood of China : and selling it at Alexandria, call it Cinamomum.

Ginger is groweth like young Reades, or Gladiolus, with a toothe like a Lilly : it is plentifull in Malabar.

40 Cloues grow in the Moluccos on trees, like Bay-trees, yelding blossomes, first white, then Greene (at which time they yeld the pleasantest smell in the world) and last of all red and hard, which are the Cloues. They are so hot of nature, that if a payle or tubbe of water should stand in the Chamber, when they cleue them, or any vessell of Wine or other mysture, in two dayes the Cloues would sucke it out and drie it. The same nature is of the vnsunne Silke of China.

The Nutmeg-tree, is like a Peach or Pearre-tree, and groweth most in Banda and Iaua. The fruit is like a Peach, the inner part whereof is the Nutmegge, which is covered and interlaced with the Mace or flowre, and ouer that is the fruit, like a Peach, as I haue seene them conferred. When the fruit is ripe, the first and outermost part openeth, as it is with our Walnuts, then the Mace flourisheth in a faire red colour, which in the ripening becometh yellow.

Cardamomum is of three sorts ; the Indians vse it in their meate, and commonly chew it in their mouthes, as being good against a stinking breath and euill humours in the head : it is much like to Panike.

Lac is a strange druggie, made by certaine winged Pismires of the gumme of Trees, which they sucke vp, and then make the Lac round about the branches, as the Bees make honey and waxe. The raw Lac is of a darke red colour, but being refined, they make it of all colours, and therewith vernish their Beds, Tables, and vie it for other ornaments, and for hard Waxe. So saith Paludanus ; they beate the Lac to powder, and so mixe all manner of colours vpon it, as they list, and make thereof such rolles as are heere sold for hard Waxe.

Indica

Indico.

Indico or Annil grows on small bushes, like Gooseberry bushes, and beares a Seed like a Cabbage, as is before observed, cut vp, and after long rotting, trodden by Oxen, and ground, Linschoten sayth, it is sowne as other Herbs, in due time pulled and dried, and then made wet, and beaten, and then dried againe, and prepared; first it is Greene, and after blue.

q Sanders.

Of q Sanders there are three sorts, white, yellow, and red. In Tymer, an Island by Lana, are whole Woods of Sanders: the trees are like Nut-trees, with a fruit like a Cherry, but vnprofitable; onely the wood (which is the Sander) is esteemed.

Snakewood groweth in Seylan, and is good against the stinging of Snakes and other poison, a Medicine learned of the beast Quil, which being in continuall enmity with Snakes, here with healeth their bytings.

f Calamba.

The trees of f Lignum Aloe are like Oline trees, but somewhat greater: the innermost part of the wood is best, with blacke and browne veines, and yeelding an Oily moysture: it is sold in weight against Silver and Gold. There is another kinde, wherewith they burne their dead Bramenes. The best, which they call Calamba, growes in Malacca, and is vied much for Beads and Crucifixes. Monfari sayth, the Portugals pay a hundred Crownes a pound for it to make their Beades.

u Opium is the Iuyce of the heads of blacke Poppie beeing cut: a dangerous drugg, vied much in Asia and Africa, which makes them goe as if they were halfe asleepe: they suppose I know not what coniunction and efficacy both of Mari and Denna therein: but being once vied, must daily be continued on paine of death, which some escaped in Aceha x company by the helpe of wine. Banga is another Receipt of like vse, especially with slaves and souldiers, makes them drunke merry, and so to forget their labour.

Cicut.

Cicut or Algalia, is the sweate of the Cicut Cat, and growes in the outermost part of the Cods, and is hote and moyst.

Benioin.

Benioin is a kind of Gumme like Frankincense and Myrrhe, but more esteemed: it growes in the Kingdome of Stam, Iaua, Sumatra, and Malacca. The tree is high, full of branches with leaves like those of the Lemmon tree; They cut the tree, and from those flits proceedeth this Gumme: which is best when the tree is young, and is called Benioin of the sweete smell. The old trees yeeld white, the young blacke. Of Frankincense wee haue spoken in Arabia: it is also a Gum, the best on those trees that grow on hills and stony places, Myrrhe is a Gumme also brought out of Arabia Felix, and the Alexine Coast.

Manna.

CHAP. XIII.

A generall discourse of the Sea, and of the Seas in and about Asia.

§. I.

Of the true places, forme, greatnesse, and depth of the Sea.

After our long perambulation of the Asian Continent, the Sea intruding doth sollicite our next endeavours, that the Reader might there severely his wearied sense, with a new succession of Natures varieties, and Humane variations. And first, while our Batke be made readie to ship vs out to some of those Islands, let vs (as it were on the Shore) take view of this, so strong, so weak, so constant, and so vociferant watery Element: That the Earth and Sea make one Globe, we have elsewhere shewed in the History of their Creation. In which, the Earth being (as it seemeth) at the first forming of it, more perfectly Spherical, and wholly covered with Waters, by the power of that Almighty Decree & Word (Let the waters be gathered into one place, that the dry Land may appear) both the Waters (as some gather) were more condensate, which before were more subtle, and therefore occupied more roome; and the Earth was in some places lifted up, in others depressed with deepe Furrows and Trenches to make room for the same, to receive the waters of the Sea; and withall the matter yielded for the elevation both of Mountaynes above the ordinary height of the Earth, and of the Earth and Continent also in the higher places, whence the greatest Rivers derive their Original, in comparison of the Lower and Maritime parts, where they empty themselves into the Sea. This is the proper seat of the Element of Water, called Aqua; quasi aqua; of the equall and plaine face and superficies thereof, or as Diogenes saith further seen observable, quod natura sunt omnia; because hence all things are bred and nourished. Now because Waters are tyether without Motion, as in Lakes; or of an uniform Motion, as in Rivers; or in the Sea; the Heavens ascribed a Trident or three-fold Scepter to Neptune, their supposed Sea-god.

That the Earth and Sea have one and the same Centre; both of Gravity and Greatnesse, appeareth by this, that the parts of the Earth and Water falling from a high place, without other impediment, have the same direct descent as a piece of Earth also fallen perpendicularly into the Water, with equall and right Angles. And that the Water naturally inclineth to a roundnesse, appeareth in the small drops thereof, which gather themselves into that forme; and by the easier discerning things on shore from the tops, then from the hatches of the ship in the Sea; likewise by the elevation or depression of the Pole and Stars, no lesse in sailing, then land-travels; to the North or South both in preventing of lengthning the Sunnes light by sailing East or West, as before hath beene observed in the Spaniards and Portugals meeting at the Platipinna; and differing a whole day in their reckoning, the Portugals loosing by meeting the Sunne in their Easterne course, that which the Spaniards get by following him in a Westerne. Yeazzen in one dayes sailing thus may be manifest, as Reverend in lanceth in a ship sailing West from Island, in one of their dayes of twenty houres getting halfe an hours, and in the next day returning with like swiftnesse, loseth as much of the Sunne: Yet in Rivers of very long course, besides that descent (before mentioned) from higher to lower passages, some are observed a kind of roundnesse or circular rising in compassing the Glbes, which this must needs be exceedingly difformed in the Rivers of Nilus, Amazoni, and others, which runne neere an eighth part thereof.

The Sea is great and wide, sayeth the Psalmist, and at first covered the whole earth, by a garment, till for mans vie the dry land appeared, which for mans habite was againe in the dayes of Noah covered. And had not God set the Sea in bound which it cannot passe, it would (as some translate it) returne to cover the earth for ever. It is his perpetual decree, who commanded, and it was made; that though the waters thereof rage, yet they cannot prevent; though they roare, yet they cannot passe over. And thus many of the ancient and later Interpreters of Gene.

for doe auerre, that the Earth is indeed lower then the Waters, as in the beginning of this Worke is obserued, as if God did by a kinde of miracle in Nature, breidle and reſtraine the tempeſtuous force of the Sea, Rerum omnium inuulsiſſima (so vs Basilis words) deſiliſſima, arena : with Sand the weakeſt of all creatures. Thus held Aquinas, Cartuſianus, Cartuſianus, and others. Which opinion being granted, how eaſie were it for the Sea to enſeale the Earth in her watric mantle, and againe to make a Conqueſt of the drie Land, hauing ſuch forces of her owne, and ſuch re-inſtrements from the Ayre and the Earth it ſelfe? Her owne powers, euen by order of Nature and proportion of the Elements; cannot but ſeeme dreadfull : in which, as the Ayre exceedeth the Water, and is it ſelfe exceeded of the Fire; ſo the Water to ſome ſeemes no leſſe to ſurmount the Earth, as the loweſt and leaſt of the Elements. And what Armies of exhalations doth the Sunne daily muſter in the great Ayrie plaine, which would ſuccour their Mother in ſuch an attempt? Beſides that, euen the Earth, as it is euery where compaſſed of the Sea, doth compaſſe in it ſelfe ſo many Seas, Lakes, Riuer, in the vppermoſt face thereof, as profeſſed partakers; and the inward bowels thereof haue daily intelligence, and continual conſpiracie with the waters, by thoſe ſecret pores and priuie paſſages, whereby it commeth to paſſe, that albeit All Riueres runne to the Sea, yet the Sea is not filled. And were it poſſible that ſo many worlds of waters ſhould daily and hourly flow into this watric world, and that ſuch a world of time together, and yet the Sea nothing increaſed, but that (as Salomon there ſaith) The Riueres goe to the place from whence they returne and goe? that is, they runne into the Sea, and thence, partly by the Sunnes force, eleuated and reſtored in Raines, and other Meteors, partly by filling the veynes of the Earth with Springs doe both wayes returne againe in Riueres to the Sea. This appeareth by the Dead Sea, and by the Caspian, which receiue many Riueres without open payment thereof to the Ocean; and at the Straits of Gibraltar, the Ocean commonly hath a current in at one end, and the Euxine Sea at the other, beſides abundance of other waters out of Europe, Asia, Africa, and yet is no fuller.

Many indeed are the wonders of the Lord in the deepe, and this concerning the height, depth, and profunditie thereof one of the hugheſt, deepeſt, and requiring the profoundeſt ſkill to ſearch. That the waters are gathered on ſwelling heapes in round forme, compaſſing the Earth, is already proued; which to a vulgar capacitie may ſeeme to enforce a height of the water aboue ſome parts of the Earth; but ſeeing that the earth and waters haue one Center, and height is properly to bee meaſured by diſtance from that Center; it ſeemeth valikelie that the water ſhould be higher then the Earth : or altogether equall to the height thereof, in whole Channels and concauities it is containe. And though the Sea ſwelleth, and ſetteth vp it ſelfe into that forme which beſt agreeeth to that Globe which is compact of it and the Earth; yet is it not capable (being a liquid ſlible body) in the greateſt depth and wide- neſſe, of ſuch eleuations as wee ſee in high and Mountaynous Regions, whereby the Earth ſeemeth to exceed the due and iuſt proportion of her owne Globoliſtie, and thereby no leſſe to excell the higheſt eleuation (as wee may terme it) of the Sea, then the Cliffe and Shores doe thoſe Waters which approach them. And what neede a conceit of miracle in the very ordinary conſtitution and conſeruation of Nature? though all Nature, if wee regard it as a Creation by ſupernall power, bee nothing elſe but miracle. Some indeed dreame of I know not what proportion of the Elements, whereby they would haue the Water to exceed the Earth, as before is ſaid; and it is true that the vpper face and vtrer ſuperficies of the Waters (for ought that is knowne to the contrary) is as great as that of the Earth. But if wee compare the depth of the Waters with the Diameter of the Earth, we ſhall find that in moſt places the one is not ſo many Fathoms as the other is Miles. Yea who euer ſoundeth at ſuch depth? And whereas the Diameter of the Earth is by ſome reckoned 68727. Miles, and by ſome more, who euer caſt Line and Lead into the Sea to meaſure a thouſand Fathom? Yea, in Scaligers opinion, the Earth is ſo much greater then the Water, that if the Mountaines were caſt downe into theſe watry receptacles, and the Earth brought into a perfect roundneſſe, there would no place in it be left for the Water. Record r recordeth not ſo much as he, if wee receiue the Jewiſh Tradition, mentioned by our Apocrypha p Eſdras, this may be more probable: for he ſaith, that (euen in the vtrer face of the Globe) the Waters were gathered into a ſewen part, and fixe parts of the Earth kept drie. Some imagine a bottomleſſe depth, paſſing quite thorow the Earth, through which the Moone being in the other Hemisphere, cauſeth the heightning of the Tides, no leſſe then when ſhe is preſent in ours; which gue no ſmall helpe alſo in their conceit in the generall Deluge : which if it be true, addes a greater proportion to the Sea then wee haue obſerued. But becauſe little reaton, and no experience can be ſhewed for this Aſſertion, I will not inſiſt in refutation. But that Deluge being cauſed by breaking vp the Fountaines below, and violent Stormes from aboue, conſure that opinion that the Sea should be higher then the Earth, which then might haue effected the Flood without either of those former causes.

But why doe I drowne my innocent Reader, with my selfe, in these Depths of the Sea? which some measure by the height of Hills; others resemble those extraordinarie Land-heights to extraordinarie Whirl-Pools: but seeing the Sea is Tenant to the Earth, which bath (as before we haue said) remoued it selfe in some sort, to make way and room for it, the more ordinarie height and eleuation of the one, may seeme to answere the more ordinarie depth and descending of the other. These bot-tomes of the Sea haue also their diuersified shape and forme, as it were of Hillocks, Mountaynes, Valleys, with the Acciuities and Decliuities of Places, as in the Shelves, Shallowes, Rockes, Ilands appeareth. And as the Land is not only higher then the Sea at the shore, so is it apparant, that in remote places from the Sea, the Land doth (besides the exorbitant swellings of Mountaynes) in the ordinarie leuell exceed the height of Maritime regions, which thence receiue those Riuer which require descent all the way of their passage, which in some is one thousand in some two thousand miles. And therefore is it likely also that the Sea answers in like proportion, it being obserued to grow shallower neere the shoare, and differendy deeper in the farther recess of the Maine.

§. II.

Of the Saltnesse and Moions of the Sea.

He saltnesse of the Sea some ascribe * to the first Creation; some, to the sweat of the Earth, roasted with the Sunne; some, to the saltnesse of the Earth, especially in Minerals of that nature; some, to aduult vapours, perly let fall on the Sea, partly rayed from it to the brinks and face thereof; some, to the motion of the Sea; some, to vnder-earth or vnder-sea ^a fires of bituminous nature, culling both this saltnesse and the motion also of the Sea; and some, to the working of the Sunne, which draweth out the purer and finer parts, leauing the grosser and baser behind: as in this little world of our bodies, the purest parts of our nourishment being employed in, and on the body, the vrine and other excrements remaining, doe detain a saltnesse.

I will not determine this question, as neither that of the Ebbing and Flowing of the Sea, which (some ^a say) is the breath of the world; some, the fires aforesaid boyling in and vnder the water; some, the waters in holes of the earth, forced out by Spirits; some, the meeting of the East and West Ocean; some ascribe it to the ^b Moone, naturally drawing water, as the Load-stone, Iron; some, to the variable light of the Moone: a variable light they all giue vs. They that send vs to God and his Decree in Nature, haue said what is the true cause, but not how it is by Naturall meanes effected. Certaine it is, that the Ocean and the Moone are companions in their motion: vncertaine whether the Ocean hath a naturall power in it selfe, or from the Moone, so to moue: which is made so much the more doubtfull, by reason that they follow not the Moone in all places of the world alike. Periemanus writeth, that in Cambaia the Tides are contrarie to the course they hold in these parts; for they encrease not with the full, but with the wane of the Moone: and so the Sea-crabs doe likewise. In the Hand of Socotora, Don Iohn of ^c Castro obserued many dayes, and found contrary both to the Indian and our wont) that when the Moone riseth, it is high Sea, and as the Moone ascends, the Tide descends and ebbeth, being dead-low water when the Moone is in the Meridian, and this operation hee found continuall. With vs also our highest Tides are two dayes after, and not at the very Full and Change. About Vaygate Stephen Borrough found it to flow by fits, very vncertaine. Scaliger ^d saith, that the full-Moones at Calicut cause the encrease of the water, and at the mouth of Indus (not farre thence, in the same Sea) the new-Moones. But what exceeding difference of the Tides doe wee find in the Downes, and other places on our owne Coasts, both for time and quantitie? that at once in the compass of ones sight, there should bee both flood, ebbe, and these differing in degrees: and that on some places of our Coast it should rise one fathome, in some two, in the Thames three, at, or neere Brissoll ten, and on some part of the French coast, neere Saint Malo fifteen, where-as our shoare ouer against it riseth but two. The like differences may bee obserued betwixt the Tyrrhene Sea, and that on the opposite coast of Barbary, the one swelling, the other not at all heightened: in the East and West Indies I could instance the like, not mentioning those currents which hinder all courses of Tides. Further the Flood continueth in some places seuerall times in some foure, in some sixe. In the Straits of Sund some haue obserued that it runneth in some foure, in some sixe. In the Straits of Sund some haue obserued that it runneth in some foure, in some sixe. In the Straits of Sund some haue obserued that it runneth in some foure, in some sixe.

times a day; and Patritius affirmeth, that himselfe observed at Ausser in Liburnia in a hand-made Strait of Sea-water, the same to happen twenty times in a day. Again, wee see these Tide-motions differ, according to their daily, weekly, monthly, and as some adde, halfe yearly and yearly alterations. All which varieties cannot be attributed to one simple cause, neither to any vniuersall, whether Sunne, Moon, or Native heat of the Sea, or any the like: although wee must needs acknowledge (which we cannot know) one principall cause, hindered or altered by manifold accidents, and therefore producing effects thus diuersified. Other motions also may be observed in the Sea, as that namely which is continuall (and if wee call the Tides the breathing, this may be termed the pulse of the Sea) whereby the waters alway wash the shore falling on and off, couering, and presently vncouering the feet of such as stand by, which hath force to expell all Heterogeneous or differing natures, as drowned carcases, wrackes, and the like. This (as that of the Tides) Patritius, Pencerus, Lydiatus, and others, attribute to a kinde of boyling, which (as in a vessell of seething water) causeth it thus to rise and fall, and to expell the drosse and things contrary. But the heate which causeth this boyling one ascribes to the Sunne, another to fires in the Sea, another to the natural heat of the Sea engendering spirits, and causing rarefaction and motion. Patritius doth not onely ascribe this, but that the Sea is as a sublunarie Planet, mouing it selfe, and moued by the superiour bodies to effect the generation of things: for which cause Orpheus calls the Ocean Father of Gods, Men and other things. The saltneesse thereof is (in his opinion) the instrument of this motion, and the nearest inward and most proper cause of marine mouings, as in the two Mexican Lakes appeareth, the one whereof is salt, and ebbs and flowes, which the other being fresh, doth not. This saltneesse (saith he) with greater heat ingendreth more spirits in my nature: the cause of greater Tides he thinketh to be the shallownesse, and narrower shores, the force of the Ocean thrulling the same most forwards where it findes interruptions and indraughts: the certaintie of the motions hee ascribes (according to his Philosophie) to the soule of the world, mouing this, as other Planets. For my censure, it shall bee rather on my feeble then these opinions, where silence rather then boldnesse becommeth. Euen a soule, whilst hee holdeth his peace, is accounted wise. And to borrow the words of a subtil Disputer, Quod ubi, clamare soles, nos nihil fore, maximè conuenit huic disquisitioni, quæ maris trallat motum. Let this also be arranged amongst the wonders of the Lois in the deepe, rather to be admired then comprehended.

I might heere speake of other Sea-motions, either particular or accidental; as that in the open Sea betweene the Tropiques, I vncertaine whether it may be termed an Easterly winde, or some impetuous violence, caused by the superiour motions which draw together with them the inferiour Elements: likewise those currents in diuers coasts, as at Madagascari on the African, and in the great Bay on the American shores. From other accidents arise other motions, caused by the windes in the ayre (which somewhere haue their set seasons) by whirle-pools, or rather contrarie currents, meeting in the Sea by Capes, Indraghts, Riuers, Ilands of the land: by the conceptions and traueiling throwes in the waters, in bringing forth some imminent tempest, and the like.

I might speake of strange Currents in many Seas vpon the coast of Africke, neere to Saint Lawrence, and Iohn de Nona, and Mayella. Captaine Sans hath related that the currents detayned him a long time, euen almost to desperation of getting out: and one of them so dreadfull, that it made a noise like that at London Bridge, with a tearfull rippling of the water; the more, the further from land, and there where they founde an hundred fathom depth, as it were proclaiming open defiance to winde and sayle (notwithstanding their passing threats and most swelling looks) in foure and twentie houres carrying them a whole Degree and nine Minutes from the course, which vnder full sayle with the windes assistance, they intended.

¶ III.

Of the Originall of Fountaines, and other Commodities of the Sea.

Might adde touching the Originall of Fountaines; which both Scripture and reason, finding no other store sufficient, deriue from the Sea, how they are from thence conveyed by secret Channels and concauities vnder the earth, and by what workmen of Nature thus wrought into new fresh waters. Scaligers experiment to proue the Sea-water at the bottom fresh, by bogies filled thereby cunning Diuers or otherwise, is by Patritius his experience, as hee saith, topal sale. And this freshnesse of the springs, not withwiſtanding their ſalt originall from the Sea, may rather be aſcribed to percolation and ſtraining thorough the narrow ſpungie paſſage of the earth, which makes them leaue behind (as an exact-d toll) their colour, thickneſſe and ſaltneſſe. Now how it ſhould come to paſſe that they ſhould ſpring out of the earth, being higher then the Sea, yea, out of the height of Mountaynes, hath exerciſed the wits of Philoſophers; ſome aſcribing it to a ſucking qualitie of the tharbe or ſpungie earth, ſome to the weight of the earth preſſing and forcing the waters vpwards, ſome to the motion of the Sea continually (as in a Pumpe) thruſting forwards the water, which expelleth the weaker ayre, and followeth it till it hide an out-let, whereof, both by the continuall protrufion of the Sea, and for auoyding a vacuum or emptineſſe (which Nature abhorreth) it holdeth continuall poſſeſſion: ſome haue our other cauſes. And Maſter Lidgate in a Treatiſe of the Originall of Springs, attributeth the ſame to vnder-earth fires, which no leſſe by a naturall diſtillation worketh theſe waters vnder the earth, into this freſhneſſe and other qualities, then the Sunne and heavenly fires doe by exhalations aboue. Yea, ſuch are his ſpeculations of theſe hidden fires, that hee maketh them the cauſes of Windes, Earth-quake, Minerals, Gemmes, fertilitye, and ſterilitye of the earth; and of the ſaltneſſe and motion (as is before ſaid) of the Sea. But loath were I to burne or drowne my Readers in theſe fierie and watrie Diſputes: let vs from theſe ſpeculations retire our ſelues to, the experimental profits and commodities which this Element yeeldeth.

Concerning the commodities ^a of the Sea, as the world generally, ſo the little model of the world, the Ilands (whereof this of Great Brittain is juſtly acknowledged the moſt excellent of the world, ſometime accounted another world) haue great cauſe to celebrate and acknowledge the ſame. It is a Wall of Defence about our ſhoares; Great Purueyout of the Worlds commodities to our uſe; Conuoyour of the ſurquedry and exceſſes of Riuer; Vniuer (by traffique) of Nations which it ſelte ſeuereth; an Open Field for paſtimes of peace; a Pit-chord Elrick in time of warre, diſdaining ſingle perſonall Combates, and onely receiving whole Cities and Caſtles, encompassed with walls of Wood; which it ſetteth together with deadly hatred and dreadfullſt force of the Elements, the Erlic thunders, Airie blatts, Wairie billowes, racks, ſhelles and bottomes of the Earth, all conſpiring to build here a houſe for Death, which by fight or flight on land is more eaſily auoyded (and how did it corne the Inuincible title of the Spaniſh Fleet in 88, and effect thus much on our behalfe againſt them?) The ^b Sea yeeldeth Fiſh for dyer, Pearles and other Jewels for ornament, Varietie of creatures for vſe and admiration, Refuge to the diſtreſſed, compendious Way to the Paſſengers, and Porage to the Merchant, Cuſtomes to the Prince, Springs to the Earth, Clouds to the Skie, matter of Contemplation to the minde, of Action to the bodie: Once, it yeeldeth all parts of the World to each part, and maketh the World (as this Treatiſe in part ſheweth) knowne to it ſelfe. Superſtition hath had her Sea-prophets which haue found out other Sea-profits, as for the purging of ſinnes; and the Roman Dioines cauſed c Hermaphrodites to be carried to the Sea for expiation, the Persian Magi thought it pollution to ſpit or doe of their naturall neceſſities therein. §. III.

Of the varieties of Seas, and of the Caſpian and Euxine.

The Sea is commonly diuided into the Mediterranean and Ocean: and vnder that Medi- land appellation are contained all the Seas and Gulſes that are ſeated within the Land, as the Arabian, Persian, Baltike, Bengalan, and eſpecially ſuch as the Sea of Sodome and the Caſpian, which haue no apparant commerce with the Ocean: but principally is that Sea called Mediterranean, which entering at the Straits of Gibraltar, is both larger then any of the reſt (containing aboue ten thouland miles in circuit) and abſtreſt from on one ſide, but on all the parts of the whole world, waſhing indifferently the ſhores of Aſia, Africke, and Europe.

The Seas beare alſo the names of the Countreies, Cities, Hills, Rivers, and Lands; by which they paſſe, or of ſome other accident there happened; as the Arlantike, or Germane Ocean, the Adriatike, the redde, white or blacke Sea, the Sea of Ladice, the Euxine, by a contrary appellation, for their inſpiratice.

But to contract our ſpeech vnto Aſia, wee finde the Sea prodigall of his beſt things, and of himſelfe vnto it, claſſing, with a ſouely embrace, all this Aſian Continent, ſaue where a little Necke of Land diuides it from Africa; and no great ſpace, together with Tanis, a little Necke of Land diuides it from Africa; and no great ſpace, together with Tanis, in many places from Europe. Yea, as now herewith ſatisfying his love to this Aſian Nymphy, in many places he influence himſelfe within the Land by Gulſes or Bayes, twining, his louing armes about some whole Countries : otherwhere (as it were) by hostile vnderminings hee maketh Seas farre from the Sea ; and hath yeelded to many Ilands , as rather may seeme admirable then credible.

Of those Seas banished from communie and societie with the Ocean, are that Sea of Sodom, largely described in our first Booke. Many other Lakes also, as of Kitaya, Vany, Chiamay, Dangu, Guian, and the like, as great or much greater, doe no lesse deluene the name of Seas : but the most eminent of all the rest is the Caspian ^d or Hyrcan Sea, called in these dayes diuersly of the places thereon situate, as the Sea of Bachu, &c. the Moores call it (as they doe also the Arabian Gulfe) Behar Corson, that is, The Sea inclosed. It hath bene diuers times sayled on and ouer by men of our Nation, passing that way into Tartaria, Media, and Persia. The first of whom was Master Anthony Lenkison, 1558. who affirmeth, that this Sea is in length about two hundred leagues, and in bredth a hundred and fiftie, without any issue to other Seas : the East part joyneth with the Turken Tartars, the West with the Chyrcasies and Caucasus, the North with the Nagay Tartars, and Volga (which springing out of a Lake neere Nouogrode, runneth two thousand miles, and there with feuentie mouthes falleth into this Sea) the South hath Media and Persia. In many places it hath fresh water, in others brackish, in others salt, as our Ocean. If wee hold the Sea naturally, or by selfe-motion or by exhalations, salt : then the freshnesse may be attributed to the abundance of fresh Riuer, which all come running with tributes of their best wealth to this seeming close-fisted Miser, which (for ought the world can see of his good works) communicateth with no other Sea, any part of that abundance which the Riuer Volga, Yaic, Yem, Cyrus, Arath, Ardok, Oxus, Chehel, and others many, bring into his coffers. And yet is this Vsser neuer the richer, Nature it selfe holding a close conspiracie to dispossesse him of his needlesse treasures. Yea the Riuer themselves (his chiefe Factors and Brokers) in the Winter time grow cold in allegiance, and frozen in respect of wonted dutie : or else are detayned by a greater Commander, the Generall of Winters forces, Frost, who then closeth and locketh vp both them and him in Icie prisons, till the Sunne taking a neerer view of this in-croaching vssurper, by the multitude of his Arrows and Darts chase him out of the field, and freeeth this Sea and Riuer from their colde fare and close dungeons, wherewith Ice their hard Gader hath entertained them. Christopher Burrough relateth that from the middle of November till the midd of March, they found this frozen Chariote of the Caspian to their cost : being forced with great perill and paine, to trauell many dayes on the Ice, and leaue their ship in the Sea, which there was cut in pieces with violence of the frost. And yet is Afracan on the Northern shore, (where Volga and the Caspian hold their first conference) in sixe and forty degrees and nine minutes, from whence this Sea extendeth beyond the fortieth degree Southwards. The freshnesse of the Riuer make it thus subiect to frost, which hath no power over the salt waters of the Ocean, as by most Learned ^e men is holden : which appeareth in the Baltike and Euxine Seas, which holding not so full commerce with the Ocean, and filled with fresh Riuer, are made an easie prey to that Icie Tyrant, whose forces the more open Seas, with their salt defence easily withstand ; and although from the mouthes of the Riuer, Bayes, and Shores, hee brings whole Ilands of Ice into those watric Plaines, yet euen vnto the Pole, so farre as hath bene discovered, the Sea with open mouth proclaimeth defiance, and enioyeth his Elementary freedome.

The Euxine Sea which is diuided from the Caspian by an hundred leagues of land, hath this reason of the freezing ascribed by Disarius in ^f Macrobius, that the fresh waters which flow from so many Riuer, being lighter then those on the Sea, swimme on the top, and are subiect to frost, which the Sea-water is not. And this force of the fresh waters is common to most great Riuer, as Plata, Zaie, and others : and in the Euxine it is obserued of Phasis by ^g Arrianus. The thawing of those Frosts is the cause of those fogges and mysts, which so much infect these Seas, and are so great a hinderance in all Northern Discoueries. And hence in like lyhood came the Prouerbe of Cimmerian darknesse, rather then from that Hansom which Platobon mentioneth (a place of a hundred miles, compassed with a wall of pitchie darkenesse, other like fabulous ^h conceits of the Poets : From these darke mysts the Euxine is called also Maro Mavrum, or the blacke Sea ; it was in old time called the Sarmatian, Cimmerian, Taurican, Caucaasian, Phasian, Pontike, and what other titles, peoples, hills, riuer, or speciall occurrents fixed on it. Of the description thereof, Arrianus hath written a whole Treatise, and Strabo hath largely commented thereon, and ⁱ Ortelius hath bestowed good paines in that argument ; to whom I referre the Reader. Arrianus was employed in this Discouerie by Adrian the Emperour, beginning at Trapezond, where he set vp Adrians Image, and where before that was a Temple dedicated to Marcus and Philippus his Nephew. He sayled from thence, descrying and describing the Coasts, Riuer, Cities, about this Sea. In Phasis hee hee obserueth the lightnesse of that water, fresh on the top, lye in the bottome, where it is mixed with the Sea, or rather lieth ouer it. They had heere a Law, That none might carrie water into Phasis; and if they had any in their ships, they must at the entrance of this Riuer cast it forth, otherwise fearing an vnluckie and dangerous Navigation. The water of this Riuer (hee saith) will last vnconrupt ten yeeres. This Phasis, Eschylus calleth the limite of Europe and Asia. At the left hand of the entrance was set the Image of the Phasian Goddesse, seeming by her Cymball in her hand, and Lyons drawing her Chariot, to bee none other then Rhea. There also (as a holy Relique) was shewed the Anchor of the ship Argo, which because it was of Iron, seemed to our Author to be counterfeit, especially there being the fragments of an Anchor of Seane, which seemed more likely to be that of the Argonautes, so much chaunted by the Poets. Other monuments of Iason he found none.

Countesse's
Reliques.

But to looke backe to the Seris or Thracian Bulphorus, hee there nameth the Temple of Iupiter Orini. Dionysius and Pyllus repute the pleasantnesse and fertilitye of these parts. Heere did Iason sacrifice to the twelue Gods, and built a Temple to them. Apello had fixe Temples neare the Straits, the most ancient at Chalcedon, giuing place to none of the Oracles, two at Bizantium, and the other neere thereunto. But with these and manifold other antiquities, Gellius can best acquaint the more leysurely Reader. Of all the Cities along this shore, I can not but mention Heracles, where were obserued the deuotions of Iupiter Straius his Altars, and two Oakes, plaisted therein his honour by Heracles. This Citie was also made famous by the Legend of Heracles, descending to Hell, of Cerberus, Acheron, and the like. Of this Citie Mennan wrote a large Historie, some parts whereof doe yet remaine. Cotta after a strate siege subduing it to the Romanes, among other spoyle seized vpon the pyramidal steue of Heracles, (whom hee would haue serue him in a thirteenth labour) exceeding in sumptuousnesse, greatnesse, elegance; neere to which was his Club of solid Gold, as was also his Lyons skinne and his Quiver. Many monuments and offerings hee carried out of the Temples. Both Attemian and Atellan tell of Dionysius sonne of Clearchus King of Heracles, which grew into so grosse and vnwonted degree of fatnesse, that it made him vnfit, not for State-affaires onely, but for necessarie functions of life, especially in his sleepe. From which to awaken him, this remedy was deuised, to thrust long Needles into his flesh, which whiles they passed thorow that new-come flesh and fatnesse, were no more felt then of a stone, till they came to the moe natural flesh of his body. When hee saie in Iudgement, he had a kind of Cupbord which hee thrust into his body, leaving his face onely open to be seene. Marcianus Heracles too, one of this Citie, had written a Periplos or Circumnauigation of these and other Seas. But least it seeme frozen in these colder Narrations, or to haue lost my selfe in these Cimmerian myths, I will get me out of this Sea, and obserue the principall Islands adiacent to Asia. For if I should after all these Discoueries of the Sea, enter into a new, of the huge Whales and other varieties of Fishes and Monsters, inhabitants of the Sea, which is thought to haue creatures resembling in some sort all those of the Land, both Men and Beasts: I should grow tedious; and Gesner with others haue done it already. I shall finde more due place for the strangest in some other parts of this Historie.

§. I.

The Islands from Iapan to the Persian gulfes.

IF we should shipp our selues for the Discouerie of the Islands in the North-east Seas of Asia, wee were like to finde cold entertainment. Sir Hugh Willoughby, with his Company, lost themselves in this, being frozen to death. Stephen Burrough hath attempted, and found out (scarce worth the finding) Vaygats and Nova Zembla. As bad or worse hath bene the successe of Pet. Lackman, and others, both Dutch and English. And the Russians reports to Heberlein, are in some things so fabulous (as of their Sata Baba, and of men dying euery Nouember, and reuiuing in Aprill following) that a may well suspend his credite to the rest.

What Balaus in his letter to Mercator, Heslinus in his late Maps of these parts, or any other have written, will bee but meane Spokil-men, to procure any Reader which vsin this North-east Discouerie. Steering therefore another course, and coasting another way to the East and South parts of Asia; let vs take a briefe survey of that World of Ilands in those Indian Seas, reseruing a more full Description of the chiefe of them to the Chapters following: and then proceed to a more leysurely view of the Arabian, and some of the Mediterranean Ilands. And first in this course, we are encountred with the Iland, or ^a Ilands rather, bearing the name of Iapan; the principall whereof are three: of which, more after wards.

a Of the Ilands of Asia. Beardus to Bordas and P. Por. celi have written large Treatise of this Iland-subiect.

Some mention (beleeue it that list) neere to Iapan, certaine Ilands of Amazoni, which the Iaponites yeerly have both worldly and fleshly traffique: and when a Ship cometh from Iapan, so many women as there are men, come to the shore, and leaue each a paire of shooes, with her marke; which who so taketh vp, is her Paramour. These are, serued by the Ilands of China, which doe (as it were) hedge and fence it in; of which, there is little in Authors worthy mentioing: In Macao, or Amacao, the Portugals have a Colonie; but the chiefe Iland of China is Anian, in the Gulfe of Cauchin-China.

b Philippin.

Further from the Continent, from Iapan Southwards, are many Ilands, called by the names of Leguis, the greater, and the lesse, rich in Gold: nigh to the same is Hirraota ^a and next to these, the Philippins, so called of ^b Philip the second, King of Spain, by whose charge and charges they were discovered in the yeete 1564. long after that Magellan had lost his life in the discouerie of these parts. Somet make this name held some proportion to the Spanish Ambition, calling all the Ilands Philippina, which are betwixt New Spain and the Gulfe of Bengala; in all, after their account, eleven thousand: whereof, onely thirtie are subiect to the Spaniard; as Thomas à leze hath obserued. But of all these afterwards; for here wee but mention them.

c G. Bat. Ben.

They begin their reckoning at Nova Guinza, where first wee see Caiana. The next Banda; which name is proper to an Iland so called, and common also to her neighbours, Rosolira guin, Ay, Rom, Neyra, in foure degrees to the South, which alone in the world are ^c said, by some, to bring forth Nutmegs and Mace. The men heere are Merchants; the women attend to Husbandrie.

Moro.
d A. Sigafetta.

The Ilands del Moro abound with Rice and Sagu (the pith of a Tree which yieldeth Meale) where ^a are wild Hennes, which sit not on their Eggs, but burie them a good depth under the sand, where the Sunne hatcheth them; They haue no Kine, but a Rish of like lineaments, which they take in their Nets.

Gilolo.
Amboyno.

^b Gilolo, hath a Mahumetane Prince; and is a great Iland; the people are Men-eaters. Amboyno, is the name of many Ilands, rude both in soyle and people, which eateth their owne Parents when they are old. David Middleton in a written Discourse of one of his Indian Voyages, mentioneth an Iland amongst or neere these of Amboyno, called Bangia, the King whereot is a Gentile. A Hollander heere obtayned such sway, that none durst displease him. Hee had two houses full of the Daughters of the Inhabitants which best liked him, besides many Slaves of both sexes. His life is meerey Epicurean: hee will dance and sing and be drunke two dayes together: nor will hee be commanded by any of his Country-men. Hee is Collector or Treasurer to the King of Ternate in those parts, and sends him what hee can spare. At Banda the Hollanders would not suffer the English to trade: and every where else, both East, and West, and North; and South (as may be instanced in the particular) if force or fraud by slanders rayed on our people can effect it, they testifie that gaine is more precious to them then the loue of our Nation. Neere to the Ilands last mentioned are the Molucca, five in number (other reckon more) Ternate, Tidor, Maita, Machian, and Bacbian, famous through the world, as being Natures Store-house of Cloues.

Their worship is directed to the Sunne, Moone, and other heavenly and earthly Creatures. The King of Tidore chiefe Priest came aboard the Consent, of which Ship David Middleton was chiefe. In the Moluccas are found those admirable Birds of Paradise, or as the Portugals call them, fowles of the Sunne. The ^c Selebes abound with Gold, abandoned of goodnesse, peopled with Idolaters and Men-eaters. The Ilands of ^d Morotay are more Northerly, where Battara-roots is their Bread, their neighbours fare in the Ilands of Tarrao, Sanguin, Solor, and others.

In those Ilands, which more properly beare the Philippine title, Mindanao is of very large circuit, and hath diuers famous Cities: Tendaia, for her excellence, was by the first Discouerer called the Philippina. Luzon incompasseth a thousand miles, in which the Spaniards haue built a Towne, called Manilla, and haue thither carried Catble for breed. This Citie standeth in fourteene degrees and a quarter.

Borneo is reputed as bigge as Spain, richly attended with many Ilands of smaller circuit. It hath a Citie of the same name, founded on Files, in the salt water, with sumptuous buildings of

This is called Elorb, perhaps that which was anciently called Edeffa. Hee speaks of the Caraguols, inhabiting as they passed, which agree neither with Turke, Moores, nor Persians, in their Sect, but haue an Heretic by themselves. Hee trauelled more then one whole daye on one side of old Babylon: from Belugia to Bagdad, though the ground bee good, yet saw hee neither Tree nor Greene Herbe, but all barren, and seeming to retaine some markes of the Propheties threatned by Esfy againt this place. They which dwell heere, and traual from hence to Ballara, carrie with them Pigeons, whom they make their Letter-posts to Bagdad, as they doe likewise betwene Ormuz and Ballara. The coasts of Persia as they sayled in this Sea, seemed as a parched Walderneffe, without tree or grasse: those few people which dwell there, and in the Islands of Lar and Cailon, liue on fish, being in manner themselves transformed into the nature of Fishes; so excellent swimmers are they, that seeing a vessel in the Seas, though stormie and tempestuous, they will swimme to it five or sixe miles to begge almes. They carie their fish with Rice, hauing no Bread; their Cats, Hennes, Dogges, and other Creatures which they keepe, haue no other dyet. In the Iland of Bairon, and those of a Goufey, they take the best Pearles in the world: In Muscato, thre score miles from Ormuz, they dare not fish for them, for Fishes, which are as cruell to the Men, as they to the innocent Oysters. They hold, that in April the Oysters come to the top of the water, and receiue the drops of Raine which then fall, wherewith they returne to the bottom againe: and therefore fish not till the end of Iuly, because that substance is not before ripened and hard. In sayling from Ormuz to Diu, he saith they passed ouer a Bay of a hundred and thirtie leagues of water, white like milke. I haue seene an Extract of a Chronicle, written by Pachaturmuraz, which reigned in Ormuz three hundred yeares agoe; testifying, that one Mabomet being King of Amen in Arabia Felix, pretending title to Persia, built a Citie on the Continent of Hormuz, which his posteritie held in succession of many generations. It happened that King Cabadum flying from the King of Creman, came to Iannuz, that is, a Wood; so they called this Iland, which is almost all of Salt, the River being brackish from a salt Mountaine in the middelt thereof, and the sides of the Ruer white salt. Yet there then grew thyme Woods: Heere he built Ormuz; which Athangurk made tributarie to the Portugals, being Lady of the Ilands thereabout, and principall Staple of Merchandize for those parts of the world. Odoricus speaketh of the intolerable heate in those parts; and Bulky testifies, that neere Ballara, many persons die of the extream heat: which happened to foure of their company, which forced by heat and wearinesse, fate downe, and with a hot blast of winde were all smothered. Ormuz is lately taken from the Portugals by the Persian.

* In Lar, saith Menfist, is the strongest and best furnished Castle of the Persian. See their names in Bulky cap. 14.

In the Discourse of these Asian Seas and this Persian, among the rest, I thought it worthy relating, which Louis de Vreite, in his Ethiopian Historie, telleth of a certaine Jew, though perhaps but a tale (for a Iyer, such as hee hath beene educted in his Ethiopian Storice, loseth his credit, where he speaks truth) yet euen tales serue for mirth being intermixed with serious histories, branded that they may be knowne for Rogues or Iesters. Be it as it will; he tels that this Jew traouelling alongt the shore of this Persian Sea, by some In-lets and Armes thereof, which embay themselves within the Land, saw the Sea losie and swelling, by force of the Windes and Tides, seeming to threaten the higher Elements, but euen now ready to swallow vp the Earth, roaring out a loud defiance in such sort, that the poore Jew was amazed, and dreadfully feared therewith: and this continued the space of some dayes, whiles the Jew trauelled thereby. But on the Saturday and Sabbath, Superstition commanded the Jew; and Nature (the Hand-maid of Diuinitie) enioyned the angrie Elements to rest; a suddaine calme followed, as if Waues and Windes would accompany the Jew in his deuotions, and had forgotten their former fure and wonted nature, to remember the satisfaction of this Day. The Jew hauing heard before, that there was a Sabbaticall River (which some place in Ethiopia, some in Phoenicia; others, they cannot tell where) in a credulous fardie perswades himselfe, that this Arme of the Sea was that Sabbaticall Streame, and that he now saw the experiment of that relation with his eyes. Fancie had no sooner affirmed, but Superstition ware to the truth, and Credulitie tickles him with gratulation of Diuine fauour to himselfe, that had liued to see that blessed sight. Rarished with this conceit, hee fills his Budget full of the Sand, which is of a more grosse and cleauning nature, then in other places, and carrieth it with him as a great treasure vnto the place of his habitation, then in other places, and carrieth it with him as a great treasure vnto the place of his habitation. There hee tells his Countrymen, that now the Messias would not be long before he came, for now he had found this signe thereof, the Sabbaticall River; shewing this Sand in proofe thereof. Credus Iudeus Apella, the Jewes beleue quickly all but the truth, especially in Portugall, whither he came with this report. Many thousand moutd by his words, remoued their dwellings, and selling their substance, would needs goe into these parts of Persia, by the Sabbaticall River to fixe their habitation; there waiting for their promised Messias. One, and a chiefe of this superstitious Expedition pedition, viz. Amatus Lusitanus, a Physician of great note, accounted one of the most learned of his Profession, and a Writer therein; and Iohn Alciat, a Merchant of great wealth: They passed through France, Germany, Hungary, their company (like a Snow-ball) encreasing as they went, with the addition of other Jewes of like credulity. When they came to Constantinople, there were of them, in many Bands or Companies, thirty thousand. Cabsumi Bassa, the Turkish Commander, thought to gaine by this occasion; and would not suffer them to passe over the water into Asia, without many hundred shoofands of Duckets, except they would passe on horse-backe. This example was soone both spread and followed of the other Basses and Commanders in Asia, as they went; their wealth and substance being every where so flected, that they came into Syria, much lessened in numbers; in estate miserable and beggerly; now Officers every where, as new hungry Flyes, lighting on these wretched sarkisses (so I may call them;) some they whipped, some they empaled, some they hanged; and burned others. Thus were these miserable Pilgrimes wasted; and Don Iohn Balasar was present, when Amatus aforesaid being dead with this affliction, his Physicke bookes were in an Out-cry to be sold at Damasco, and because they were in Latine, no man would buy them, till at last another Jew becomie Christian. Alciat, one of the wealthiest men which Europe held, dyed poore in an Hospitall at Constantinople. And this was the issue of their Pilgrimage to the Sabbaticall streame, which they supposed to finde in this Persian Gulfe, where wee have too long holden you the Spectators of this Jewish Tragedie.

And yet let me intreate your patience a litle longer, in considering the occasion of this error. We have elsewhere mentioned this Sabbaticall River: now you shall understand that the Jewes generally have drowned their wits therein. Rambam & call it Gozan. Genebrard allegeth many R. R. testimonies of it: but of all and of all, let Eldad Danias his tale which Genebrard hath translated find some favourable entertainment; the rather because one of our Apocryphall Authors seemes to weaue the same webbe, which as the worthier person, deserueth hirt examination. *Esdra*s therefore (so we suppose him, and this is not all his Jewish Fables) reporteth, that Ier. ben. Triben which Salmadax led captive, take counsell among themselves, to leave the multitude of the Heathen, and goe forth into a further Countrey where neuer Adams dwelt: that they might there keepe their statutes which they neuer kept in their owne Land. And they entred into Euphrates by the narrow passages of the River. For the most High then shewed signes for them, and beld still the flood till they were passed over. For through that Countrey there was a great way to goe, namely, of a years and a halfe: vntill the same Region is called Asarsareth. Then dwelt they there vntill the latter time. And now when they shall begin to come, the Higbest shall say the Springs of the streame againe, &c. Here you see no lesse Miracles then in Jordan, as the Red Sea, for their passage: which seeing it was through Euphrates, yet will pardon our Iew for searching it neere this Persian Gulfe, especially seeing his good Masters the Rabbins had increased this Tale, with the Inclosure of these Jewes from passing againe into our World; not by the continuall course of Euphrates, as *Esdra*s iustifieth, but by the Sabbatizing of the Sabbaticall streame, which by Eldads description is two hundred cubits ouer, full of sands and Stones, without water, making a noyse like thunder as it floweth, which by night is heard halfe a dayes Journey from it. On the Sabbath it is continually quiet and still, but all that while ariseth thence a flame, that none dare enter, or come neere by halfe a mile. Thus the fire (if not the Religion of the Sabbath) then detaynes them no lesse then the stony streame on the weeke dayes: and what stony heart can refuse them from the tennes? Yet doth not bee and *Esdra*s agree of the Inhabitants, both deriuing them from the tennes Tribes; but Eldad challengeth no lesse antiquitie then from Ierobosam, who contending with Reboosam, the godly Canolike Israelites refusing to fight against the house of Dauid, chofe rather to attempt this Pilgrimage, and so passing the River Phylon (for the Scriptures hid forbidden them to meddle with Egypt, Ammon or Amalek) they went and they went till they came into Ethiopia. There did the foure Tribes of Dan, Nephtali, Gad, Aser let le themselves, which continually was vpon the seuen Kingdoms of Tuliga, Kamtua, Koha, Marugia, Tacul, Bacma, and Kacua (ie on the simplicity of our Geographers, which know not one of these, no better then *Esdra*s his Asarsareth) they have a King whose name is Haziel Mathiel, vnto whom they fight, each Tribe three moneths, by course. The Tribe also of Moses (for they imagine his children claued to their Mothers Religion, which was a Magianite or Ethiopian) is turned to their enmity: and they all obserue the Talmud, the Hebrew Tongue, the Ordinances of the Elders, and suffer nothing vnlike amongst them? Yea, no Vtopian State comparable to theirs. He tels the like tales of the other Tribes; But how came he thence to tell this newes? Truly I wondr no lesse then you: yet he faith he got to the Sea (forgetting that before he had compassed his Countrey with the Sabbaticall streame) and there was taken captiue, and by his leanelesse escaping the Canibals (else our fat Storie had bene deuoured was sold to a Jew, of whom perhaps this forged Tale procured his redemption. Howsoever the Tradition holds, but h for these inclosed Jewes, and that Sabbaticall streame, that it should be sought here-a-wayes, or found no where. The citing is sufficient relating to a reasonable understanding; and yet the Jewes are not onely beloved with these their inclosed brethren, imagining their Messias may bee amongst them, although they know not whether to ascribe this transportation to Salmanser, or to Alexander the Great, or to the dayes of Ierobam: but Christians also tell h of them about the Pole; and they know not where. It any lust to haue another Guide for the Sabbaticall streame, Master Fuliers learned labours will giue him good directions. He saith it is the same which Breard in his Description of the Holy Land, calleth Valania: hee also correcteth the vsuall Translations of Ptolemy and Iosephus (learned Casaubon is of his minde) and addes other things ridiculous enough out of the Rabbines, out of whose muddie Lakes this River floweth to enclose the fabulous Jewes afore said.

If any maruell why in a Discourse of the Sea wee adde this, I answer, that wee cannot finde the Land whereto it is due: and therefore one absurditie must follow another. But let vs proceed.

Þ. III.

Of the Red Sea, Sir H. MIDDLETONS taking, and of Rhodes and Cyprus.

THE Red Sea, or Arabian Gulfe, seemes vnwilling to be the Oceans subiect: so many small Ilands doth the continually muster in resistance, besides her vndermining the Sea with her shallow Channell, conspiring the destruction of many headle Mariners, that here will adventure as tenants to the Sea in their moving houses. Once (by a mightier hand) was it helped to preuaile against the Seas force, to discover a dry Land in the midst thereof, and with her watery erected wals to guard these new passengers, till the same hand reuered it, or rather rewarded the then empty belly thereof with the prey of so many thousand Egyptians. Babelmandel, Camaran, and Mazus are accounted amongst the chiefe of these Isles: Suachen hath most souereignie, being the Seat of the Turkish Bassa for Abassia.

Arianus in his Periplus of the Red Sea, and Agatharchides in a Treatise of like Argument, mention not many Ilands therein: Orine, Alalzz, Catacumene, and that of Diodorus in the mouth of the Strait. Dow Iohn of Castro hath written an exact Treatise (from his owne experience) of these Seas and Ilands, which Master Hakins hath in a written Copy; out of which we shall obserue more in our coasting about Africke. Thomas Jones, who was in the Ascension in this Sea, speaketh of twelue or thirteene desolate Ilands, where they found refreshing with Cokes, Fish, and Turtle-doues, where of one may with his hands take twenty dozen in a day. The Straits are a mile and an halfe ouer, but now not chained. Mokha is the chiefe Staple of Indian Commodities, which passe that way to Cairo and Alexandria.

This Moha or Mokha is eightene leagues within the Bab, and hath bene often visited by English ships; but in the yere 1610. they dealt treacherously and barbarously with Sir H. Middleton and his Fleete, both here and at Aden. Aden hath bene of great trading a great Citie, now ruined, neither shops of any account within it, nor shippes of Merchandise without, adorning the same as in times past. Neither doe the Turkes deserue better, whoooke it by treachery at first, hanging vp the King comming to visit them, and keeping (or rather losing and lessening) it still by like treachery. Thus dealt they with Captaine Downius his Company, in colour of Trade surprising twenty, and making them prisoners: and yet would was the Generall dealt with at Moha. The Agia, after much protestation of loue and vowing him publicly to testifie the Grand Signiors Grace in cloth of Gold, giuing leave to let vp their Pinnasse, with many offices and offers of kindnesse, on the eight and twentieth of November suddenly assaulted the English, killed eight, knocked downe the Generall, and rooke him with eight and forcie of his company: and Master Pemberton also with nine of his Men. They attempted presently to surprise the Darling with three great Boates full of 60 Squalliers, where they found the Trumpeter asleepe, and slue him with another. The depeke vpon occasion of somegating that day for Quick-silver, was couered with victuals: pnone of the companie fearing, or prepared for offence or defence. Happily one threw forth a barrel of powder, and disturbed them with fire, which when their Captaine Emir Babare cryed to oue the ships cables, made them mistake and cut the Boat-ropes, so driving away, leaving their Captaine and sixe and twentie more behinde to the slaughter. And with a Petce they gave sufficient warning to the Trades Increase, Sir Henries ship, so that their violence succeeded not by Sea, their intent being to become Masters of all. The next day Sir Henrie Middleton with fifteen more, all chained by the necks, were brought before the Aga, who sternly demanded how he durst come into their Port of Moha, so neere their holy Citie of Mecca, being the Port and Doore thereof: adding that the Bassa had order from the Great Turke to captivate all Christians in these Seas, although they had His Owne Passe: He pressed the Generall to write to the Ships, that they should come on shore (out of the water into this fire) and so preiayling, caused Him to be taken out of his chaine and collar, and clapping a great paire of fetters on his legs, and manacles on his hands, separated from the rest of his companie, hid him in a dutie dog-kennell vnder a paire of staires. At night the Confull of the Banians intreated some mitigation, so that he was removed to a better roome, but lodged on the bare ground, continuing in this miserie (They hoped meanwhile for want of water and via shuall to obdaine the ships) till December 20. Order then came from Iesser Bassa, to bring them to Zenan or Sinan, chiefe Citie of Yeoman of Ayaman. Then being re-examined as before, His Irons were knocked off, and with foure and thirte more English hee was sent thither, the Turkes themselues pitying their manacles, and some of them doing them fauours; Master Pemberton made a strange escape.

The chart is nineteene miles from Moha North-North-west, in 16. 15. There they arrived Ianuarie 3: being their Diuano or Council day, conveyed as in great pompe and triumph drubbing one. The Generall was carried vp into the Castle to a roome twelue steps high, where oue a great Men tooke him by the wrists, and led him to the Balla, sitting at the vpper end of a long Gallerie covered on the floore with Turky carpets, and when hee came within two yards of Him, he was staide, the Balla with frownes demanding his country; and other questions like those of the Aga. Then was he with foure or five more committed to the Keepers house: the rest to the common prison, clapped in Irons, where they had with their small allowance starved. If the Generall had not releued them by the meanes of some of the Turkes themselues, by promises and other meanes become their friends. On Ianuarie 17. arrived nineteene more of those which had bene betrayed at Aden. On the 21. of Februarie, they were all freed of their Irons, whereas (they heard) their intent had bene to cut off the heads of the chiefe, and make slaves of the rest: and at last with faire promises returned to Moha in the beginning of March. And on the 22. of May the Generall made his escape by this deuise: He sent to the ship for provisions as for longer stay, and especially for Wine and Aquavine, which hee gaue bountifullly among his Keepers, so that at noone they went home to rest their laden braines. The Aga himselfe also was gone that day on pleasure out of towne. Thus the English (having some tolerable libertie since their returne) carried on an empie Tunne to the shore, and an other after it in which was the Generall, the rest of the companie being appointed by sundrie wayes to meete there at the Boat which was appointed to come from the ship; and thus they got aboard, a few onely staying longer, and therefore left behinde. But these with other their goods by force were rendred to them, hauing recovered their ships: The treacherous Aga was removed, Ider Aga placed in his roome: and since, Iesser Bassa is also reported to haue lost his head.

In their way to Zenan they were much annoyed with cold in the Mountaynes, the ground every night covered with a white frost, and the Ice in one night a finger thicke: The Citie is bigger then Bristol, hath a wall of mud, Orchards and Gardens within the same: there are many women and children kept as Hostages, to secure the Parents and Husbandes allegiance. The way is by ragged Mountaynes (especially betwene Tayes and Zenan) and hath many Centers or Innes by the Grand Seignior erected for the ease of Travellers. Their returne from Zenan was on the nineteenth of Februarie, eightreene miles to Surage, where the people are poore, clothed from the waste to the knees: The twentieth to Damane (twentie miles) a Towne consisting of five Hamlets ioyned; a plentifull place. The next day they travelled till after mid-night, and came to Ermin, fifteene miles. The two and twentieth, they went foureene miles; and the three and twentieth staid at Naquellansare a common Inne. On the Hill there is a Castle, the Gouvernour an Arabian; No Turke may passe this way without Passe and Licence, the Arabs in the most places ruling, and the people not brooking the Turkish insolence. The foure and twentieth, theyooke vp Alfes, but the people tooke them a Turkish insolence. The foure and twentieth, they went fifteene miles. The five and way againe notwithstanding the Bassas warrant: they went fifteene miles. The five and twentieth, sixteene miles to Rabatanim Center. The sixe and twentieth, as farre beyond to Mersadine. The seuen and twentieth, to Tayes, a Citie halfe as bigge as Zenan, with a mud wall wall and a Cattle. On the first of March sixteen miles, to Fufas. The second eleven miles, to Alabine. The fourth to Moufa, seventeen miles. Hereabouts and at Tayes is store of Ino, dico. The fifth they came to Moha. The Countrey is populous all the way: and because it is so little knowen, I have particularly related this journall. On the fifth of January is great resort of people to Fufas, in devotion towards one of their Saints there buried, and thence they goe together to Mecca.

Moha is a towne unwall'd, very populous, seated close to the Sea, a salt, sandie, barren soile: the Agas had bene as they say Catamite to Jessar Bassa, as the other at Iden also. At their returne he teased Sir Henrie, and called for the Alcoran, kissed it, and swore that hee bare him no ill will. Hee might rather have sworn by their ships: for that was the Deitie to that he most feared. These in this time found a good Reed; called Affab, for their refreshing in the Abex or Habesh shore, the King of Reheita (a towne neere the Bab) kindly entretyning them: At this Affab-road they had wood and water enough, but brackish; with other piousness at reasonable rates. On the shore they are Mahlimetans, within land Christians. This King came riding pompously on a Cow to the English, when Generall Sarr was there, with fiftie shels hanging for a jewell on his forehead. The better sort speake and write Arabicke, the vulgar another language. But this is African; and so may we reckon Socotora and those two Ilands which confront it; Of which one (they say) is the habitation of Men, and the other of Women, which sometimes have entercourse one with the other, but the Aire (Nature inexorable and heavy Hand-maid) not suffering any long abode to each, but in their owne allotted portion.

Loth am I to looke any further into that boisterous Sea, and therefore leaving all that huge Tract of Africke, as compassed by a sudden thought, but unsaluted, wee shall finde other Asian Ilands in the Mediterranean. And because being now wearied, the Archipelago would be too tedious a passage for vs, neither are there many Ilands worth naming in Propontis, or the Euxine, we will speake a little of Rhodes and Cyprus, and then remember how long we have forgotten our Readers patience.

The former of those containeth about an hundred and twentie miles: fertile in soile, and of most pleasant aire, caused by that looke which Phaebus beareth to it; there neuer passing day, in which hee doth not, in his bright and shining apparell; salute it. And for this cause happily was that huge Callosus of brass (gilded over, and reputed the most wonderful of the Worlds leuen Wonders) here dedicated to the Sunne (though some ascribe it to Jupiter) the workmanship of Chares Lindusius, of three score and ten cubits, or as others tell, an hundred and fortie three feet, but it selfe told fourescore cubits in height, which, falling by an Earthquake, the Oracle forbade the *Rhodian*s to erect againe. But nothing forbade Machius, or Manius, the fifth Caliph, after his seuen yeeres warre about Constantinople (as saith Constantinus, out of Theophrastus) invading this Iland, to carry away nine hundred (Constantinus numbred many more) Camels burthens of this brazen calkasse.

The Temple of Liber was here enriched, with many presents of the Greeks and Romans, to both which the Citie of Rhodes was had in friendly and honourable regard. Much was their force by Sea in ancient times, and for two hundred yeeres space it was the seat of the Hospitalar Knights, which now reside in Malta; driven thence by mightie Soliman.

These Knights had also, by purchase of King Richard the first of England, the Ilands of Cyprus, dedicated by the Poets to Venus, to whom the Inhabitants were too much addicted, as appeared by their Temples and other vanities in her honour. At Paphos there was worshipped in the likeness of a Naue; and round thereabouts (by the Druiis working) it rayned not. Trogus writeth, That the Cyprians prostituted their daughters (before they married them) to Mariners on the shore. We have scene at Rome (saith R. Volaterranus) the attendants of Queene Carletta, neuer a whit better then those ancient.

Of Cyprus thus reporteth Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 4. It is ennobled by two Cities, Salamis and Paphus; the one famous for Inspiring Images, the other, for the Temple of Venus. It is so plentifull in all things, that it needes no helpe of other Nations, and of her owne abundance is able to set forth a ship, from the Keele to the Top-saile, with all provision, furnished to the Sea. Neither grieue I to tell it; the Romans more greedily then usually, made themselves Lords thereof. For Ptolemie the King being Confederate with vs, was proseribed without any fault, but the defect of our Treasure, who therefore paysood himselfe, and the Ile became tributarie. Sextus Rufinus saith as much. Amasis was the first, if we beleue Herodotus, that ever conquered Cyprus, and made it tributarie. He also saith (lib. 4.) That the Cyprians were partly from Salamine and Athens, partly from Arcadia, partly from Cythrus, from Phoenicia, and from Ethiopia. Plinie a Firmeth 8. That it was sometime the seat of nine Kings, and was diuersly named, as Acamanthis, Cressaria, Afficia, Amalthis, Macanra, Cypsus, and Colima. and Mines were not able to waste them, it was made lawfull for any man to fell and destroy them, and for his labour to possesse the land which he had so cleared. Bartholomaeus Salernitanus sayth, he saw flying fishes in the Sea about Cyprus, which in the Atlantike Ocean are common: he saw also a Rammie in Cyprus with seven hornes.

In the time of Constantine it was forsaken of the Inhabitants, as before forsaken of the Elements, which refused to water with any drops of raine that lland (sometime called Macaria or happy) the space of seventene yeeres together, or as others haue it, fixe and thirtie, beganne with diuers parts by Helena, the Mother of Constantine, and remanyn to the Greeke Empire, till that Lion of England made it a prey, and the Knights purchase, who sold it to Guido Lusignan: whose posterity failing, the Venetians succeeded, till Seybold the Second, minding to erect a Religious Hospitall, to testifie his magnificence, beganne with an irreligious foundation. For whereas their holy Lawes will not suffer any thing to bee dedicated to holy uses, which their owne Sword hath not conquered, hee brake league with the Venetian, and robbed them of this lland, which they are thought, not the iustest title, before to haue possessed. But it is high time to be thinke vs of our Indian inshore, whence we haue taken so large a prospect: where we are stayed to be transported inshore, to the chiefe of those llands there to take a more leysurely view of their Regions and Religions. And if any be desirous to reade the ancient names and descriptions of the Seas and llands about Asia, Marcellinus, Heracleotus, and Scylax Carandenis haue written especiall Treatises thereof, which Daniel Haezelius hath published in Greeke, very profitable to the learned Students of the ancient Geographie, as are the workes also of Isidorus Characenus, Ariemidorus Ephesius, and Dicaearchus Messenus, which he hath ioyned with them.

CHAP. XV.

A larger Relation of some principall Ilands of Asia, and first of the Ilands of Iapon.

D. I.

A Preface touching the Iesuites, and a description of Iapon, with some of their strange Customes.

He Iesuits have not more fixed the eyes of the World vpon them in the Westerne parts, then they have fixed their owne eyes on the Easterne: heere lacking to repaire, with their entempered Morier, the ruines of their Falling Babylon; there laying a new foundation of their after-hopes: heere, by their Politike Mysteries and Mysticall Policies, endeavouring to recover; there, by new Corquests to make supply to their losses: heere, for busie intruding into affaires of State, suspected by their owne, hated by their Adversaries: there, by seeming to neglect Greatnesse, and to contemne Riches, of the mightiest are not feared, whiles Others belecue, observe, and admire them. Both heere and there they spare not to a compasse Sea and Land, to winne Profelytes; eury of their Residences or Colledges, being as so many Forts to establish this new Romane Monarchie, but with vnlike aduantage, encountering there with Reason (or rather with the carcasse of Reason) attended with Ignorance, and Superstition, whose Owlishe eyes cannot endure the enteruiew of Truth, though darkened with those Cloudes, wherewith they ouer-cast it: Heere, with Truth, yea, the Soule of Truth, true Religion; whose Shield of Faith, and Sword of the Spirit, these (the stronger part of the strongest Gate of Hell) cannot preuaile against. A Spanish Faction of Spanish humour and successe, more easily conquering a World of the naked Americans, and effeminate Indians, then keeping all they had in Europe, Such are the armes of the one, and the preaching of the other. Yet would I faine be thankful to the one and the other, the first for furthering Geographic with knowledge of a new World; the other, for making a possibility of a better World to some, whereas otherwise there was a general desperation of all.

Neither are the wounds of Popish Superstition so absolutely mortall, as the Ethnike Atheisme; the one having no foundation at all; the other shewing the true foundation: although their Babylonish stume euen heere supply the roome of better morter, besides their stubble, hay and wood built open it. Better a mixed truth, then a totall error: and a yamed Christ, then none at all. But howsoever they bee beholden to them for their Diuinitie, it were inhumanitie in vs, not to acknowledge a beholdingnesse to them, for that they giue vs 40 the knowledge of many peoples, although in all their Discourses this caution is necessary, not to yeeld them a Catholike and vniuersall credit, where we any way may spie them dawbling the wals of their pretended Catholike Church. In relating their Miracles, and such like, we will remember they are Iesuits: in other things not seruicable to Rome, we will heare them as Trauersers, when lying doth not aduantage them, nor hurt vs. But as the labours of the Iesuites may eury where breed shame to our negligence in a better quarrell: so in Iapon it is the most of all admirable; that the furthest part of the World should be so neere to their industry. And that you at last may bee acquainted with Iapon, wee will borrow of them to pay your hopes, by this long introduction suspended.

Maffius (who hath translated and set forth more then thirty of those Iaponian Epistles) 50 in the twelfth Booke of his Indian History, doth thus describe it: Besides other lesse, three principall Ilands beare the name of Iapon; which the first and greatest more particularly challengeth; and containeth in it three and fifty Kingdomes or Principalties, the chiefe City whereof is Meato: The second is Ximom, diuided into nine Signiories: The third, Xicore, quartered into foure Lordships, to that there are in all of this Iaponian Dominion, three score and sixe Shires; or petteie Kingdomes. The space of Land is mesured two hundred leagues in length, in breadth some where ten, in other places thirtie, between the thirty and thirtie eight degrees of Latitude: Eastward from China. (Our Countrey-man William A. 60 meaneth to know the truth; placeth it from the 35. to the 48. degree of Northerly latitude; the length East and by North, and West and by South, for so it lyeth, is two hundred and twenty English leagues: that way, and South and North two hundred and three score leagues, almost almost square.) The soyle is not very fertile, subiect to much Snow, the ayre wholsome. The bowels of the earth are strewed with diuers Metals & the Trees are fruitful, and one e wonderful, in that it abhorreth moylture, and if happily it bee moyltened, it shrinketh and becommeth withered; which they remedie by plucking it vp by the rootes, and after it is dried in the Sunne, to set it in drie sand; if a bough bee broken off and nayled on againe, it groweth.

They haue two high Mountaynes, one of which casteth forth flames, and in the toppes thereof the Diuell vseth to shew himselfe in a bright Cloud to some, that (by long fasting) haue prepared themselues to this sight: the other, called Eugeniana, is by some leagues higher then the Cloudes.

They much esteeme a tall personablenesse: they plucke off the haire on their head (Children before; the common people halfe way; the Nobilitie almost all) leauing but a little growing behind, which grows long and is tyed vp on knots, to touch which, were to offer great indignitie to a man.

They can endure much hardship: an Infant new-borne in the coldest of Winter, is presently carried to the Riuer to bee washed: their education is hard; yet are they neate: they vse forks (as the Chindos) or sticks, not touching the meat with their fingers, and therefore need no Napier: they sit on Carpets, and enter the roomes vnshod, their Tables are a hand high, some eigheteen inches square, curiously wrought, to each Guest one, and changed at euery new seruice or change of meat.

Fris faith (speaking of Feasts) they haue three of them at the beginning of the Feast (et before each guest with diuers gilded Dishes in each of them, and as many at the end: And in greater solemnities more.

They vse a much the powder of a certaine Herbe called Chia, of which they put as much as a Walnut-shell may containe, into a dish of Porcelaine, and drinke it with hot water. At the departure of Friends they will shew all their most precious Houhold furniture, the best whereof they employ about the heating water, or other vses for this Herbe, which is of precious account with them.

The women in Iapon which wanted meanes to bring vp their Children, with inludaine butcherie did deprive them, being new-born, of that life, which not long before they had communicated to them. Their Houses are most of wood, because of often Earthquakes: and some of stone. Temples and Monasteries they haue for both Sexes; and more had, till Nanwang destroyed them. Their Language is one, and yet exceedingly diuersified, according as they differ in State or Sexe: or as they (speake in praise or dispraise, vsing a diuers Idiom.

They vse Characters in writing and Printing, as in China. Their Swords are of a most excellent temper. Their Customes differ in many things from other men. e Blacke is a feli-tall colour, White a funerall: their meates, drinke, perfumes, are as dissonant to ours. Their Teeth are coloured with blacke, as beauties liuery borrowed of Art, which wee by Art would auoyd. They mount on the right side of the Horse. They sit (as we rise) to entertaine a friend. They giue to the sicke persons, salt things, sharpe and raw: they vse Pills, neuer let blood; we contrary (as in other rites) either to other ridiculous.

All their Nobles are called Tout: amongst whom are diuers degrees: all of them holding their all in capite, to finde so many Souldiers to the warre, at their owne costs. Generally the whole Nation is witty: paueritie is a disgrace to no man, Reproches, Thefts, Perjuries, Dice-play are hatefull: very ambitious they are in all things, respectue to their credit; full of courtesie each to other, neuer brawling, no not at home with their households. The inconstancie of that State learneth them by vse to prepare for, and to welcome euery State.

They are exceedingly subtil, hypocritically and double-dealing; they are also of cruel disposition, not to their enemies alone, but sometimes will assay the goodness of their blade and strength of their arme, on some innocent body: and in case of distresse, they esteeme it a credit to prevent the sentence of Law by bloody execution done on themselves, which they vsually doe in ripping vp their breasts a-crosse, a seruant or friend attending to smite off his head: and if it bee a Man of any sort, his friends and followers in like manner with their owne hands plucke out their bowels to reluse their loue. The Governours haue absolute rule ouer their inferiours: yea, in euery private Family, the authoritie extendeth to life or death.

The people (saith Adams) are exceeding courteous and valiane; they are gouerned in great Ciuilitie (no Land better) with severitie of Iustice. They are very superstitious, and of diuers opinions.

§. II.

The Voyages of some English to Iapan, and their abode there.

* W. Adams his strange

William Adams, His Countryman * went chiefe Pilot of a Fleet of Hollanders of five Saile, 1599. and wintered in the Magellan Straits from April to September. Neere to the Ile of Saint Mary in feuen and thirte degrees in the South-sea, the ship wherein hee was, and another of the Fleet lost their men in fight with the Indians. They sayled thence to Iapan, and fought the North-Cape (which is false placed in Maps) in thirte degrees, but found it in 35°. In this voyage from Saint Mary hither, they were foure moneths and two and twenty dayes: and then there were but sixe besides himselfe that could stand vpon their legs. They anchored neere Bungo: and two or three dayes after a Iesuit from Langalack came aboard them. The King of Bungo befriended them with house-rooms, and refreshing for their sicke; but three of their company dyed the next day, and three after, onely eighteene were left. The Emperour sent five Gallies or Frigats for them, about fower-score leagues distance: and demanded of them many questions touching our Country, and the termes of Warre and Peace in which it stood with others. Then was he commanded to prison, and two dayes after conuened againe, and demanded the cause of his Voyage. The Iesuits and Portugals informed against them as robbers of all Nations, and vsed their best friends to their worst designements: so that euery day they looked to bee crucified (or crucified, which is there the vsuall death of malefactors.) But the Emperour answered, they had not hurt him: and after long imprisonment, he was suffered to returne to his Ship, and restitution of the goods (before seized on) commanded, but without effect because they were disperied. They had sitie thousand Rials given them. This Citie was called Saca; two leagues and a halfe from Ozaca. From thence they were removed to Quanto, an hundred and twentie leagues Eastward, neere to Eddo, where the Emperour resided. They could not obtaine leaue to goe where the Hollanders traded; but were allowed each man two pound of Rice a day, and eleven or twelue Ducats a yeere. In proceesse of three or foure yeeres, the Emperour employed Adams in making him a Ship after the fashion of ours, which, * as he could, he did, which was him fauour and a larger annuities: Hee after built him another an hundred and twentie tunnes: and by this means, and acquainting him with some principles of Geometry, and the Mathematickes, grew in such fauour, that the Iesuits and Portugals (his quondam enemies) were now glad to see him as a mediatur in their suits to the Emperour: Hee hath now given him a Lorisship, with eightie or ninetie Husbandmen or Slaues, to serue him, a fauour neuer before done to any Stranger. He could neuer obtaine leaue to returne home to his wife: but the Emperour was contented he should write for a Dutch and English trade to be there established yearly. They haue there (saith he) an Indies of money: a good attractiue to bring them thither. And thither since both Hollanders and English haue resorted. The first English ship that there arrived, was the Cloute, anno 1613. Generall Saris aduenturing from Bantam thither by the Moluccas, and after an intricate passage amongst Rocks and Ilands, (which he feared would haue inclosed him without possibilitie of Egress) through an open Sea he arrived at last at Pirando. He was well enterdayned there by King Foyen and his Nephew the young King, who coming aboard, began their Complements of Salutation at the feet, putting off their shoes; and joyning their hands, the right within the left, moned them to and fro before their knees. They were entertained with a banquet and musick to their good content. No sooner were they gone, but multitudes of their Gentrie came aboard with their Presents; but to prevent danger they obtayned a Gardiano from the King. Daily they were oppressed with multitudes to gaze on the Ship and her beautifull Scerene: and some women seeing the Pictures of Venus and Cupid, hanging in the Generals Cabin, fell on their knees thereto, whispering (for they durst not openly profess it) that they were Christians; and this Picture they tooke to bee that of Our Lady and Her Sonne: such a ridiculous Image (scarcely an Image) of truth is in Images, called Lay-mens bookes, indeed * Distrainers of vanity, and * Teachers of lies: whence it is an easie descent to * The worship wee know not what. After that the King came aboard againe with his Women, which there sang and played on Instruments, observing time, and that by booke, as it was pickt; but with harsh musick to English eares. Hee gaue him the choise of diuers houses to hire for his abode: but little else might be made, the people not daring to trade till the Emperours License was obtayned. Sixe weekes he stayed here expecting the coming of Master Adams before named, with whom he after passed to the Court eight hundred miles further. First, from this Iland by water to Ozaca, thence to Surungo or Sorungo, where the old Emperour resided. He was well prouided of necessaries for his Water-passage by the King of Pirando, and for his Land-journey also, with Men and a Palankine for himselfe, and a spare Horse, and one and twenty other horses for his men, raken vp (as with vs Post-horses) by the way. The third day after they were come to Surungo, they were admitted to the Emperours presence in his Castle, where they ascended on certain stayres, and came to a matted room, in which they sate a while on the mats (after the Eastern fashion) wayting the coming of the Emperour, to whom they were anon admitted, and deliuered His Majesties Letter vnto Him, which He tooke and layd vpon his head, and with promise of speedy dispatch, willed them to repaire to their lodging after their tedious journey. Thence they went to Edoo where the Prince keeps his Court, and found honourable entertainment. Surungo is as bigge as London with the Suburbs, but Edoo is both a greater and fairer Citie, all or most of the Nobilitie, hauing there their faire Houses, gilded, and making a gallant shew. The old Emperour himselfe makes way to his Sonnes succession, almost putting him into present possession of the State, by the greater Court and Pompe heere, then at Surungo. The Princes Secretary is Fatex (and therefore of greater experience) to the Secretary of the Emperour. The Prince is aboute fortie yeeres old. He returned to Surungo, and had Articles of Trade granted (which the Secretary aduised they should propound as briefly as might be) the Iapondians affecting breuitie.) These, * I haue leene in the Iaponian Character, seeming to differ from that of the Chinoise in forme, but like for paper, and manner of writing with pensils (taking the Inke from a stone whereon it is mixed with water) the lines downewards, multiplied from the right hand to the left sealed with a redde print of Inke, and not with Wax; Some say the Iapondians haue letters. Captain Saris brought diuers of their bookes, which seeme rather to be Characters then Letters as farre as Asian gursle, vnlike to the Chinoise, yet with like art of Printing, the Pictures in their bookes not comparable to the Art in ours. He heard that they had but twenty Characters, which must be vnderstood of Letters: for Characters standing for entire words cannot easily be numbered, as in China we haue obserued.

Being returned (after the view of Meaco) to Firando, He there settled a Factorie of English Merchandise, leaving Master Cockes with some others of our Nation there in Trade, Himselfe returning from Bantam. Since this, some Intelligence hath bene received from Master Cockes, as wee shall observe in due place: and others have bene employed in this Iaponian Trade: whither the Chinois resort with many Iunkes, notwithstanding their mutual hatred, the Iaponian ready to kill that Man which shall call him a Chinese, and the Chinois so hating all Trade with Strangers, that themselves here reported, that five thousand had lately bene slain by the King therefore, and the Officers put out of their places; the new Officers nevertheless for bribes permitting These this Egreffe. And this may serve by the way to answer such a as will by no means beleue that the Iesuites have set foot in China, because the Chinois dare not for any summe carry a Stranger thither, and protest that none are admitted, no nor any Iesuites there seene. For all this I easily beleue; the Iesuites also acknowledge; and therefore in many yeeres (even after the Mart was permitted in Canton to the Portugals) could not bee admitted, till great importunitie after many many repulses on the one side, and on the other side bribes, preuayled; especially for These, as not seeming dangerous, so few in number, so sacred in profession, so safe in habitation, so Admirable for Arts, so liberrall in the Giving Art, (which goes beyond all the Seven Liberrall) and at last, after many yeeres pressing with Presents unto the King Himselfe, and those so acceptable in that Story is mentioned. The Chinois at Bantam knew it not, and no marvell: for these were Merchants neere the Coast, from which the Iesuites had their Residences very remote: Their China fashion of keeping much within; going abroad with their faces covered with Vailles, Fannes, and chayre Curtaines; and so few in such a Sea of people, might easily escape their sight. Somewhat that before by vs related, more the Iesuites owne Histories, can cleere this point, which I here mention, because duers in speech and writing so confidently affirme that none of the Iesuites are or have bene in China: when as yet in so many foreign Ports they meet with China-Merchants, all trading on perill of their liues, if bribes be prevented not seueritie. But I will not kindle that fire of contention in these Relations, which betwene those Nations so easily flameth, the Chinois and Iaponians. The Emperour sent his Letter to his Majesty of Great Brittain, as did also the King of Firando, with promise of much kindnesse to His Subjects: which with many other Rarities of this and the rest of Captayne Sarūhis his Voyage and Actions in the Red-sea, at Bantam, the Moluccas and other Places, I have in my bookes of Voyages now published, to which, and other Iaponian voyages there added I referre the more Studios.

§. III.

Of the Government and Courage of the Iaponers.

YE have heard that in the Empire of Iapon are sixtie sixe Signiories or petty Kingdomes, all subiect to one Monarch. Touching their ancient Kings wee can say little: but as it seemes in these last eight hundred yeeres, They have had much Chiuwarre, each labouring to make Himselfe Lord of as much as he could. The three last have bene the greatest which Iapon in many ages hath seene: The first of these was Nabununga a great Tyrant, a greater was Quabacodonno his Successour, both in Tyrannie and Empire, who from a Cutter of wood climbed to the Imperiall Soueraintie. Hee had a Nephew, whom Hee caused to be made Quabacodonno, contenting Himselfe with the Title of Taisofama; but growing in jealousy of this Rising Sonne, soone brought Him to a Siege, enforcing Him to crosse or kill Himselfe with other of his Companions, after the Iaponian manner. Before his Death, having no Children but one Infant, He sent for Giesio Lord of eight Kingdomes, and committed to Him as Protector, the Administration of the Kingdom: adjoining as Counsellors, foure other great Princes, and five other of His owne Creatures, that these Decem-viri might rule the State in the Minority of his Sonne. For further securitie He tooke an Oath of these and all the Nobilitie, and married the Niece of Giesio to this young Emperour, being about two yeeres old: Hee also made marriages betwixt others of the Nobilitie, to hold them in concord. But these bonds were too weak: for soone after the Nine Counsellors or Governours brake out against Daisufama (so was Giesio now called) whom Taisofama had appointed chiefe of the Tenne: and this fire being smothered, kindled the second time into a greater flame, which brought all Iapon into combustion: wherein Daisufama being Conquerour, added many Kingdomes to his owne, and at last the Empire also, which was all this while entuled vpon Firoi, or Fris-xama; or Findericxama, the Sonne of Taisofama. Daisufama usurping the Empire, changed his Title into Cubo. Captaine Sarūhis calls him Ogufasama: perhaps a later Title.

Hee

He holds more Kingdomes in his hand then any formerly: fiftene beside those that Taisoſama held: this being their policy to keepe some Signiorities immediately subiect, and make others Tributary. This Emperour fortified at Gieudo or Edoo in his Kingdome of Quanto, employing three hundred thousand continually in his works from February to September: where now his Sonne resides as apparant Heire to this Monarchy. Firesama, Sonne of Taisoſama, keeps at Ozaca: where by later Intelligence from Master Cocker, wee understand that there have resorted to him of Exiles, Male-contents and others, eighty or a hundred thousand, against whom Ogofasama gathered an Army of three hundred thousand, the issue of which warre we have not yet heard, but onely that Ozaca (a City as bigge as London within the wals) is burned.

Dec. 10. 1614.

All Iapon sometime obeyed one Prince, called Uo, or Dairi, a who at length addicting himselfe to his private delights, and putting off the burthen of ruling to his Officers, grew in contempt: and at last every one seized on his owne Province, whereof you have heard there are three score and sixe, leauing the Dairi a bare title, and a Heralls Kingdome, to giue termes of honour at his pleasure, whence he rayseth great revenue, otherwise subiect (excepting his Title) as are all the rest, to the Lord of Tensa, (so they call the noblest Kingdome adioyning to Meaco). This Uo, or Dairi descendeth by succession from the ancient Kings, out of which he is chosen, and is honoured as a God. He may not touch the ground with his foot, which if he doe, he is put by the place, neuer goeth out of his house, seldom is seene of the people. He sitteth in his seat with a Bow and Arrows on one hand of him, on the other a Dagger. If he should kill any, or if hee shew himselfe an enemy to peace, hee is deprived as well as if he had trodden on the ground. All great men haue their Factors with him to procure new Titles of honour, the only fewell of his greatness. The King of China giuing Royall Ensignes to Taisoſama, perswaded him to depose and abolish the Dairi, which he liued not to effect.

They haue another generall Officer or chiefe Iustice, which denounceth war, and in peace, giueth sentence on matters in controversie. But these are but the Instruments of the Lords of Tensa, as are also the Bonzi. These are their Religious, among whom one is supreme in cases spirituall, by whom all their old Holies are ordered, and all new are confirmed or dashed: The Tundi (which are as their Bishops) are by him consecrated and confirmed, although their nomination be by Lay-patrons. He dispenseth with them in diuers Priviledges and Immunities: he enioyeth great Reueneue and Soueraignty, and is aduanced hereto by money and kindred. The Tundi giue Priestly orders, & dispense in smaller matters, as eating flesh on daies prohibited. They are subiect in spirituall things to these, in secular affaires to their Kings and Ciuill Magistrates. Through their diuisions and many wars they were much infested with Robbers and Pyrats, till Quabaccondonu, in stead of, so many Tyrants, erected One, and became vniuersall Monarch of Iapon. Betweene him and the King of China hapned warres about the Kingdome of Coray, which the Iaponites left vpon his death: and the Chinoise also, as tating for no more then they already had. Many of them still are Pyrats, very much feared, and not suffered to land in any place. Captaine Danis had experience of their daring spirits to his cost; for hauing taken a ship of them, and not possessing himselfe of their weapons, because of their humble semblance, they watched opportunity, and slue him; and thought to haue taken their takers, and made themselves Masters of the English ships hauing a watch-word or token for those aboard their owne ship, to murder the English there. Damigerous had this Fray proued, had not the murdering Pecee, with almost a cleane riddance of them, cruelly decided the quarrell. Yet would they not desire their liues, and pulled the Pikes of such as had wounded them, thorow their bodies, to reuenge it with their Swords.

Sir Ed. Maff. born.

This is generall to the Iaponians, call it fortitude or desperatenesse, or cruelty, or in some so respects all of them. Quabaccondonu the Nephew of Taisoſama before mentioned, seemed to delight in blood and butchery, and obserued as an ordinary recreation, at set times to haue condemned persons brought before him, in a place purposely inclosed and framed to this inhumanity: in the midst of try his arme, art, and blade in this beauly caruing of humane bodies: sometimes also setting them for markes to his Pecee or Arrows; sometimes exonerating women, to open and curiously to search the closest Cabinets of Nature; alway proterating vengeance to repay him in his owne Coyne. For old Taisoſama hauing a young child, of his owne bodie, studied how to remoue this Quabaccondonu. It is a custome in Iapon that the Father growing old, resigne their Signiorities to the Sonne or Heire: The Lords of Tensa (which title includeth the Iaponian Empire) adde another ceremony, to visit that Sonne now 65 in possession, so to acknowledge a kind of subiection, all the Lords in the Empire doing the like, in publicke solemnity. This time was appointed, and Quabaccondonu prouided all variety of

of cheere for entertainment, a thousand choyce Wayters to attend, and thirteen thousand of their Japonian Tables, little bigger then our Trenchers: but all was disappointed by Tai-cosama valour, refusing to come. After that, He picked quarrels with him, and caused Him to go to the Monastery of Coia, (a receptacle for Exiles.) Quabacodono in this distresse fruited his hinder-locks and beard, changing his name to Doi. The Bonzy gave Him entertainment at Coia (as to other Exiles) without any respect to his present Title, or late power. A few dayes after came a Mandate from Tai-cosama, that they should all plucke out their bowels after the Japonian custome. First began an Honourable servant, who, having cut himselfe open across the brest, was by Quabacodono, (after reverence done to him) beheaded, and then Others in order after the same manner: the last was Quabacodono, whole head, after hee had ripped vp himselfe, was strooke off with the same Sword which hee had vsed before in his butcherly recreations. And lastly, he that had smitten off his head, committed execution vpon himselfe: the Bonzy presently burning all their bodies in the same place. One of this company was offered by Tai-cosama his liberty, which hee refused, chusing kindly to dye with him, who in life had vsed him kindly.

The like executions followed in others: one of which was the mightiest Lord in Tenfu, who being flaine, his Son but 16. yeeres old, had his life offered: but sending word to Tai-cosama, he could not lue without reuenge of his Fathers death, went presently to a Temple in Meaco, and before the Idoll Fotseo disembowelled himselfe. Of all Quabacodono wives and their followers, one and thirty chiefe women, and three of his children litle Infants, were carried in Carts to the place of execution, where the Executioner presently presents them with Quabacodono head, that death might first enter at their eyes, which by a bloody hand soone possessed all the other members: Their bodies were all laid in one Graue, out of which Tai-cosama rayled a Temple with Inscription; The Temple of Traitors. After other wives and children of the other Nobles executed, hee demolished to the ground the Palace which Quabacodono had built, with the City by him founded, consisting of litle other then three hundred Noblemens Houses: this being the Japonian policy, vnder shew of attendance, to keepe the Grandes at the Court, so to bee secured of their persons and practices. I haue bene the longer in this Relation, to shew the Japonian tyranny in this example: whereof it were easie to giue you many. The poorest, if sentence of Death bee determined on them, will (if they can haue knowledge and meanes) prevent it with this (accounted honourable kind of death) crossing themselves. And whentoeuer any man is executed, presently every man rusheth in, and cryes his Caton or Sword on the body of the Dead, thus thrust into goblets, not a piece left bigger then a mans hand. This Captaine Saru saw done on a woman, and her two Paramours at Firando, whom shee had appointed to visit her; but on coming toooner and before the other was gone, they quarrelled (to draw a Sword in a Garrison Towne, and adultery are both death) and they were all thus executed. The like for stealing, one for a little bagge of Rice, another for a piece of Lead not worth about sixe pence. Their doores stand open (so little doe they feare Theues) and they make ordinary through-faires thorow other mens houses. Crucifying is common, the bodies still hanging, and putrifying by the high-ways: their Crosses haue two crosse timbers fastned to the maine Post which is set into the ground, the one for the expansion of the hands, the other of the feet, with a shorter piece in the midst to beare vp the weight of the body. They bind them thereto, and runne a Lance into the right side of the crucified, sometimes two across. Heading is vsuall, which in Solemnities is thus performed: one goes before with a Mattocke, another followes with a shouell, a third with a boord or table containing the crime, which also hee himselfe following next, holdeth in a stick, to which is fastened a paper made like a Vane, the end whereof is in his hands tyed behind him, by which cord the Executioner leads him, on each side a Souldier with his Lance resting on him; at the dismall place without shew of feare hee sits downe, and holds out his head presently wiped off, so thaters mangle him as if said.

Since Captaine Saru his returne, the King of Firando is dead, and three of his followers crossed themselves, their bodies were burned and enioyed the same Sepulchre with his. And the Mint-master a Great man with this olde Emperour, hath already promised thus to dye with Him. I could leade you from these Tragedies to their Comedies, which in Japon are common, and that by common women, which are to bee hired of their Pandor or Owner for this, the Bed, or attendance at table to fill your drinke: but it is Note-worthy that the Pandar, being dead, is by a bridle made of Straw put in his mouth, drawne about the streets, and cast on a dung-hill or some open place to bee deuoured of Beasts or Fowles. This hinders not but these Hydris heads multiply. Sometimes Great Men at their Great Solemnities will themselves in person personate the AGs of their Ancestors: This Captaine Saru saw the King of Firando with the chiefe Men doe whiles hee was there, all the Towne and payred, and altered from Austeritie (in some) to Wantonnesse, (in others) from Arts, to Armes.

The Bonzij tooke part with Nachien, enemy of Nabunanga, who enraged hreath, made truce with the one, to destroy the other. The Bonzij not preuailing by their suing for peace, fortified themselves for warre in the Temple of Quanen their God of health and long life, much frequented with Pilgrimes from all parts, much solemnized with their pompous Procections (like in all parts, if yee beleue the felseite, to their Corpus Christi Solemnity) which grew the more famous, for that these were but the preamble to the like pompe in Gibon Festiual at Meaco. But all preuailed not with Nabunanga, who destroyed both Temple and Priests with fire and sword, burning foure hundred other Temples for company, in the yeere 1572. At Meaco he burned twenty of these Bonzian Cloysters of the greater sort, besides fourescore lesse, and in one of them threecore Bonzian women or Nunnes, whose Devotion was employed in begging for the reparation of the Temple of Daibud. Amongst the rest, as the Grecians had their Moverry with his Odnicau, so the Iaponians have their Iesu with his Trident, to conuey soules departed into their allotted eternall residences: The Bonzij his Chaplaines by lots enquired whether they should remooue him; hee commanded it, and they with great solemnitie performed it, but out of a place, which then escaped, to another wherein, and wherewith he was burnt. Fuchusang in was another Bonzian Academy, adorned with many Colledges, which he destroyed. Xuanguen the King of Cainochin shrouded his head and beard, and professed himselfe a Bonzij, and not only attired himselfe in their Habit, but thrice a day did performe their Superstitions, having six hundred Bonzij to his followers. He writ to Nabunanga, intituling himselfe the Patron of those Religions: the other in his answer stiled himselfe the Tamer of Devils, and Enemy of Selfe. But after that he would be a God, soone did he cease to be a many the immortall God, hating Corriuals, by his owne subjects destroyed his life, riches, and memory. These Bonzij are for the most part Gentlemen, whom their Parents (having many children) for want of mayntenance thrust into Cloysters; Shonen (as you haue heard) and Shauers, couetously pilling and polling the people of their money by many deuices, as by selling them Seroules to keepe them (by the Deuill) from hurt of Devils after death: borrowing of money here, as to repay with great interest in the future World; giuing the Creditor a Bill or Scroll of their hands for security; by telling of things stolne or lost (which they doe by Enchantments, calling a Deuill into a child, who bring fo possessed, answereth their questions) by selling their blessings and curses, like Balaam. Some by vow (the most) liue vnmarrried: as the Bonzian women.

Another Sect called Saiambuxu, before their admission into that Order, liue two thousand or more together on a high Mountayne, for the space of threecore dayes macerating themselves with selfe-inflicted penance; the Deuill in diuers shapes mischiefe while appearing to them. And after this they are receiued into that damnable Fellowship; distinguished by white flockes hanging downe their neckes, curled haire, and blacke hats, and so wander from place to place, giuing notice of their coming by a little Bell. Another Sect, called Genguis, dwell on some high Hill, blacke of complexion, and (as is supposed) horned, marrie Wiues of their owne kindred, passe ouer great Rivers by the Devils helpe, who on a certaine Hill, at times appointed, appeareth to them: of whom by the name of Amida he is worshipped. In another Hill he was wont to appeare to his deuout followers, whom then hee would lead, as they thought, to Paradise, indeed to destruction. They say that a Some, not able to perswade his Father from this passage to Paradise, secretly followed him with his Bow and Arrowes, and when the Deuill appeared, shot and wounded a Foxe, whom hee followed by the blood to a Lake wherein he found many dead mens bones. They haue another Vniuersity in Iapon called Coia, whose Bonzian Students are of the Sect of Combedaxu, supposed the Inuenter of the Iaponian Letters. He in his old age digged a foure-square Caue, into which hee conueyed himselfe, affirming that hee then dyed not, but after some Millions of yeeres would retorne in the dayes of one Adiroen, which then should be a most worthy King in Iapon. About his Sepulchre burne many Lampes, sent thither from diuers Nations, with opinion that such as enrich that Monument, shall themselves here be enriched, and in the other life by Combedaxu patronized. In the Colledges here liue fixe thousand of these Shauelings: from whom women are restrained vpon paine of death. At Fatamochaiti, the Bonzij trayned vp witty and proper youths in all trickes of subtilty and guile; acquainting them great men, and borrowing money on that credit, might enrich their wicked Colledge: till the sleight being found, they were killed of the Inhabitants.

There be that worship the Sunne and Moone, who haue an Image with three heads, which (they say) is the vertue of the Sunne, Moone, and Elements. These worship the Deuill, in visible shape appearing to them, with many and costly Sacrifices. Some Bonzij play the Physicians, which burne certaine papers, in which are writ ten the sentences of Cam and Fotob: which papers being burnt, they put the ashes in drinke, and giue the same to cure diseases, and (with lyes) to turne away lyes and fraudulent dealing.

Some hold Xacas booke in such veneration, that without it they hold it impossible to bee issued. Other Bonzij haue beene in other ages in high reputation of holinesse; but especially, not a hundred yeeres since, the author of the sect called Scaxos: the Ruler or General of which sect is openly wicked, but so adored of the people, that if he but looke on them, they will salute him with teares of ioy, praying him that all their sinnes may bee pardoned, and therewith giue him no small quantitie of their gold. His yearly festiual is so honoured with thronging of the people, that in the entrie of the Cloyster many are trodden vnder foot, which yet is of the blinde people accounted a happinesse, many willingly yeelding themselves to be killed in that presse. And in the night, whiles his prayles are sung, there is a great howling and lamentation. Neguiro was author of the sect Foquexan.

There is an Image or Colossus of Copper in the way from Ozaca to Sorungo, called Dabiz, made hollow, sitting vpon his heeles, of huge greatnesse: and yeelding a great sound if any hallow in the hollow thereof, as some of Captaine Saris his companie did. At Meaco he observed one Temple as great as the body of Paulus westward from the Quire, with a stone roofoe, borne vpon as high pillars. Hee saw an Idoll greater then the former, reaching vp to the top of the arch. That of Dabiz was in their way to the pilgrimage of Tenchadema, where Master Adams told him that hee had bene. There they euery moneth present the Deuill with a new Virgin, instructed by the Bonzij to aske him certayne questions, which he in humane shape appearing, answereth; hauing the carnall vse of her body, if some Bonzi make not the Deuill Cuckold, as in our Egyptian Relations yee shall find of Tyrannus.

Some of their Bonzij professe a militarie discipline, as the Knights of Malta. The profession called Neugori was instituted by Cacuban (who is therefore desired) in which some intend their prayers, whiles others fight, and others performe their task of making fise arrows a day. Their government is an Anarchie; euery one obeying and commanding, the meanest person amongst them hauing a Negative in all their consultations: And nothing is agreed on till all be agreed. In the night they often kill one another without remorse, and yet (such is their Religion) this Sect holdeth it a sinne to kill a flye or any liuing thing. Amongst the Bonzij there are two principall men, which if vnder their hand-writing they giue their testimoniall to other of their Orders, it is as conferring a Degree, yea a kinde of Canonization. For thenceforward they sit in a chaire, and are adored, and appoint to other Students their tasks of meditation. One of these, puffed vp with vanitie and arrogance, professed to know what he was before he was borne, and what should become of him after death. Valentine Caruaglus in relating the death of some principall Nobles, which withstood Daisufama the present Emperor, speaks of a certaine Bonzi, which neuer stirres out of doores but vpon such occasions; who accompanied with many of his Sect, after other hallowing ceremonies did giue them a certaine booke to kisse, and laid it on their heads, wherein they repoled much holinesse, and worshipped it as a god: but one of them, named Augustine, reiected him, crying out hee was a Christian, and therewith tooke out a picture of Queene Catherine of Portugall, sister to Charles the fifth, in which were also represented the holy Virgin, and our Lord, and with great reuerence laid it three times on his head, and so resounding the names of Iesus and Maria, was beheaded. This I mention to let you see the Iaponian Christianity. Some of the Bonzij are diligent Preachers, with great zeale and eloquence declaring the goodnesse of their Amida, and exhortation to call vpon him.

M Eaco their chiefe Citie is chiefe also in superstitions, hauing had (if report lye not) on the Hill neere to it seuen thousand Cloysters or Abbies: one of which is so famous, that the Kings in their Warres will vow great summes of gold, and after victorie pay the same there: the people also in distresse make it their sanctuarie, where the Deuill by visions deludeth them. In August they celebrate the Feast of Gibow with Pageants: fifteene or sixteene Chariots covered with silke, goe before, in them are children with Minstralls. Euery Chariot is drawne with thirtie or fortie men, and followed by their peculiar Companies or Trades: and after them Chariots of men armed, which all passe by the Temple in the morning. In the euening, two Litters come forth, carried by men; the one of the God, the other of his Lemman; then followed the third of his Wife with with which the men runne vp and downe in such a confused manner, as may signifie her ieioulie. Here the people weepe and pray to their goddesse, whom yet with a contrary deuotion they comfort: and lastly (as if by the peoples mediation) the Litters are ioyned together, and carried into the Temple. In the same moneth they haue their feast of All-soles, in which they light many lamps at their doores, and all night walke vp and downe the Citie: and many suppose at a certaine place they meet with the walking ghosts of their deceased friends, and after welcomming ceremonies, they set viſtials ⁴ before them, at least in that place, where hauing a little attended, they inuite them to their houses. The reason of this refreshing they alledge the long iourney to Paradise, which in lesse then three yeeres space cannot be pased, and therefore they haue neede of heartning. Two dayes this feast lasteth, in which they cleanse their graues, and giue presents to the Bonzij. In March they haue festiuall Playes, in which many meet in the afternoone painted with the Images of their gods on their shoulders: and parting themselves into two ranks, the boyes beginne with stones, the men continue the fray with arrowes, poles, and swords, alwayes with the death of some, and impunitie of the doers. The fourth moneth is a kind of Lent, or deuoter season, in which euery day in the weeke the Bonzij preach twice or thrice a day, in the prayes of Kura.

At Sacai in Iuly they keepe the feast of Daimaogin, to whom many Temples are dedicated: in which the Idoll is carried with much pompe on horse-backe, followed first by the Bonzij, then the Nobilitie, after them certayne Witches, whom armed troups of Souldiers follow. Then cometh the Litter of the God, all gilded, carried by twentie men, answering each other in certaine Hymnes; the people worshipping.

They beleue diuers Paradises, into each of which their peculiar gods carry their owne worshippers: And some make ouer-hastie iourneyes thither on this sort. Hee watcheth certayne dayes, and then out of a pulpit preacheth of the contempt of the world. Others betake them to be his companions, and some giue their almes. On the last day hee maketh an Oration to his fellowes, who all drinke wine goe into their ship, carrying a sithe to cut vp all the brambles in their way; and putting on their clothes, stulle their sleeves with stones, and hanging a great stone about their necks to helpe them the sooner to their Paradise, hurle themselves into the Sea. And great honour is done to them being thus dead. I saw one (hild Phela) that had seuen of these companions, which with their great alacrity, and my great amazement, did this. But they which worship Amida, obserue another rite. Being weary of liuing, they put themselves in a strait hole of the earth, receiuing breath onely by a reede, and so continue fasting and praying till death. Some in honour of a certayne Idoll, doe cast themselves downe from an high Tower, where this Idoll is placed, and after their death are reputed Saints. Others ⁵ sayle to their Paradise (as before) but when they haue launched into the deepe, make holes in the ships keele for Death to enter, and the Sea to swallow both it and them. Diuers also crosse and dismembowell themselves before their Idols; for wch such sacrifices their gods are pleased.

Iosephus Acosta ⁶ tells of a strange Confession, which is obserued in this order. There are (saith he) in Ocaca very high and steepe Rocks, which haue pikes or points on them about two hundred fadome high. One of which, higher and more terrible then the rest, daunteth and terrifieth the Xamabusis (which are certayne pilgrimes) to looke vp vnto it: vpon the top of the point there is a great rod of Iron of three fadome long, placed there by a strange deuice: at the end of this rod is a ballance tyed, whereof the scales are so bigge, as a man may sit in one of them. And the Goguis (which be Devils in humane shape) command those pilgrimes to enter therein, one after another, not leauing one of them. Then with an Engine or Instrument, which moueth by means of a wheele, they make this rod of Iron to hang in the aier: one of the Xamabusis being set in one of the scales, which (because there is no counterpoise in the other scale) presently hangeth downe, and the empty one flieth to touch the rod above, whereupon the ballance hangeth. Then the Goguis selleth the poore pilgrime that hee must confesse all his finnes, that hee can remember, with a lowd voyce, that all may heare: Which he presently doth, some of the hearers laughing, some sighing. At euery sinne mentioned, the other scale falls a litle, till that hauing told all, it remaines equall with the other, whereupon the sorrowfull penitent sits. Then the Goguis turnes the wheele, and drawes the rod and ballance vnto him, and the pilgrime comes forth, and another enters till all haue passed. If any concealed any sinne, the pilgrime comes forth, and another enters till all haue confesse, he grew obstinate, the Goguis cast him downe from the top, where in an instant, he is broken in a thousand peeces. A Asopooia, who had seuen times made triall her selfe being conuerted to Christianitie, reported this. But the terror was such (saith hee) that few would confesse any thing. The place is herof called Sangenetocoro, that is, the place of Confession. Thus much Acosta whom as I thinke for the storie, so I would a litle trouble (for hee would more sonnes of Xaca, Marisenes, Trigiu, and others, would be too tedious to report. Organimus a telleth. That whiles vpon a time the Feast of this last was solemnizing, a shewre of stones rayned with such violence, that the companie, to the number of twentie thousand, betooke them to their heeles. But Amida is most worne in their lips; beggars asking and begging in his name: chapmen in buying and selling, sounding and ringing it, the Bowzy promising salvation to all that inuoke it. Admirable are the Temples b for matter and workmanship erected to him; one neere to Meaco is an hundred and fortie elles in length, with a huge Image of Amida, hauing thirtie Images about it of Souldiers, besides *Ethiopi*ans and Deuils, yea Windes and Thunders figured, and a thousand Images of Canon (on each side of the Temple fise hundred) all in like, but monstrous shape, with thirtie armes, two onely holding proportion to his body, the brest adorned with seven faces; all the Images and other furniture so glittering with gold, that it dazeleth the beholders eyes. Almeida describeth a Temple of theirs in Meaco, called Cobencu, which had three Porches, with so many Cloysters, and other pieces of stately and costly workmanship. Two mightie Colosses or statues of Lions, were let as Porters at the doore. In the midst of the Temple were set Xaca and his sonnes about him. There were threescore and ten pillars of Cedar of such height, that (as the Register booke of the Temple testifieth) each of them cost fise thousand ducats. These and the walls were painted, the roote artificially framed: a hall for the Bowzy fortie elles long and twelue broad of like workmanship with the Temple: whereunto were annexed their chambers, an 2C hundred and four-score in number, a Librarie full stored with bookes; Bathes, Butteries, Kitchens, huge Caldrons an elle deepe, to heate their water for drinke, which they neuer drinke cold, neither in Summer nor Winter; Parlors foure and twentie, with lights burning in them all night. Before it, is a Fish-pool fise elles square, full of fish, which none may touch. It is fise hundred yeeres since the foundation of this Temple. The pleasant and spacious walks before the Temple of Casanga, planted with lottie Cedars and Pines, watered with a goodly stream, arched with a double row of pillars, adorned with fiftie Lanternes on each side, of solid metall covered with gold, and curiously wrought, which burne all night; the large Monasterie of Bonzian Nunnes, which beir g aboute fise and fortie yeeres old, denote themselves to these holies; the Quire not to be entred by any but certaine Religious, which there sit in garments of silke: these with other like might tempt my pen to bee tedious. And so might the Temple of Fachiman in the same Groue, more costly and curious then the former, and another without it consecrated to Dai, which hath two giantly Porters of stone foureene elles high, twofscore and eightene pillars of wonderfull height, and three elles and a halfe in compass: it was built fise hundred yeeres since, and was twentie yeeres in building. A Tower or Sterple of wood is borne vp with thirtie pillars, in which did hang a brazen Bell, the mouth whereof was two elles, the compass fise, the depth three and a halfe, the thickness about thirteene inches. There are many Deere and Doves consecrated to the Temple, which goe into mens houses, no man touching them. Their walkes set with Orange Trees, and other their rarities of Art and Nature, they which would further learne, let them resort to Almeida our Author. One Temple is dedicated iust by, to a Lizard, (which they 40 make Author and Patron of learning) without Altar or Image in it. Hec that readeth of the huge workes of Taisosama, holding sometime an hundred thousand workmen in labour at once, may present to his imagination the incredible buildings which those Tyrants by so many slauih hands, can raise. Their bulie wits appeare by their curious questions to Iohn Fernandus, of the nature of the Soule, of Angels and Deuils, &c. and some of them seeing the absurdities of the Bowzy, worship nothing at all. The Bowzy, as the Iesuites report, rayed slanderous rumours of them, to be eaters of mens flesh, and causes of the warres and plagues which their gods provoked by this new Sect sent amongst them: they d slandered the new Conuers as miserable Apostataes, which became Christians, because they would not be at the charges of their Idolatrie. The Iesuites e tell of a great woman possessed with a Deuill, which said that he was a Foxe, for some iniuries offered by the Maide, thus dealing with the Mistrresse. There were in those parts store of Foxes, multiplied by their superstition, not daring to hurt any notwithstanding their great harmes, because, forsooth, they were the Deuils instruments to punish them. Yet in this case the Wizard being consulted, counsayled to take a Foxe without hurting him, (which with a trap was done) and to gae him all kinde entertainment with most delicate foodes and vsage, so to pacifie the Good-wits angrie Damen, who yet (like a Deuill) with faire entreatie grew worse. Hereupon another famous Wizard was called, who writ a long scroll, bunding himselfe in the Deuill. Foxes name to free the woman, subscribing with his blood; which scroll hee 50 hanged on the Foxes necke before taken: which being neatly trimmed and shauen by a Barber, and painted (as their women, being of pale complexion, vlc) was let goe, and the Deuill intermitted his tortures awhile, but after reiterating the same, The womans husband

Francis Fernandes writeth, that in the way from Malacca to Iapan they are encountered with great stormes, which they call Tiffons, that blow foure and twentie houres, beginning from the North to the East. and so about the Compasse: these happen in June and July. It is there colde in November, December, Ianuarie, and Februarie, because of continuall North and North-west windes. Whiles Captayne Seris was there, a terrible Tuffon blew downe the houses in Firando, turning them ouer with the fire in them; which must needs haue fired them, but for (as strange an accident) so much Raine comming withall. A Bonze pretended to haue bene told by their God or Duill, that such a Night their Towne should bee burnt: this made such Out-cries euery night, the Diuell still prouing a lyar, that they could not sleepe. That Tuffon sunke diuers lunkes, and did much harme to the Hollanders wharfe, bringing vp the Sea so terribly that it made the Earth to shake. And yet the yeere after worse harme was related from Edoo by Master Cockes: this faire Citie all ouerblowne, and the people forced to flee into the Mountaynes: the waters taking possession of those gilded Houles, and the windes carrying away all the Tiles of the Kings Palace lately build in His new Fortrelle, these Tiles all gilded, but now none to bee found. The Pagans ascribe this to the Charmes of the Iesuites lately banished; the Christian Iapponians, wnto that persecution. Their women are as white as wish vs: but not well coloured, which they supply with Art. There are women at Firando, which liue in their Boates, and take Fish by diuing in eight fathom deepe: their Eyes are red by this diuing, they easily this way knowne. They haue three sorts of Siluer. It is with little cost reduced to the Spanish puritie. Their houses are floored with Mats, and they fringed with Silke, Gold or other stuffe. The Iaponders confirme and subscribe their compacts and bonds with their Blood, Their Siluer is in bars, their Gold coyne in long forme.

Hee that listeth further to bee acquainted with Iaponian affayres, may resort to the Epistles of the Iesuites, which besides these I haue named are many: and of that Societe are not many lesse then two hundred in this Iland, ^a which also is now become an Episcopall Sea. Some Cities are become wholly ^b Christian, if wee beleene the Iesuites, abandoning all their Ethnike Paganisme and Idolatrie: would God no leauen were mixed with their Christianitie. Peter Martines, their first Bishop tels of aboute twentie thousand in a yeere converted to Christian Religion: whereas in China they haue found small successe, notwithstanding that they ^c there promised to themselves a more plentiful harvest then in any other Nation. The first of them was Xavier (one of Ignatius first companions, and like to haue bene canonized before him too) which dyed in China, 1552. and lyeth buried at Goa: of which Artus Blandinius, and the Iesuites tell many strange things. But the first finding of this Iland is by Gulnams ascribed to Anthony Abota and his fellows, 1542.

But before these M. Polo writeth of this Iland, which hee calleth ^d Xepangu, whither Cublai the great Tartarian Can, in the yeere 1264. sent two Captaynes to conquer the Iland. The windes (as angry with the Tartarians, and taking part with the Ilanders) raised so stormie a Sea, that (when there were now thirtie thousand of their Companies, landed in a little Iland) they were forced to put off to Sea, and scattered with tempests. The Ilanders set fourth a Nauie to take those Tartarians, which so confusedly ordered that enterprise, that the Tartarians found meanes to make themselves Masters of their enemies Nauie, and therewith to layle away.

Marcus Paulus reporteth like things of their Idolatrous Religion, as you haue heard: of Idols with heads of Oxen, Hogges, and Dogges; and other deformed shapes: and some with many hands, as a testimonie of their great power. The enemies which theyooke in warre, not able to redeme themselves, hee saith they did eate in solenne Feasts: hee addeth, that in the Iaponian language Mangi was called Cin; as now it is Cina or China.

I haue presumed to adde a piece of a Letter of Quibacodonius to the Viceroy of India, which after other things, hath these words: Iapan is the Kingdome of Chiamu, whom we esteeme to bee the same with Seiu, which is the beginning of all things. This Seiu is the substance and very being of all things: and all things are one and the same with Seiu, and in-to Seiu are resolved, which in Seina is called Iuro; and in Tescincu Buppa. In the obseruation of the Lawes of this Chiamu, consisteth all the politique government of Iapan, both inward and outward, &c.

Betweene the Sects of Amida and Xaca happened a late grieuous quarrell, Anno 1609. Both Sects number great multitudes, and are said in times past to haue numbered betwixt them three thousand Colledges or Monasteries in the Mountaynes not farre from Meaco. Their originall was from Sijenoyama a Towne in the said Hilles: those of the Amidan Sect were called Fandexu, the other of Xaca Feguxu. Now it happened that one of these

these Foguesius, transported with zeale, in a Sermon of his had rayled on Amida, and his Seſtaries, which by one of them was ſooner answered: whereupon followed a challenge of Diſputation betwixt them, which came to the eares of Cubo, who followed Amida. Hee commanded that both of them ſhould come to Yendo, or Edoo, to trie the matter before Him: where the Foguesius feared the Emperour (the rather becauſe hee had ſhewed the bitterneſſe of his zeale againſt one of Cubos Sonnes, which, hee ſaid being lately dead, was now damned for being of Amidas Hereſie, and rode vp and downe all Iapan without reſt, appearing here and there.) And now could hee ſpeake but halfe words, being ſurprized with his feare, a poſſion which is the betraying of his Succours that Reaſon offereth. Cubo commanded that hee ſhould be ſtripped of his Bonzan habite in a publike Congregation by other Prieſts, together with his Companions, laden meane while with inſolent words and blowes. After this, they and eleven more of their Seſt (about twentie in all) were bound, and ledde vp and downe this Citie, and other the chiefe Citieſ of Iapan, in which before hee had Preached. Laſtly, all of them were carried backe to Miaco and Carred, the Preacher had his Eares and Noſe cut off, the reſt their * Noſes; and the matter taken vp by the King of Bingo which followed Kaca, obtayned this Concluſion, that all the Foguesius ſhould by their publike writing confeſſe, that the Founder of their Hereſie, which firſt taught the worſhippers of Amida to be damned, was an Impoſitor, and that Kaca neuer had taught ſo.

Thus hath this Emperour dealt with the Iaponian Seſts: nor is hee equal to the Ieſuites Chriſtianitie. For in Yendo (ſo the Ieſuites call that Imperiall Citie of the Prince, Ours Eddo and Edoo) Proclamation was made that None of the Nobles ſhould become Chriſtian. And many inferiour Kings perſecuted the ſame, ſpecially Michael an Apoſtate, the King of Arima, which had before ſeſed bad meanes to remove his Father, ſo to become his vitimely Succellour. This his Father Iohn had a little before bene employed againſt the Portugals Ship of Macao. The reaſon was, ſome quarrels at Macao betwixt the Portugals and Iaponians, who being ſeuerely enquired into by the Portugall Magiſtrate, ſleide home, and acquainted Cubo with the buſineſſe. Hereupon this ſhip arriuing in Iapan at Nangachick, Hee ſent this King of Arima againſt them; in which fight the Portugall Ship long preuailing, by caſualtie was fired, and by themſelves caſting fire into the Gunners-rooms, blowne vp, to the loſſe of a Million of goods. This Iohn viſing indireſt meanes to obtaine part of the Kingdome of Eyen, his hopes increaſed by the marriage of the Emperours Neece to his Sonne Michael, notwithstanding his former wife. The iſſue was, that whiles the Father entertained one policie, the Sonne had two: the one for that Land of Eyen, the other to ſupplant His Father (who ſeemed to forget the Iaponian cuſtome, in their age to reliquithe the Government to the Sonne or Succellour.) This at laſt hee effected by his Fathers baniſhment firſt, and ſooner after his death, and now becoming of his wifes Religion, perſecuted the Chriſtians, and baniſhed the Ieſuites. Hee burnt or roaſted rather eight of his Subiects, after Saint Lawrence his example. And the Emperour himſelfe hath much diſtaſted the Ieſuites. The reaſon is not mentioned by the Ieſuites. But Captayne Sariſ then in Iapan, affirms, that a Ship of the Portugals coming from Macao, Ogasbasama ſent to haue ſome rarities bought for his vie: The Gouernour (I know not whether it were the King of Firando) moued the Ieſuites to effect the Emperours pleaſure; They ſaid they were Religious men, that belonged to the Captayne of the Ship. Hee being ſolicited, ſaid it belonged to the Maſter: the Maſter was asked, and answered, The Ieſuites ruled herein. Thus was the buſineſſe wound in a Circle, (they ſeeking it ſeemes to heighten the price) and the Emperour, whom the Emperour had ſent, accuſed the Ieſuites as being vnder the Cloake of Religion, Merchants. Hereupon He cauſed their Temples to be pulled downe, and all removed to Nimgaſeſicke and prohibited any Maſſe ſaying within five leagues of the Court: which whiles ſome preſumed in their zeale to tranſgreſſe; ſaying Maſſe in an Hoſpittall of Lepers within that Compaſſe, they were Crucified therefore, Captayne Sariſ in his journey to Sorunga met with ſome of their Churches thus taken downe, duers Iunkes being laden with them. For ſuch he the Iaponian building with joynts in their Timber, and without nayles, that it may eaſily be removed. The Reliques of theſe crucified perſons were reſeued as great Holies: as great Follies, I ſhould haue ſaid. And ſince, Maſter Cackes hath written that the Ieſuites are all baniſhed Iapan, and their Churches pulled downe and burnt. The Ieſuites had ſome goodly Colledges, as at Meaco, one of their Churches as large as the * Tower-Hill, whither the Children reſorted daily to their Schoole.

And before theſe dayes the Kings of Bingo, Arima, and Omur ſent their Embaſſadors to the Pope (then Gregorie the thirteenth) with Letters of deuotion to his Holineſſe, and had audience in the Conſiſtorie the thirte and euenieth day of March Ann. 1583. This was the Ieſuites policie (ſaith * Linſeſoten) to make the Iaponites to know the magnificence cence of Europe, and by that meanes principally to enrich themselves with Gifts and Priviledges. Howsoever, the Iaponites thought themselves hereby much obliged to the Pope, as by the Letter of Don Sancio, the King or Lord of Omur, and Prinsius of Arima to Pope Xistus 1590. appeareth. But for a farewell to these Iaponian Iesuites, I like their being there so well, that I could wish all of that societie were Preaching in that land, or acting the Scripture-stories vpon the Stage (which is one way of instructing the Iaponites) or, if you like that rather, a whipping themselves in their vaine-glorious Processions (which is another of their Iaponian Lectures) that so they might in some measure expiate the crimes of their European brethren; or any way else, so that our Europe were well ridde of such vermine.

Coray is a hundred leagues from Iapan by Sea, which is so troublesome, that in the five yeeres warres betwene the Iaponites and the Corayans, it swallowed about five hundred Ships. This Kingdome of Coray is an hundred leagues long, and threecore broad, tributary to China, and confining vpon the Tartars. They are good Archers, but not so good Souldiers as the Iaponians, nor so well weaponed; but better provided of Ships. Taicosama warred vpon it, both to make it his way (as was thought) to China, and especially that having subdued it, he might place the Kings his vassals in Iaponia there, so to possesse all that Iaponian state immediately himselfe.

Edoo.

There are to the North of Iapan neere to Sassuma certaine plentifull Ilands called Lingui; the Portugals name them Schieis, which by the King of Sassuma indeuot Cubo hath conquered, the King, Nobles, and a rich bootie taken. Formosa is a great barren Iland, betwixt Macar and Iapan, not farre from China, to which it is tributary, betwixt whom and the Iapanders haue bene late quarrels. Lewis Frois speaketh of a great Nation of wilde people to the North of Iapan, three hundred leagues from Meaco, which are clothed with Beasts skinned, with great beards and mustachoes; a people giuen to Wine, valiant, dreadfull to the Iaponites: they worship the Heaven: and other Religion they haue not. Captayne Saru was told at Edoo of an Ile called Yedzo North-west from Iapan, by one which said hee had bene there twice; that the people are hairy as Monkeys, and that further North there were small people of little stature. These of Yedzo were as tall as the Iaponians, with whom they haue continual traffique, hauing little apparell but from them. Of Corea hee was also told, that there are many bogges, for which caule they haue Waggonns with broad wheeles, to keepe them from sinking, and obseruing the Monson or season of the wind (of which you haue heard how certaine it comes yeerely in all the East) they haue sayles fitted to these Waggonns, and so make their Voyages on land. With such Waggonns full of Souldiers Taicosama (as he was told) had intended to assaile China, but was prevented by One, which to poison him, poisoned himselfe.

CHAP. XVI. Of the Philipina's.

Of the Spanish Ilands, and others adioyning.

It is already shew'd, that those Ilands receiued this name of Philip the second, King of Spaine, and that this name sometime is in a large sense attributed to all these Ilands in those huge Seas, but more properly to those which Legaspi discovered, in the yeere 1564. and where the Spaniards haue since that time had some places of abode; Mendanao, Tendaya, Luzon, and their neighbours, lying farre into the Sea before Cauinchina, and Cambaya, betwixt the seventh degree and the twentieth of Northerly latitude: but first of all other Tendaia was called Philippina, by the Spaniards, which discovered it out of New-Spaine 1542. as Iuan Guesan, one of them, Fruits, Birds, Beasts, Fishes, Gold; and enriched further with trade from China. Seuentie of these Ilands are Subiects or friends to the Spaniards. Of ancient time they were subiect (as some say) to the Chinois; but vntill they did voluntarily relinquish them: the cause of much Quill warre amongst themselves, that Avarchie prouing worse to them than a Tyrannie, or rather the worst tyrannie, every man becoming a Tyrant, and as hee had meanes of wit, strength, and followers, preying vpon others vining or selling them for slaues: which their diuisions made an easie way to the Spanish Conquest.

They worshipped the Sunne and Moone, obseruing in their honour solemne and sumptuous Feasts. In the Illocoes they worshipped the Deuill, and offered to him many Sacrifices in recompence of a great quantitie of Gold, which they said he had giuen them. Their Feasts and Sacrifices were done by women, which were Witches of them called Holgo reuerenced amongst them as Priests. These had ordinary talke with the Deuill, and many times in publicke. These wrought strange Witchcrafts; they answered vnto all Questions that were demanded of them: (although their Answers were often eyther Lyes or Riddles) they vied Lots as the Chinois, and were obseruers of times. If they beganne a Iourny, and met with a Lizard or other Worme, they would returne home, saying the Heauens prohibited their proceeding.

They haue now amongst them many Preachers and Monasteries of the Augustinians, Franciscans, and Iesuits. But the wicked life of the Spaniards is so offense to the Inhabitants, that the Discourser (himselfe a Friar) telleth here of a notable Story. A certayne Ilander soone after his Baptisme, died, and appeared after to many of his Countrey men, perswading them to be baptized, as a way vnto that happinesse, whereof hee now had in himselfe most blessed experience, onely they must be baptized, and obserue the Commandements, which the Spaniards preached to them; of whom, and of others like vnto them, there were in that happy place infinite numbers. Hereupon he vanished and some were perswaded: but others of them refused, saying, that seeing there were Spanish Soldiers in glory, they would not go thither, because they would not bee in their company. A like History Bartholom de las Casas relateth of a Westerne Indian, at the time of his death answering to a Dominicke Friar, which counselled him to dye a Christian, and so to bee capable of Heauen (when hee heard there were Spaniards in Heauen) hee would rather bee in Hell with his Fore-fathers, then in Heauen with the Spaniards.

The Spaniards haue their Bishop and Archdeacon, and besides other Religious, seuen Colledges of Iesuits. Botern sayeth, That the King of Spaine had thought to haue made Manila an Archbishopsicke, and added three other Archbishopsickes. Captaine Noot (a Dutchman that compassed the World) lost a ship here in fight with the Spaniards, and sunke one of theirs: he affirms, that the Conuers of these parts are more Popishly Christian, then in the midst of Rome or Spaine, and more addicted to their Superstitious follies.

In these Philippina's some caue and cut their skinn, with sundry streakes and deuices all ouer their body. Moreouer, as we haue spoken of Bals worne in their yards, (or Bels rather, for they make a loud ringing as they goe, if they wrap them not vp very close) by the men of Pegu: so heere, the men, and men-children amongst them haue nayles of Tin thrust quite thorow the head of their priuy part, being split in the lower end, and rusted, which is done when they be young, and the place groweth vp againe, without any great paine. They take it out, and put it in, as occasion serueth. This here, as that in Pegu, is said to haue bene practised to auoid the sinne of Sodomy, whereto before they were prone. The Males also are (at least in some of the Philippina's) circumcised. The people worship the Deuill, who oft times appeareth to them in conference, in most vgly and monstros shape. There is amongst them an Iland of Negro's, inhabited with blacke people, almost as bigge as England, in nine degrees.

Here also bee those blacke people called Ospapnai, Man-eaters and Sorcerers, among whom Deuils walke familiarly, as companions. If these wicked Spirits find one alone they whom Deuils walke familiarly, as companions. If these wicked Spirits find one alone they whom Deuils walke familiarly, as companions. If these wicked Spirits find one alone they whom Deuils walke familiarly, as companions.

Like indinao, Mindanao, or Vendenao is a great Iland, containyng by Iuan Gaetan obseruation, three hundred and foure score leagues in compass. It is inhabited of Moores and Gentiles: there are many Kings. In stead of bread they vse Rice and Sagu. There is Pepper, Ginger, and Gold singularly good. Tendaia enuironeth a hundred and sixty leagues, from twelue to fifteene degrees of latitude; the people Idolatrous; abound with Pepper, Ginger, Gold, and Mynes.

When as Magellan, first of all men, by the West discovered these Easterne Ilands, in the Ilands of Burthoon and Caleghan, hee could learne no other Religion obserued amongst them, but that lifting vp their hands closed together, and their face towards Heauen, they called on their God by the name of Abba. In Zubut (in token of friendship) hee and the King did let themselves bloud on the right arme, for so was their wont to confirme leagues of amity. The King had his skinn painted with a hot Iron Penill: he and his people at Magellan's perwasion were baptized; and burned their Idols, which were made of hollow wood, with great faces and foure teeth, like Bores tuskes in their moulies: painted they were all ouer, but had only a forepart, and nothing behind.

They weare in their yard a nayle of Gold. They had many wiues, but one principally. They observed many Ceremonies in killing a Hogge, in Sacrifice, as it seemed, to the Sunne. After the founding of their Cymbals, and certaine Cates set downe in platters, two old women came forth with Trumpets or Pipes of Reed, and did reuerence to the Sunne, and then clothing themselves with sacred Veltments, one of them put about her fore-head a haire-lace with two hornes, holding another heire-lace or skarfe in her hand, and sobeganne to found, daunce, and call vpon the Sunne, wherein she is followed by the other, both of them in this manner dancing about the Hogge, which is there fast tyed. The horned Beldame still muttereth certaine words, to the Sunne, and the other answereth her: then doth she take a cup of wine, and after some Ceremonies powreth it on the Hogge: and after that with a Lance, after dances and flourishes, she killeth the Hogge. All this while a little Torch is burning, which at last she taketh into her mouth, and by teth it: and the other woman washeth the Pipes with the Swines blood, and with her finger embrewed with blood, marketh the fore-head of her husband first, and then of the rest. Then doe they vntire themselves, and onely with women associates, eate the cheate in the platters: and after singe the Hogge, and eat him. Without these Ceremonies they eat no Swines flesh.

From hence Magellan went to Mathan, where in a battle with the Ilanders he was slaine. In Pulaoan they keepe Cockes for the game, but eate not of their flesh, forbidden by their Superstitions. In Ciumbubon they found a tree, which had leaues like thole of the Mulberry, hauing besides on each side of the leafe, as it were, two feete, with which (as if it had bene mouing and sensible) it would stirre and goe vp and downe. Pigafetta kept one eight dayes in a platter, and when he touched it, presently it would flee from him, and moue vp and downe: he thought it liued of the ayre.

In Burneo the people are partly Moores, and partly Gentiles, and according to their Religions, haue two Kings and two Royall Cities, situated in Salt-water. The Moores when they kill a Hen or a Goat, vse first certayne words to the Sunne. The Gentiles worship the Sunne and Moore, esteeming the one Male and the other Female, him the Father, this the Mother of the Stars, whom also they reckon in the catalogue of their Demi-gods. They salute the Sun in his morning-approach, with certaine Verses and adoration: which they also performe to the Moore, and demand of them children, riches, and other their necessities. After death they expect no future state. The Spaniards heard of great Pearles as bigge as Egges, which the King of Burneo had: and if you beleue them, they tooke an Oyster themselves, whose fishie substance weighed seuen and fortie pounds. The Moore King in Burneo was serued in his Palace, and attended only by women and Maydens.

In Gilolo they are likewise, some of the Arabian Sect, the others Gentiles, The Moores had two Kings of their Law, each of which had fixe hundred children, The Gentiles vied to worship the first thing they encounter in the morning all the day following. They were sometime man-eaters: some of the Ilanders were by the Portugals conuered: but the King being poysoned by a Mahumetan, they declined. Yet one Nobleman named Iohn, first killing his wife and children with his owne hands, left they should apostatize, and then offered himselfe to endure any torment.

§. II.

Of the Molucces, Banda, Amboyna, and Selebes.

The Molucces are vsually reckoned fixe (as before is said) but many other Ilands are subject to them, and by some Authours called also by that name. The King of Ternate is said to haue twenty Ilands vnder his subiection, and in his Port representeth great Maiesty. Both heere and in Banda the Mahumetan Superstition hath set footing, and preuayled, as in the other adioyning Ilands, the Moores being as zealous to winne Profitables, as to enrich themselves. None of these Ilands is above fixe leagues in compass, enriched with Cloues, but of other fruits barren and poore. One tree they haue, which out of the cot branches yeldeth a white, wholsome, and sauourie liquor for drinke; they call it Tanaca, and the pith thereof affordeth them meate called Saga, tasting in the mouth like sowre Curds, melting like Sugar, whereof they make certayne Cakes, which will endure good for food ten yeeres.

HONDIVS his Map of the Indian Ilands:

The Clouie-trees not onely sucke vp all the moysture of the Earth where they grow, dis-40 dayning any other plant should grow neere them (like our Incolfers) suddenly drinking vp all the Heavens liberality in showres, but with their thirsty appetite intercept the running waters that descend from the Mountaines, before they can betake them to their Mothers lap, the Oceans refuge. In this Iland * are said to bee men having ankles with spurs like to Cockes; here are Hogges with hornes: a River stored with fish, and yet so hot, that it flayeth off the skin of any creature which entereth it: Oysters so large, that they Christen in the shels: Crabs so strong, that with their clawes they will breake the Iron of a Pick-axe: stones which grow like fish, whereof they make Lime.

In * Ternate is Mountayne, which (as it were) angry with Nature, for being fastned to the earth, doth not only lift vp his high head above the Ayrie Regions of cloudes, but ende-50 uoureth also to conioyne it selfe with the fery Element, wherewith it seemeth to hold some entercourse, with dreadfull thunders, belching out light flames mixed with a darke smoke, like proud Greatnesse, waisting it selfe with it owne flames, and filling the neighbouring valley with ashes. It is not much above a hundred yeeres, since first the Sect of Mahumet en-tred the Moluccas. But now * both heere and in Amboino the Iesuits have their Residences, and have perswaded many to their Catholike Faith, and whipping Precessions. Stephan ab 7 Hagan in the yeere 1605, wanne this Iland of Amboino, and the Fort of the Portugals, to the States: it is a Clouie-Iland. The King of Ternate is Mahumetan.

In * Ternate there is neuer suffered unpomished: the Hollanders saw a Boy of eleven or twelve yeeres, for stealing a leafe of Tobaccho, led vp and downe with his hands bound be-60 hind him, for a publike spectacle and derision to other Boyes. They mayntaine deadly wars with the Portugals, and spare none of them that they can get. If an Eclipse of the Sunne or Moone happen, they howle and make piteous lamentation, perswading themselves, that

that their King, or some great man amongst them will dye. Experience thereof was the sixe of August 1599. when the Moone was eclipsed about eight of the clocke as night, they every way by crying out, by strange gestures, praying and beating their Balons and Drummes, expressed a lamentable passion of griefe, for the feare aforesaid. And the eclipse being past, when they see that neither the King, nor any other is dead, they observe the next day solemnely by festiuall with publike Procession of old and young of all sorts. They esteemed it a Miracle when the Hollanders told them that there were in their Country which could prognosticate of Eclipses long before. Columbus v^{sed}, the like simplicity of the Iamaicans to his persuasion: for when they forooke him, hee threatned vnto them the anger of God, whereof they should see an euident token in the darkening of the Moone within two dayes, which according to the naturall reuolution of the Heauens (knowne to Columbus) comming to passe, the Ilanders with dread and feare shewed all readinesse to his Seruice. The conceits of the Mooones Eclipse haue bene diuers, some Indians thinking that hee was whipped by the Sun till the blood followed: the Greekes attributing the same to Thesalian Charmes, for remedy whereof, they v^{sed} to beat on Instruments of Brasse, and lighted Torches, and cast fires vp towards Heauen. And the Athenians persecuted naturall Philosphers and Meteoricgianns, as aduersaries to Diuinitie, as appeareth in Diagoras Protagoras, and Socrates, till Plato brought them to another mind. Plutar. Nicias.

The water about Ternate is so cleere, that they fish by the eye, and can see the Anchors in the bottome of the water, at sixteene or seuentene fathome deepe, as if it were but a foot: and espy euery fish which passeth, to no small aduantage of their fishing.

When the King goeth to the Mesquit, a Boy goeth before, which beareth his Sword on his shoulder, and in the other hand a Kid: after him follow the Kings Souldiers. After them another with a Censer. Next to whom cometh the King with a Turefold ouer his head, to keepe off the Sunne. When they are come to the doores, there are vessels of water to wash their hands and feete, before they enter; and then the floor is couered with white cloth, whereon they prostra e themselves, with their faces to the earth, softly mumbling their Mumpsimus deuotions. In the middelt is a Pulpit spread with white cloth. In stead of a Bell, they haue a great Drum hangd vp, which they beate with Clubs. They haue in euery Temple also one Bell, but without a clapper. All come at that peale, or sound, with their weapons armed.

The Moluccians e are better proportioned then other Indians, haue more beard, (which the elder men nourish and weare long for their greater authority) browne of colour, and meane of stature. For valour they haue not their like in all India, especially those of Ternate, chusing rather to dye then flee, and esteeming it a great credit to fight against greater multitudes. Their shields are of wood two spans broad, and 4. foot long. They are exceedingly addicted to sloth and ease, none working in any Handicraft; their houses are of Timber and Reeds, without one nayle in them, which their slaues build, and doe also their other labours. They haue no money, and the siluer which they haue is employed to vessels of plate. Their riches are their Cloues, wherewith they prouide them of other necessities. They neuer see their wiue till they are married; nor the wiues them. Makian and Maber are now subiect to the King of Ternate; Tidore and Batian haue their peculiar Kings. This people haue the power to elect their King, so that they chosse one of the Royall and ancient Family. The King of Ternate calleth himselfe King of Gilolo, whereof hee hath but a part, and that by conquest. The birds of Paradise (saith this Authour) haue two feet as well as other Birds; but as loone as they are taken, they are cut off, with a great part of their body, whereof a little is left with the head and necke, which being hardned and dried in the Sunne, seeme to be so bred. The Moores ⁴ made the Ilanders beleue that they came out of Paradise, and therefore call them Mannuedata, or holy Birds, and haue them in religious account. They are very beautifull, with varietie of feathers and colours.

Amboyra bringeth forth Oranges, Citrons, Lemmons, Cloues, Coquos, Bonanas, Sugar-canes, and other fruits, being a very fertile Iland. The Inhabitants are simple, liue sparingly, and are attired like other the Moluccans. They spend much Rice, whereof they make loaves like Sugar-loaves. They haue Gallies e after their manner, formed like Dragons, which they row very swiftly: they call them Karkellen. The Admirall came to the Hollanders with three of these, full of armed men, which rowed round about them, expressing manifold Peecces of Ordnance in euery Galley, which they discharged, answered in that kinde by the Hollanders. But two of the Holland ships not finding sufficient store of Commodities for them all, went to Banda, passing by Poel Setto, an Iland not inhabited, bearing North-west from Banda five Dutch miles. They say it is inhabited of Deuils, and whosoever must passe by, maketh all possible haste to be gone, much affrighted eyther by selfe-fancies, or Deuillish Impostures.

Banda is foure and twentie dutch miles from Amboyna, and diuided into three parts, which comprehend five miles. The chiefe Citie is Nera. In this Iland are more store or Nutmegs then elsewhere in the Moluccas: for which cause they resort hither from Iaua, China, and Malacca. They professe Mahometisme so deuoutly, that they neuer goe to their watches before they haue prayed in the Melsquit, whereinto they enter, being first washed (after the Mahometane manner) but pray so lowd, that they may bee heard a great distance: their wordes of prayer are Steffersolla, Steffersolla; Asebad an la, Asebad an la; The, Asebad an la; Tl lolla, yll lolla, Mahumed die Rosulla: At the pronouncing of which last wordes, they stroke their hands ouer their face; in which gesture they thinke is much holinesse. Other prayers they mutter ouer very softly, with little mouing their lips. They stand vpon Mats, and lift vp their eyes twice or thrice to heauen: after which they kneele downe, bowing their head twice or thrice to the earth. Thus they doe often euery day, both at home and in the streets. They haue their publike meetings and bankets in their Temples very often, euery one bringing his part of the cheere: which sometimes they doe in the woods a hundred in a companie. At these times they consult of publike affaires.

They haue ciuill warres, Nera and Lantoor holding together against three other Townes. Two little Ilands, Polleruain and Poelvunay take part with Nera, and when occasion requirerh, come thither with their boates to consultation, where they are entertayned in publike feasts: the manner whereof is, that they sit downe in order; in stead of a table euery one hath a peece of a leafe of the Bonanas Tree: then is set before each a peece of Sagu bread, after that, a dish made of the leafe of another Tree, with a little sodden Rice and Fleish-pottage, which they hurle by handfulls into their mouthes, deuouring rather then eating the same. In the meanewhile the Gentlemen arise with their weapons, and exercise themselves in Martiall games, with Daunces. The quarrell betwixt these Ilanders grew about the cutting of certayne Trees, from whenceir is come to cut and kill one another with cruell butcherie. They exercise Sea-fights in their Caracore, or Galeots, with great dexterity, with great showts and cryes, the Gentlemen dancing on the hatches very actiuelly. They are very bloodie and barbarous, yet bury the heads of their enemies with sweet odours. If any of their friends die, the women make a shrill and lowd crye to call him againe; which not effected, they prouide a great feast, whereunto all the kindred and friends are inuited. They burye them almost after our fashion, in a white sheet, the corps being carried on mens shoulders, the men first, and women after, following. A Censer is there left fuming all the day and night; and in the night they keepe a light burning in a little house, which they haue set ouer the graue. In the morning and euening all of all sorts come and say their prayers a long while together at the graue: and being asked wherefore they said, that the dead should not arise againe. They haue a play with the Ball, exercised by many of them, not as amongst vs with the hand, but with their feete, tossing the same vp into the ayre, and taking it one of another with admirable sleight. Thus haue we related from Dutch testimonies.

In Banda the Hollanders are reported to haue foure Factories, and three Castles. They are farre more feared of the Natiues then loued. They raysed a Fort neere to one of their Melsquids or Temples, to the prophanation (as they thought) of their holy ground, and of the Sepulchres of their dead, which for this cause they spared not. Hence did the Bandefes burne with indignation, which yet they concealed, and with goodly protestations desired the Dutch Generall Verhauf, which was there at that time with many ships, to come into their House, or place of Councell. This was compassed with Trees and Bushes, in the midst hauing a faire round place, where they sate vpon Mats, their chiefe Magistrate being the Sabandare. Verhauf promised to come, and when hee was by one of his Country-men, that had long continued there, admonished of the trecherie of this people. Hee yet scorned to feare, and with some three hundred followers at the appointed houre marched thither. The Xeriff (one of Mahomets kindred, wearing, as note hereof, greene in his Turbant) which had before inuited him to this assembly, with all lowly semblance meetes him, tells that in such armed troups they shall not dare to speake their mindes. He presently commands his Souldiers to stay, tooke with him some two and forrie chiefe men, entred and sate downe with the Bandefe Senate, cross-legged, a Bandefe and a Hollander together, and so through all the companie. At the watch word each Bandefe stabbed his neighbour Dutch, and presently the Generals head was smitten off, and carried out to his Souldiers, now busie in playing, or otherwise idle, their peeces lying on the ground: and in this case they were suddenly assaulted by an ambush, hidden there in the Thickets, and were in great danger to haue lost their Fort. The English in their ships might see the fight. In another place the Hollanders turned one of their Melsquids into a Fort. The offended Bandefes offered their slaues liberie to dispossesse them: they refused, till a Iauan Merchant (then there with his Iunke) offered him ten slaues aboard his Iunke to giue the onsets. Thus they went about three hundred, each man with a fire-fire-brand in one hand, and a creefe in the other, adventured on the flot, and soone fired the Fort over their heads, slaying every man.

These Islands of Banda are subiect (as some, but vtruelly, report) to the King of Botone, with whom one M. Richard Welding, an Englishman, was in great fauour. The King had a sonne which was mad, whom a certaine Italian vndertaking to cure, was sent to attend him in the other World, his patient dying vnder his hand. M. Welding had serued him in his warres, and gotten victories for him, and honour for himselfe and his Nation.

It is reported, that lately neere to the Hollanders Fort in Banda, there issued a great fire out of the Sea; which continued a good space, and was likely to have fired the Hollanders Fort, the Natives wayting for such oportunitie, but by shifting of the winde it escaped. The Sea in that fired place was many many fathomes deeper then it had beene before. But our English haue since this was published, enioyed not only commerce but Forts and Dominion by voluntary subiection of the Bandanese themselves; the cause of great warres twixt the Dutch and ours: the particulars whereof you may see at large in my Booke of Voyages.

The Hollanders and the Spaniards are in continuall warres for these Molucca Islands. They droue out the Portugals by force about ten yeeres since, but the Spaniards haue succeeded in the quarrell, which yet is managed on both parts, so as the Natives haue the worst. For they both wear out the Country people in warres, which betwene Tidore and Ternate are ancient (by these bellows kindled into continuall flames) that there are scarcely sufficient to gather their Cloues. Machian yields the most flore: in the third yeere (which is most plentiful) about 1800. Bahars; on other yeeres almost cleuen hundred.

The Spaniards haue a Castle on Ternate, another on Tidore, in Gelolo also and Battachina two others, but the Hollanders haue three in Terenate, and as many in Tidore, one in Amboyna, one in Battachina, in Batclame one, in Botoone two Bulwarkes, in Mecame three, in Mouter one; besides their other Indian Forts, and all their Factories. They haue their wiuces also to helpe man (if that name may bee giuen to women) their Fortresses in some places. Their Sea-force and Land-vice being added, make them dreadful to the Spaniard, hateful to the Indians, and for their insolence, distastefull to the English, vnder pretence of I know not what conquest, stiffly denying, terribly threatening, disgracefully deprauing the English, vnder whose name they haue yet borne themselves in many places of the Indies, and with mayne force and violence binding the Natives to their owne trade, and that at lower prices and harder conditions; which makes them loue the more liberrall, though imperious and proud spirit of the Spaniard, more then that accounted sordid dealing of the Flemming, in the Moluccas and Banda Islands.

Before we leaue these Moluccas and their dependant Islands, we may conclude with a Tragedy, wherein blind superstition, and beastly cruelty, were principall Agitors. When Menesius was Gouernour of the Portugall Fort in Ternate, he kept a Sow, which some of the deuout Mahumetans killed. He getting the chiefe Priest (accessorie to the fact) into the Castle, at his deliuerie made his face bee greased with Bacon by the Tylor, which caused the people to offer abuse to some Portugals. Menesius in reuenge cut off the hands of two of them, the third had his hands bound behinde him, and was bayted with two dogges on the Sea-shore: which his implacable enemies transported him into like dogged humour (though he were not with Hecuba transformed into the shape:) in foomch, that fastening with his teeth on one of their eares, he held fast, till his strength fayling, hee sunke into the Sea with the Dogge, and was drowned.

In Celebes they cate mans flesh. The King of the Moluccas was wont to send condemned persons to Celebes, to be deuoured. Nicolaus Nannes writeth, that Celebes is very large, and containeth many and great Islands: the Soyle is exceeding fertile; the Inhabitants comely and tall, rather ruddie then blacke. They haue many Kings; which is cause of many contentions. Three of them were conuerted, Peter Mascarenia, in a Letter dated a thousand five hundred sixtie nine, speaketh of a King of Sion in Celebes, which was baptized, and his subiects therefore rebelled against him, one Towne only except; and that hee and the King of Sanguim did take vp a Crosse on their owne shoulders, which the chiefe Men had before heuen of a faire piece of wood, and helped to erect the same; and then, with the multitude kneeling downe, worshipped it.

Southward of Celebes, is situated a little Island, where Sir Francis Drake graued his ship. This Island is thoroughly growne with Woods; in which, every night certayne fierce Flies made such a light, as if every Twigge or Tree had beene a burning Candle. Here they found Bats as bigge as Hennes, and plentie of Cray-fishes so great, that one wvould suffice foure men to their dinner: they digged themselves holes in the earth, like Conies.

At Macassar in this Island is an English Factorie. In this Island some are Moores, some Etniques. They enuenome their Arrow-heads (which are made of Fish-bones) with an incurable incurable poyson. There are Priests, which conforme, or rather deforme themselves, to the habit of women; noursing their haire on the head, and plucking it out of the face. They gild their teeth, and vie broken, wanton, effeminate gestures. They are called Beces, and marrie one another. For them to lye with a woman, is capitall, and punished with burning in pitch. These Men-Monsters, Women-Daills, much hindered the Portugals Conversions.

§. III.

Of the Ilands, and other adioyning Ilands.

NOr farre from hence is Iaua; of which name, M. Paulus and Nich. de Conti, reckon two great Ilands; ascribing to the one, two thousand; and to the other, three thousand miles in circuit. The lesse is neere to the firme Land of the South Continent, where Beach, and some other Prouinces, are named by Paulus and Pertanmannus, of Heathenish superstitions. The lesse Iaua had, in the dayes of M. Paulus; eight Kingdomes; in sixe of which, himselfe had bene, which bee nameth Felich; wherine the rurall Inhabitants were Idolaters; the Citizens, Moores: the Idoll-worshippers eat any flesh whatsoeuer, of man, or beast, and obserue all day what they first see in the morning. Basma the second, acknowledged the Great Chams souerainrie, but payed him no tribute. Here were certayne Vnicornes, headed like Swine, footed like an Elephant, with one horne on their forehead (with which they doe not hurt any, but to that end vie certayne prickles that grow on their tongues:) They delight also in the myre, like Swine. Here are little Apes, much resembling men in their countenance, which they vsed to prelerue with certayne Spices, hauing stayed off their skins, and left the haire growing in those parts, where Nature cauleth men to be hayrie, and sell them to Merchants, to be carried over the World as the bodies of little men; happily the onely true Pygmies the world yeeldeth. In Samara, the third of those Kingdomes, none of the North-stares can bee seene. They are Man-eaters, and Idolaters; but not so brutish, as in Dragorian, the next Kingdome; where, if a man bee sicke, his kinmen consult with their Sorcerers, who enquire of the Deuill, Whether he shall escape, or no? And if the answer bee Negative, they send for certayne men, specially designed to that villanous mysterie, which strangle him; and then they dresse and eate him amongst the kindred, euen to the very marrow in his bones. For (say they) if any flesh should remayne, it would purrifie, and wormes would breeds thereof; which after (for want of sustenance) would perish, whereby the soule of the dead partie would be much tormented. The bones they burie safely, that no beast should touch them; such dread haue they of beasts and crueltie, in a more then beastly crueltie, and such a care to obserue humanitie and pietie in a most impious inhumanitie. Lambri, the next Kingdome, hath in it some men with tayles, like Dogs; a span long. The last is Fanfur, where they live of bread made of pits of Trees, the wood whereof is heauie, and sinketh to the botome, if it be put in water, like Iron; and therefore they make Lances thereof, able to pierce Armour; for it is three fingers thick betwixt the hollow and the barke.

To let passe Pentan, Sondar, and other Idolatrous Ilands, and come to Iaua maior: This Countrey is very rich; but in times past, of most abominable auiditie. Nich. Conti saith, That they feede on Cats, Rats, and other vermine, and were most vile murderers; not flieking to make triall of the good cutting or thrust of their blades on the next body they met with, and that without punishment; yea (if the blow or thrust were deliuered with fine force) with much commendation. Veretmannus affirmeth of them, That some obserue Idols, some the Sunne or Moone, others an Oxe, and many the first thing they meete in the morning, and some worship the Deuill. When men were old, and not able longer to worke, their children or parents carried them into the Market, and sold them to others, which did eate them. And the like they vsed with the younger sort in any desperate sicknesse, preventing Nature with a violent death, and esteeming their bellies fitter Sepulchres then the earth; accounting others fooles, which suffered the wormes to deuoure so pleasant foode. For feare of these Man-eaters, they stayed not long there. It semeth, that they haue much left their brutish customes; since, wonne to more ciuilitie, by trading of the Moores and Christians, especially such as are of the Arabian law: although, as our owne Countrey-men report, which haue there liued, a mans life is valued to the murderer at a small summe of money. They are a proud Nation. If a man should come in, where they are set on the ground after their manner, and should sit on a Chieft, or high thing, it were as much as his life were worth. The King of Bantam breaking promise with the Hollanders, when they obiected it, My tongue (he answered) is not of Bone.

waterish, that their Buffals and men goe almost knee-deepe, when they sow it. Atosbay is the chiefe Citie. They are theuſt, and giuen to ſpoyle, and captiued many of the Hollanders, which went thither on ſhoare, to buy commodities ; which they were forced to redeeme at a deere rate. In theſe partes, are Battes as bigge as Hennes, which the people roſt and eate.

The Iland Baly is Eaſt from Iaua, very populous, containyng (as is thought) ſixe hundred thouſand Inhabitants ; they are Ethnikes, and worſhip that which they firſt meet in the morning. Heere and in Polo Roſſa the Women are burned with their dead Husbands : one man is ſaid to haue had ſixtie of his Wiues (for they marrie as many as they pleaſe) burned with him, whiles the Hollanders were there. The Iland hath many Bulls, Buffals, Goates, Swine, Horſe, with many kindes of Fowles, Fruits, and Metals : The chiefe men are carried by ſlaues on Seats borne on their ſhoulders, or elle in Chariots drawne with Buffals.

In the Voyage of Maſter Thomas Candlish¹ is mention made of a Iauan King, called Raja Ballamboam, very aged, in which had a hundred Wiues, and his Sonne had ſixtie. Their cuſtome is, that when the King dyeth, they burne the body, and preſerue the aſhes. Tuedayes after, the wiues of the dead King goe to a place appointed, and there ſee which was deereſt in his fauour, throweth a ball from her ; and where that ball reſteth, thither they goe all, and turning their faces Eaſtward, ſtabbe themſelues with a Criſe or Dagger to the heart. They are very reſolute people, and dread no attempe which the King ſhall enioyne them, bee it neuer ſo dangerous. All the race of this King Ballamboam was rased and utterly destroyed by the Paſſaruan, after a long ſiege : which warre was begun in the blood of the King of Ballamboam Daughter, whom he ſlew, as is before ſaid, and added this Drunkenneſſe vnto his thoſt.

Jortam, or Joartam, containeth about a thouſand Houſholds. The Inhabitants are Ethnikes, and haue their Temples in Woods ; to which they reſort, to ſay and doe their Holies ; none, before their deformed Diuell-formed Pagodes. In this Citie dwelleth the chiefe Pope, or heigh Prielt, of that Superſtition, whole authoritie is great in all theſe partes. Hee was a hundred and twentie yeeres old, and had many Wiues which nourished him with their milke, being not able to take other ſuſtenance : a deadly enimie to the Chriſtians, whom the King did yet with ſome priuiledges fauour.

Edmond Scott writeth, That they vie in Bantam martiall Law : Adulterie is death. The free Iauan muſt to every wiſe keepe ten women-ſlaues, which are their Concupiſces alſo ; ſome keepe forcie : but they may haue but three Wiues. They are proud, and (by this multitude of ſlaues) poore ; cruell, and cowardly. Their Criſes or Daggers are two foot long, waued Indenture-fashion ; and poiſoned, that few eſcape. The vulgar ſort haue little Religion : but many pray to the Diuell (whom for that end they haue painted in their houſes, and ſet Wax Candles, and ſing before them) for feare of hurt, which they doe not to God, becauſe of his goodneſſe. The moſt of their worke, is to carue ſtickes for their Criſe-handles. They are Coizeners, Theues, Idle, Gluttons take Betrele, Opium, Tobacco. They haue diuers Sects ; yet moſt are in manner Atheiſts. Many Chinois dwell there. Some thinke, that if they bee good, they ſhall be borne againe after death to great riches ; and that wicked men ſhall bee turned into Toades, or other vgly beaſts. Every New Moone they burne Sacrifices, and ſing over them certayne Prayers, in the meane while tinging a Bell, which at the end of every Prayer they ring out ; which is alſo their Paſſing-Bell Ceremony, when any are ready to die. They furniſh their Altars with Goats, Hennes, Duckes, ſometimes raw, and ſometimes ready dreſſed ; all which they eate : onely certayne papers, painted and cut out in curious workes, they burne. Many of them haue ſome ſkill in Aſtronomie. They keepe no Sabbath ; but what day they begin any great worke, they after keepe holy. They haue South-ſeyers, which ſometimes runne up and downe the ſtreets like mad-men, with ſwords in their hands, tearing their haire, and throwing themſelues againſt the ground. Chinois cut not their haire, for then they may not returne to China. They buy ſlaues, and get Children of them, which they carrie with them to China, but ſell the Mother. The Moores, if they be Great men, haue Moſchetes in their owne houſes : they haue one great one in the Citie. Foreinners (whereof are many from many places) inhabite the Suburbes. They buy by night diſtilled Wines of the Chinois, and drinke it ſecretly, being forbidden it by their Mahumetane Law. It was about the yeere 1560. that this people became of that Sect. The men and women paſſe their time day and night in much ſloath, dalliance, and chewing Betrele, Epiouri de grege porci.

Samatra is esteemed by some ^a the greatest of the Easterne Islands, stretching it selfe almost seven hundred miles in length, in bredth about two hundred. The Ayre is not very whollome, by reason of the situation vnder the Line, and the multitude of Lakes and Rivers, whereout the Sun drinketh more then he can well concoct, and therefore (as it were) belcheth out heere continually such crude and vndigested vapours. Their food is Millet, Rice, Sagu, and Fruits, Their riches are Pepper, Ginger, Cassia, Silke, Beniyoyn, Gold, Tinne, Iron, &c. The Kingdome of Campa yeeldeth Trees, whose pith or marrow is Aloe, which is prized in India at the like weight (some say) of Gold; the Barke is called Aquila. In the Sea-coast they are Moores in Religion, and so haue been about these last two hundred yeeres: vp, within Land, they are Pagans; and in many places, as in the Kingdomes of Andragiri and Aru, they are Man-eaters. They were diuided, before the Portugals entred India, into nine and twentie Kingdomes, whereof the chiefe was Pedir, after that Pacem, and now Acem. For Abraham, sometime a Slaue, since King of Acem, hath conquered almost all the North part of the Iland, and with helpe from the Turke and the Arabians, distresth sometimes the affaires of Malacca. This King ^b gaue in marriage with his Daughter, to the King of Ior, a Peeces Ornance, such as for greatnesse, length, and workmanship, can hardly bee matched in all Christendome. Heere is a ^c Hill, called Balaluannu, which continually burneth; and a Fountaine (as is reported) which runneth pure Balsome. Some ^d thinke, that this was Chersoneusus Aures of the Ancients.

Galuanu ^e writeth, That at the Bacut, or Man-eaters in the Mountaines of Samatra, gild their teeth, and esteeme the flesh of blacke people sweeter then of the white. The flesh of their Kine, Buffs, and Hennes, is as blacke as Inke. They say, that there are certaine people there called Daragu Dara, which haue tayles like to Sheepe. Heere is said also to grow a Tree, the iuyce whereof is strong poyson, and if it touch the blood of a man, killeth him, but if a man drinke of it, it is a soueraigne Antidote. As for those tayled people (a fable by Becket's Legend ^f reported of some Kemish-men, iniurious to that angrise Saint, and after applyed to our whole Nation; many indeed esteeming the English to bee tayled.) Galuanu affirmeth, That the King of Tidore told him, that in the Ilands of Batto-China there were some which had tayles, hauing also a thing like vnto a duggie betwene their coddies, out of the which there came Milke.

Nicols de Conti ^g saith; in his time the Samatrans were all Gentiles, and the Man-eaters amongst them vsed the skulls of their eaten enemies in stead of money, exchanging the same for their necessities; and he was accounted the richest man, which had most of those skulls in his house. In Vertomannus time they had money in Pedir, marked on the one side with a Di, ^h well, on the other with a Chariot, drawne with Elephants. Their Religion (see faith) is the same with those of Tarnassari, burning their Wiues in like manner. The inhabitants are cunning Artificers, Merchants, and Saylers: their Ships haue at each end a Prow, which with marvellous agilitie they can dispose for wards, or backwards, making vse of the same, according to the diuersitie of Wind and Channell, which there are very changeable.

In Acens ⁱ are Melquits of Timber and Reed, with Vessels of water at the entrie, for them to walk, according to the Arabian custome. The King comes little abroad, nor may any goe to him, except he be sent for by an Officer with a gilded staffe or dagger. To his Palace they passe through seven Gates one after another, guarded with Women expert at their Weapon and vsing both Peeces and Swords, He hath none other Guard for his person. In saluting the King, ^h they lay their hands folded on their head, which in other salutations they lay on the forehead.

Sultan Aladin the King, was (as Cornelius Houtmann reporteth) first a Fisher-man, and growing famous for his exploits by Sea, was preferred to the image of the Kings kinwoman, and the Office of Admirall. Afterward, he became Princeps of the young King (the former being dead) but proued his murder, and sent a thousand of the chiefe men to follow him into the other world, ennobling base fellows of his Conspiracie, and vsurped the State to himselfe. He was supposed an hundred yeeres ^k old; so old, that his eldest Son (whom he kept at home with him, hauing made his younger King of Pedir) imprisoned him, ^l alledging, that he was too old for Government, & warred on his Brother. Our English first ^m had Trade here in the last times of Queene Elizabeth, whose name was then famous in those parts for her exploits against the Spaniards. The Queenes Letters, directed to this King, were received with great State. First, he entertained the Messenger with a Banquet, gaue him a Robe, and a piece of Calico wrought with gold, and offered Pledges for the Generals safetie; for whom he sent six Elephants, with Drums, Trumpets, Streamers, and much people. The greatest Elephant, being thirteene or fourteene foot high, and a small Castle, like a Coach, covered with Velvet on his backe: in the midst whereof, was a great Balon of Gold, with a rich Couering of Silke, wherein the Letter was put. The Generall was mounted on another Elephant, but was staid at the Court-gate, till the Kings pleasure and licentie was againe sent. The King made him a Feast; the dishes were of Gold or Tambayck (which is mixt of Gold and Brasse) their Wine is of Rice, in which the King dranke to the Generall out of his Gallery (a fathom higher then where they sate) it is as strong as Aqua vita. After the Feast, the Kings Damocels made Musick and Dances: which was a great fauour; for they are not commonly seene. The chiefe Prelate was appointed one of the Commissioners for Articles of League, which were concluded. They tooke a Prize of 9. hundred Tuns, and were like to be taken themselves by a strange Spout (as they call it) which fell not farre from them (as in one whole drop, enough to haue sunke any ship; and sometimes continueth a quarter of an houre together, as powred out of a vessel) the Sea boyling therewith. The King sent a Letter and a Present to the Queene: and at their departure asked, if they had the Palmes of Dauid, and caused them to sing one; which, he and his Nobles concluded with a Psalm (as he said) for their prosperitie.

The Court hath three Guards, betweene each of which is a great Greene. The King may see all that come, himselfe vnseene. The walls of his house are hanged sometimes with Cloth of Gold, Velvet, or Damaske. He sits crosse-legged, with foure Crisles, two before, and two behind, very rich. Fortie Women attend him with Fannes, Cloathes, Singing, and other Offices. Hee eateth and drinketh all day, or clewning Befeale and Areeca, talking of Venerie and Cock-fighting. When they would doe reuerence (which we vse to performe by vncouering the head) they put off their hose and shoes, holding the palmes of the hands together, and lifting them aboue the head, with bending of the body, and saying, Doulat. They vse not to put malefactors to death, but cut off their hands and feet, and banish them to the Ile Polowey: and if they execute them, it is by Elephants tearing them, or thrusting a stake in their fundament. This King had an hundred Gallies; of which, some will carry four hundred men: open, without decke; their Oares like shouels, foure foot long, rowed with one hand. A woman was Admirall; he not daring, through selfe-guiltinesse, to trust men.

They had many differing Dignities and Degrees for their Clergie; vsed to pray with Beads; had Schooles: they had one Prophet, disguised in his apparell, whom they much honoured. They bury their Dead in the fields, with their head towards Mecca, laying a free stone at the head, and another at the feet, with signification what the deceased had bene. The Kings haue them, not of Stone, but of Gold: and this King had two made for him, each weighing a thousand pound, enriched with Stones. They haue a tradition, that Achen is Ophir. Once every yeere they obserue a solemne cetemonie of going to Church, to see if Mabomet bee come. Then are there fortie Elephants richly couered, and on them the Nobles; one, spare for the Prophet, and another whereon the King rideth, with much pompe. When they haue looked into the Moskee, and not seene their Mabomet, the King returns on that spare Elephant. Pider, Manacabo, and Aru, are tributaries to Achen. Anno, 1613. Aprill twelfth, Captayne Beff anchored in the Rode of Achin, and was kindly enterrayned. The King sent an Arancaia riding in a Tent on an Elephants backe, attended with two or three of the Kings boyes (for Hee is attended by Boyes abroad, and by Women within) to receiue His Majesties Letter, which was thus carried in a Balon of Gold, the Generall following with fortie or fiftie Men. After this Letter and a Present deliuered, the King told them they should see some of his pastime; which was first Cock-fighting, next that, the fight of Rammes, then his tame Elephants, after them his Bulllooes, (all as they succeeded, exceeding the former in fiercenesse.) lastly the Antilopes which the Generall had giuen Him. All this while did the King take Tobacoco in a Silver pipe, giuen him by his Women standing in a close roome behind. This done, Supper was serued in by young Boyes of fouretee or fiftene yeeres old, in Swaffe, which is a mettall halfe Copper, halfe Gold: and continued from seuen of the clocke till almost twelue, in which were serued in foure hundred Dishes, besides Hot drinks. The next day the King sent the Generall an Elephant to ride on (otherwise none might doe it) and appointed One of his chiefe Arancaias alway to attend Him: free ac- cesse was likewise granted at all times, which none else may doe without the Kings Cretele of Dagger (there vsed as a Scepter) and the Articles agreed on betwene Sir James Lancaster and his predecessour, were promised to be ratified. On the second of May, all Strangers were invited to a Feast kept at the Spring of the Ruer, in the water, fixe miles from the Citie. Two Elephants were sent for the Generall. The dishes were serued in by Boyes, swimming with one hand, and holding the Dish or strong drinke in the other. Of all these drinks they must taste, and then throw the rest into the water. This continued from one till fise; they had five hundred dishes well dressed, Generall Beft weary of sitting so long in the water, had leave to depart an hour before the Reit: the Captayne of the Dutch house tooke his leave either with hote drinckes, or cold sitting so long in the water, and soone after dyed. The King gave the Generall a New Title, calling, and charging his Nobles to call him, Arancia Pule, that is, the honourable white man. Iune, the second, They were entertayned with a fight of foure Elephants, and a wilde Tygre, which was fastened to a stake, and yet so fastened on their Trunks and legs, that he made them roare and bleed extreamly. Sometimes wild Elephants fight before Him, which would soone kill each other, but that came ones are fastned to them; which draw them backe, fourescore or a hundred men helping. And for their taming, they vie to let one wilde, betwene two tame.

This King sent to his Majestie a Present, and a Letter in forme for painting and writing very curious, the words thus interpreted. PEDRVCKA SIRIE SVLTAN; King of Kings, Renowned for his warres, and sole King of Samatra, and a King more feared then his Predecessors: feared in his Kingdome, and honoured of all bordering Nations; in whom there is the true image of a King, in whom raigens the true methode of Government, formed as it were of the most pure mettall, and adorned with the most fine colours; whose seate is high and most compleat, like to a Chryshall Miner, pure and cleere as the choicest Glasse; from whom floweth the pure streame of Bounty and Justice; whose presence is as the finest Gold: King of Priaman, and of the Mountayne of Gold, viz. Solida; and Lord of nine sorts of Stones; King of two Simbaroes of beaten Gold; having for his Seates Mats of Gold: His furniture for his Horses, and Armour for Himselfe being likewise of pure gold; His Elephant with teeth of Gold, and all provisions thereto belonging; His Lances halfe Gold, halfe Silver; his small Shot of the same; a Saddle also for another Elephant of the same mettall; a Tent of Silver; and all his Scales, halfe Gold, halfe Silver; his Sepulchre of Gold: (whereas his Predecessors had all these halfe Gold, halfe Silver) his services compleat of Gold and Silver. A King under whom there are many Kings, having taken Othe the King of Aruw; all the Countrey of Priaman, Tecoo, Barons, being subdued by Him, in now under His command: Seventie Elephants and much provisions carried by Sea to make his warres in Aruw, where God gave mee more Victorie then any of my Predecessors. This great King findeth this Letter of Salutation to JAMES KING OF GREAT BRITAINE, viz. England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, to signifie the great content Hee hath received by His Highnesse Letter delivered by the hands of Arancia Pule, Thomas Best His Majesties Embassadour: as therewith wherof, His Eyes were surpris'd with a celestiall brightnesse, and his Spirits ransh'd with a Divine joy; the opening thereof rendred a savour more fragrant then the most odoriferous Flowers, or sweetest perfumes in the world. For which cause, I the Great King of Samatra doe profess my selfe to bee of One heart, one minde, and of one flesh, with the most Potent Prince JAMES King of England, and doe earnestly desire that the League begunne, may be continued to all Posterities. And herein I take my greatest Felicitie, there being nothing in the world more pleasant or joyfull to mee. And for attestation of my desire, that the League and Amicitie begunne, may be continued betwixt Us, I have returned this Letter unto your Majestie, making also My Prayers unto the Great God for the Continuance of the same. And I shall bee My greatest Honour to receive Memoriall from so Great a Potentate, and so Remote a Nation. And for a pledge of My Love and Honour, and Continuance of our League, I send your Majestie a Creefe wrought with Gold, the hilt thereof being beaten Gold, with a ring of Stones, an Assagaya of Swasse, halfe Copper, halfe Gold, eight Purshan dishes small and great of Campbire, one piece of Sowering fluffe, three pieces of Calice Lawne: which your Majestie accepting as from a Brother, I shall reit satisfied and much honoured. And so with my prayers to the Great God, Creator of Heavens and Earth, for your Majesties long life, with Victorie over your Enemies, and Prosperitie in your Land. Given at Our Palace at Achi the 1032. yeere of Mahomet by the Accompt of the Moores.

This Letter for the strange dwelling forme, and because it containeth a petrie Invention of the Kings Wealth, and some knowledge of the adjoining Kingdomes, I have thus verbatim exprest. This King of Achi is a proper gallant man of warre (they are Master Cuplands words) of two and thirtie yeeres, of middle size, full of Spirit, strong by Sea and Land; his Countrey populous, his Elephants many, whereof wee have seene a hundred and threescore, or a hundred and fourescore at a time. His Gallies and Frigates carry in them very good Brasile Ordnance, Demicanon, Culverin, Sakar, Minton, and the like. His building is stately a mans River running about and thorow his Palace, which branch Hee cut and brought sixe or eight miles off in twentie dayes whilles wee continued at Achi. Samatra is very Mountainous, the people courteous. Without the Kings Chop no Stranger may haue ingress or egress. Hee desired the Generall to commend Him to the King of England, and to intreat Him to send him two white Women. For (said Hee) if I beget one of them with Child and it prove a Sonne, I will make Him King of Priaman, Passaman, and of the Coast from whence whence you fetch your Pepper, so that you shall not need to come any more to Mee, but to your owne English King for these Commodities.

He is cruell: he plucked out one of the eyes of a Nobleman for looking on one of the Kings women walking in a Riuer: Another wearing a Shafh beyond his degree, had his head cut round so farre, as that too large: some he boyles in scalding Oyle, some are sawne in pieces, spitted alive, their legs cut off, or otherwise tortured. It is reported that in his Predecessors time, when Malacca was besieged, the Portugals putting on shore here, by the ozie and myrry landing, were made an easier prey to an Ambush of Achiners in the Reeds, which tooke many of them, who by the Kings command, had all of them, all their Priuities presently cut away. To returne to M. Copland, on the third of July 1613. the Kings Armada of a hundred and twenty, or two hundred Frigats and Gallies arrived from Ioar, which Kingdome Lava-mar the Generall had then subdued to this King, with the Kingdome of Siak, bringing both those Kings with two of their brethren, and some Dutchmen prisoners to Achi.

At Tecoo they staid eleuen weekes, and bought a hundred and twenty tunnes of Pepper, burying five and twenty men, which got their death at Passian (for Tecoo is a healthfull place) where and in the Country about, the Pepper most groweth.

In Nicobar they are base people, and till not the ground. Sumbro is ten or twelue leagues Northward from this Island, where that plant growes, not a plant but a Worme, but a stone: before^e obserued. The people are tawny and naked: they paint their faces. Their Priests in their Sacrifices wear apparell so close, as if it were sowed to them; and hornes on their heads turning backe, with a taile also hanging downe behind: for so the Deuill (they say) appeareth to them. Their faces and haire are deformed with greene, blacke and yellow colours.

Zeilan (which some call Seylon, other Ceilan) is by Barrius auerred to be Taproba- na: sometimes (according to Marcus Paulus his reports) thought to haue com-prehended 3600. miles in circuit, since much impayred by his our-mighty neighbour the Sea, which hath now left not about 250. miles in length, and an 140. miles of breadth vnto it. b The Indians call it Tenarism, or the delicious land, and some are of opinion, that this was Paradise. (So iust are the iudgements of the Highest, that, when as man wandered from him, caused him also to wander from himselfe, and from his habitation; yea, the place it selfe hath also wandred, in mens wandering conceits, ouer the World, yea, and out of our habitable World altogether, as before is c shewed; men now seeking it as vainly as before they lost it.) It is in fashion d resembling an Egge, by a shallow channell separated from the Cape Comori. The Heauens with their dewes, the Ayre with a pleasaunt holefomnesse and fragrant freshnesse, the Waters in their many Riuers and Fountaynes, the Earth diuersified in aspiring Hills, lowly Vales, equall and indifferent Plaines, filled in her inward Chambers with Metals and Jewels, in her outward Court and vpper face stord with whole Woods of the best Cinamon that the Sonne seeth, besides Fruits, Oranges, Limons, &c. surmounting those of Spaine; Fowles and Beasts; both tame and wild (among which is their Elephant e honoured (by a naturall acknowledgement of excellence) of all other Elephants in the World.) These all haue conspired and ioyned in common league to present vnto Zeilan the chiete of worldly treasures and pleasures, with a long and healthfull life in the Inhabitants, to enjoy them. No maruell then, if Sense and Sensuality haue heere stumbled on a Paradise. There, wooddie Hills (as a naturall Amphitheatre) doe encompass a large Plaine: and one of them, as not contenting his beetle-browes with that only prospect, disdained alio the fellowship of the neighbouring Mountaynes, lifting f vp his steepe head seuen leagues in height; and hath in the top a Plaine, in the midst whereof is a stone of two Cubits, erected in manner of a Table, holding in it the print of a mans foot, who (they say) came from Dei thither, to teach them Religion. The Logues and other deuout Pilgrimes resort thither, from places a thousand leagues distant, with great difficulty of passage both hither and heere. For they are forced to mount vp this Hill by the helpe of nayles and chaines fastened thereto, Nature hauing prohibited other passage. Massen and Boterus could per-swade themselves, that this foot-step is a relike and memory of the Ethiopian Eunuch: others will haue it further fetcht, and father it vpon Adam, the first Father of Mankind, of whom the Hill also is named, Pico de Adam. The Moores g call it Adam Baba, and say, That from thence Adam ascended into Heauen. The Pilgrimes are clad in their Palmers Weed, with iron chaines, and skins of Lions, and other wild beasts. Vpon their armes and legs they wear buttons with sharpe points, that cut the flesh, and draw bloud, which (they say) they doe in Gods seruice.

Before they come at the Mountayne, they passe by a fenny Valley full of water, wherein they wade vp to the waste, with Knives in their hands, to scrape from their legs the blood-leeches, which else would end their Pilgrimage and life before the time. For this dirty and watery passage continueth eighteen miles, before they come at the Hill; whose proud top would disdaine climbing, if Art did not captiue Nature, and binde the Hill with chaines of Iron, as is said. When they are mounted, they wash them in a Lake or Poole of cleere springing water, neere to that foot-stone, and making their Prayers, doe thus account themselves cleane from all their finnes. This holy journey is generally performed by the Islanders (sayth Vermannus) once a yeere. He addeth h that a Moore told him, that this foot-print was two spans long; and that Adam heere a long time bewayled his sinne, and found pardon. But Odoricus affirmeth, that they reported this mourning to haue bene for Abel, and to haue lasted three hundred yeeres, and of the teares of Abel and Eue this purifying water to haue proceeded:
which Odoricus i proued to be a Tale, because he saw the water springing continually, and it runneth thence into the Sea. He saith, that this water had in it many precious stones; and the King gaue leaue at certayne times of the yeere to poore men to take them, that they might pray for his soule; which they could not doe, but first anointed with Limons, because of the Horse-leeches in that water. There k are reckoned nine Kings in this Island: The first of Columbi, to whom the rest pay tribute, viz. the Kings of Isanapatan, Trinquamale, Bate- colon, Vilassiem, Tanamaca, Laula, Galle, and Candy.

In Candy l were Statues artificially wroughte fine or fixe fathomes high, which these Symmetrians proportioned to the stature of Adam, gathered by that print of his foot. In De Vintane m is a Pagode or Idoll Temple, the compass whereof is 2130. paces: it is very high, and all white, except on the top, which hath the spires thereof gilded, in somuch that

men are not able, when the Sun shineth, to looke thereon. It hath a Towre or square Steeple of excellent workmanship. There are many other Temples, and a Monastery alio of Religious persons, which are attired in yellow, haue their crownes shauen, with Brades in their hands, and alwayes seeme to mamble ouer somewhat of their deuout Orisons, being in high estimation of sanctity with the vulgar, and freed from publike labours and burthens. Their Monastery is built after the manner of the Popish, being also gilded with Gold. In their Chappels are many Images of both sexes; which, they say, represent some of their Saints: they are set on the Altar, and are clothed with garments of gold and siluer. Before them are the Images of Boves, which beare vp great Candellickes, with Wax-candles burning therein night and day. Euery houre they resort to these Altars to their Adumimus. They held a solemne Procession, whiles the Hollanders were there, in which their Abbot rode on an Elephant richly attired, lifting vp his hands ouer his head, with a golden Rod therein: the Monkes went two and two before him in order, partly bearing and playing on many Instruments of Musicke, partly bearing Wax-lights and Torches: the men alio, and after them the women and Maids following in like order: and the fairest Virgins were busied with games and dances, being naked from the nauell vpwards, beneath couered with smokes of diuers colours, their armes and eares adorned with Gold and Jewels. Any man that should see it (saith our Author) would thinke, our Westerne Monkes had hence borrowed their Ceremonies. Their Images are in euery corner of the way, which they adorne with flowers. In Canday, the chiefe Citie of that Kingdome, were Pagodes innumerable. The houses or Temples were of stone, like the Temples in these parts: some Statues were as high as the mast of a ship. The people heere, if they haue once touched meate, which for quantity or quality they cannot eate, they cast it to the dogs: neither will any man (be he neuer so meane) eate that which another hath touched. The women goe naked from the waste vpwards. They marry as many wiues as they can keepe.

The King makes vse of their Superstition: For pretending to build Temples, he after leaves them vnperfect, excusing himselfe, that they had not contributed sufficient summes of mony, and therefore exacteth a new. There is one Statue of great stature, with a Sword in his hand, which by illusion of the Deuill (it is not the delusion of fabulous reports) made as though he would strike the King with his Sword, as he was entering the Temple, and put him in great feare, whereas before he had made a mocke of it. The Singales or Native Inhabitants say, that the World shall not perish, as long as that Image continueth safe. When any one is sicke, hee sacrificeth to the Deuill, hauing a Box hanging in his house to that end, therein to gather somewhat for his Offering. Some pray vnto the Image of an Elephants head, made of wood or stone, that they may obtaine wisdom (whereof this prayer argues their great want): some eate no quicke creature. They eat no Beete, nor drinke any Wine; they worship whatsoeuer first meeteth them in the morning.

George Spilberge was bountifully entertained of the King of Candy, but Sebalde de Werten was with diuers of his companions slaine, after he had received much kindeesse of the King; 40 his importunacie to get the King into his ship, making him suspect some trechery.

The King of Motecalo had eares adorned with Jewels, and hanging downe (the lappets of them were so stretched) to his shoulders. He was kind to the Hollanders: but they incensed him against them by killing certaine Kine; for some of them said, that the soules of Kine slaine after that manner, were hurled forthwith into Hell. He obserued one Pagode, to whose Feast he went while the Hollanders were there, the solemnity whereof was to continue (ten dayes) till a new Moone, with great concourse of deuout persons.

Of the Superstitions of Perimal, and the worship of the Apes tooth, celebrated in this Island; we haue already shewed in the Chapter • of Narjunga. The Cingalan language which they speake in this Island, is I thought to haue bene there left by the Chinois, sometimes supposed (I thinke falsely) Lords of Zeilan. In Marcus Paulus his dayes the Tartarians had not pierced thus farre. For the King then reigning, refused to sell to Cublai Can (then the greatest Monarch in the World) at a price, a Rubie which hee had left him by his Ancestors, esteemed the richest Jewell in the World, being (as he saith) a span long, and as bigge as a mans arme, cleere and shining, as if it had bin a fire. In this Island were reckoned nine Principallities or Kingdomes, but not long since, their chiefe King was murdered by a Barber, who draue the other Kings out of the Countrey, and vsurped the Monarchy to himselfe, stirring hostility against the Portugals. The Singales are very cunning Artificers in all Metals, 50 One of them presented the Archbishop of Goa with a Crucifix, so cunningly wrought, as if he had giuen life to the Image of one dead. He sent it to the King of Spaine as a rare Jewell, not to be equalled in Europe. The Inhabitants heere are aduise and expert in luggling, both men and women, traouelling through India with their strange Hobby-horses, to get money by this vanity. The Sea-coast (as in other Indian Islands) is inhabited with Moores, the Inland with Pagans.

The Portugals haue a Fortresse at Colombo. The Ilanders ⁶ are not warriours: they giue themselves to pastime and pleasure: they goe naked from the girdle vpward: they make wide holes in their eares, which they stretch out with the weight of their Jewels to their shoulders. Mosart relates, that Zeilan hath whole Forrests of Cinamon, and Mountaynes of Chryfall, and that out of their Riuer they draw Pearles, Rubies, Saphirs and Cats-eyes: that they worship the first creature they meet, eat nothing that hath blood, make no more bread then will be eaten at a meale, their Religion prohibiting them to eat any two houres old. The Hollanders found exceeding, both good and bad entertainment with the King of Candy. Now for that question, whether Zeilan or Samatra be that Taprobane of the ancient is very doubtful, yet that report in Pliny ⁷ of Taprobane, seemes more to encline for Zeilans. For hee lieth, That in Clandius time, a seruant of Annius Placamus, which was Customser for the Red Sea, was carried from the Coast of Arabia, besides Carmania, in fifteene dayes, which, I thinke, could not possibly bee done to Samatra. Likewise the excellency of the Elephants, beyond all the Indian, agrees to Zeilan: and had Samatra bene so knowne at that time, the other parts of India (if it is like) had bene better discovered then they were in those times. This Taprobane was discovered to bee an Iland, by Oncetricus, Alexanders Admirall of his Fleet in these parts. It was then accounted another World, and therefore shall be the period of our Pilgrimage, and Perambulation in this Asian part of the World: which (by the gracious goodnesse of his Almightie Guide) the Pilgrime hath now passed, and hath led the industrious Reader along with him.

THe Popish Pilgrimes were wont to beguile their weary steps, with Musicke ⁸ or pleasant tales (according to the delicate deuotion of those times) & ease was their pardon and penance at their iourneys end. And in these our times Madonna de Loreto must giue entertainment to many Pilgrimes, which (as if Venus were become her Chamberlaine) haue their Curtezan-consolations to solace their Pilgrim-paines: the deuout Friars and Nuns themselves, thus haue defied the Deuill, and denied the World, by a new Vow deuoted to the flesh, disguise themselves in Lay-habits, traouelling thither, and from thence, as Man and Wife, only at Loreto couering all with their Cowles. And if Confession discover, it hideth againe as a double courting. But to vs, Vowes, Cowles, and such falce-solaces are wanting: the end of this labour is but the beginning of another: our penance endureth all the way; neyther haue we hope of Pardon and Indulgence from some feuerer Pœnitentiaries and Confours, whose greatest vertue is to find or seeke faults in Others.

Had the Muses bene propitious, and the Graces gracious, we would haue had some Musi-call and gracefull harmony, at least in Phrase and Method: but euen the Muses which whilome so graced that Father of History, Herodorus, that each of them vouchsafed, if yee vouchsafed it credit, to bestow that Booke on him, which hee entituled with their names) seemed afraid of so tedious a iourney; nor would the Graces grace vs with their company. Many indeed offered themselves with their Rules, Methods, and Precepts of Histories, as Bodinus, Chytraeus, Possuinus, Mylene, Folietus, Viperanus, Zuinger, Sambucus, Ricobonus, Paritius, Pontanus, Foxius, Robertellus, Balduinus, and Others which haue written Treatises of that argument: but I thought such attendance would be chargeable, especially to a Traueller: and their many Rules would not haue added wings to my Head and Feet, (as the Poets paint their Mercury) but rather haue fettered my Feet, and made my weake Head forget it selfe with their remembrances. I therefore followed Nature (both within me and without me) as my best guide, for matter and manner, which commonly yeeldeth Beauties as loudly, if not so curious, as those which bankrupt themselves with borrowing of Art: the issues of our bodies and minds here in being like, Quia matres sudent, demissi humeris esse, vincto pectore vs gracie sint, saith Cleora in the Comedy, Tame si bona est natura, reddunt curam a uincula uincula: To concerned curiositie may hide rather then commend Natures bounty, which of it selfe is alway more honest, if not more honourable. Neuer could the Persian Court parallel the goodlinesse of Eliker and Assatia, which yet neglected the Persian delicacies. Once, I haue had sufficient burthen of the businesse in hand; enough it was for me to goe, though I did not dance vnder it. But it is time to leaue this idle discourse about our course in this Asian History, and bebinke vs of our African Perambulation.

CHAP. I.

§. I.

Of the Name and Limits of Africa.

Hether this name Africa, bee so called of ^a Epher or Apher, the sonne of Midian, and nephew of Abraham, by his second wife Reurah (as Iosephus ^b affirmeth, alleaging witnesses of his opinion, Alexander Polyhistor, and Cleodemus;) or of the Sunnes presence, ^c because it is aprica, or of the colds absence, of ā and geia, as Festus saith; or of the word Feruca, ^d which in the Arabian tongue signifieth to diuide (wherupon they call this part of the world Ifriquia) because it is (saith Leo) diuided by Nilus, and the Sea, from the rest of the world: or of ^e Ifriens, an Arabian King, which (chased by the Assyrians) here seated himselfe; or of ^f Aphar, the Hebrew word, which 50 signifies durt (as Aphra the Synake also) filly agreeing to the sandie and parched Soile: or if any other ^g can giue more probable Etymologie of the Name, I list not to contend. Nor is it meet for me to be religious in these questions of names, in this Quest and Inquire of Religions. It is a great Peninsula, by one Isthmus, or necke of Land betweene the Red Sea, and the Easterne Mediterranean, ioyned to the Continent, which with the Red Sea aforesaid is the Easterne limit of Africa, as the Mediterranean on the North, and elsewhere the Ocean. For Nilus is a more obscure, and vncertaine Vmpire. Some diuide the World into two parts; Asia and Europe, accounting Africa a part of Europe, which opinion Varro ascribeth to Erastosthenes; Salust, Lucan, and Aethicus, with Simlerus, mention it. It is twice ^h as bigge as Europe, and ded by scorching heats, and shewres of sands, as a counterfeite of thole heauenly raines, and 60 moving waters, which the Aire and Seas afford in other places. Such are the many Desarts in Africa, only fertile in barrennesse: although in other parts it is both fruitfull and populous. The Equinoctial Circle doth in manner diuide it in the middelt. And yet old Atlas neuer sheddeth his snowie haire, but hath alwayes on his huge and high tops vnmolten snow, whence sometime it is disperfed (as from a store-house) in such incredible quantitie, that it couereth Carth, Horfes, and the tops of Trees, to the great danger of the Inhabitants: and the Mountaynes are so cold, as a man is not able to endure his hand in them. Mount Atlas aforefaid stretcheth from the Ocean, ¹ bearing name of him, almost to Egypt. Other Mountaynes of name are those of Sierra Leona, and the Mountaynes of the Moone, &c.

One Lake Zembe yeeldeth three mightie Riuer, disemboking themselves into three feuerall Seas: Nilus, which runneth North wards fortie degrees from hence, in Astrononically reckoning; Cuama, which runneth into the Easterne; and Zaire into the Westerne Seas: of which Riuer, and of other like, the Reader shall finde more in due place spoken.

Some parts of Africa are beyond admiration for barrenesse, some for fertilitye, Ptolemy mentions a Citie in the middelt of the sands, called Tacape, in the way to Leptis, which hath a Spring of water flowing plentifully and dispensed by course amongst the Inhabitants. There vnder a great Date-tree groweth an Oliue, vnder that a Figge, vnder that a Pomegranate, vnder that a Vine, vnder that Wheat, Pease, Herbs, all at once. The Vine beares twice a yeere; and otherwife, very abundance would make it as bad as barren. Somewhat is gathered all the yeere long. Foure cubits of that soile square, not measured with the fingers stretched out, but gathered into the fist, are sold for so many Denarij. This Budeus 1 summes and proportions by the Acre, after the Roman mesure, and saith, that an Acre of that ground, after that rate, is priced at 12800. Sextertij nummi, which maketh 320. French crownes, not 60 reckoning the defect of the cubit, which being added, addes much to the summe.

The Romans reckoned fixe Provinces in Africa: Ptolemy numbred twelue. But then was not Lions bring forth small deformed lumps, at the first time five, and (every yeere after) one lesse, after the first burthen remayning barren. It cannot stirre till it be two moneths old, nor goe till it be fixe, if you beleue him. The Libyans beleue that the Lion hath vnderstanding of prayers, and tell of a Getulian woman, which lying at the Lions mercy, beought him so noble a beast, not to dishonour himselfe with so ignoble a prey and conquest, as shee a weak woman was. The like is told * of a Spanish dogge, of one Didacus Salazar a Spaniard. This man according to the bloudie practice of that Nation, minding to fill his dogges belly with an old womans flesh which was his captive, gaue her a letter to carry to the Gouverneur, and so soone as shee was a little past, looled his Maltise, who presently had over-taken her. The woman terrified, prostrates her selfe to the dogge, and fues for her life; Good master Dogge, I master Dogge (saith shee) in her language, I carry this letter to the Gouverneur (and shewest him) Be not fierce on me, master Dogge. The dogge (having changed, it seemes, with his Master, his doggednesse for the others humanitie) made a stay, and lifting vp his legge, onely pisset on her and departed, to no small wonder of the Spaniards that knew him.

But to returne to the King of beasts. His tayle seemeth to be his Scepter, whereby he expresseth his passion. Hee shrinkes not at danger, except some couett of woods thrust him from witnesses, and then hee will take the benefit of flight, which otherwise hee seemes to disdain. Mentor, a man of Syracuse, was encountered with a Lion, which in stead of tearing him, fawned on him, and with his dumbe eloquence seemed to implore his aide, shewing ²⁰ his diseased foot, wherein Mentor perceived a stubbe Ricking, which he pulled out. The like is reported by Gellius out of Polybist, of a fugitive seruant, who having performed this kind of office to a Lion, was by him gratified for a long space with a daily portion of his prey. But after this the man was taken and presented to his Master (a Roman Senator) who exhibited games to the Romans, wherein seruants and condemned persons were exposed to the furie of the beasts, amongst whom he placed this seruant; and by a wonderfull Fate, this Lion also was a little before taken, and bestowed on him for this solemne spectacle. The beasts running with violence to their bloudie encounter, suddenly this Lion stayed, and taking little better view, fawned on this his guest, and defended him from the assault of the other beasts: whereupon, by the peoples entreatie (who had learned the storie of him) he was freed, and the beast giuen him: which followed him with a Line in the streets, the people pointing and saying Hic est homo Medicus leonum, Hic est leg. hostes hominum. One Elpis a Samian performed a cure on another Lion, pulling a bone out of his throat, at the Lions geping and silent moane: and in remembrance hereof built a Temple (at his returne) to Esculapius at Sango, whom before hee had inuoked before in feare of a Lion.

Plinie and Solinus among other African beasts mention the Hyena, which some thinke to be Male one yeere, and Female another, by course: This Aristotle denies, This beast hath no necke ioynt, and therefore stirres not his necke, but with bending about his whole body. He will imitate humane voyce, and drawing neere to the sheepe-coates, hauing heard the name of some of the shepheards, will call him, and when hee comes, deuoure him. They tell that his eyes are diuersified with a thousand colours, that the touch of his shadow makes a dogge not able to barke. By engendering with this beast, the Lionesse brings forth a Crocuta, of like qualities to the Hyena. Hee hath one continued tooth without diuision throughout his mouth. Some thinke this Hyena to bee the Lycanthropos or Man-wolfe, some the Ciuet-Cat, some a fable: howeouer, old and late Philosophers, Physicians, and Historians mention it. Something, perhaps, told of it is fabulous. But it is absurd to denie the eye-light of so many witnesses. He that will reade a pleasant storie of the taking them, let him reade Babingtons his Epistles: if an entire storie, Banbinus his second booke De Hermaproditis.

In Africa also are wilde Ases, among which, one Male hath many Females: a zealous beast, who (for feare of after encroching) bites off the stones of the young Males, if the suspicious Female present him nor by bringing forth in a close place where hee shall not finde it. The like is told of Beuers, ⁷ which being hunted for the medicinale qualitie of their stones, are said to bite them off when they are in danger to be taken, paying that ransom for their liues. It cannot be true that is reported of the Hyenemum, = a stone found in the Hyena's eye, that being put vnder the tongue of a man, bee shall foretell things to come, except hee foretell this, That no man will beleue what our Authour before hath told. The Libard is not hurtfull to men except they annoy him: but killeth and eateth dogges. Dabub is the name of a simple and bile-creature like a Wolfe, saue that his legges and feete are like to a mans: so foolish, that with a song, and a taber, they which know his haunt will bring him out of his den, and captiue his eares with their musick, while another captiueth his legs with a rope: Scauliger thinks this is the Hyena, which the Turkes call, Zirtlan, and take with a rope fastened to the legge, he that goes in proffessing he is not there, till they be there sure of him.

The Zebra of all Creatures for beautie and comelineſſe is admirably pleaſing: reſembling a Horſe of exquisite compoſition, but not all ſo ſwift; all over-laid with patient-coloured Lanes, and garbs, from Head to Taile. They live in great Herds, as I was told by my friend Andrew Battell, who lived in the Kingdome of Congo many yeeres, and for the ſpace of ſome months lived on the ſketh of this Beaſt, which hee killed with his Peece. For upon ſome quarrell betwixt the Portugals (among whom hee was a Sergeant of a band) and him, hee lived eight or nine months in the Woods, where hee might have view of hundreds together in Herds both of theſe, and of Elephants. So ſimple was the Zebra; that when hee ſhot one, hee might ſhoot ſtill, they all ſtanding full at gaze, till three or foure of them were dead, but more ſtrange it ſeemed which hee told me of a kinde of great Ape if they might be bee rearm'd, of the height of a man, but twice as bigge in feature of their limbes, with ſtrength proportionable, haire all over, otherwiſe altogether like Men and Women in their whole bodily ſhape, except this, that their legges had no calves. They lived on ſuch wilde fruits as the Trees and Woods yielded, and in the night time lodged on the Trees: Hee was accompanied with two Negro-Boyes, and they carried away one of them by a ſudden ſurpriſe: yet not hurting him, as they vie not to doe any which they take, except the Captive doe then looke upon them. This ſlue, after a months life with them, conveyed himſelfe away againe to his Maſter. Other Apes there are ſore, and as Solinus reporteth, * Satyrus with ſteele like Goates, and Sphynxes, with breſtlike women, and haire, whereof Purpur ſaith hee ſaw one at Verona, and a kind of Conies alſo at the ſame time, four times as bigge as the ordinary; and (which is more incredible) had each of them foure ſentall members. Philippo Pigefetta ſpeaketh in his Relation * of Congo, of other Beaſts in Africa, as of the Tygre as here, and cruell as Lions, making prey of Man and Beaſt, yet rather devouring blacke men then white: where Multachios are holden for mortall poyſon, and being given in meates, cauſe men to die madde. The Empanangs is ſomewhat like to an Oxe, Their Sheepe and Goates never bring forth leſſe then two, and ſometimes three or foure at a time, They have Wolves, Foxes, Deere (Red and Fallow) Roe-bucks, Cuiet-cats, Sables and Martens.

The River-horfe becomes peculiar to Africa, a beast somewhat resembling a Horfe, shorter-legged, with great feet and a very great head, with horrible teeth : so fearful by Land, that a Child may affright them, and in the Water as their proper element (though their Element be Grass, Corne in the blade, and other like from the earth) they are audacious and daring. But of this and many other African Creatures (too long here to relate) the Reader may informe himselfe more fully in my Voyages ; in Iobson, Bassell, Sumter, Aluare, John Ley, and others there published.

Apes are called Pongy's.

* Satyres are thought to be a kind of Apes: these are Natural. There are others unnatural of humane copulation with goats: a third sort diabolically illusions, & a fourth poetical tales. See these things at large in Saebinus de Hermaphrod. & also Drad. in Solin. &c.

δ. III.

Of Crocodiles, Serpents and other strange Creatures.

 Hey haue Snakes and Adders, whereof some are called Imbuaia, five and twentie spannes * long, living in Land and Water, not venomous but rauenuous, and lurke in Trees (for which taking purpose, Nature hath giuen it a litle horne or claw within two or three foot of the Taile) waiting for their prey, which hauing taken, it deuoureth hores, hoofes, and all, although it be a Hart. And then swolne with this to huge a meale, it is as it were drunke and sleepe, and vniwieldie for the space of five or sixe dayes. The Pagan Negroes roaft and eate them as great dainties. The biting of their Vipers killen in four and twentie houres space. Africa for monsters in this kinde hath been famous, as in Roman historie appeareth. Attilius v Regulus the Roman Consul in the first Punicke Warre, at the Riuer Bagrada encountered with a huge Serpent, and planted his Engines ad-Artillerie against the same, whose skime, sent to Rome for a Monument, was in length a hundred and twentie foot, as Gellius out of Tuberus reported, and had eaten many of the hurt by Darts or Arrows, and with the breath it killed many, and had eaten many of the Soldiers, before they could with a stone out of an Engine destroy this destroyer. The Riuers of Niger, Nilus, Zaïre, and others, haue flore of Crocodiles, whereof some are of an incredible bignesse, and greedie deuourers, thirte foot long, from an Egge lesse than a Goose-egge, Aristotle saith, that Crocodiles haue no tongues, but I my selfe haue scene both great and litle.
(saith our Author) dead and dryed, in all which I found a tongue, but very short, flat and large.
Strange it is that they tell of the number of sixtie in this beaſt: the sex sifter yeres, the teeth, yoyns, egges, and dayes of laying and hatching, being all numbred by sixtie.

of them are able to swallow an entire Heifer, as some report. They lay also, that the Female layes her Eggs where Nilus will make an end of his flowing that yere, as if by secret Providence the dimmed how farr the River would rise. In ingendering the lyes on her backe, and through the shortnesse of her legs cannot turne her selfe on her belly, but by the Males helpe from whilch being feared by the clamours of some watching this opportunitie, he is easily taken: which they doe also by Pit-falls and other meanes. Foure moneths together in the Winter, they eate nothings: they are chike-lighted by Land, and easier take their prey by water, which is done by their tayle. They are bold vpon the fearefull, and fearefull vpon the bold: yet a fearefull beast to encounter riling on his tayle, with such Hellish iawes and Deuilish clawes ouer the assylant, as require an vndaunted spirit. For which the Tomyris were famous, easily conquering them. Authors tell of a little Bird, which as he lyes gaping, goes into his mouth, and picks his indented teeth, which he cannot deuoure by reason of her sharp feathers rayed like bristles, when he offereth to shut his mouth on her: the Schemmon or Rat of Nilus is said to gape for this occasion of his gaping, and then to runne into his belly and as clearely as a Cat, sheweth like a Ferret, but without haire, and blacke sharpe toothes, round eard, short legg'd, long tayl'd, suppos'd of both genders: bought at Markets in Egypte to kill Mice and Rats. They prey vpon all lesser Serpents destroy Crocodiles Eggs, and strangle all the Cats they meet with, leue Poultry, cannot endure the wind: their moulthes are so little, they cannot bite any thing that is thicke.

Mount Atlas hath plenty of Dragons, grosse of body: slow of motion, and in hyting or touching, incurably venomous. The Desarts of Lybia haue in them many Hydras. Dubis is the name of a kind of great Lizard, not venomous, which neuer drinketh, and if water be put in his mouth, he presently dyeth. He is counted dainty meat, and three dayes after hee is killed, at the heat of the fire he moueth as if he had life. In Congo is a kind of Dragons like in bignesse to Rammes, with wings, hauing long tayles and chaps, and diuers lawes of teeth, of blue and greene colour, pointed like kales, with two feet, and feed on raw flesh. The Pagan Negroes pray to them as Gods, for which cause the great Lords keep them to make a game among vs, admirable for their Erie sustinance (although they also hunt and eat Flies) and for the changeablenesse of their colours. ¶ Into all (as Theophrastus sayth) but reddish and white? The Tarandus is a Beast somewhat resembling an Oxe, in quantitie, a Hart in shape, the skin hard, a finger thicke, fit for shields, haired like a Beare, lying, as Theophrastus sheweth, in Sarmatia. Solinus sayth in Aethiopia, seldome scene, of incredible changeablenesse to the colour of that which is next it. The Polypus seemeth by his breath to change his colour, his lungs extending almost through all his body: which Aristotle testifieth he doth both for feare and hunting his prey: adding the same qualitie of another fish called a Cutrell. Another Serpent hath a rundle on his Tayle like a Bell, which also ringeth as it goeth. But if any desire to know the varietie of these Serpents, Solinus in his thirteenth Chapter will more fully satisfie him, and Bellonius in his obseruations.

Manifold are these kindes of Serpents in Africa, as the Cerafces, which hath a little Coronet of four hornes, whereby he allureth the Birds vnto him (lying hidden in the sands all but the head) and so deuoureth them. The Iaculi dart themselues from Trees on such Creatures as passe by. The Amphisbena hath two heads, the Tayle also ornerated, (I cannot say honored) with a Head, which causeth it to moue circularly with crooked windings: a fit Embleme of popular edition, where the people will rule their Prince, needs must their motion be crooked, when there are two heads, and therefore none. The Scythale is admirable in her varied lacket. The Diptas kills those whom the stingeth, with thirst. The Hypanale with sleepe, as befell to Cleopatra. The Hemerois with vntanchable bleeding. The Pretler with swelling. And not to poison you with names of many other of these paysonfull Creatures, the Basilisk is said to kill with her sight or hissing. ¶ Galen describes it, and so doe Solinus and others. It is not halfe a foot long and hath three pointes (Galen sayth) on the head, or after Solinus, strikes like a Mitre. It blisseth the ground it toucheth, the Herbes also, and Trees, and infecteth the Ayre, so that Birds flying ouer, fall dead. If frayeth away other Serpents with the hissing. It goeth vpright from the belly vpwards. If any thing be slaine by it, the same also proueth venomous to such as touch it. Only a Weasill kills it. The Bergamini bought the carcase of one of them at an incredible summe, which they hung in their Temple (which Apelles hand had made famous) in a Net of Gold, to preserve the same from Birds and Spiders. The Catoblepes is said to be of like venomous nature, alwayes going with her head into the ground, her sight otherwise being deadly. As for the Monsters, that by mixt generations of vnlike kinde of Nature vnaturally procreeth, ¶ I leaue to others discourse. Leuimus & Lennius tels, that of the marrow in a Mans back-bone is ingendered a Serpent; yea, of an Egge which an old Cocke will forth of the Water another like a Woman with a smooth face, her haire partly hanging, and partly gathered into a knot, and blacke of colour; her face very faire, rolie lippes, fingers and brefts well proportioned, but her lower parts hidden in the water: Thus from morning till Sun-set, they fedde their greedy eyes with this spectacle, which then ranke downe againe into the Waters. Hondius speaks of a Mermaid taken in the Netherlands, and taught to Spin: I swear not to the truth of it. But many Histories speake of some like Men in their whole shape both in our and other Coasts, and some like Lions: and for Mermaides, in the Voyage of Henry Hudson for Northerly Discouerie 1608. Thomas Hills and Robert Rainer saw one rise by the Ship side on the fiftenth of June; from the Naull vpwards her backe and breasts like a Woman, as likewise her bignesse of body: her afterparts like a Porpie, and speckled like a Mackerill: when they called their company to see it, shee ranke downe. I might adde many other Creatures strange and wonderfull, and yet not so wonderfull, as the effects and veruies which Albertus, Miraldus, and others tell of these and other Creatures. Such are the Sea-kine, lesser then the Land-kine, the Tartaruca a Tortoise, which liueth in the Deserts of huge bignesse, &c.

The people which inhabite Africa are Arabians, Moores, Abissines, Egyptians, and diuers sorts of the Heathens; differing in Rites from each other, as shall follow in our discourse. The Monsters which Plinie, and others tell of, besides Munster and Sabeliens out of them, I neither beleue, nor report.

CHAP. II.

Of Egypt and the famous River Nilus. and first Kings, Temples, and Monuments, according to HERODOTVS, DIODORVS, and others.

The names of Egypt, and of the River Nilus.

FET our generall view of Africa, Egypt may iustly challenge the principall place in our African discourse, as being both in situation next to Asia (whence we are lately come) and consequently from thence first peopled; besides that Religion, our Load-Starre hath here found the soonest and solemnest entertainment. And not in Religion alone, but in Police, Philosophie, and Artes, the Grecians which would seeme the first Fathers of these things, haue beene Disciples to the Egyptians, as Am. Marcellinus, and D. Siculus, Plutarch, and many others asseme. Hence Orpheus, Musaeus and Homer fetched their Theologie; Lycurgus and Solon their Lawes; Pythagoras, Plato, Anaxagoras, Eudoxus, Democritus, Dadalus, here borrowed that knowledge for which the World hath euer since admired them. Let it not then be imputed to me as a tedious officiousness, if I longer detain the Reader (otherwise delighted with the view of those rills which hence haue flowed among the Greeke and Latine Poets and Philosophers) in Surueighing these Egyptian Fountaines and Well-springs; whence haue issued especially a deluge of Superstition, that in elder times drowned all the neighbouring parts of the World. Nor let it be tedious vnto vs to behold (in this Historiall Theater) those Egyptian Rarities; the sight whereof hath drawne not Philosophers alone but great Princes too, and mightie Emperors, to the vndertaking of long and dangerous journeyes: As Scuerus, who though hee forbid Iudaisme and Christianitie, yet went this Pilgrimage, in honour of Serapis, and for the strange sights of Memphis, Memnon, the Pyramides, Labyrinth, &c. Vespasian also and others did the like.

The name of Egypt (saith Isophorus) is Masse of Misraim, the sonne of Cham, as the Egyptians themselves are called Misrai. So the Arabians at this day call it (as Leo asseme) but the Inhabitants they call Chibis. This Chibis they say was he which first ruled this Country, and built houses therein. The Inhabitants also doe now call themselves thus: yet are there not now left any true Egyptians, save a few Christians; the Mahometans haue mingled themselves with the Arabians and Africans. These Christians are hereupon called Coptis, of their Nation, as Master Brerewood obserueth, not of their Religion, which is the same with the Iacobites. And the Egyptians in some ancient Monuments are termed Agophtis: and the name Agophtis (which some deriue from Agophtis brother of Danuel) is likelier to come of that Chibis: or this Agophtis: and all these names may seeme to tellect vs of a twofold Winter, vnder both Tropikes at the same time; vnder Cancer the rainy Winter, which in manner (as ye haue heard) attends on the Sunne; vnder Capricorne the Astronomical Winter, in the Suns abience, where also he supposeth it to raine at that time, by reason of the high Hills there situate, and the great Lakes which minister store of moisture, besides that Cancer is then in the house of the Moone. Again, the winds $\approx$ Etesy (that is to say, ordinary yearly) in their annuall course, euer Winter lift vp the Cloudes to the tops of the Hills, which melt them into raine, whereby all the Riuer in Ethiopia are filled: and cause those ouer-flowings, which in Nilus is strangelt, because it is in Egypt farthest off from the raines that cause it. Aristides 7 sayth, that Aristotle found by his wit, and Alexander by experience, sending men thither for that purpose, that raines were the cause of this ouer-flowing, and that those raines were caused by Etesian winds, which (sayth hee) are by the approaching Sunne ingendred in the North parts, and carried to the South, where meeting and multiplying on the tops of the high Ethiopian Hills, they cause raines. Master Sandys affirmeth, that some moeth before this rising of Nilus, for diuers dayes you shall here see the troubled Ayre full of blacke and ponderous Cloudes; and heare a continuall rumbling, threatening to drowne the whole Countrey, yet seldom so much as dropping, but carried Southward by the North winds that constantly blow at that season. The Egyptians by three Pitches Hieroglyphically intimated a threefold cause; the Earth, the South Ocean, and these raines. Strange it is, that the Earth of Egypt adioyning to the Riuer, preferred, and weighed daily, 21 keeps the same weight till the seuenteenth of Iune, and then growes daily heavier with the increase of the Riuer: experimented generally affirmed by French, English, and others.

Marcus Fridericus Wendelinus hath written a large Booke, which hee calleth Admiranda Nili, and hath preambled with a pretie Preface Booke of the wonders of water, Saint Ambrose had given him a good Text in his Hexameron. The Sea, saith hee, is good, the hostly of Riuer, the fontaine of flowers, the derivation of ouer-flowings. By it remote Nations are ioyed, danger of battles are remoued, Barbarian furie is bounded, it is a helpe in necessitie, in perils a refuge, a delight in pleasures, wholsome life to the health, communitie of men separated, compendiousness of travelling, a shelter of the afflicted; a Subsidie to the publick Treasury, the nourishment of sterility. Hence are flowers transfused on the Earth, the Sunne drawing the water of the Sea, by his rarifying beames, and exhaling it up to the colder shade clouds; there cooled and condensate into stremes, which not only temper the drought, but makes fertile the fields. What should I recken the Manners which are as it were embordered Jewels, in which those which with firme purpose of chastitie put off the secular enticements of intemperance, may chuse to be bid to the world, and to auoid the doubtfull turnings of this life. The Sea therefore is the Closet of Temperance, the Schoole of Continuance, the retiring place of Gravity, the Haven of Securitie, the time-tempests calme, the sollicitie of the world, the incentive of deuotion, the voyce of singers contending with the waves, furies, &c. These prayles of that holy Father giuen to the Sea, may here be set as Prince Nilus his Inheritance, the Oceans eldest sonne, a Riuer of longer course, and further fetched, and more knowne pedigree then any Riuer that age of the Ancients knew, and from so equall an arbitrement to three Seas, the West-Atlantike, the East-Indian, and vnknowne-South running so many degrees to the North, in pilgrimage to that holy ground where Christ himselfe had sought refuge, and whence by a mightie hand God had deliuered Israel, and in whose waters Moses made the beginning of the Egyptian plagues. For more holinesse was in Christis feet, then could be vnholinesse in Egyptis elder Idolatries, or later Mahumetan Furies: and yet those precious feet impart no holinesse to the ground or men, where Faith receiueu not what thence readily floweth. Still doth Nilus vise, and euer forsakes those whom Christ visited, and which haue forsaken Christ, as drowning himselfe for anguish, or vnder the Seas bottom to seeke close and priuate Intelligence with Iordan, where the waters are as pestiferous in that Dead Sea, as were the deeds Dauidist which ouerwhelmed the Sodomites Region therein, and from the neighbouring Region chased the Canaanites first, and after the carnall Israelites. But I am almost drowned also betwixt these places of Diuine Iudgement. Wendelinus hath giuen vs the elder names Schebor, $\mu\lambda\lambda\alpha\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, Oceanus; Egyptus, Tremis, Aboras, Isuptus, Egyptus, Giebor, Syris, Chrysothron, Neym, Mahara, Ababaisus, Syne, Dyris. Hee telvs also the originall (out of the Negus his Title) to be in Goyene, a Countrey liubet to the Abissine: argueth against the conceits of those which make Nilus one of the Riuer of Paradise, and Philosophically discounteth of the ouer-flowing, the mounthes and issues, and the qualities thereof, but so largely that I rather refferre the studious to him, then presume hence to enlarge this Discourse already tedious. He hath packed his Booke as a full store-house of ancient and moderne, Ethnike and Christian authorities of all kinds in this Argument. In my Voyages now published Aluarez and the Iesuits giue great light to this Obscure-famous Riuer.

P. II.

The division of Egypt, and the great workes of their Ancient Pharaos.

Egypt was anciently divided into Thebaïs Delta, and the Region interiacent: and these subdivided into fixe and thirty Nomi, which we call Shires, whereof Tenty and Heliopolis were the assignement of Jacobs Family, & then called Goshen, from whence Moses after conducted them into Canaan, as Serabo & also witnesseth. The wealth of Egypt, as it proceedeth from Nilus, so is it much increased by the conveyance in the natural and hand-laboured channels & thereof. Their harvest beginneth in April, and is threshed out in May. In this one Region were sometimes (by Herodotus and Plinius report) twenty thousand Cities: Diodorus & Siculus sayth eighteenth thousand: and in his time, three thousand. He also was told by the Egyptian Priests, that it had been governed about the space of eighteenth hundred yeeres, by the Gods and Heroes; the last of whom was Orus: after whom it was vnder Kings vntill his time, the space almost of fifteen hundred yeeres. To Herodotus they reported of three hundred and thirty Kings from Menas to Sesostrius.

tian opinion, esteeming their houses their Innes, and their Sepulchres their eternall habitations. Of the race of Simandus was Ogdous, that built e Memphis (called in the Scripture Neph) compassing a hundred and fifty furlongs, at the parting of Nilus into that Delta- dion, where the succeeding Kings abode, forsaking Thebes till Alexandria was after built by Alexander.

Thebes was called Dispalis, or Impieri City, where (as Strabo [†] reporteth) was consecrated to Impiter a beautifull Virgin of noble birth, who, vntill the time that shee had her naturall purgation, had the carnall company of whomsoever shee pleased, and at this her menstruous accident was bewayled as dead, and after married. Such Virgins the Greeks (sayth he) called Pallades. Many yeeres after Ogdous, succeeded Sesostris. § Sesostris is of o. 1 pinion, that Herodotus erred in the name, and ascribed the deeds of ^h Shishak to Sesostris; to which also the computation of Herodotus doth agree reasonably in the time, 1 Others account him the same with Sesachius in Diodorus. The huge Conquests of this Sesostris are beyond all that euer Alexander atchieued, if we credit Authors. At his returne hee builded in eu-ery City of Egypt a Temple to their chiefe God at their owne costs; and offered a ship of Cedar two hundred and eighty Cubits in length, siluered on the in-side, gilded on the outside, to the chiefe God at Thebes, and two Ob-lisks one hundred and twenty Cubits high, wherein were ingrauen the greatnesse of his Empire and Reuenues. At Memphis in the Temple of Uolcan he dedicated Statues of himselfe and his wife, thirty Cubits high, of his children twenty. And when he went to the Temple, or through the City, his Chariot was 2 drawne by Kings, as Lucan singeth:

Veni ad Oceanum mundi, extrema Sesostris;
Et Pharios currus Regum cernitibus egi,

Sesostris in the Westerne World; by Warre Compelled Kings to draw his Memphian Carre.

Thus we read in our owne Chronicles ^k of Edgarus Pacificus, sometimes King of England, rowed in a Boat by eight Kings, himselfe holding the Sterne.

^l Tactus ^l rellcth of Rhameses an Egyptian King, who conquered the East and South parts of the World, helped herein (as the Priests told Germanicus) with the forces of Thebes, who had then seven hundred thousand fighting men. This was written in Egyptian Characters at Thebes, interpreted by one of the Priests, together with his reuenues not inferior to the Romane or Parthian Empires. Pheron, the Sonne and Successor of Sesostris, enraged at the rage of Nilus, swelling aboute eightene Cubits, cast a Dart against the streame, ^m and thereupon lost his sight, which by the aduice of the Oracle in Butis, was restored by the vrine of a woman, which had neuer knowne man but her husband; which caused him to burne his owne wife, and many other, sayling in this new experiment, and to marry her whom at last he found by this prooffe to be honest. He set vp in the Temple of the Sunne two Pillars, each of one stone of 100. Cubits high, and eight broad. After succeeded Memphites, Rhadinus, and Cheops. This last shut vp all the Temples in Egypt and busied them in his owne workes, one hundred thousand by course ten yeeres together, in building a Pyramis for his Sepulchre.
The least stone was thirty foot, and all grauen. Nilus passeth vnder it by a Trench. It was reckoned among the Wonders of the World. His daughter and brother made two other; odious therefore to the Egyptians who will not once name them. This was hollow, the other solid. They did it (sayth he) in hope of the Resurrection. For they would not intere their dead bodies, because of the Wormes, nor burne them, because they esteemed fire, a liuing creature, which feeding thereon, must together with it perish. They therefore with Nutre and Cedar, or with compositions of Myrrhe, Cassia, and other Odours thus preserue them. ⁿ Scaliger sayth, ^o they see these bodies in their dining Roomes, that their Children and Nephewes might behold them whiles they were eating. Some also report, ^p That the poorer sort vsed hereunto the stony Bitumen of the Dead Sea, which had preliued an infinite number of Carcasses in a dreadfull Cave (not farre from these Pyramides) yet to bee seene with their flesh and members whole, after so many thousand yeeres, and some with their haire and teeth: Of these is the true *Mummi*a.

^q The Mores and Indians violate the Sepulchres: and either burne them, (as is reported they sometimes doe, in stead of fire-wood, which is scarce in those parts) or else sell them at Cairo, a body for a Dolor, the Citie being nigh twenty miles from thence. For these *Mummi*a are neere the place where Memphis sometimes stood. In that place are some indifferent great, and a number of little Pyramides with Tombs of feuerall fashions; many ruinated, and many violated: the ancient Egyptians coueuing there to bee buried, as the place supposed to sometime

thebody of Osiris. Vnder every one, or wherefoeuer lye stones not naturall to the place, by removing the same, descents are discovered like the narrow mouthes of Wells, having holes in each side of the walls, to descend by (but with troublesome passage) some well-nigh ten fadome deepe, leading into long Vaults (belonging, it should seeme, to particular Families) hewen out of the Rock with pillars of the same. Betweene every arch the corpses lye rancke one by another, shrowded in a number of folds of linnen, swathed in bands of the same, the breasts of some being stayned with hieroglyphicall Characters. Within their bellies are painted papers, and their gods inclosed in little models of stone or metall: some of the shape of men in coat-armours, with the heads of Sheepe, Hawkes, Dogs, &c. others of Cats, Beetles, 10 Monkeys, and such like. They wrapt the dead bodies in manifold folds of linnen beemered with gumme, and after other ceremonies laid the corps in a boat to be wafted over Acherusia, a Lake on the South side of the Circle by Charon (so they called the Ferry-man) and there the body was brought before certayne Iudges, who, if conuicted of euill life, depriv'd it of buriall: the most terrible of punishments to the Egyptians. About this Lake stood the Temple of Hecate, with the Ports of Cecrops and Leibes; or Oblivion: Sisyx and other Poeticall fables had hence their derivation. But let vs returne to the Pyramides; and view them as they now stand, with Master Sandy; his eyes having first told a miracle, or imposture rather of the Moores with pieces of Mummies sticke in the sands, many thousands on Good Friday resorting to see the armes and legs of dead men appearing on the other side of Nilus, to the gyane 20 of the Ferry-man, for this cause perhaps, deluding the superstitious vulgar. Banringarten mentions it in his time; and thought it an illusion of the Deuill: whether Hee, or His, wee will not now examine.

Full west from Cairo, close vpon the Libyan Deserts, having crossed Nilus, and a Playne twelve miles over, they came to the three Pyramides, the greatest of them is ascended by two hundred and fiftie five steps, each step above three feet high, of a breadth proportionable. No stone so little through the whole, as to bee drawne by our carriages, brought out of the Mountaynes of Arabia, with a double wonder of the conueyance and mounting. The North side is most worne by reason of the humiditie of the Northerne winde in these parts. From the top is discerned the Countrey, with her beloved Nile, the Mammes and many huge Pyramides as farre off, each of which, were this away, might be reputed wonderfull. Descending 30 on the East side, below from each corner equally distant, they approached the entrance, into which they went with a light in euery mans hand: a narrow and dreadfull passage, stooping or creeping, as downe the steepe of an hill an hundred foote, the descent fill continuing, but few daring to venter further. (Plinius writes, that at the bottome is a spacious pit, eightie and sixe cubits deepe, filled at the overflow by concealed Conduits; others adde, that there is in the midst a little Iland, on that the Tombe of Cheops the Founder.) Master Sandy saith, That climbing over the mouth of this dungeon, they ascended by like vncasie passage about an hundred and twentie feete; and thence passing through a long irksome entrie directed forward, they came to a little roome with a compass roote of polished marble. From 40 hence they climbed an hundred and twentie feete higher, at the top entring a goolly roome twentie foote wide, and fortie foote long; the roote of a maruailous height, the stones so great, that eight floores it, eight roofes it; eight flagg the ends, and sixteene the sides, all of well wrought Theban marble. At the vpper end is a Tombe of one stone, vncovered and emptic, breft high, seuen foote in length, and almost foure in breadth, sounding like a bell, more probably supposed the Builders sepulchre. If any desire a more exact survey, let him resort to our Authour, and other eye and pen-witnelles. Not farre hence is that Sphinx, a huge Colosse, with the head of a Maide, and body of a Lion, supposed by Belonius, to be the monument of some sepulchre, by Plinius, of Amasis. It yet continueth all of one stone, and is a huge 50 face, looking toward Cairo. The compass of the head, saith P. Martyr * aneye-witnesse, is fiftie eight paces. Plinius * numbred eight Pyramides, and saith, That the compass of this Sphinx, about the head, was an hundred and two feete, the length an hundred and fortie three. Master Sandy affirmeth, that vnto the mouth it consists of the naturall Rocke, thus aduanced; the rest of huge flat stones laid thereon, wrought altogether into the forme of an Ethiopian woman (heretofore adored by the people) not so huge as before reported, the whole being but sixtie foote high: the face disfigured by Time, or the Moores superstition, detesting Images. Plinius writes, That three hundred and sixtie thousand men were twentie yeeres in making one of the Pyramides; and three were made in seuenie eight yeeres and foure moneths. The greatest (saith he) couereth eight Acres of ground; and Belonius affirmeth, That the Pyramides rather exceed, then fall short of the reports of the Ancient; and 60 that a strong and cunning Archer on the top, is not able to shoot beyond the fabrick of one; which Villamont, being there, caused to bee tried and found true. William Luthew writeth, as their Dragoman told him: the top thereof is all that the height of one is 1092. foote, b as their Dragoman told him: the top thereof is all one

Mycerinus is reckoned the next King, better beloved of his subjects, whose daughter was buried in a wooden Bull ^d in the Citie Sai; to which every day were odors offered, and a light set by night. This Ox once a yeere was brought out to the people. Next to him was Apschu, who made a Pyramid of bricks; and these bricks were made of earth, that claued to the end of a pole for this purpose, in a vaine curiositie thrust into a Lake. Yet were ¹⁰ all their wonders exceeded by the Labyrinth, the worke (say some) of Prammetichus, or (after Herodotus) of the twelve Peeres which reigned in common as Kings; partly above ground, partly beneath, in both containing 3500. roomes. Herodotus saith, he saw the upper roomes, the lower he might not, as being the sepulchres of the Founders, and of the sacred Crocodiles: all was of stone, and grauen. The caule of making this Labyrinth is diversely delivered; by Demetrius, the Palace of Mothetudes; by Lysias, the sepulchre of Meru; the most probable opinion, that it was consecrated to the Sunne: the patterne to Dedalus, for that in Crete, representing but the hundredth part of this. The entrance was of Parian marble pillars. The worke was diuided into Regions ^c and perfectures, sixteen vast houses being attributed to sixteen of them. There were also Temples for all the Egyptian gods; and Nemesis above in sitene Chappels: many Pyramids also, each of fortie elles, and founded on fixe walls. After a wearie journey they come to those inexplicable wayes (the Labyrinth of this Labyrinth) hauing before ascended high Halls and Galleries, each of ninetie steps, inly adorned with pillars of Porphyrie, Images of their Gods, statues of Kings, and monstrous shapes. Some of the houses were so leated, that the opening of the doores caused a terrible thunder: As terrible was the darke wayes: and most of all, without a guide, the inextricable windings, insold walls, and manifold deceiuing doores, making by many passages, none at all. No cement or mortar was vsed in all this huge worke.

The Lake of Meru was not lesse wonderfull, compassing three thousand fixe hundred furlongs, and fiftie fadome in depth, made by Meru, whose name it beareth: in the middle were two Pyramids fiftie fadome above, and as much beneath water, one for himselfe, the other for his wife: The water flowes fixe moneths out, and fixe moneths in, from Nilus. The fish were worth to the Kings coffers twentie of their pounds a day, the first fixe; and a talent a day, the last fixe moneths. Of Nemus, whom the Scripture calls Pharaoh Necho, and of his victorie againe the Syrians in Magdolo, or Magiddo, where he slue King Iosiah, Herodotus witnesseth. Hee also makes this Nemus author of that Trench; from Nilus to the Red Sea (which Strabo ascribes to Sesostris. Plinius ^e makes Sesostris first Author, seconded by Darius, who in this businesse was followed by Ptolemaus) one hundred foot broad, feuen and thirtie miles long; but forced to leaue the enterprise, for feare of the Red Sea ouer-flowing Egypt, or mixing his water with Nilus.

Tremellius thinks it to be the labour of the Israelites, in that seruitude from which Moses freed them. He consumed in this worke 120000. Egyptians. After him reigned Sammis, and then Apries. About these times Nabuchodonosor conquered the Egyptians according to Ezechiel's prophesie, Ezech. 30. But they had also ciuill warres. Amasis ^b deprived Apries, who, being of a base birth, of a great bason of gold in which himselfe and his guests had vied to wash their feete, made an Image and placed it in the most conuenient part of the Citie, and obseruing their superstitious deuotion thereunto, said that they ought now no lesse to respect him, notwithstanding his former base birth and offices. When hee was a priuate man, to maintayne his prodigall expences, he vied to steale from others: and when they redemanded his thefts, hee being a King, did neglect. Hee brought from the Citie Elephantina twentie dayes sayling, a building of solid stone, the rooffe being of one stone, one and twentie cubits long, fourteene broad, and eight thicke, and brought it to the Temple at Sai. Hee ordained, that every one should yearly giue account to the Magistrate, how hee liued, and maintayned himselfe. And he which brought a false account, or liued by vnjust meanes, was put to death. Hee was buried, as was supposed, in that Sphynx above said. Pammenius his sonne succeeded, whom Cambyses deprived.

CHAP. III.

Of the Egyptian Idols, with their Legendarie Histories, and Mysteries.

§. I.

Of Osiris and Isis, their Legends of the Creation, &c.

Fwe stay longer on this Egyptian Stage, partly the varietie of Authors may excuse vs which have entreated of this Subject, partly the varietie of matter, which adding some light to the Diuine Oracles, (not that they need it; which are in themselves a Light ^a shining in a darke place; but because of our need, whole Owlsh-eyes cannot so easily discern: that light) deserueth a larger relation. For whether the Histories of the old Testament, or the Prophecies of the New, be considered, both there literally wee reade of Egyptian Rites practised, and here mystically of like Superstitions in the Antichristian Synagogue renewed, theretofore ^b spiritually called Sodom and Egypt. No where can Antiquitie plead a longer succession of er-rour; no where of Superstition more multiplicitie; more blind zeale, in prosecuting the same themselves; or crueltie in persecuting others that gaine-said. Oh Egypt! wonderfull in Nature, whose Heauens is brass, and yet thine Earth not Iron; wonderfull for Antiquitie, Arctes and Arctes; but no way so wonderfull, as in thy Religions, wherewith thou hast disturbed the rest of the World, both elder and later, Heathen and Christian, to which thou hast bene a sinke and Mother of Abominations. Thy Heathenisme planted by Cham, watered by Iamnes, Iambres, Hermes, ouerflowed to Athens and Rome: Thy Christianisme was famous for many ancient Fathers; more infamous for that Arrian heresie, which rising heere, eclipsed the Christian Light; the World wondering and groaning to see it selfe an Arrian. I speake not of the first Monkes, whose Egge, here laide, was faire, and beginnings holy: but (by the Diuels brooding) brought forth in after-ages a dangerous Serpent: Thy Malumcellum encreased with like lightnesse of credulitie, with like eagernes of deuotion, hath bene no lesse trousome to the Arabian Sect in Asia and Africke; then before to the Heathens or Christians in Europe. The first Author (it seemeth) of this Egyptian, as of all other false Religions, was Cham (as before is said) which had taken deepe rooting in the dayes of Ioseph the Patriarch, and in the dayes of Moses; their Priests, ^c Wise men and Southlayers, confirming their deuotions with lying Miracles, as the Scriptures testifie of Iannes and Iambres; and ^d Hermes Trismegistus, of his Grandfather and himselfe. The Grecians ascribe the deuotions to Osiris and Isis: of whom the Historie and Myserie is so confused; that Typhon neuer heu'd Osiris into so many pieces, as these vaine Theologians and Mythologists haue done. They are tor-40 toooth in the Egyptian throne, King and Queene: in the Heauens, the Sonne and Moone; beneath these, the Elements; after Heraclitus, they are Bacchus and Ceres; Diodorus maketh Osiris the same with the Sonne, Serapis, Dionysius, Pluto, Ammon; Iupiter, Isis, the Moone; Ceres and Iuno, Apollodorus makes her Ceres; and Lo. Antonius, and Cleopatra stiked and fig-red themselves, the one Osiris, and the other Isis. In Macrobius, and Seruius, she is the nature of things; ^e He, Adonis, and Atis: Plutarch addeth to these Interpretations Oceanus and Sis-rinis; as to Isis, Minerva, Proserpina, Thetis. And if you haue not enough, Apuleius will helpe you, with Venus, Diana, Bellona, Hecate, Rhamnusia; and Heliodorus neuer home, maketh Os-iris to be Nidus, the Earth Isis. So true it is that ^f An Idol is nothing in the world, and Idola 50 Serapis, whom Moses calleth also Ischa, Orus Apello, therefore called Isis, because at the first rising of that Starre, they prognosticated what should happen the yeere following. The like was in use amongst the Cilicians, who obserued the first rising of that starre from the top of Taurus; and thence saith Manilius,

*Euentus singulis variis & tempora decus,
 Quae, ualido ueniat, concordia quantae.*

Thence they foretell what store of fruits or want,
 What times, what health, what concord, they descent.

Truly in the first Booke of his Diuination, reciteth the same out of Heraclides, Ponticus of 60 the Cel. But the Egyptians had more cause to obserue that Starre, because Nilus doth then begin to encrease. And therefore from thence they began to reckon their Tekubim or quarters of their yeere, as the Iewes from Nisan.

of Asclepius: of which name were three learned Egyptians, Asclepius Ulicani, Inuenter of Physicke, Asclepius Iamtheri, Inuenter of Poetry, and another which had no surname, whom Hermes dedicated some of his Bookes; and the same Asclepius ¹ in the beginning of his first Booke calleth him 'elte the Scholler of Hermes. In the Writings of these Egyptians, transbrought into Greeke, and explained by the Egyptian Priests, the Greeke Philosophers, especially Platonikes and Pythagoreans, learned their Diuine, Morall, and Naturall Philoſophy. Antiquity and Learning hold vs longer in these mens company; the more curious may haue recourse to their owne works. For my owne opinion, I cannot beleuee so ancient Monuments of Ethicke Authours to remayne: but, as in the Syllabi, Berosus, Hemecb, and many other old Authours lost, some new obtruded on the World in their Names. Yet I leaue to each man his owne censur.

Twenty thousand Rixes are ascribed to Hesus: some say thirtie sixe thousand five hundred twenty five. He in his Aclepius translated by Apuleius thus writteth. Egypte is the Image of Heauen, and the Temple of the whole World. But the time shall come when the Egyptian deuotion shall proue vaine, and their pietie fruitlesse: for the Diuinitie shall returne to Heauen, and Egypt shall be forsaken of her gods. And no marvell, seeing that these Gods were Idols, the workes of mens hands, as himselfe ¹ after sheweth: and when as they could not make foules, they called, or ² conuined into them the soules of Deuils or Angels, by which the Images might haue power to doe good or euill. For thy Grandfather, O Aclepius (ayth he) was the first Inuentor of Physicke, to whom is a Temple consecrated in a Mountayne of Libya, where his worldly man (his body) resteth: for the reft, or rather his whole selfe is gone to Heauen; and doth now heale men by his Deirys, as then by his Physicke. The lame doth Mercury my Grandfather, preferring all such as resort to him. May the willing Reader leane further of their Superstitions, which hee thus freely confesteth in that Author, whose Prophecie, God bee thanked, by the bright and powerfull Sun-sonne of the Gospel, was long since effected.

Hus far haue we launched out of their History, into their Mysteries. To returne to the Relation of their Beasts and Bestiall Superstitions, Lucian saith, That Apis represented the Celestiall Bull; and other Beasts which they worshipped, other signes in the Zodiacke. They that respected the Constellation of Pisces, did eat no fish, nor a Goat, if they regarded Capricorne. Aries a heauenly Constellation, was their heauenly deuotion: and not here alone, but at the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon. Sirabo saith, That they nourished many Creatures, which they accounted sacred, but not Gods. This nourishment, after e Diadema, was in this sort. First they consecrated vnto their maintenance sufficient Lands. Such Votaries also had ascribed their children from some dangerous wickedness, accustomed to shawe their haire, and putting it in gold or silver, offered it to their Priests. The Hawkes they fed with goblets of flesh, and putting in Birds caught for them. The Cats and Ichneumons, with bread, and milke, and fish: and like wise the rest.

 falleth downe and doeth worsh.p. When any of them dyeth, it is wrapped in fine Linnen, fal-led out and embalmed with Cedar and sweet Oymyntes, and buried in a holy place, the reason-being men howling and knocking their breista, in the streets of these vntaionable beastes.
 Yes, when famine hath driuen them to eat manns flesh, the zeale of deuotion hath preu-vntouched their sacred reuerence. And if a Dogge dy in a house, all in that household taste themselves, and make great lamentation. If Wine, Wheate or other food be found, where ther places obiected others : as Mnevis, a blacke Bull, consecrated to the Sunne, as Apu was to the Moone; with his haire growing forward, worshipped at Heliopolis ; Bacis, another, that was fayne to change colour every houre, at Hermuthus ; besides, Onophris, and Memphis, other-where. Thus by Sinne, Beasts became Gods, Men became Beasts ; at this be not a bader degree of balenelle, to worship Beasts, and in them, Devils : to content themselves with meane houses, and neuer to be contented with the magnificence and sumptuousnesse of their Temples to Beasts. 2. Splendida sana cum lucis, & Templa cum vestibulis & portibus admirandis : intragressus autem videbis adorari selem, &c. that is, They have glorious Chappels, with Grotes, and stately Temples, with goodly Gate-ways and Porches : but when you are within once, you shall see nothing but a Cat (or some such Carrion) worshipped, &c. And even at this day, in Cayra and other places of Egypt, they account it (according to their Alchameane Superstition) no small point of charitie, to be bountifull and liberal to Birds, which they will redeeme to libertie; and to Dogges, Cats, and other Beasts, setting them meate and good prouision at appointed times.

As for the Camell, that hath carried the Alcoran at Mecca in their Pilgrimage, yee have heard already, how religious they esteeme the touch thereof : Doula saw the like at Constantinople ; some plucking off his haire as holy relikes, some killing him, some wiping off his sweat, therewith to rub their faces and eyes, all entertaining him with frequent conference, and at last eating his flesh, distributed into small parts for that purpose.

Weare further to know, that although Egypt worshipped beasts, yet not all, the same : these d only were vniuersally receiued ; three beasts, a Dogge, a Cat, a Bull : two Fowles, the Hawke, and the Ibis ; two fishes, Lepidus and Otrynchus. Other beasts have their Sects of Worshippers ; as sheepe among the Thebans and Saits ; the fish called Latus, among the Latopolitans ; a Cynocephalus, at Hermopolis (which is a kind of great Ape, or Monkie, naturally circumcised, and abhorring from fish) a Wolfe at Lycopolis. The Babylonians nere to Memphis, worshipped a beast called Cepus, resembling in the face a Satyre, in other parts, partly a Dogge, partly a Beare : Likewise, other Cities, other beasts, which caused great dissension, whereof Isenud :

Ardes albus Combs & Tentyra, summus viris,
Inde furor vulgo, quod numina vicinorum
Ody videri, locum
Combs and Tentyra doe both yet burne
With mutual hate, because they both doe spurne
At one anothers Gods, &c.

Strabo saith, in the Namus, on Shire of Arinoe, diuine honour giuen to a Crocodile, kept tame in a certaine Lake by the Priests, and named Sachus, nourished with Bread, Wine, and Flesh; which the Pilgrims that came to visit him, offered. Now the Tentyrites, and those of Elephantina, killed Crocodiles. And in the Citie of Hercules they worshipped an Ichneumon, a beast that destroyeth Crocodiles and Alpes, and therefore euen at this day of much estimation, as Belusius 8 obserueth, where you may see his description. These imagined that Typhon was transformed into a Crocodile. At Hermopolis they worshipped a Goat : and Goats had carnall mixture with Women.

The Omibites (more beastly) esteemed themselves fauoured of their Crocodile God, if he filled his paunch with the flesh and blood of their dearest Children, as Balbi, and others report of the Moderne Inhabitants of Pegu, before related. King Mena built a Citie called Crocodile, and dedicated the Neighbour-henne to their food. They were as scrupulous in the use of meats as some, abstained from Cheefe, some from Beanes, some from Onions, others after their owne fancies. This multiplicitie of Sects is ascribed to the policie of their ancient Kings, according to that Rule, Divide et Rale. For it was not likely they would joyne in Conspiracy, whom Religion (the most mortall make-bate) had dissipated. As Geoprus, where the holies of Ast were most solemne, there were (sayth Sihan) store of great Scorpions, which presently killed such as they stung ; but yet the women which there lamented Ast, no lesse then Widowes the death of their Husbando, or Mothers of their Children ; and going bare-foot, are neuer hurt by them. Heere Sihan deuoted the Male Goats to their bellies, the Females to their Goddesses. Hawkes were consecrated to Orus or the Sunne, because they see and looke directly against the Sun-beames : of this bird they fabled that it liued seven hundred yeeres. They which will, may find in that his tenth Booke, the Reasons of diuine rather their beastly and foule deuotions, to Fowles and Beasts ; too tedious for this place.

They hel'd Serpents in so sacred account, that o Ofria is neuer painted without them : and Iosephus saith, That it was reckoned a happinesse (which I thinke few would enuy them to be bitten of Alpses, as also to be deuoured of Crocodiles. Venimus was that Old Serpent, which both here, and in other Nations, then, and at this day, hath procured diuine honor to this first Instrument of Hell : As if he would thus exalt this Trophie of his ancient conquest, in delight both of God and Man, in that Creature whereby Man perished, and which God had cursed : except we will rather attribute it to a deuillish malice, or apish imitation of that Brayen Serpent, set up by Moses in the Wilderness, the figure of Christ crucified, who brake this Serpents head. Ieremie the Prophet was stoned (some ha' say) at Tanis in Egypt, and was afterwards worshipp'd of the Inhabitants there (such was their difference of Sects) for his present remedying the stings of Serpents.

I thinke by this time, either my Relation, or their superstition, is tedious: and yet I have not mentioned other their gods, both stinking and monitrous. Loth am I to search the Waters for their deified Frogs, and Hippopotami; or play the Scauenger, to present you with their Beetle-gods, out of their priuies: yea, their Priuies, ¹ and Farts, had their vniuolue canonization, and went for Egyptian deities; Lettice lutable to such lips. So Herome ² denieth their dreadfull deitie, the Onion, and stinking Fart, Crepidat ventris infans quæ Pelusiac religio,³ which they worshipped at Pelusium. Lefse brutish, though not lesse idolatrous, was it in ⁴ Ptolemeus Philopator, to erect a Temple to Homer, in which his Image was placed, to comply stultified enuironed with those Cities which challenged him for theirs. That came next to reason in the Egyptian ⁵ deities (though farre enough from Religion) when they exprest God like a Man with an egge in his mouth, thereby intimating that God created the World with his Word. So in the Citie Sai they exprest in hieroglyphikes an Infanz, an old Man, a Hawke, a Fish, and a Riuer-horfe, on the doores of Minerva's Temple, as Minerna should say, O, yee which are borne and die know that God hateth impudence. This altho by the way we adde for difference of Egyptian hieroglyphikes and Indian pictures ⁶ in Mexico, that these exprest Histories, those concealed Mysteries: the Indians describing things as plainly as they could, the Egyptians yeelding a double shell before you come to the kernell; and therefore more implicate and difficult then the other. For that a picture of a Hawke, a Fish, and a Riuer-horfe should represent such creatures is euident: but that one of these should represent God, the second Hatred, the third Impudence, is a myserie, and if well searched, an absurditie, and a thing much to beadmired that wise men should so admire things so ridiculous.

10 Their sacrifices were so diversified in their kinds, that Peucer saith, they had six hundred three score and six several sorts of them: Some they had peculiar to special gods; as to the Sunne, a Cocke, a Swan, a Bull; to Venus, a Dove; to the celestiall Signes, such things as held correspondent similitude; besides, their sacrifices of Red-men to Osiris. Enfrise is said to have offered Therapsim (first Author of that Counsell, wroth to the Counsellor) thereby to appease angrie Nilus, that in nine yeeres had not our-bound. They offered every day three men at Heliopolis; in stead of which bloodie rites, Amasis after substituted so many waxen Images.

So compounded shapen, whole Images they adored. Some were their Canopi; fawled as it were in cloyes (to resembling Orms) with heads of owles, or other creatures. Ofries is sometime scene with the head of a Hawke, Isfs with the head of a Lion, Anubis alway with the head of a dogge; and contrariwise, beards pishured with the heads of Ofries and Isfs: monstrous misse-shapen figures, of misse-shapen monstrous myeries.

They borrow'd of the Jewes abstinence from Swines-flesh, and Circumcision of their Males; to which they add'd Excoication of their Females; ſhall obſerve the Chriſtians in thoſe parts. Theodore ſaith, That Pythagoras receiv'd circumciſion of the Egyptians, which they receiv'd of the Hebrewes. Amroſe ſaith, That the Egyptians circumciſed their ſons at the age of fourteen yeeres (as the Iſraelites at thirteen) becauſe that then the ſex of the population began to burne, which Reſon teacheth, to neede circumciſion : and therefore (ſe ſeemeth) they vied it in thoſe parts ſit the ſeats and inſtruments of Luſt ; and not either in regard of originall corruption, or the promiſed Seede, which were hidden myſteries mysteries to their mystricall superstitions. It is like, the Deuill would thus prophane this diuine Sacrament of Circumcision, as at this day in the Heathen Nations about Congo; and in Iucatan in America, before the Spaniards came there. They so abhorre Swine, * that if one by the way touch them, hee presently watheth himselfe and his garments. Neither may a Swine-heard haue access into their Temples, or marry with their daughters. Yet doe they offer Swine to the Moone and Bacchus (Ipsi and Osiris) when the Moone is at full. In this sacrifice they burne the Tayle, Milt, and Leafe; and (which on another day would be piacular) on that day of the full they eate the rest. Ælian * giueth this reason of their hatred of Swine, because it is a gluttonous beast, not sparing the flesh neither of their owne young, nor of men: as on the contrarie, they worship the Storke for her pietie, in nourishing her aged parents (that I speake not of their wed-locke chatitie; for breach whereof, y Crullus tells, from the relation of an eye-witnesse, That in a wood nere to Spire in Germanie, the Male complaining to a congregation of Storkes, caused them to tear his Mate in pieces.) The Egyptians also had a conceit, That Swines milke would breede the leprosie; and that Swine were beasts odious to the Sunne and Moone. He citeth out of Endoxus, That they spared them, for treading their Seede into the ground; which was their Harrowing and Tillage, when Nilus had newly left the softned Earth, to send these Labourers, their Kine and Swine, to tread in the myrie Earth the Come which they sowed therein. The Egyptians * sware by the head of their King; which oath whosoever violated, lost his life for the same, without any redemption.

The Priests, in old time renowned for their learning, in Strabens time were ignorant and vnlearned. No woman * might beare Priestly function. These Priests might not eate Eggs, Milke, or Oile (except with Salads: they might not salute Mariners, nor looke vpon their children or kinsfolks. They * wathed themselves in the day-time thrice, and in the night twice: they were shauen, wore linnen garments alwayes new wathed, were daily allowed sacred meates. * Of their ancient Priests, thus Dn Baris singeth in Syluesters tune:—

The Memphian Priests were deepe Philosophers,

And curious gazers on the sacred Starres, Searchers of Nature, and great Mathematickes,
Ere any letter knew the ancient Attickes:

Tertullian * speaks of the continence of Apis his Priests, and addes; That cestayne women, consecrated to the African Ceres, voluntarily relinquished marriage, and from thenceforth might not touch a Male, no, not so much as kisse their owne sonnes.

Their magicke skill appeared in Iannes and Jambres, which withstood Moses; and in Hermes testimonie of himselfe. R. Salomon on Exod. 8. writeth, That Pharao said to Moses and Aaron, Doe you bring straw into Ophraim, a Citie full of straw? And doe yee bring enchantments into Egypt, which aboundeth therewith? Posseius deriueth the Egyptian and Orientall sciences from Abraham, to whom he dareth to attribute their diuinations by the Aire, Water, Fire, Earth, Birds: and allegeth Rambams authoritie, That the greatest part of the Alcoran is taken out of the Egyptian learning; and saith, That Moses and Salomon studied the same, and expounded in Scripture, what Abraham had taught them: to which also hee ascribeth the Iewish Exorcismes, in casting out Devils. But some Deuill, I thinke, hath taught him so to commend these deuillish Arts, as he doth no lesse the Alcoran, and the Iewish Cabala, calling them an excellent Appendix to Moses, and both, of I know not what magicall facultie, first infused into Adam in the puritie of his creation, and taught by the Angell Raziel, by him deliuered in verball tradition; written first by Henech, the bookes whereof Nimrod stole from Noah, which Abraham might learne either in that Chaldean Nation; or from Melchisedech. But let vs obserue these Priests further.

Priests

Priests & of Isti, besides their shawings and linnen garments, had paper-shoes: on their heads, Anubis; in their hands a Timbrell, or a branch of Sea-wormewood, or a Pine-apple. They had one chiefe Priest, or Primare of Egypt, as appeareth by Iosephus and Heliodorus, who maketh Thymis to succcede his father Calasiris in this high Priesthood at Memphis. Manetho also enioyed this Pontifical Hierarchie, as appeareth by his Epistle to Ptolemus, which after shall follow. Philostratus speaketh of Gymnosophists, which some ascribe to India; Heliodorus to Ethiopia; he to Ethiopia and Egypt. These, saith he, dwell abroad without house, on a Hill a little off the banks of Nilus, where grew a Grove, in which they held their generall Assemblies, to consult of publike affaires, hauing otherwise their studies and sacrifices apart, each by himselfe. Theseus was the chiefe of this Monkish Colledge, when Apollonius, after his visitation of the Babylonian Magi, and Indian Brachmanes, came thither. These held the immortallitie of the soule, and accounted Nilus for a god. If a man at Memphis had by chance-medley killed a man, hee was exiled, till those Gymnosophists absolved him.

Heracles Temple; at Canopus; was priuileged with Sanctuary, to giue immunitie to Rogitives and Malefactors: Thus elsewhere, Osiris, at Apollo, in Syria; Diana, at Ephesus; eury Cardinals house (saith a Pope) in Rome; Saint Peter at Westminster; and other Popish Oratories, priuileged Denies of Theeues.

§. III.

Of their Feasts and Oracles.

Their Feasts were many: of which, Herodotus reckoneth one at Bubastis, in honour of Diana. To this place the Men and Women, at this festiuall solemnitie, fayed in great multitudes, with minstrelsie and showtings: and as they came to any Cirie on the waters side, they went on shore; and the women, some danced, some played, some made a bravie with the women of the place: and thus resorting to Bubastis, they there offered great Sacrifices, spending in this feast more Wine then in all the yeere besides. After resort of Men and Women, besides Children, seven hundred thousand. In Bubastis was solemnized the feast of Isti; in which, after the sacrifice, many thousands beat themselves: but with what they did beate themselves, was not lawfull to relate. The Carians that inhabited Egypt, did also cut their foreheads with swords, signifying thereby, that they were foreigners. This Cirie was in the midit of the Egyptian Delta, and in it, a very great Temple of Isti. A third feast was at Sai, in honour of Minerva, where assembling by night, they lighted candles full of Salt and Oile, and therewith went about the walls of the Cirie: This solemnitie was called Light-burning, or if you will, Candle-messe. This night, they which came not hither, yet observed the setting vp of Lights throughout Egypt. A fourth was at Heliopolis, in honour of the Sunne. A fifth at Bucus, of Latera, wherein onely sacrificing was vied. At Papremus was observed the solemnitie of Mars, with sacrifices, but till Sunneset, onely a few Priests were busied about the Image: a greater number of them foud before the doores of the Temple with wooden clubs, and ouer-against them about a thousand men that payed their vowes, each with clubs in their hands, who the day before carried the Image out of a gilded Chappell of Timber into another sacred Romaine; those few which were chosen for the Idoll-seruice, drawing a waggon with four wheelies, on which the Chappell and Image were carried. Those that stood at the Porch, forbade these to enter; but the Votaries, to helpe their god; beate and drave them backe. Here began a great clubbay, in which many were wounded, and many (although the Egyptians concealed it) dyed of the wounds. The cause (forsooth) was, because here was thirned the mother of Mars; to whom, her Sonnie, at ripe age, resorted to haue lye with, but was repelled by her seruants: whereupon, hee procuring helpe elsewhere, was slauing of them: Hence grew that solemnitie.

On the seventh day of the moneth Tybi, which was wereth to our Ianuarie and Decembre, was solemnized the coming of Isti out of Phoenicia; in which, many things were done in despite of Typhon. The Captives then hurled downe an Asse from a steepe place, and abused ruddie men for this cause. They had also in their Bacchanall-solemnitie, most abused ruddie men for this cause. They carried Images of a cubit length, with the priuie thy Rites; in which, being drunken, they carried Images of the elder Matrons. This Yard, Member of a monstrous size, with musicke, accompanied with the elder Matrons. They, which they called Psallus, was usually made of fig-tree. Herodotus saith, That besides their Swine-feast, they obtained another to Bacchus, without Swine, in like sort as the Greeks, in which, they had such cubittall Images made of sinewes, as Calus readeth it, made made to bee drawne to and fro with sinewes or strings, carried by women. In the moneth Thoth (which most what agreeth to September) the nineteenth day ⁴ was holy to Mercurie, in which they did eate honey and figs, saying withall, Trith se fuerit. On the ninth day of this moneth they obserued another feast; wherein every man before his doore did eate roasted fish: the Priests did not eate, but burne the same. Before is mentioned the seeking of Osiris. This was an Egyptian feast, obserued in the moneth Athyrr (which answereth somewhat to November) from the seuenteenth day (in which they imagined that Osiris perished) foure dayes were spent in mourning: the causes were foure; Nilus flaking, the Windes then blowing, the Dayes shortening, the Winter approaching. Here is the mysterie vnfolded. On the nineteenth day they went by night to the Sea, and brought forth a sacred Chist, in which was a golden Boxe, into which they powred water, and made a show; That Osiris was found. Then they mingled the Earth with Water, adding spices and costly perfumes, and made an Image of the Moone, applying these mysticall Rites to the nature of the Earth and Water. About the winter Solstice they carried a Cow seuen times about the Temple ⁵, in remembrance of the Sunnes circuit, which in the twenth moneth would be in the Summer Solstice.

The originall of Isis seeking Osiris, is before shewed. Some make Typhon the husband of Isis, which thus Osiris her sonne, or brother, (as diuers diuersly esteeme him) for inuice committed with her, and cut him in pieces. Annubis her Huntsman, by helpe of his dogs, found out the pieces againe. This (saith ⁶ Minutius Felix) is resembled every yeere, Nec desunt annis omnibus vel perdere quod inueniunt, vel inuenire quod perierunt. Hæc Egyptia quondam, nunc & sacra Romana sunt. Truly the Playes of Christ his Crucifying and Resurrection, which are obserued in all Churches of the Roman Religion yearly, might seeme to haue had this Egyptian originall. Once, Index expurgatorius, hath cut out Omnes tongue, where he speaketh against them, as ⁷ before vpon like occasion is noted. This feast is also mentioned by Iulius Firmicus, and others.

They had another feast called Pamytha, of Pamyte the Nurse of Osiris, who going to fetch water, heard a voyce, bidding her proclaime, That a great King and Benefactor was borne. On this holy day was carried in procession an Image with three itones, (as Pintarch ⁸ saith) with a three-fold yard; in which Ritee hee findeth a foolish mysterie, not worth the telling. But I thinke this Feast of Pamytha hath hurted every man.

The Egyptians had many Oracles of Hercules, Apollo, Minerva, Diana, Mars, Iupiter, and others. The Oracle of Latonæ at Butrys ⁹ told Cambyses, That hee should die at Ecbatana; whereby he secured himselfe for Syria, and yet there dyed, in an obscure village of that name, whereas he had interpreted it of the great Citie in Media. Their Apis and Serapis were also esteemed Oracles. Amun was deceiued by the Oracle of Serapis, telling him of his death, which he construed of Libya, and fell out in a place of the same name in Bithynia. At Pelusi sum, if we may beleue Achilles Statius ¹⁰, was the Temple, Image, and Oracle of Iupiter Castor; and by an Oracle, he maketh Leucippe, a Virgin, to be appointed for sacrifice. At Memphis, a Cow; at Heliopolis, the Bull Mneuis; at Arlinoe, the Crocodiles were their Oracles. But we were too tedious to relate the rest.

Of the inventions and disposition of the Egyptians.

THE best amongst their Inventions, wee may reckon the derimation of their superstitions to others. That the elder Romans entrayned these damnable Egyptian holies, appeareth by the Temples, Chappels, Streets, Coynes, dedicated vnto Isis, Serapis, &c. mentioned by Onuphrius, Rosinus, Orator, Edricius, Apianus, Amentius, Grutavius, Gulianus, Occo, and other writers of Roman Antiquities. Of Isis and Serapis were certayne publicke places in Rome, named Iseum and Serapeum. ¹¹ Isis sepulchre relateth of one Paulina, a noble woman of Rome, married to Saturninus, deuoted to the superstition of Isis; whom Dei Mundus had solicited in vaine to disbelongeth; notwithstanding the offer of two hundred thousand Drachmes (which comes to five thousand sixe hundred and twentie thousand) for one night; but with a quarter of that summe hee corrupted the Priests of Isis, one of which told Paulina, That the god Amun was inflamed with her loue, had sent for her; which message was welcome to her, and to her husband not distastefull. Thus Mundus, vnder pretence of Amun, obtaining a nights lodging, meeting her three dayes after, mercily rested at her, for sauing his money, but not her honettie: Whereupon Tiberius banished him, and crucified the Priests, and razed the Temple, commanding the Image of Isis to bee cast into Tiber. But these superstitions were renewed soone after, Vicinius ¹² the Emperour not refusing most in all the world, saith * Dion. This Antonius was in high estimation with him (some thinke, his Minion :) Hee dyed in Ægypt, either drowned in Nilus, as Adrian writeth, or (which is the truth) was sacrifice. For whereas Adrian was exceeding curious, and addicted to Divinations and Magicall Arts of all kindes (in the hellish rites whereof was required the soule of such a one as would die voluntarily) Antonius refused it not, and therefore was thus honoured, and had a Citie in Ægypt newly repaired from the ruines, and dedicated in his Name. Yea, hee reported 1 he law a new Starre, which (forsooth) was the soule of this Antonius. The Greekes made a God of him, and a giuer of Oracles; whereof Prudentius singeth :

Adrianus, dei Ganymeden.

Canis, suo in Templis vota exaudire Marito?

And Infin Martyr : Antonium qui modo extitit, omnes metu coacti pro deo colere, cum & quic, & unde esset, scirent. Hee caused money to bee coyned with the picture of the Temple of Antonius which Adrian had erected, and a Crocodile vnder it. Choul = expresth diuers formes of these Antiochan Coines, and one with inscription of Marcellus the Priest of Antonius.

Amianus Marcellinus = ascribeth to the Egyptians a contentious humour, addicted to lawing and quarrells, Affectudine perplexus iugandi semper letissimus. Their vanitie and superstition may further appeare by .hat which Diophantes = recordeth of one Syrophanes a rich Egyptian; who doting on his Sonne yet liuing, dedicated an Image in his house vnto him, to which the seruants at any time, when they had displeased their Master, betooke themselves, adorning the same with Flowers and Garlands, so recouering their Masters fauour. Some = make the Egyptians first inuentors of Wine (which they say, was first made in the Egyptian Citie Plinthis) and of Beere, to which end they first made Mault of Barley, for such places as wanted Grapes. When a man proued more in shew then in substance (as hypocrites, whom the Truth it selfe calleth Whited Tombs) the Prouerbe termed him an Egyptian Temple, because those buildings were sumptuous and magnificent for matter and forme to the view, but the Deitie therein worshipped, was a Cat, Dogge, or such other contemptible creature. The naturall fine 9 and crueltie viued amongst the Egyptians, hath made them infamous among Authors, both Prophane and Diuine. And Stephanus Bizantinus saith, that they which practised close, subtilie, craftie couzenages, were said, Αἰγυπτῶνες, to play the Egyptians : Æschylus also the Greeke Poet makes them Mint-masters therein : and perhaps those Rogues which wander ouer so many Countries, and liue by their wits and chefts, were therefore = called Egyptians, rather then for the Nation, being the scumme and dregs of other Nations, disguised by a deuised tongue and habit ; called in some Countries Cingari; their life resembling much the Beduini, or Rexumi, roguish Arabians wandering in Syria, and other parts. Belonius saith, That these wander through all the Turkish Empire, and are no 4 lesse strangers in Egypt then other places. They are cunning in Iron-worke, and cheating Fortune-tellers : some esteeme them Walchians.

But least I should also impose too cruell a taske on my more willing Readers, I will proceed to other obseruations. I haue heere in this Egyptian relation of their Rites, Manners, and Mysteries, benee the larger, both because Authors are herein plentifull, and especially because Egypt hath benee an olde storer and treasurer of these mysticall Rites for that later vpstart, the Mysticall Babylon, in the West ; which as shee is spirituall called Sodom and Ægypt, so, like that Strumpet mentioned f by Salomon, hath not a little decayed her bed with the Ornaments, Carpets, and Laces of Ægypt. Wiser were the Romanes = of olde, which made diuers Lawes to expell the Egyptian Rites out of their Citie, which the later Popes entertaine.

Of their Devotions in those Times.

Theod. l. 5. c. 22.

For the devotion there practised, wee may read in Russians of the Temple and Image of Serapis in his time destroyed by Theophilus, successor to Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria. This Temple was borne vp with Vault-works, with great lights and secret passages, the space of an hundred steps: on the top whereof round about, were lofty rooms, in which the Keepers of the Temple, and they which made themselves chaste (Agynettes) remayned. Within these were Galleries, or Cloysters, in squared ranks, and in the middelt of all was the Temple, lifted vp on costly Pillars, and built of Marble. Post Capitulum nihil orbis terrarum cernit ambitiosius, saith & another: Except the Capitoll, the World hath not a statelier Piece. Here was the Image of Serapis, reaching with his right hand to the wall on one side, with his left hand vnto the other, being framed of all kinds of Wood and Metals. It had on the East a little window so fitted, that when on a solemne day the Image of the Sunne was admitted to salute this Serapis, the iugling Priests so obfuscated the time, that euen then the Sun-beames through this window, should seeme to kisse Serapis. They had also another trick, by a Load-stone placed in the Rooft, to draw vp the Iron Image of the Sunne, as if it did then bid Serapis farewell. The superstitious Ethnicks had a Tradition among them, That if euer mans hand did offer violence to that Image, the Earth should presently returne, and resoluë it selfe into the first Chaos, and the Heavens would suddenly fall. All this notwithstanding, a Christian Souldier dismembred the same, and burned Serapis openly, the Mice running out of his diuided trunk.

i. Story of Ty-rannus, Saturnus Priest.

Rome (sayth Rassius) esteemed this Serapis to bee Iupiter, and that hee ware a Measure (Modius) on his head, as hee which gouerned all things in measure, or else did liberally feed men with the fruits of the Earth. Others coniectured him to be Nilus; others, Ioseph that led Egypt in the seven deere yeeres. Others thought him to bee one Apis, (a King in Memphis) who in the time of famine, with his owne store, supplied the peoples want: for which benefit they built a Temple to him after his death, wherein they nourished an Oxe, in remembrance of him, whose husbandry and tillage had nourished them. This Beast they called also Apis.

He i mentioneth the Temple of Saturne, whose Priest called Tyrannus, (vnder pretence of Saturnes commandement) would demand the company of what Lady he liked to beare the God company at night: which the Husband did not much scliffe at, esteeming it an honour to haue a God his Coriuall. But Tyrannus shutting the woman into the Temple, by secret passages conueyed himselfe thither into the hollow Image of Saturne, in which hee held conference a while with the woman, and after by a device putting out the lightes, satisfied his lust, in committing in the darke those workes of darknesse, which after being brought to light, caused the Temples destruction.

They had Breft-places of Serapis in euery House, in the Walles, Entries, Posts, Windows; in stead whereof they after fastened Croffes. The Croffe in the Egyptian Mysteries signified life to come. They had a Tradition, That their Religion should continue, till there came a Signe, in which was Life, & And by this occasion many of their Priests were conuerted. Sozomen i reporteth the same, That in purging of Serapis Temple at Alexandria, the Croffe, being found among other their Hieroglyphickes, was occasion of the conuersion of many vnto the Christian Faith. This Temple, and the Temple of Bacchus, were turned into Christian Churches. Olympius a Philosopher with a company of seditious Ethnicks, fortified himselfe in Serapis Temple, and caused many by force to sacrifice: and when the Christians burned their Images, he auerred that the Images were but corruptible matter, but the Vertues, or Diuine Powers which inhabited them, were fled to Heauen. This I thought to mention for their sakes, who to their Image-worship haue borrowed the like Heathenish plaister. Rassius addeth, That in destroying the Temples, they found Reliques of their bloudie Superstition, the heads of Infants cut off, with the lips gilded.

The deuotion of Canopus was not inferiour to that of Alexandria. Here, through the subtiltie of the Priest, the Chaldeans were vanquished. For whereas they challenged their God Fire to be the strongest, as deuouring other Wooden and Mettal-gods, hee conueyed an Earthen pot full of holes, which he had stopp'd with Waxe and filled with water, into the Images; and when the Chaldzans made their fiery tryall hereof, the Waxe melting, the Water issued, and quenched the fire. Hence it is that they made the Image of Canopus with feet and necke short, and a belly like a barrill, or water-vessel.

- Tacitus ^m reporteth certaine Miracles wrought at Alexandria by the instigation of Serapis: the curing of a lame and blind man, whom that God had moued to seeke this helpe at hind him in the Temple one Basilides, whom by present enquiry hee found to lye sicke foure-score miles thence in his bed. The name yet was an ominous signe to him of the whole Empire, as deniued of Basileus. The originall of this God is by some imputed to Ptolemaeus Lagus, who hauing in Alexandria erected Temples, and instituted Religious Rites, seemed to him, suddenly after vanishing in a flame of fire. When the Egyptian Priests could not satisfie him in the interpretation of these things, Timotheus an Athenian, whom hee had sent for to be chief Master of Ceremonies, willed him to send to Sinope, wherein was an ancient Temple of Plato, hauing in it the Image of Proserpina. Ptolemy neglecting this; and with a second Vision terrified, sent to Seydrotibemus King of Sinope ^a for the same; being (in the way) further hereunto encouraged by the Delphian Oracle. Seydrotibemus protracting the businesse, was by diseases and manifest anger of the Gods forced to aske mble and periwade his people to suffer the carrying away of their God. But whiles they resisted this enterprise, the ambitious Idoll, without once taking leave, conueyed himselfe into the ship, which also, together with him, hee made to arrive at Alexandria in three dayes, where this Temple was built to him, in the place wherein sometime had stood Isis Chappell. Some ^e esteemed him Aesculapius for his cures, some Osiris, some Iupiter, & some Pluto: but Serapis was his Egyptian appellation. ^a Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, his Sonne, bestowed cost in that famous Library at Alexandria before related, by ^x Cesars Souldiers casually burned. Cornelius Tacitus ^c telleth no lesse Miracle of Memnon's stony Image at Thebes, or as others lay, at Abidus, which being stricken with the Sun-beame, at the Sun-rising yielded a vocall sound. This Image was halie cut off by Cambyses: Pausanias ^t sayth that he saw it, and largely describeth it. Augustus, hauing destroyed Antibony and Cleopatra, brought ^e Egypt into a Province, and sowed all the trenches of Nilus. Hee caused the body of ^x Great Alexander to bee brought forth, which he crowned with a Crowne of Gold, and strewing with flowers, worshipped it. Hee built Niopolis in memory of his Asian Victory: instituted there Quinquenniall Games; enlarged Apollo's Temples; and consecrated the place where he had pitched his Tents to Nephtis and Mari, adorning it with spoiles.
- Onias ¹ one of the Jewish Priests (according to the Jewish manner) literally interpreting Esaies ² Prophecie of the Altar in Egypt, built a Temple at Bubastis in fashion of that at Ierusalem, but lesse, by the permission of Ptolemaeus, and furnished it with Priests and Lenites after the Jewish Religion. At ^a Alexandria also the Jewes were free and had their Synagogues, as at Leontopolis likewise, and other places. ^b Procopius sayth, that Dioclesian the Emperour bestowed Elephantina and the parts adioyning on the Bleni and Nobata, whose Religion was a mungrell of the Greekish, Egyptian, and their Owne: but hee caused them to cease humane Sacrifices which they vsed to offer to the Sunne.
- And thus was the state of Religion in Egypt during the conquests of the Persians, Greeks and Romans, each rather seeking to settle heere their Empires then Opinious. But when the Sunne of Righteousnesse, the Sunne of God, the Saviour of Man, appeared to the World, he honoured Egypt with his infancy, as after with a Religious conquest, by weapons (not carnall) casting downe the bolds which these Hellish spirits had heere so long possessed; thus fulfilling truly what Ezay had prophesied, and Mercury foretold. Alexandria became a Patriarchall Sea (the first Bishop whereof was Saint Mark) enioying in Libya, Pentapolis, and Egypt, the same power that the Romane Bishop had in Italy, by Decree of the ^e first Nicen Council. Heere also liued the first Heremites (the ⁴ first and chief of which was Anthony, an Egyptian Inuenter of this Order) in the sandy Desarts, by occasion of those bloody persecutions wherein many thousand lost their liues. Of these Heremites read Io. Cassianus, and Serenus Sulpicius de uita Martin. l. 3. But when as the Mahumetan Religion and Armes began first to peepe into the World, Egypt ^e was made a slave to those Superstitions vnder which it groweth till this day.

He Saracens diuided Egypt into three parts; Errif, from Cairo to Rofetto; Asfahid, the Land part from Cairo to Bugia; Maremma, or Bechria, as Nilus runneth to Damiatia. It was a subdued vnder the conduct of Hamru the sonne of Haf Generall of the Arabian forces to Homar or Anmar the second Caliph. Hee only exacted Tribute, permitting freedom of their Conscience to all. He built vpon the bankes of Nilus a Towne called by the Arabian Fustata, that is, Tabernacle; becaufe in the Desert places, through which he passed, he was constrained to lye in Tents. The common people call this Towne Mesre Hattich, the Ancient Citie: for so it is in respect of Cairo, which was after built two miles from hence, by one Gebuar, who of a Dalmatian slaue had bene aduanced to be a Counsellor vnto Elean the Mahumetane Calpha, and was Generall of his Army about the foure hundred yere of their Hegira. Hee called it Elcabatra, which signifieth an imperious Mistresse. Hee walled it round, and built in it that famous Temple called Gemib Halbare, as Hamru had done before at Fustato. In this Towne of Fustato standeth the Sepulchre of a famous Saint of their Sect called Nassifa, of the Line of Mabomet, whose beautifull Shrine the Schismaticall Patriarches of Egypt adorned with siluer Lampes, Carpets of Silke and other precious ornaments. No Mahumetan commeth to Cairo eyther by Water or Land, but he adored this Sepulchre, and offereth thereat, in somuch that the yeerely Oblations and Almes heere offered for the reliefe of the poore kindred of Mabomet, and mayntenance of the Priests that keepe it (which want not their counterfeit Miracles to delude the peoples zeale) amount to one hundred thousand Saraffi. And when Zelim conquered Cairo, the Ianizaries rifling this Sepulchre, found in it five hundred thousand Saraffi in ready Coine, besides other riches. Some report that this Nassifa being a Dame of honour, yeelded her body, without reward, to any that required the same, bestowing (as the said) this Almes for the loue of the Prophet Mabomet. Lettice suitable to such lips: Like Prophet, like Saint. But Leo would haue you thinke her an honest woman.

Fustato is reckoned as a Suburb to Cairo, containing (in Leo's time) Anno one thousand five hundred twenty sixe) five thousand Families: besides many Sepulchres adored of the fond people, which couer the pavement with rich Carpets. Hither resort euery Friday great multitudes for deuotion, and bestow liberal Almes: They heere sprinkle cold water with sweet herbes and leauy boughes.

Bulach is another Suburb of Cairo vpon the bankes of Nilus, of like distance, and hath in it foure thousand Families with stately Temples and Colledges. Beb Elloch standeth a mile from Cairo, and hath about three thousand Families. Gemel: Tailon was adorned by Tailon sometime Governour of Egypt with a sumptuous Temple and Palace. Beb Zusla, another Suburb, containeth twelue thousand Families. Cairo, it selfe within the Wallles, hath not about eight thousand Families, and is full of stately and magnificent Temples. Heere is an Hospitall built by Papieris, the first Soldan of the Mamelukes Race: the yeerely revenues whereof amount to two hundred thousand Saraffi, or as some reckon, five hundred Ducats a day. It is open to all sicke and diseased persons, and heire to all that die there. The Plague is sometime so hot at Cairo, that there dye twelue thousand persons daily. This was the state of Cairo in Leo's time. Solomon & Schweigger affirmeth, that at his being in Cairo, Anno a thousand five hundred eighty one, there died daily betwene seven and ten thousand: nor is any place more plagued with the French Disease. Besides that Hospitall, and Nassifu Sepulchre, are three other famous, Zania della Inachari, Imamsciofy Giamalascar. This is the general Vniuersitie of all Egypt. In this place, Anno one thousand five hundred threethree and sixe, in the moneth of January, by misfortune of fire were burned nine thousand written Bookes of great value, wrought with Gold, worth three or foure hundred Ducats a piece one with another. This was interpreted as an ominous token of their ruine. They thinke also that Mecca will in short time be conquered by the Christians, and her deuotions shall be removed to Rofetto. Neander his conceit is ridiculous, that Cairo should hold as much people as all Italy, and that there are two and twentie thousand Temples. Iohn Eusebium out of their owne Registers numbeth but two thousand foure hundred: and though Cairo considered together with these Suburbs is great, yet it is not all the way continued with houses and buildings, but hath Gardens also and Orchards betwene. Iudocus a Meggen reporteth, that a man can hardly walke the streets by reason of the multitudes of people and beasts. They bring their water from Nilus into the Citie on Camels: on Mules, and Horses the chiefe men idle, and on Asses the poorer. Neither will they permit a Christian to ride on a Horse. They sell all by waight, euen wood for the fire, of which is great scarcitie. And although the Temples and some Houles are faire, yet the greater part of the Towne is ill built. Because they may not by their Law drinke wine, they compound a drinke of drie Raisons steeped in water and other mixtures; yea, and secretly will make bold with the former. He saith, that (besides other calls from their fleeples to deuotion) they ascend at mid-night to call, that the people may encrease and multiply, and therewith their Religion.

Benjamin Tadelensis numbered in Cairo 2000. Iewes in his time (440. yeeres since) in two Synagogues and Sects of the Hellenists and Babylonians. He saith that there then reigned in Misraim or Cairo Amir Almumanin Eli sonne of Abulib, all whose subiects were called Mored-m or Rebels, for their difference from the Bagdad Caliph. His Palace was called Soan. And he came forth but twice a yeere, on their Easter solemnitie, and then when Nilus ouerfloweth, which extendeth fiteene dayes journeyes when it ascendeth twelue cubits on their measuring pillar, and but halfe that way is watered, if it ascendeth but fixe cubits. An Officer euery day signified the increase, with proclamation of praise to God therefore. The water of Nilus serueth for drinke and medicine against reptitions. Old Misraim (he saith) is two leagues from new Misraim, but altogether waste. Bamgarten thinks there are in Cairo 8000. which live onely by carrying water. And there are diuers which either of their owne vow, or by some Testators charitie offer freely to all that will drinke in silver vessels: and sprinkle the streets twice a day because of the heate and dust. There are more in Cairo (hee reporteth such a rumour) which want houles to dwell in, then Venice hath Citizens. There are esteemed to be 15000. Iewes: 10000. Cookes which carry their cookerie and boile it as they goe, on their heads. In nine or ten houres one can scarcely compasse it. But you must know that this was in the time of the Soldan, before the Turke had conquered it.

Now though I haue bene already tedious, yet for the Readers fuller notice of this Countrey and Citie, I haue here added some of the later and exacter Observations of that learned Gentleman, Master George Sandys, to whom wee haue elsewhere bene indebted. Here relateth, that trauelling from Alexandria to Cairo, they paid at the gate a Madeyne a head, indifferently for themselves and their Asses: they passed through a Desert, producing here and there a few vnhusbanded Palmes, Capers, and a weede called Kall * which they vie for fuel, selling the asses to the Venetians, who mixing them equally with the stones brought from Pavia by the Riuer Ticinum, make thereof their Christalline glasses. On the left hand they left the ruins of Cleopatras Palace, and beyond that of Bucharis an ancient Citie: and passing a guard of Souldiers, and after that ferried ouer a Creeke of the Sea, they came to a quadrangle arched, and built by a Moore for the reliefe of Trauellers, and there reposed themselves on the stones till mid-night, and then passed along the shore, before day entering Rosetta, where they repayed to a Caue belonging to the Frankes, in an vnder, darke, mustie roome, where they were entertained on the hard floore. This Citie lieth vpon the principall branch of Nile, called heretofore Canopus, which about three miles thence entereth the Sea, hauing the entrance crossed with a barre of sand (as at Damiata) changeable with the windes and surges, the Ierbies or Boates being therefore made without keeles, flat and round in the bottom, a Pilot founding all the day to direct for the Channell. The houles are of bricke, flat-roofed (a thing generall in these hotter countries) jetting ouer to shaddow the narrow streets, exceedingly furnished with provisions, built by a slave of an Egyptian Chalife. Neere to this stood Canopus, that Citie famous in the worst sense, if we beleue Iuuenal; where, to elchew vice, saith Seneca, was to incurre infamie. Here had Serapis a Temple, visited in his Office festiually by a world of luxurious people from Alexandria, in painted boats, downe the artificiall Channells.

Here hying a Ierby, the next day but one they came to Cairo. This arme of Nilus is as broad as the Thames at Tilburie, slow, often troublesomely shallow, and euer thicke: hauing on each side many meane Townes, seated on Hills of mud throwne vp, to preserve them in the ouerflow. Ten miles from Rosetta is that Cut which runneth to Alexandria. Vpon the banks along as they passed, were infinite numbers of deepe and spacious Vaults, into which they let the Riuer, from whence they conuiey it by trenches into their seuerall grounds, being drawne vp into higher Cisternes with wheelles set round with Pitchers, turned about by Buffoloes. The Moores had much labour in drawing vp the Boate, wading often about the middle, at euery stronger hale crying Elaugh, thinking by this name of God to finde his assistance, and to claue away Deuils and impediments. They are descended of the Arabians, and vnderstand their language: a deuout, ignorant, laborious people, tawnie, meane statured, nimble-footed, thrill tongued, spare of dyet, reputed base by the Turkes, not suffered to wear weapons in Townes, not admitted to Souldierie or Magistracies. In Cities they practise merchandise, little differing in habite from Turkes. There dwell also in Egypt Arabians, Iewes, Christians, both Greekes, Armenians, and the truest Egyptians, the Coptes. The Countrey people follow husbandrie, are wrapt in a russet Mantle, both men and women; these hiding their faces with beastly clowts, with holes for their eyes, haueing easie trauell (those which are borne in the eighth moneth living, elsewhere deadly) to that purpose letting a plant in the roome, which growes in the Desarts, low, leaflesse, browne, branched like Corall, and set in water, doth then strangely display it selfe. A nassie people crusted with dirt, and footed with smoke by reason of their fuell and want of chimneys in their base cottages. The women thinke it a great comelinesse to bee fat, and therefore in the Cities being wrapt from the crowne of the head to the foot in linnen Robes, they spreade their armes vnderneath to appeare more corpulent. They couer their faces with blacke Cypres bespotted with red. The better sort weare hoopoes of gold and silver about their armes, and about their ankles; others of copper, with pieces of coine halfe couering their foreheads, and plates about their necks. Both men and women brand their armes for the loue of each other, diuers women stajnyng their chinnes with knots and flowers of blue, made by pricking of the skinne with needles, and rubbing it ouer with inke, and the iuyce of an herbe, which will neuer out.

Cairo.

Cairo (which wee had almost forgotten in this generall view of the moderne Egyptians) is seated on the East side of the Riuer, representing the forme of a Crescent, stretching South and North with the adioyning Suburbs fise Italian miles, in breadth scarce one and a halfe where broadest: the walls (if it bee walled) rather seeming to belong to priuate houses; the streets narrow, the houses high built, more faire without then inwardly commodious and most of stone neere to the top; at the end almost of each street a gate, which thue (as euery night they are) make them defensive, as so many Castles. Their locks and keyes be of wood euen to doores plated with Iron. The Mosques are magnificent, the stones of many being carved without, supported with pillars of marble, adorned with what Art can deuise, and their Religion tolerate. Yet differ they in forme from those of Constantinople, some being square, with open roofes in the middle of a huge proportion, the couered circle tarraist about; others stretched out in length, and many fitted vnto the place where they stand: adioyning to which are lodgings for Santons, Fooles, and mad men, whom their deuotion honoureth. Here be also diuers goodly Hospitals both for building, reuenue, and attendance. Next to these in beaultie are the great Mens Seraghios, by which if a Christian rise, they will put him from his Asse with indignation and contumelie. The streets are unpaved and exceeding durie after a shoure (for here it rayneth sometimes in winter, and then most subiect to plagues) ouer which many beames are laid athwart on the tops of houses, and couered with mats, to shelter them from the Sunne. The like courtoure there is betweene two high Mosques in the principall street, vnder which when any great Mah passeth, they shoote vp arrowes that sticketh in abundance. The Nile, a mile distant, in the time of the inundation flows in by sundrie channels, which growing emptie or corrupted, they haue it brought on Camels: their Well water being good for no other vse but to wash houses or cleanse the streets. In the midst of the Towne is a spacious Caue, called the Beseitan, in which are fold all finer wares, and old things as at out-cries, by the Call, Who giues more? There are three principall gates, neere to the Northernmost of which sometime stood that stately Palace of Dulthe wife to Caitheu the Sultan, which had the doores and iawmes of luorie, the walls and paucements checkered with discoloured marble; Columns of Porphyre, Alabaster and Serpentine; ceilings flourished with Gold and Azure, inlaid with Ebonie; but ruined by Zelus the Turke, and the stones and ornaments transported to Constantinople. Neere to this is the lake Esbiky, square and large; then only a Lake when Nilus ouerfloweth, frequented with barges of pleasure; at other times as profitable as then pleasant, affording fine haruests in a yeere. Within and without the Citie are a number of delicate Orchards watered as they doe their fields; in which grow varietie of excellent fruits, as Oranges, Limons, Pomegranates, Apples of Paradise, Sicamor figs, and another kinde (growing on Trees as bigge as Oaks, boared full of holes, the fruit not growing amongst the leaues, but out of the bole and branches) Dates, Almonds, Cassia fistula (leaved like an Ash, the fruit hanging downe like Sauiages) Apples no bigger then berries, Galls growing on Tamariskes; Plantains, that haue a broad flaggie leafe growing in clusters; and shaped like Cucumbers, the rinde like a Peate-rod, solide within without stones or kernels, to the taste very delicious (holden by the Mahometans the forbidden fruit in Paradise) and many other Trees, some bearing fruit all the yeere, and almost all their leaues. To these adde whole fields of Palmes, and yet no prejudice to the vnder growing Corrie: these are naturall (others planted, and onely Orchards) pleasant in forme, in fruit profitable of body: waite, high, round and slender (yet vaine for buildings) crested about, and therefore easily climbed: the branches like like Sedges, lit on the neather side and euer greene, growing onely on the top as plumes of feathers, yeerly pruned, and the bole at the top bared. There are Male and Female, both bearing Cods, but this onely fruitfull, yet not without the Males neighbourhood, towards whose vpright growth three enclines her crowne, hauing in the beginning of March, her seedes commixed with his. Their Dites grow like fingers, whence they haue their name, ripe in the end of December, which began to Cod in Februaire: the tops of such as are fruitlesse, they open, and take out the braine which they sell for a Salad, better then an Artichoke: of the branches they make bedsteds, Larices, &c. of the webbe of the leaues, Baskets; Mais, Fans, and the like; of the outward huske of the Cod good cordage, of the inward, 10 Brushes: all this they yeerly afford without empaying the Tree.

At the South end of the Citie stands the Castle, once the Mansion of the Mameluke Sultans, ascended vnto by one way onely, and that hewen out of the Rocke by the casie steepes on horse-backe to bee ascended. From the top the Citie and Countrey yeld a delightful prospect. It is so great, that it seemes a Citie of it selfe, immured with high walls diuided into partitions and entered by doores of Iron, wherein are many spacious Courts, in times past the places of exercise. The ruines testifie a quandam sumptuousnesse; many pillars of solide marble yet remayning, so huge, that they caule iust wonder, how they were thither conueyed. Here hath the Bassa his residence, and herein the Dinaw is kept on Sundayes, Mondayes, and Tuesdayes: the Chaulces as Aduocates preferring the suites of 10 their Clientes. The Bassa commandeth as absolute Soueraigne, hath vnder him sixteene Sanziacks, and a hundred thousand Spacheis. The reuenues of this little Countrey amount to three millions of Shariffes, one to the Great Turke, the second to the Bassa, the third for payes and sending forth the Carauan to Mecca. The present Bassa is Mahemet, a man well in yeeres, and of seuerer conditions. He cut off the heads of foure thousand Spacheis at his first entrance for insolencies, and sent the great men to Constantinople, strangling such as refused, vnto the Arabians which hated the other, in his execrations. Drunkennesse is punished with death. If a robberie committed, they which are appointed to guard that quarter, suffer for it, which makes them (to saue themselves) sometimes apprehend innocents, who with holes boared through their armes stretch wide on stauces, in which are candles 30 stucke burning downe to the flesh, are led to execution. His rigour made him confine himselfe to the Castle, yet so approued of the Grand Seigneur, that he hath given him his daughter in marriage (a childe of foure yeeres) solemnized with all possible ceremonies. He will hardly suffer a Christian to turne Mahumetan, thinking, perhaps, they doe it rather for preferment then deuotion.

No Citie can be more populous, nor better serued with prouision of all sorts, then Cairo, the fairest Citie in Turke, yet now as it were wichered by age and sicknesse, in comparison of her yonger and more flourishing times. Most of the Inhabitants are Merchants or Artificers. All of a trade keepe their shops in one place, which they shut about fise a clocke (except Cookes) solacing themselves the rest of the day. Few but such as haue great families, dresse meate in their houses, which the men buy readie drest, the women being too fine fingered to meddle with hufwiferie. These ride abroad vpon pleasure on easie-going Assees, and tie their husbands to due beneuolence, otherwise procuring a dinorcement. Many Physitians are in Cairo, by reason of the many Simples brought hither. They haue a kinde of Rue, wherewith they perfume themselves in the morning, as a preseruatiue against both Infection and Deuils. There are many which get their linings by shewing feats with Birds and Beasts: which teach Ravens to vse their throats and tongues together, so that they will make a man admire at their speech; Dogs and Goats to goe and turne on the tops of little pillars, not aboue the breadth of a mans hand; Camels taught to dauce when they are yong, by setting them on a hot hearth, playing meanwhile on an Instrumēt, the heat then 10 and musick after, causing this motion. Asles are not Asles, but beyond Banks his Horse in tricks, taught by their fustle Masters. But Cairo hath carried vs too farre, at an Inferious Mistis indeed to our Readers patientie. Yet will we further adde this short note out of the two Mareiners Translators of the Nubien Geographers.

Metri is the name of Cairo and all Egypt, so called of Mefraim the sonne of Noa, as saith Mohamad Siacita. This Citie is gouerned by a Bascia and wentie fise thousand Spacheis and Ianiziers. It is rich in Cassia Trees, Sugar Canes and Corne, many Lands adioyning yielding harvest twice a yeere, Hay foure times, Herbs and Pulse in manner alway greene. Adde store of Salt very white, the water of Nilus inclosed in pits, and by the onely heate of the Sunne in three dayes being turned into it. In former times it was famous for Balsam 10 plants, now remoued to Mecca by command of the Othomans; and none are found in all Egypt but seuen shrubs * in the Bassa's garden, kept with great diligence. The leaues are like to wilde Marjoram, the joyce is taken by a little incision in the trunk or branch. Abu. Chah-Ber-Ali writes, that from the fiftenth to the two and twentieth of Raby Auhani (June) there falls a dew which leaves no token thereof in the earth, yet by vulgar experience is found by weighing the Sand or Earth of Nilus banks, and is an evident token of the encrease of Nilus. The Aire also is then made more wholesome; Plagues and Fevers cease, and those which were sicke of them, recovered.

Alexandria is very vnwholesome, as the graue of that Alexandria wee before mentioned. Vnder the foundations are great habitations, as if they were two Alexandria's built one vpon another. Vnder the houses of the Citie are Cisternes sustayned with mightie Arches to receive the inundation of Nilus, belonging (saith G. Brown) to every house: the cause of much sicknesse to the Inhabitants, especially since the diminishing and decay of the Citie, most of the Cisternes now being fennie for want of vse. When the Saracens had spoyled it, it remayned long desolate, vntill a subtil Caliph proclaymed that Mahomet had left great indulgences to such as would here inhabit. And thus he replenished the Citie with Inhabitants, building houses for them, as hee did Colledges for the Students, and Monasteries for the Religious. Here yet remayneth a little Chappell, wherein they say that the high Prophet and King, Alexander the Great liyes buried: to which resort many Piigrimes that adore the same, and bestow there their almes. The Arabians and their Alcoran also call Alexander, Two-borned, the reason whereof seemeth to be that his ambitious seeking to bee accounted the sonne of Iupiter Ammon: neither doe the vulgar Arabians know him by the name Alexander, but by that title of Two-borned. And such was his Image in the Cyrenaik coynes. This body was taken from Perdiccas by Ptolemaus Lagus, and there intombed in gold: which Cybisartes taking away, it was covered with glaite, for remaying till the time of the Saracens. In old time they had a custome, mentioned by Gallen, of executing condemned persons which they would quickly despatch; to apply to the breast an Aspe, and then cause him to walke a few paces: and suddenly he is at his long home. This he there saw: a practice not much unlike the Athenian draught of Hemlock. There is in Alexandria (as Master Eusebius relateth) a pillar of marble, called by the Turkes, King Pharaos needle, foure square, in height ninetie foote. Master Sandys saith, there lyes another by it, like vnto it, halfe buried in rubbish: both Hieroglyphicall Obeliskes of Theban marble, almost as hard, and of a deeper red then Porphyry: in the same place where Alexanders Palace stood. And without the said Citie foure hundred paces, another round, called Pompeys Pillar, standing on a square stone fiftene foote high: the compasse of the pillar is seuen and thirtie foote, the height, an hundred and one, causing no small wonder how it should be erected on that stone. This happily was set vp in memorie of Great Pompey, who by the Egyptian treacherie was slaine at Pelusium, almost in the sight of Ierusalem (as Eberus noteth) and that Countrey of the Iewes which he had vniuently wronged and subdued to Romaneseruitude; although his hands were purer touching the holy places and treasures, which his curious eyes would needes behold, then those of perjured Craesus, which before had suffered deserved vengeance by Parthian execution. Iodocus to Meggen saith, that the Channell which bringeth water from Nilus continueth fiftie miles: the Cisternes which receiue it, are as you haue heard: and it is thought (as this our Author affirmeth) that those parts of Alexandria which the ground hideth, cost more then that which is open to the view. Yet doe these Cisternes now much decay. The Citie sheweth faire without, but within (they are Baumgartens words) like a heape of stones: few houses are whole. The Custome is firmed by the Iewes at two hundred thousand Madeins a day (a coyne of siluer trebling the value of an Asper, thirtie of them amounting to a Riall of eight) the Port is free to friend and enemy. Ten in the hundred is paid in kinde of all thing for custome, onely money payes but one and a halfe, whereof they take an exact account, that they may ghesse at the value of returned commodities; then paying eleuen in the hundred more, euen for such Goods as are in propertie vnaltered. The places anciently famous in Alexandria, besides the Muszum and Serapum before mentioned, as the Vniuersitie and Librarie, were the Iizum and other their Temples, which with the Palaces are said to take vp the fourth part of their Citie. Beniamin Tudelensis speaketh of a faire building without the walls in his time, called Aristoteles Schoole, wherein were twentie Schooles, and betwene them marble pillars: sometimes much frequented (as he saith, but I thinke, deceiued) to heare Aristoteles Reading. He mentions Vaults a mile long. He found there three thousand Iewes. Thebes, that sometime was so famous a Citie, containeth not now about three hundred Families: and still retaineth some bones of the carkease of old Thebes, many pillars, walls, inscriptions in Latine, Greeke, and Egyptian characters. Memphis, her next successor, is vnto this day.

one the other for Enemies, with hatred or mutinies: but if any question arise, Learned men by conference debate the same. No man vpon paine of grievous punishment may reproach any of the foure Doctors, first Authors of those foure Sects. Thereas one Sect of religious men in Cayro, called Cheneffas, which live vpon Horle-flesh: therefore are lame la'ssought and le: vp attainting, and loke to these Cheneffas, which Sect is rise in all Agy. There goe certayne Women vp and downe the Citie crying, whose office is to Excié or Circumcise the women, which is obserued in Egypte and Syria, both by the Mahumetans, and Iacobite-Christians. Neither haue the Turkes (although in superstition by themselves acknowledged) shott of the Arabians and Egyptians beene altogether idle in their Deuotion, which they testifie by their Pilgrimages, and Almes-works. Belimius telteth of one Turke that caused water to bee brought wialy on Camels backs for the ease of Trauellers in that desart space betwene Alexandria and Rosetta. Egypt hath in it many Iewish Synagogues, who speake the Spanish, Italian, Turkish, Arabian, and Greeke languages, and are great Merchants. Thus wee see the iudgements of God by the Persians, Grecians, and Romans for their Priuilege Idolatry, and a greater Iudgment for their Heresie, hatched by Arrius, punished by a Saracenicall Apostasie.

Amongst the differing Sects of the Mahumetans (of which wee haue spoken in the third booke) Arabia, and especially Egypt, and herein Cayro most of all is pestered with them, which may be called the Naked, or the Wicked Sect, roguing vp and downe naked, and praishing their filthy villanie, in the open sight of the people, who yet hold them for Saints. The iust hand of Diuine Iustice, that when men forsake God, not Religion and Truth alone, but Reason, but Sense shall also forsake them.

this a Chitic of the Mamelukes.

Before wee leaue those Soldans of Cayro, or rather because you haue stayed so long here, let vs bestow some spectacle on you worthy the sight, as a refreshing to your wearied eyes. They are the same which the Soldan in representation of his magnificence made to the Turkish Embassadour, Anno 1507. from Baumgartens relations, which was an eye-witnesse thereof. There were assembled threecore thousand Mamelukes all in like habite: the Soldan himselfe all in white, with a mitred Diadem, and not fure from him their Pope or Caliph in a lower rate: and beneath him the Turkish Embassadour. The place was a spacious Plaine, in which were those hi apes of sand, fiftie paces distant, and in each a Spere erected with a marke to shote at, and the like ouer against them, with space betwene for sixe Horles running a full career, yeele strange experiments of their skill, not one missing the marke, first with casting Darts, and after with their Arrowes, as they ranne: and lastly trying their slauers. Others after this, in the like race of their running Horles, flor with hke dexteritie diuers Arrowes backwards and forwards. Others in the middlest of their race alighted three times, and (their Horles still running) mounted againe, and hitte the marke neuertheless. Others did hite the same, standing on their Horles thus swiftly running. Others three times vnbent their Bowes, and thence againe bent them whiles their Horles ranne, and missed not the marke: neither did others, which amidst their race, lighted downe on either side, and againe mounted themselves: no, nor they which in their swiftest course leaped and turned themselves backwards on their Horles; and then (their Horles still running) turned themselves forwards. There were, which whiles their Horle ranne, vngirt their Saddles thrice, at each time shooting, and then againe girding their saddles, and neuer missing the marke. Some sitting in their saddles, leaped backwards out of them, and turning ouer their heads, setled themselves againe in their saddles and shor, as the former, three times: Others layd themselves backwards on their running Horles, and taking their eyles, put them into their mouths, and yet forgot not their syme in shooting. Some after euery shor drew out their Swords, and flourished them about their heads, and againe sheathed them. Others sitting betwixt three swords on the right side, and as many on the left, thinly clothed, that without great care euery motion would make way for death, yet before and behinde them touched the marke. One stood vpon two Horles running very swiftly, his feete loose, and shor also at once three Arrowes before, and againe three behinde him. Another sitting on a Horle neither bryddled nor saddled, as hee came at euery marke arose and stood vpon his feete, and on both hands hitting the marke, fate downe againe three times. A third sitting on the bare Horle, when hee came to the marke, lay vpon his backe, and lifted vp his legges, and yet missed not his shote. After all this they ranne with like swiftnesse (for all these things, which, where is the Vaylter that can doe on his imaginary Horle standing still: these did running) and with their slauers carried away those matchles as trying phing ouer their innocent enemy. One of them was killed with a fall, and two more wounded in these their feats of Agilitie. They had an Obie graue man which was their seacher. If I haue long decayed thee in this spectacle, remember that the race of Mamelukes should not bee forgotten, the rather, because their name is now tased out of the world; and this may seeme an Epitaph on their Sepulchre, after which none perhaps are left able to doe the like, nor in all Franciscus Abadus his Triumphall Pandecks to be paralleled.

As for the Christians in Egypt, yee may reade in the Histories of the Holy Land-wares, what attempts were often made by the Westerne Christians against these vubelcuers. Concerning the present state of Christianitie there, Leo, Boterus, and Master Pory in his Additions to his Englished Leo, may acquaint you; and better then others Master George Sandys. Besides the forreine Christians, which resort to these parts for traffique there, are thought to bee fiftie thousand Native of the Countrey, which haue Churches, and Monasteries; whereof there are three Christian Churches at Alexandria. They are called Coptic, and Christians from the Girdle; because of their Circumcision, which together with Baptisme they admit. In their Liturgie they vse the Chaldaean language. But they reade the Gospell againe, in the Arabian. They are accounted of Emicks Heresie. Their Patriarchall Sea is Alexandria; whilst e froin Saint Marke to this day hath had a continued succession, as appeareth by the late Letters of Gabriel to the Pope, calling him selfe the fourecore and teuenteenth of the Patriarchs from Saint Marke. Thus writeth Baſonia with a great many swelling words, which may puffe vp his Romane Sea.

But how credulous is Superstition? and that neuer-erring Sea hath (now often?) beene gulled this way, or sought to gull and coozen others with such Testificall fictions of I know not what conuerſions, and submissions, as Baronius would make you beleene of this Gabriel. Thus had Mahomet his Gabriel; and thus our age hath another Gabriel obtruded vpon the vulgar simplicitie: (farre fetched belike is good for their Lady-mother) But Alexandria hath knowne no Gabriel in these times, Patriarch there. George Donsa held good acquaintance with Melitus, and his Predecessour was Siluester; so that this Romish Gabriel which ascribeth so much to that Sea, was a Romane Gabriel indeed, which Alexandria neuer knew. Neither did Melitus the Patriarch know any such Papall Supremacie, but writeth learnedly against the same; as in an Epistle of his to Iohn Donsa (wherein hee maketh mention of our English Embassadors) extant with George Donsa Iournall may appeare.

How Christian Religion was first planted in Egypt by Saint Marke, and the Apostles, and their Successors, and how persecuted by the Ethnikes; after by the Arians; and how Ethnikie Religion was againe by Valens permitted to all that would embrace it, the forenamed Ecclesiastical Histories make mention: how it was persecuted by the Persian inuasions, and after by the Saracens in time brought to this present state, and how it now continueth, yee may reade in many both old and new Authors. Zaga Zaga an Ethiopian Bishop saith, that the Patriarch of Alexandria resideth at Cairo: where their Ethiopian Metropolitan receiveth of him his Confirmation. And in their Ethiopian Liturgie, they mention them, both in this sort: Pray for our Prince, the Prince of our Archbishops, the Lord Gabriel, and the chiefe of the Church of Alexandria, and for the chiefe of our Countrey, our venerable Archbishop Marke, &c. And thus much of this Egiptian Prelate, as a taste of that which is to bee declared in our Christian Relations. Adrianus Romanus, & in his Theatrum Vrbiu, Gayth, that besides the Patriarch of the Coptites, heere is also a Patriarch of the Greekes and Arabians, which haue their Liturgie in Greeke, but scarce vnderstand the same. The Coptic Patriarch hath his title of Alexandria, but his residence in Cayro. But it is more then time to leaue this the first and worit of Nations in Superstition: Zealous in all, but not according to knowledge: as else where shall appeare, in their Christianity folded in manifold Iewish ceremonies; and heere hath beene manifested in their present Mahumetan, and ancient Ethnikie bloody, beastly, stinking Deuotions, so eagerly pursued (let this bee our Conclusion) that Inuenal in his time writing of a Religious quarrell intirely banded betweene the Combiter and Tentytites, at the end of a leuen dayes Festival obscured Day and Night: after many wounds and blowes, One in flight falling downe, and so into the Enemies hands, was presently plucked in pieces and eaten rawe: that euen their sacrifices of Men, in respect of this were milde, as morsels to their Gods; but this in despite of Deuotion, or despitefull Deuotion, became a humane Sacrifice to inhumane, beastly, diuellish Men. Onely let vs obserue the Egyptian Chronologie, and so make an end.

After this so long a Historie of Egyptian affaires, I haue heere added the order of times, wherein those things happened, that this our Relation might be the more compleat, although perhaps it may seeme to some more then tedious already. Parro diuided Times into three sorts; the first hee called Vncertaine; the second Rabulous; the third Historicall. Ioseph Scaliger, a man happily more studious in this subiect of Times, then all Times before haue yielded vs, reckoneth the two former for one, as not easily to be distinguished. He hath also published to the world not onely his owne learned Obseruations on Eusebii Chronicle; but such Fragments as out of *Cicero*us, Suetonius, and others, hee could finde both of Eusebii Chronicle in Greeke (for before we had onely the Latine Translation of Hierome, much whereof also is vterly lost) also of Africanus; from whose store-house Eusebius tooke his Chronicle, both for matter and words, almost by whole-sale. And whereas Annius had before counted the world with counterfeits of Berosus, Manetho, Metasthenes, which other fabulous tales, falsely ascribed on the Ancients: hee hath helped likewise to some Reliques of those Histories, which others haue inserted into their works; the very bones of such fables being worthy of admiration, if not of veneration. The true Manetho therefore in three Tomes wrote the Egyptian Historie vnto Ptolemie Philadelphus: his Greeke Epistle Dedicatory being but short, I haue thus translated it.

v. Hence appeareth the time of Manetho, and his pontifical Dignitie, with the original of his Antiquities borrowed of Hermes, and the occasion of his writing in the Greeke, as to a

-1 Hee ^e first sette downe the yeeres of the raigne of their Gods. Vulcan, Sol, Agorbadon, Saturne, Osiris, and Isis, Typhon. Then of the Demi-gods : Orus, who reigned five and twentie yeeres : Mars, thirte and twentie : Amphis, Leucente : Hercules, fouretee, foure and twentie : Ammon, thirte : Tibor, seuen and twentie : Sofus, two and thirte : Iupiter, twentie. Things both false in themselves, and in the Copie imperfecte. After these hee reckeneth in order two and thirte ^e Dynastie, Lordships, or governments in Egypt.

253 The first of the Thinites; of eight Kings, whose names and yeeres of reign are, Menes, threecore and two: hee was laide of an Hippopotamus, or River-Horle. Atthis his Son, Iuen and thirtie. He built a Palace in Memphis, and wrote of Anatomie. Cusiceus his sonne; one and thirtie. Emphes, his sonne, three and twentie. In his time was a great famine. Heo built the Pyramides in Cochoh. Saphedus, his sonne, twentie: Semempis, his sonne, eighteene: Breneser, his sonne, fixe and twentie. Sum, to two hundred threecore and three. Of Menes, the first of these, it is reported e that hee first inuented chevie of money: for which long after hee was solemnely curst by a Councell of Priests in the time of Cnephatus, and at Thebes a pillar was erected in the Temple to retifie the same.

2 The second Dynastie of the Thinites vnder nine Kings, Whose names and yeeres of their reigns are in order as followeth, Boethus, eight and thirtie yeeres. Cnacchus, nine and thirtie: in his time was ordayned the worship of Apis at Memphis, and Mnevis at Heliopolis. Buodhis, ten and fortie: Thas, seuentene: Setebus, one and fortie: Chares, seuentene: Nepherchesus, five and twentie: in his time Nilus is said to haue had his waters mixed with honey. Segehich, eight and fortie: Cenues, thirtie: Summe, three hundred and two.

3 The third of the Memphites, Echerophis, eight and twenty : Tefarhoris, nine and twenty. He is supposed to be Aeschulapis, for his skill in Physicke; studious of Painting and Architecture. Tyru, seven : Mejochris, leuenteene : Zophis, sixteene : Tefartasi, nineteene : Acheris, two and forty : Siphuris, thirrie : Herpserer, fixe and twenty.

4. The fourth Dynastie of the Memphites. Soris, nine and twentie : Saphis, threecore and three : he made the greatest Pyramid. Saphis, threecore and sixe : Manchares, threecore and three : Raiofer, five and twentie : Bicheres, two and twentie : Zecherches, seven : Tamphthis, nine : Sefochris, eight and fortie.

months: Artaxerxes Longimanus, forty: Xerxes, two moneths: Sogdianus, seven: Darius Nothus, eleven, in all, one hundred and thirteene.

29. The nine and twentieth, Nepherites, fix: Achoris, twelue: Psammites, one: Nephe- rices, two moneths.

30. The thirtieth, of the Sebennites: Nelanebis, eighteene: Tes, two: Nelanebis eigh- teene.

31. The one and thirtieth, of the Persians: Artaxerxes Ochus, ten: He recovered Egypt in the seanteenth yeere of his Reigne: Arso, foure: Darius Codomannus, fix: subdued by Alexander. Hitherto Manetho. The whole summe of whole one and thirty Dynasties amount to five thousand three hundred fifty and five yeeres.

32. The two and thirtieth Dynastie, of the Macedonians: Alexander Mag. five: Ptole- meus Lagi, forty: Ptol. Philadelphus, eight and thirty: Ptol. Euergetes, fixe and twenty: Ptol. Philopator, seventeene: Ptol. Epiphanes, foure and twentie: Ptol. Philometor, five and thirty: Ptol. Euergetes 2. nine and twentie: Ptol. Ptolemy, seventeene: Ptol. Alexander, ten: Ptol. Cleopatra, eight: Ptol. Dionysius, thirty: Cleopatra, two and twenty: in all, three hundred and one. Some of these Ptolemies made incestuous Marriages with their owne sisters: which it seemes was not vsuall in Alexandria: whereupon Seneca scoffeth, Athenia domidium lucet, Alexandria totum. Whereupon Turneb. affirmeth, That at Athens they might marry their owne sisters by their father (as Lycurgus permitted only the sisters by mothers side, and forbade to marry with the fathers daughter) but at Alexandria, all sisters were permitted to their li- ceptious beds. Thus Cleopatra was wife to Ptolemy Philometor her elder brother, and after that to her younger brother, by whom she was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead.

If the former Catalogue doe not agree with the Relations of Isoponus, Theopompus, or others, who haue cited some parts of Manetho in their Workes, it is not much maruell; the Grecians being alway audacious, ready to preuent Authors to their own purposes; besides the oversights of Writers, through negligence or ignorance in foreine names. Neither is Manetho's Word an Oracle, who reckoneth so long time before any time was: but either it is to be ascribed to the arrogancy of the Egyptian Priests, desirous to bee accounted no lesse ancient then the Chaldeans: for Berosus and Manetho (as if they had been agreed) deriue their Hi- stories from the like Antiquity (saith Scaliger out of Synecellus) which would better appeare, if we had the entire bodies, and not a few scattered bones of their Histories: or else we may ascribe it to their confounding of Histories; applying to an order of Succession, the diuers reignes of severall Dynasties, which happily governed at the same time in severall parts of Eg- ypt; as in so small a Region as Canaan, Israhel destroyed 31. Kings. This Scaliger coniectu- reth; Lydius affirmeth. Neither yet is Scaliger to be blamed, for acquainting the World with these fragments of Manetho; considering, that the middle part thereof holdeth not onely like- lihood in it selfe, but in great part correspondence with the Scriptures. If the Egyptians de- viued otherwise to Herodotus and Diodorus, it was easie for them to deceive strangers, or bee deceived themselves. The like History of prodigious Antiquities, Augustine reciteth of an Egyptian Priest, that told Alexander of the continuance of the Macedonian Kingdome eight thousand yeeres, whereas the Grecians accounted but foure hundred and founscore. Yea, the Scriptures themselves haue not escaped that mis-reckoning of Times; almost all Antiquitie being carried downe the streame of the seuenity Interpreters, which adde many hundred, yeeres to the Hebrew Text, either of purpose, as some⁴ suppose, or as Augustine thinketh by error of him that first copied the Scriptures out of Ptolemies Library.

Sir Walter Raleigh, in that his laborious and learned Worke, called The History of the World, supposeth, That Egypt first tooke that name; at such time as Agypus or Rameses cha- sed thence his brother Danaus into Peloponnesus, which some reckon 877. yeeres after the Flood; some, more. As for the prodigious Antiquities which they challenge, hauing referred Mercator and Pererius, he enclineth to this opinion touching their ancient Dynasties, that they are not altogether fabulous: but that Egypt being peopled before the Flood two hun- dred yeeres after Adam, there might remaine to the finnes of Musarum some Monuments in Pillars or Altars of stone, or metall, of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians hauing added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. Petrus Alexandrinus (lately set forth in Greeke and Latine by Raderus) writes, That Misram hauing given beginning to the Egyptian Nation, did after goe into the East, to the Persians and Bactrians, and is the same that was called Zoroaster by the Greeks, Inuenter of Iudiciall Astrologie and Magicke. He hauing given order for the keeping of the ashes of his burned body, as the pledge of the Empire so long to continue with them, called vpon Orion (which he saith was Nimrod, by the Persian Superstition beleued,

Aeth to this day; the cauſe (ſaith the Note on that place) why the Perſians worſhip the fire Yet the Author mentions another cauſe, from Perſeus, which kindled fire by Lightning; and preferring the fame, built a Temple to it. He ſaith alſo, That Picus or Iupia, his father, taught Perſeus to diuine by a Cup (like to that which is mentioned of Iſop in Egypt) and the ſame Picus was father to Hermes, or Mercurie, King of Egypt, with other Legends, too long for this place. This Mercurie he maketh the ſame with Faunus, the firſt hinder (he ſaith) of Gold, and that in a golden Veile he foretold diuers things, and that the Egyptians wor-ſhipped him, hauing before him their King; which place he held thirty nine yeeres.
After him reigned Pulcin, 1680. dayes, for at that time the Egyptians knew not to ſumber. He firſt made a Law againſt Adulterie; and that the Egyptian women ſhould haue but one husband. He was Inuentor of Iron and Armour, Stones and Clubs being before that time the only Weapons. His ſonne Sol ſucceeded, a great Philoſopher; after him, Sofis; and next, Oſiris then, Orus, Tubus, Conqueror of Africa; and after that, Sefſiris, of the race of Cham, the ſame as he ſuppoſeth with Trimegiſtus. Thus much I haue thought here to adde out of him, where the Reader may further ſatiſſie himſelf; if that can ſaſſie any, which can nothing certifie, or make certaine, in theſe Antiquities; wherein we may find many opinions, ſcarcely any truth, but in the Word of Truth, the Scriptures.

That which we read of the Dynasties of Shepherds Scaliger interpreteth of that bafe feruile force, which Moses faith were abominable to the Egyptians, and feeme to haue beene strangers, that inhabited some fenny places which Nature had fortified, if we beleuee Hellodorus; and therefore made forie into the Countrey (the culme of Borders) and were called therefore Robbers. Thise (it seemeth) driuen to their shifts, by the hard and tyrannous vshage of the Egyptians, procured (as we reade of the Tatars) their owne freedome, and thridome of their Lords. The Romanes in their times were forced to maintaine a Garrison againt them, therefore called Βυζαντινοι. And Ierome mentioneth it the Bucolia, where no Christians dwelled, but only a fierce Nation. Iosephus and Eusebius thinke them to be the Israelites; which is vnlkely, becaufe they liued in feruitude, and neuer reigned there. Lydius suppoeth the Philistines vnder Ammolech and Pisiet to be the men.

30 Nothing is more obscure in the Egyptian Chronologie, than the time of the departure of Israelites thence under Moses, whom Iustin 1 Martyr affirmeth out of Diodorus to have bin the first that wrote the Egyptian Lawes. Tatamius * Assyrus (who after became an Heretick faith) (and alledged Ptolemy Mendisius, a Priest, for his Author) That this departure was in the dayes of Amafis, King of Egypt, who lived in the time of Inachius ; Theophilus and Iosephus, * out of Manetho, in the Reigne of Tethmofes; Eusebius, * in the reigne of Cenchres; Cedrenius faith, Petitionius : Others, otherwise; according to the diuers interpretation of Manetho. The Scripture sheweth, it was four hundred and thirty yeeres, from the promise first made to Abraham, as all that I know, both elder and later, Greeke and Latine P Chronographers, except Genetard and Adrichomius, reckon it. Lydiat thinketh, That the drowning of the 40 Egyptian Pharo was the cause of those tumults in Egypt, about Succession, which are ascribed to Egyptus and Danaus. Orosius 9 reporteth, That the prints of the Chariot-wheels of the Egyptians, then pursuing the Israelites through the Sea, did yet in his time remayne in the Sands on the shore, and vnder-water; which no curiositie or casualitie can so disorder, but that Diuine Providence doth re-imprint them in their wonted forme.

Hard it is to apply the yeeres of the Egyptian Chronologie, to the true account of the Worlds generation, by reason of the disagreement of Authors, touching the Egyptian Kings, vntill Sejfac time; which (after Lydiat) was in the yeere of the World 3029, although Iuen from hence we haue but slippery footing. Auugustus (after the same Author) made Egypt a Province, in the yeere 975. Vnder which Roman gouernment it continued, vntill the Saensens conquered it, in the time of Omar the third Chalipha, who began his reigne, after Sealgers computation, in his Catalogue ⁶ of the Chaliphes; in the yeere of Christ 643. The names of the Cesars belong to another place; and it were tedious here, to relate the yeeres of their severall Reignes. Osmen, the fourth Chalipha, beganne in the yeere of Christ 645, whom the rest succeeded in order, vntill the yeere 869. And then the Chaliphes were diuided; Almansad reigning in Bagdet, & Tolon in Egypt, who dyed in the yeere of Christ 883, and of the Hegeira 270. whom succeeded Hamara his sonne; and after him, his sonne Abanur, whom Muchbaris the Bagdet Chalipha slue, about the yeere 907. Afterwardes, about the yeere 943, Abijid Mubandis, sonne of Tangi, reigned in Egypt, to whom a few yeeres after succeeded his sonne Abdu, whom Meza Ledin Ilabi, of the posteritie of Phetima, Mahmets Daughter, deposed in the yeere of our Lord 971. To whom succeeded his sonne Auz, 975. Eltacham, in the yeere 996, Ertaher Laazizidin Illahi, 1030. Mufterat or Billabi, 1035. Muftenle 1095. Elamir Babnecam Illahi, 1101. he was but five yeeres old: the Protector of the Kingdome was Aphtzala Wizar: Elphat Ladin Illahi, 1135. Ettaphar succeeded: and hee being lame, Elphat; who died in the yeere 1160. and Ertaher Ladin Illahi, his Sonne was the last of the Phetimaan race. To him succeeded Afaredidin Shurachoch, of the Family of Amb (which were Cards;) after his death, Infaph Tzclat Eddin was constituted King by the Chalipha; and the Bigged Chaliphes were againe acknowledged in Egypt. This is that Saladine that tooke Ierusalem, in the yeere of Christ 1190. Heg. 586 He conquered Mesopotamia, &c. hee died in the yeere of our Lord 1193. And as Cardinall Vitruaco * affirmeth, reduced the Schismaticall Sect in Egypt to vniformity with the Baldac Chalipha. Elaphtical succeeded him in the Kingdome of Damascus: Melich Elaziz, in Egypt; Taher Giazir, in Halep, or Aleppo; Adelich Elaziz exchanged Egypt for Damascus, with his Vncle Eladel. The Egyptians made Aphtzala their King, in the yeere of our Lord 1202. After Eladel succeeded Elchamel, 1219, who died in the yeere of our Lord 1237. Heg. 635. EfSaloch followed: and after him, Elmutam, 1242. The Turken conspired against him: he fled into a Tower of Wood; which they fired: and halfe burned, he leaped into a streame that passed by, and there perished: Turmoan Azeeddin Ithib was made King in his place, in the yeere of our Lord 1245. Heere beganne the Reigne of the Mamalukes, or slaues. Hee being slaue, another slaue succeeded, whom they called Melich Elmutaphar. This seemeth to be he, that Leo calleth Piperitis. Thus fare out of Scaliger, collected by him out of Abraham Zacynthi, which addeth much light to the Egyptian Historie of these times, wherein I could neuer before satisfie my selfe concerning the erection and alteration of the Schismaticall Egyptian Chaliphates, which with much labour (little availing) I had sought, Iacobus à Vitruaco Bishop of Accon, or Ptolemais, about foure hundred yeeres since, and a Roman Cardinall, in his Orientall History * affirmeth, That Halv, disdaining to be accounted the successour of Mahomet, whom hee thought inferior to himselfe, began a new Sect of his owne, which he established in Egypt; the other Mahumetans erecting another at Baldac; but Baldac was of a later erection, and these things haue no probabilitye.

* See Vitruaco his 6th booke, of the greatness of this Saladine, and of Saffadin his brother, which fue his ten Nephewes, Sonnes of Sal, and succeeded in this exceeding Monarchie of many many Kingdomes.

x Orient. Hist. cap. 5.

These Kings were not called Chaliphates (as the posterity of Phetima or Fatima) but Sultans. A certaine Catalogue of the Names, Times, and Affaires of these Mamaluke-Sultans, I cannot perfectly exhibit. Pencernus 1 nameth in order these names; Turquemesius, Corbut, Bendocader, Melchisat, Elpi, Melchisraph, Melchunasar, Melchadel, and after many others, Caitheius, a stout enemy of the Turkes *. This Caitheius was chosen Sultan in the yeere of our Lord 1465. and reigned three and thirty yeeres. Two of his principall Mamalukes, Achardus and Campfous, full of emulation, were a principall cause of the ruine of that Dynastie. For whereas the Sultan was alway chosen out of the Mamalukes, by most voyces amongst themselves, Campfous fearing lest Achardus should haue succeeded after Caitheius, fained, That his Master had taken order on his death-bed, that his Sonne Mahomet should obtaine the roome; and vsed meanes to effect it, both by the voyces of those Mamalukes he could suborne, and confirmation of their Chalipha, whose hornes these Soldans had thorted, abridging his power (as before is said.) This Mahomet proued so cruel a Tyrant, and chose two Mamalukes to banded themselves in Factions, that all became confused; and within six yeeres after Caitheius his death, the Sultans Throne was five times vacant. Tomumbeius kills Mahomet; Campfous Ciarchesius is chosen; Zanballas, President of Damascus, rebelleth, and by Tomumbeius meanes imprisoneth him, and vsurpeth the Scepter: but for his crueltye, soone after is deprived and captiued by Tomumbeius, and after, strangled; He also succeeding in Authority, Tyranny, and Destiny.

b Of the Egyptian misery in these times, read Vitruaco, and Mori, eye witnesses, c. Treasures of ancient and modern times, L. 5. c. 31.

After Tomumbeius, was elected Campfous Gaurius, whom Zelim a the Turke ouerthrew, and due in bataille; in whose place, another Tomumbeius was chosen: but soone, together with his whole State, came into the Turkes power. Thus being diuided in many Factions among themselves, and exercising all cruelties and pillages vpon the people, b they made themselves a prey to their Neighbours, who like Egypti Vulture, watched this opportunity to feize on these Lions, hauing now bled out their strength in mutuall and ciuill conflicts, in the yeere of our Lord 1517. The Egyptians affirme, c That a little before Selim besieged Cairo, for the space of eight dayes together, a great number of Crocodiles were scene in all parts on the banks of Nilus, and much dispersed abroad in the fields, taking and tearing great store of prey, as a preface of this Turkish seruitude. Solyman succeeded, in the yeere of our Lord 1519. (or 1520. as others say.) Selim the second, 1566. Amur the third, 1574. & in the yeere 1595. Mahomet the third; to whom, Acmet, who now is the Egyptian and Turkish Soldan. Of thele you may be more fully informed in M. Knolles his Turkish Historie, as also in our former Relations.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Oracle of IUPITER AMMON; and of Cyrene: and diuers Peoples adioynning, mentioned by the Ancients.

10  Lib. 1. c. 8. b. Plin. 15. c. 5.
 that lyeth betwene Africa Minor and Egypt, Pomponius Mela doth call Cyrenaica, including vnder that title Marmarica, which Plinius reckeneth by it selfe: who also calleth the former Pentapolis, and saith, it is renowned by the Oracle of Hammon, which is fiftie miles distant from Cyrene; by the Fontayne of the Sunne, and thole fise Cities, Berenice, Adinoc, Ptolemais, Apollonia, & Cyrene. This Region is now called Barca and Mesrata: of which, this is inhabited, and rich: the other is most what desart, and poore. Their Religion was like the Egyptians in times past. The Arabians that live there now, attend on their purchase, being the greatest Theeues in Africke. But this is, vnto the Arabians in all places of their abode (or wandring rather:) for which cause, it seemeth, Herome saith, the word Arabi signifieth Theeues, and is therefore taxed of Drosius, in his Observations; 10 Arabi no otherwise signifying Theeues, then Chananius a Merchant, or Chaldeu a Mathematician; because such commonly were their studies and courses. Berenice was sometime sacred, famous for the Garden of the Hesperides; nere to which, is that River of Lethe, formerly chaunted by the Poets. Nigh to this place also, are the Psylli, a people terrible to Serpents, and medicinable against their poysons, both by touching the wounded partie, and by sucking out the poyson, and by enchanting the Serpent.

The Oracle of Iupiter Ammon is famous among the Ancient. The place where this Temple was, hath on euery side vailt and fandie Desarts; in which, they which travelled, as were made in Arrianus and Curtius; seemed to waite with Nature: for the Earth was couered with sand; which yielded an vnstable footing, and sometime was blowne about with the wilde motions of the Aire. Water was hence banished, neither Cloudes nor Springs ordinarily shewing it. A ferie heate did possesse and tyrannize ouer the place, which the Sands and Sunne much encreased. Neither was here Tree, or Hill, or other marke for Trauellers, to discern their way; but the Starres. In the middle of this Desart, was that sacred Grove (which Siluius Italicus calleth a Lucus fatidicus) not about fiftie furlongs in circue, full of fittie-bearing Trees; watered with wholesome Springs, seasoned with temperate Aite, and a continuall Spring. The Inhabitantes, called Ammonians, are dispersed in cottages, and haue the middelt of the Grove fortified with a triple wall. The first Munition conteyneth the Kings Palace; the second, the Serrail, or lodgings for his women, where is also the Oracle; the third, the Courtiers inhabite. Before the Oracle is a Fountayne, in which the Offerings were washed, before they were offered. The forme of this God was deformed with Ramshornes, crooked, as some paint him: according to Curtius, without forme of any creature, but like a round Bosse, beset with jewels. This, when they consult with the Oracles, is carried by the Priests, in a gilded ship, with many silver Bells on both sides of the ship. The Matrons follow, and the Virgins singing their disordered Profession, by which they prouoke their god to manifest what they seeke. These Priests were about fiftiecore in number. Alexanders ambitious pilgrimage to this Oracle, is sufficiently knowen by the Relations of Curtius and Arrianus. This we may adde out of Scaliger, that after that, the Cyrenians, to sooth this proud King, which would needes bee taken for the sonne of Ammon, stamped his shipe in their coynes, with two hornes of a Ramme, and without a beard; whereas before they had vsed the forme of Iupiter, with a beard and hornes; wherein the other Easterne people followed them. The Syrians vsed the like stamp with the name of King Isylmachus, which Scaliger (who hath giuen vs the pictures of these Coynes) thinketh to be Alexander.

Ramshornes are said to bee ascribed to him, because Bacchus wandering in these Desarts with his Armie, was guided to this place by a silly Ramme. Likewise Pausanias in his facts with his Armie, was guided to this place by a silly Ramme. A Shepherd, was author of Messemia saith, that one Ammon (which built the Temple) a Shepherd, was author of this name to their God. Plutarchus reason of Amun we haue before shewed. Others ascriue this name from Amon the Sand; which may well agree with all Idols deuotion, as bezieue a fandie foundation, although it is here intended to the situation. But that which I haue before noted of Ham the sonne of Noah, foundeth more probable, as being Progenitor of all these Nations; and of this minde also is Pencurius. This Strabo in his time saith was in request, as no other Oracle besides. For the Romanes contented themselves with their Sybil, and other diuinations. This Oracle was not giuen by word, but by signes. This defect of of Oracles in generall, and especially of this, occasioned that Treatise of Plutarch & of this subject, enquiring the cause of the Oracles saying. Neut had he read, that the Gods which had not made heauen and earth, should perish out of the earth: nor had he eyes to see that Sunne of Righteousnesse, the Lights of the world, whole pure beames shined and dispersed these mists of darknesse. And therefore are his coniectures to farre from the marke, as not able with a natural eye to see the things of God. The antiquitie of this Oracle appeareth, in that Semiramis came to it, and inquired of her death; after which, the Oracle promised to her diuine honours. Perseus also and Hercules are reported to haue consulted the same in their aduentures against Gorgon and Enfrisa. Besides this Groue, there is another of Ammon, which hath in the midst a Well, they call it the Fountayne of the Sunne; whose water at Sunne-rising is luke-warme, and cooleth more and more till noone; at which time it is very cold, and from thence till mid-night, by degrees exchangeth that coldnesse with heate, holding a kinde of naturall Antipathy with the Sunne; & hottest in his furthest absence, coldest in his nearest presence. Plinie and Solinus place this Fountayne in Debris, a Towne not very farre from those parts amongst the Garamants. Lucrētius mentions it, and Philosophically disposteth the cause thereof.

Pausanias y reckoneth an Ammonian Iuno among the Libyan Cities, as well as this Iupiter. He addeth, the Lacedemonians had this Ammon in much request, and built to him no lesse Temples, as at Cythereum one, which had no roofo: and the Aphyreans did him no lesse worship then the Libyans.

Orellius, z who hath bestowed a Description of this Temple, supposeth that his Image was painted with hornes, but that Vmblicus was accounted the Deitie it selfe, or the signe of his presence, which shapelesse shape he sampleth by many like in other Nations. The ship he coniectureth to signifie, that the Religion was brought from some other place. But if Ammon be that sonne of Noah, it might rather bee a memoriall of the Arke, wherein Noah and his sonnes were preferred: as that also of Iannus, (who is imagined to be Noah) may more fitly be interpreted, then according to the Poets glossie:

b *Sen. Sulpiz.
Dialog. Philosophiae de Porce.
Orig. cap. 44.*

The ancient frugalitie of the Cyrenians is commended in Authors. Sulpinius bringeth in Postumianus, in his Dialogues, telling, That landing there by force of weather, he went with the Priest vnto the Church, which was very homely, covered with bafe twigs or boughs, not much better then the Priest (their hoste) his Tent, in which a man might not stand vp-right. Enquiring after the disposition of the people, they learned, that they were vtterly ignorant of buying and selling, of fraude and stealing. They neither had, nor cared to haue, so gold or silver; and when he offered ten pieces of gold to the Priest, hee refused it: onely was content to accept a litle rayment.

The Hammities are not much distant in place, or differing in name, from the Ammoni-ans: which built their houses of Salte, digging the salt-stones out of the Mountaynes, which they with mortar apply to their buildings. Mela ioyneth to these aforesaid the Atlantes, which curse the Sunne at the setting and rising, as bringing damage to them and their fields.
A practice not vnlike to the women of Angola at this day, who (as Andrew Barile, which liued there, testifieth) salute the New Moone when they first see her, by holding vp their hinder parts naked against her, as the cause of their troublesome mensuall purgation.

These Atlantes haue no proper names, nor feede of such things as haue life. He affirmeth of the Garamantes, that they had no wives, but liued in a beastly communie. The Angula acknowledge no other Gods but Ghosts, or Soules departed, by which they sweare; with which they consult as Oracles; to which they pray at their Tombes, receiuing answers by dreames. The women the first night of marriage are prostituted to all that will see them, the more the greater honour, but after, must obserue their owne husbands. The Troglodytes dwell in Caves, and feede on Serpents, and rather make a sound or noyse, then humane voyce: they vied Circumcision: they named not their Children by their Parents names; but by the names of sheepe, or other beasts which yeeld them nourishment. Their wiues and children (saith Agatharchides) are common: onely the Kings wife is proper, yet if any had lyen with her, his punishment was but the losse of a sheepe. In their Winter they lue on blood and milke which are mixed and heated together at the fire. In their Summer they kill the scabbed and diseased of their Cattell. They entitle none with the name of Parents, but the Bull and Cow, the Ram and Ewe, and the Male and Female of the Goates, because of these they receiue their nourishment, and not from their Parents. They goe naked all but the buttocks. Such as want that skin which others circumsise (scutal) they deprive of the whole flesh, so farre as the circumcision should haue extended. Their funerall Rites were, to tye the necks of the dead to their legs, and couer them with heapes of stones, letting a goates horne on the top, with laughter rather then mourning. Their old men which can follow the flockes no longer, they strangle with an Oxe-taile, which medicine they minister like wise to those that haue grievous diseases, or maymes. And vnto these doth Plinius adde the Blennyes, with faces in their breasts, the Satyres, Egyptians, Himantopodes, and other monstres, leaue wor-20 thy Relation or credit. These parts I haue thus ioyned in one Discourse, as liuing (for the most part) a wilde life, as the Arabians and Tartars doe at this day: and for Religion haue nothing notable that I finde, but as you haue heard. Procopius writeth of the Blennyes and Nobates, that Iustinian placed them in Egypt, about Elephantina; that they before obserued the Greekes deuotions, Isis also and Osiris, and Priapus, and sacrificed to the Sunne; which Rites the Emperour prohibited. But hee mentions no such Monstres. The Arabians which vnder Eleuin about the foure hundred yeere of their Hegena, gaue a Ducat a man to passe into Africke, are Lords and Inhabitants of the Deserts to this day, liuing (as wee say) a dogs life, in hunger and ease, professing Mahumets sect.

The Adrimacada liued neere to the Egyptians both in situation and custome. The Nas-
 30 samers had many wiues, with which they had companie publicly. The first night of the marriage, all the guests had dealing with the Bride, and rewarded her with some gifts. The Gnidanes had a more beastly custome, whose women glorying in their shame, wate so many fringes of leather as they had found Louers. The Machytes ware the haire on the hinder part of their head, as the Iaponians now doe. The Auses vied the contrarie: whose Virgins in the yearly feast of Minerva, diuided themselves into two companies, and skirmished with stauies and stones. If any Virgins dyed of the wounds, they accounted them false Maides. The most martiall Vrags of the companie, they arme and crowne, and place in a Chariot, with great solemnitie. They vsed not marriage, but had women in common: the child being reckoned his wish whom shee chooseth to liue. To adde a word of the Cyrenians, they held 40 it vnlawfull to smite a Cow, in honour of Isis, whose Falls and Feasts they solemnly obserued: and in Barca they abstayned both from Beefe and Hogs flesh. They feared the crowning or temples of their children, to preuent the distilling of the rheume.

In their sacrificing, they first cut off the eare of the beast, as first fruits, and hurled it ouer the house. Their gods were the Sunne and Moone. The Maxes haue the left side of their heads, leauing the haire on the right side. The Zigantes feede on Apes, whereof they haue plentie.

The Megauares make no account of Sepulchres, in stead whereof they couer the corpse with stones, and set vp a Goates horne on the stone heape. They haue many skirmishes for their pastures, which are ended by the mediation of old Women, who may safely interpose themselves, and end the fray (or battell, if you will so call it.) When men are so old that they can no longer follow the herds, they strangle him with a Cowes taile, if he will not preuent them by doing it himselfe. The like medicine they administer to such as are dangerously sicke. Of the Maces, Celins thinks the Roman Priests borrowed their shauen crownes. Of bulous, I list not to expresse. Silius Italicus in his Poems, and Aldrete in his Antiquities of Spaine and Africke, expresse diuers of their ancient Rites and Names, and that which seems vs most fitting, shall in this Historie be inferred. This part of the World, as least knowne to the Ancients, yeilded both Poets and Historians most matter of their Fables, in explaining whereof Aldrete hath written in Spanish very learnedly, as also of the later times, when the 60 Romans, Vandals, and since the Arabians, haue preuiyled.

Of that part of Barbarie, now called the Kingdome of Tunis and Tripolis.

§. I.

The name Barbaric: the Kingdome of Tunis, and Antiquitie of Carthage.

As the Tract of Land, between Atlas and the Sea (stretching in length from Egypt to the Straits) is * called Barbaria, either of Barbar (which signifieth to murmur) because such seemed the speech of the Inhabitants to the Arabians, or of the word Bar, which signifieth a Desert, doubled. It comprehendeth * both Maaritania's, Africamior, Libya exterior, besides Cyreniaca and Marmarica, whereof wee have spoken. The Inhabitants some fetch from Palestina, some from Arabia. It was conquered by the Romans, and taken from the Grecke Emperors by the Vandals, and from them againe by the Saracens and Arabians, and is now partly subiect to the Turke, partly to the Xerisse. It is vially diuided into foure Kingdomes, Marocco, Fesse, Tremisen, and Tunis; for of Barca is said alreadie: The Cities of Barbarie (it is Ios. Scaliger * his testimonie) speake Arabike, but not pure, nor yet so degenerate as the Italian is from the Latine; but the Countreie people vie the old African tongue, nothing like the other.

gimian with Natures forces, yea, the River Gellus, against Nature, stayed it selfe, as congealed indeed, whether with wonder, feare, or necessitie, accepting a Bridge or Damme rather of Roman bodies for a passage to the African Armie. These were golden dayes to Carthage; when three c bulshels of Gold-Rings, taken from the fingers of the slain enemies, were sent hither as a 4 present. A twome meane-while did Rome sustaine; and easily in five dayes might Hanniball have dined in the Capitoll: and poore helpe could they finde within the reiaue, had not Capua, with feasting the Conquerour, detayned Rome from Conquest, when they despoyled the Temples for Armour, armed their slaves, and bestowd their priuate take on the publike Treasure: all which could not make Fabius c fight with Annibal, but by not fighting he learned to overcome, knowing, that a shield was better weapon then a sword in that case. Scarce f in seuentene yeeres could Italy shake off this burthen, till Scipio by new policie warred against Hannibal, not in Italy, where he was, but in Africke and Carthage, whence his force was; thereby procuring Annibals returne, as the outward members are forced to yeeld their blood, to succour any sudden oppression of the heart.

But how is my heart oppressed with sudden passion, thus to transport the Reader, with my selfe, from Africke into Spaine, France, Italy, there to behold this Tragedie? Let the matter it selfe answer: and now weare returned to Carthage, and finde the Tragedie heere. For in the third Punike warre the Romans (sayth h Florus) rather fought with the Citie it selfe then with Men. And alas, what could that Hermophrodite-armie doe, wherein were five and twentie thousand armed? Women? Yet had women then the greater courage: Hephdrubal the King yielded. His wife, with her two children, and much people, burned themselves in the Temple of Esculapius, that could not cure this distate of his Citie and suppliants the like fate befalling the first and last Queenes of Carthage. Seuentene dayes together did Carthage burne, seven hundred yeeres after the first building.

In this last warre, after they had deliuered vp their Naue and weapons, being commanded to remoue ten miles from thence, Anger kindled new forces, and taught them to supply the want of Iron, with Silver and Gold, in making weapons, with pulling downe their houles to build a Naue, the Matrons giuing their haire (the feminine Ornament) to make bands for their manly and warlike Engines; their priuate glory, for publike needesse; all which serued but to augment the pompe of this funerals of Carthage. Cesar did after restore it with a Roman Colonie, neuer attayning the Tyrian glory, afflicted with Vandals and Gothes, and by the Saracens made desolate, vntill the time of Elmadidi, an heretical Calipha, who procured the inhabiting hereof. But not about the twentieth part was inhabited: The rest remayneth as scattered ruines, dispersed bones, of the carcase of old Carthage. Master Ponnissier, a friend of mine, told me, That hee hath bene rowed in his Boat ouer the walls of Carthage, or thirt ruines, the Sea hauing made the last conquest by eating into the Land. The Conduits are whole (saith Leo) which bring water from a Hill thirtie miles from Carthage, twelue miles vnder the Earth, the rest aboue. And now (saith he) are not about five and twentie shops, and five hundred houles therein, one faire Temple, one Colledge, but without Schollers, the inhabitants poore, proud, and superstitious. Master m Engsham saith, That this Citie is now ruined and destroyed. Hae mentoneth those Arches wherein water was higher conueyed, and one street three miles long.

As for the Sea-discoueries attempted by the Carthaginians, Hannu compassed m all Africa from the Spanish to the Arabian Straits, and committed his discoueries to writing; Himilco at the same time was employed in the search of Europe. Diodorus Siculus o wrieth a whole Chapter of their discouery of a pleasant and fertile land Westward, in the Ocean, which cannot more fitly agree with any other Region then some part of the Westlandies, as may seeme at the first view. But a man shall haue much to doe to finde that land, a harder discouery now, then it was then to the finders, at least as the Storied lies. And some p thinke, that the Indians of America were a Colonie of the Carthaginians. Ariselle hath also the like Relation in his Booke De admirandis Auditionib. In the beginning of the Warre q they had three hundred Cities in Libya, and seven hundred thousand persons in their Citie.

The Carthaginians (as all acknowledged, and their very name Peni doth procure) were Phenicians: which Countrey wee haue before shewed to be famous, as for many other things, so for the first letters and the first (that is, the Hebrew) language. The letters which the Hebrews since the Babylonian Captiuitie haue used, Poffellus m would haue to be the first, but secret till those times, and then by Ezra made common: but f others more probably hold the Phenician or Samaritan the first: and that the present Hebrew were the Assyrian or Chaldean Characters, which the Iewes brought thence with them. Now for prooffe that their ancient Language was Phenician, and consequently Hebrew: Dido is but the feminine, saith Scaliger, to David: and Elifa is the Hebrew Elifha. Iosephus relateth out, of Theophrastus, that the Tyrians and Sydonians might not vse other but their owne Countrey they oathes, of which hee reckoneth Corban, which the Scriptures also mention. And Scaliger saith, that the Punike Scene in Plinius his Penulus (although they had then much declined from the Hebrew puritie) is neerer the Hebrew then the Syriake, and that hee could for the most part restore it to the right Punike, which also hath happily bene attempted by Master Selden in his Dia Syria; and by Bernardo Aldrete a Spaniard in his Varia Antiquedades de España, Africa, y Ortae provinciarum lib. 2. cap. 2. Where he in a large Catalogue compareth the Hebrew, Syriake, Phœnician, and Punike termes together. Of their Baalshamen and other notes of this language, we have spoken before in our first Booke. The name Carthago, as Genebrard and Aldrete observe, in Syriake, signifies the midle Citie, Kartha a Citie, Go, midle: Selinus saith, New Citie.

Wee have alleged the testimonie of Procopius for the Chanzanites fleeing before Ishmael and the Punikes (saith * Augustine) called themselves (even in his time) Chanani. Salust ascribeth to the Phœnicians, Hippo, Hadrumentus, Leptis and other Cities on the Sea-coast, besides Carthage, which they built either to enlarge their Empire, or to prevent a fullness at home.

Concerning the Religion of the Africans : in Ancient times, Leo saith, That they worshipped the Fire and the Sunne, as did the Persians (erecting, in honour of each of these, faire and sumptuous Temples, in which the Fire was continually kept burning, as in the Temple of Vesta at Rome. The Numidians and Libyans sacrificed to the Planets. And some of the Negroes worshipped Gughim, which signifieth the LORD of Heavens. These afterward (hee saith) were of the Jewish Religion, and after that, of the Christian, till the 268. yeere of the Hegira, that some Negro Kingdomes became Mahometane, although there remaine some Christians to this day : those which were Jewish, both by the Christians and Mahometanes, were venterly destroyed. But those of Barbarie (whereof wee especially entreat) remained (saith hee) Idolaters, till two hundred and fiftie yeeres before Mahomet's birth, when they became Christians. This must be interpreted of the vniuersall and publike profession about the time of Constantine : For otherwise Africke had in it Christians before. Dorotheus in Synops saith, That Epenetus, one of the Ieuentic Disciples, was a Bishop of Carthage ; and that Simon the Apostle preached in Mauritania, and among the Africans, as Matthias also in Ethiopia. But the Gothes soone corrupted Christian Religion with Arrianisme, the forerunner of Mahometanism, both heere and elsie-where. The Moores (saith * another) worshipped Isba as a God ; and the Pani, Uranus ; the Libyans, Psaphon. This Psaphon (otherwise a base fellow) had taught Birds to sing, Psaphon is a great God, and let them flie into the Woods ; where chancing their lesion, they enchanted the rude people with this superstition. Eliaenus b telleth the like Historie of Annou a Carthaginian, whose birds, at libertie in the Woods, forgot this their Masters Lesson. The Pæni c being (as is said) Phœni or Phœnicians, brought (in all likelihood) the Phœnician Religion with them from thence. Yee may read in our first booke of Moloch : whence come the Carthaginian names of Milicis, Imilce, Amilcar, Bomilcar. Yea, Athenodorus reports of Amilcar a Carthaginian Deitie, which is like to be this Moloch or Milcim, in a little differing Dialect. Some are of opinion that these sacrifices had their beginning from a diabollicall imitation of Abrahams offering his onely sonne Isaac. For so Porphyrius and Philo Biblus relate out of the Phœnician Annals, that an ancient King called Israel, in great danger of warre, offered his onely sonne. Porphyrius calls him Iend, as Moses also, Gen. 22. 2. Iebid, that is, unigenitum, which hee had by Auobreta : whom Scaliger interpreteth Sara. Neither is it any great marvell, that the names and Story should bee thus peruerced, to any that read what relations, Iustus, Strabo and others write of the Iewes, or how the Deuill is the great Seducer of the world, bringing darkeness out of light it selfe. Silius mentioneth these their damnable Rites of humane Sacrifices.

Poscere cede Deos ueniam, ac flagrantibus aris (Infandum dictū) paruos imponere natos.*

Carthage, appeale the offended Deities,
Was wont to offer humane Sacrifice :
And tender Babes (abominable shame)
Were made the fiewell of the Altars flame.

So Ennius in that verse of his, cited by * Nepinus Marcellus, He suos Dini mos sacrificare pueros. Terentian writes, that this custome continued till the time of Tiberius, who being Proconful, crucified the Priests authors of this villanie, on the very Trees which shadowed the Temple in this bloody groue : yet this continued to Terentian's dayes, but more closely :

Sed & nunc in occulto persequeretur: hoc sacrum faciunt. Ipsi parentes sui offerant, & liberos exponebant, & infantibus blandiebantur, ne lacrymantes immolerentur. These are the words of Tertullian. To Saturne (saith e Sardus) were humane Sacrifices offered by the Rhodians, Phoenicians, Curetes, and Carthaginiens: the Sardi their e Colonie, offered the fayest of their Captives, and such as were about threelcore and tenne yeeres olds, who to shew their courage, laughed; whence grew the Proverbe, Sardonius risus: this was done also to Saturne. The Carthaginiens in time of plague, offered their Children to Saturne, which Gelo caused them to leave. Yea such was their zeale in this superstition, that if they had no Children of their owne, they bought for this purpose of the poore, the Mother assisting this Butcherly sacrifice, without once sighing or weeping, for then shee had lost the price, and her Child neverthelesse. And least the crying of the Children should bee heard, all resounded with Instruments of Musicke. Thus Plutarch in his treatise of Superstition. Being overcome by Agathocles, they sacrificed two hundred of the chiefe mens Children, to Saturne. Clearchus and others write, cited by Suidas, That in their solemne supplications at Carthage, they put a childe into the armes of Saturnes Brazen Image, vnder which was set a Furnace or Ovens, which being kindled, the childe in his burning, seemed to laugh. This custome might happily bee the occasion of that desperate act before spoken of in the destruction of Carthage by the Romanes, so many perishing in Aesculapius Temple. Other their Rites are likely to bee the same with those which we have reported of the Phoenicians, somewhat perhaps, in time inclining also to the Greekish superstition. Their devotion to Venus, the Phoenician Goddesse, Augustine mentioneth in these words, Regnum Veneris quale erat Carthagini, ubi nunc est regnum Christi.

h Carthage was called Iustiniana, of Iustinian, Iunonia of Gracchus, Hadesianopolis of Hadesian, and of Commodus, Alexandria Commodiana Togata. It was sacked the second time of Capellianus, President of Mauritania; thirdly, vnder Genfericus, of the Vandals; fourthly, of the Maurusians; fifthly, of the Persians; sixthly, of the Egyptians; lastly, of the Mahometanes.

Tunis i was a small Towne, till after the destruction of Carthage it grew in some reckoning (as before is sayd.) It hath in it about ten thousand Houholds. Abdul Mumen joynd it to his Kingdome of Marocco. And when that Kingdome declined, & the Vice-Roy (which before was subject to Marocco) now vsurped the State to himselfe, calling himselfe King of Africa. In our Fathers i dayes, Mulesses, sonne of Mabomet, King of Tunis (by murder of his elder brother Mamen, and either killing or putting out the eyes of twenty or ther his brethren) obtayned the Crowne. But Rafette the onely brother remayning when with his Arabians he could not gaine the Kingdome, he went with Barbarossa to Solyma the Turke, who fo vsed the matter, that Mulesses was chased out of his Kingdome, and Tunis subjected it selfe to Solyma. But Mulesses craued and obtained ayde of Charles the fifth, who in the yeere 1535. passed m with an Armie into Africke, and repossessed Mulesses of his Kingdome, who became the Emperours Vassall.

Our Histories tell of Edward the first his arrival at Tunis, and Henry the fourth with English Archers; at both which times the Tunetanes were forced to composition. It was before either of them were Kings. Frossart, for Henry, hath his Sonne Iohn de Beaufort.

Mulesses, about the yeere 1544. crossed over the Sea into Sicily, leaving his sonne Amida in the government. The costliness of his dyet was admirable, and of his Perfumes. One Peacocke and two Pheasants, dressed after his order, were observed to amount to a hundred Dukats and more. He was a superstitious observer of his Religion, and of the Starrs which portended to him the losse of his Kingdome, and a miserable end. To avoide this, he departed out of Africa (for feare of Barbarossa) but so fell into the danger. A rumour was spred at Tunis, that hee was dead; whereupon Amida possessed himselfe of the Kingdome. Mulesses hastned home to recover it, and lost himselfe: for hee was taken Captive, and after both his eyes put out with a burning knife, and of his two sonnes Nabafar and Abdala he was committed to Prison. But Adamelech his brother got the Kingdome from Amida, and soon after dyed, to whom succeeded Mabomet his sonne, a childe: whose Tutors were forrannercall, that Amida was againe sent for by the Tunetans, and Mulesses is brought to Sanctuary, whence by the Spaniards meanes hee was conveyed to Guleta, and thence to Sicily, where he was maintayned at the Emperours charge. He deriued his Pedegree from the Chorean Family, in right line from Homar, *Mabomet*s Disciple. Amida obeyned the Kingdome, thus tossed betwix Moortes, Turkes, and Christians, but was after taken and sent prisoner to Sicily. Mabomet (brother of Amida, now a slave in Sicily) was made King of Tunis; vnder the Spaniard, 1573. by Don Iohn of Austria: but the next yeere after Selym the Turkeooke Guleta, holden by the Spaniards almost forie yeeres, and at last rooke Tunis also: Mabomet the new King was sent to Constantinople prisoner.

It hath (sayth ¹ Leo) many Temples, especially one of singular beauty and greatness, furnished with store of Priests and Revenue: also, many Colleges of Schoollers, and Monasteries of Religious persons, to which the people yeeld liberrall Almes. They are soberly clothed, that they esteeme Fooles Saints: and while I was at Tunis, the King built a faire Monastery for one Sidel Dabi (which went vp and downe with his head and feete bare, holling stones, and crying like mad man) endowing the same with great Revenue for him and all his kindred.

Berta is an ancient City, supposed by some to be Vtica, where Caro liue him selfe.

II.

Of Cairaoan, and the Kingdome of Tripolis.

Cairaoan hath bene a City famous, built by Hucha, Generall of the warres of Ozmen, or Oimaz, the third Calipha, thirty sixe miles from the Sea, and from Tunis, one hundred, to secure themselves from any sudden invasion, which the commoditie of the Sea might cause them. He built therein an admirable Temple, on Pirats of Maible. To Hucha in this government succeeded a Muse, to whom Ismahe Barle of Ceuta offered his service for the conquest of Spaine, and being found faithfully vntaichfull with some few Souldiers lent him, was after employed with Tarif of whom the hill was called Gebel Tarif, now Gibraltar who with an Army of twelue thousand tooke Seuil, and after that ouerthrew King Rodericus, and being enriched with spoyle, was dispossessed thereof by Muse, who by this newes of his successe was moued to follow him into Spaine, as the Spanish Writers (though not altogether agreeing herein) declare, and subdued the same in thirty moneths space. When Muse or Musa departed with Tarif out of Spaine, the Moores there fell into such contentions, that in twenty yeeres space there were no lesse then fiftene Kings: and one of them seiled his Throne in the blood of three hundred Competitors. Iezal the sonne of Musa, and after him his Brother, and Nephew, succeeded each other in this government, which Elagleh (that followed them) turned into an independent and free Signory, by occasion (as is said) of the Chalisa's leaving Damasco, and remouing the Seat Royal, or Popedome to Bagdat. This House here ruled a hundred and seuentie yeeres, at which time Mabdi an hereticall Chalisa deprived them. These Saracens wan Sicilia in those times to the Cairaoan Dominion.

About the foure hundred yeere of the Hegira, Elcain was Chalisa in Cairaoan, whose Captaine Geboar conquered vnto him Barbary, Numidia, and as farre as Sus Westward: and after being employed in the East, subdued Egypt and Syria. Hee, for securing himselfe and his Army, built Cairo. After this he sent to his Lord Elcain to come thither in person, assuring him, that the Calipha of Bagdat was not able to abide his presence and puissance. Elcain listening to Geboar, appointed a Lieutenant in Cairaoan, and went to Cairo. But his Lieutenant of Cairaoan rebelled and offered his obedience to the Chalisa of Bagdat, who therefore gave him large Priuiledges, and made him King of all Africa. Elcain in these Straits knew not which way to turne him, till by counsell of his Secretary he tooke this course. The Arabians at that time were exceedingly multiplied, insomuch that the Country otherwise barren, could not sustaine them and their Cattell. To these hee gae leave to passe into Africa, paying for euery Pell a Duckat, and taking an oath of them, to be enemies to his Rebell. These in short time sacked Tripolis and Cabis, and after eight moneths siege, Cairaoan also, and remayned Lords of Africa, till Ioseph the first King of Marocco, who gae aide to the Kingmen of that Rebell, wonne the Cities from the Arabians, which still kept possession of the fields. The Lord of Cairaoan fled Westward, and reigned in Bugia, and the parts adioyning; and others of his kindred ruled in Tunis, till the Kings of Marocco swallowed all; that City being built presently after the Arabians had destroyed this, in the yeere foure hundred twenty foure of their Hegira, as Leo reckoneth. Cairaoan hath in it an ancient Temple, and Colledge of Priests. Hither the great men among the Moores and Numidians are brought to beburied; hoping by the Prayers of those Priests to climbe to Heauen. For this cause (Boterm sayth) they enter into this City vnshod, with great reuerence.

The Arabians haue filled Africa with themselves, their Armes, Arts, and Language. Arabike Letters, as Positellus affirmeth, were borrowed of the Chaldees; and first with Abubner and his Law, began to bee called Arabike. Hee findeth in the same, I know not what Cabalisticall Mysteries, yeelding more certaine predictions, then from the Heauens, or Oracles; and is much studied (he sayth) in Tunis, Marocco, and Cairo.

Tripolis of Barbary (for there is another of that name in Syria, so called, because the Arcadians, Tyrians, and Sidonians inhabited it) was so named of three Cities, whose Colonies planted it, Abratonum, and Tophia, and Leptis magna: or as others, Cesa, or Tiphia, or Oea, Sabrada, and Leptis. It was built by the Romans, conquered by the Gothes, and after by the Saracens. And after the destruction thereof, the Africans built a new Tripolis, wherein were many faire Temples, Colledges for Students, and Hospitals. Corneis alway deare, because their fields are Sand. It was subiect vnto the King of Tunis, till the King of Fez carried away the King of Tunis prisoner. At which time the Genouefe Fleet of twenty Sayle tooke Tripolis, and sold it to the Fezan for fifty thousand Duckats. But the Kings of Tunis recovered it after. Zacharias being King, played the Tyrant, and therefore was expelled, and a certaine Citizen was advanced to the Throne; who at first gouerned modestly, but declining to tyrannise was murdered: And a Courtier of Prince Abnaser, who had made himselfe an Heremite, was forced to be their King, who ruled Tripolis, till Ferdinando sent Peter Nanarre, who came thither in the Evening, and the next day tooke it: and the King remayned captiue till Charles the first freed him. Charles gaue the Citie to the Knights of Malta, whom the Turkes dispossessed by force, Anno 1551. and there haue their Beglerbeg or Vice-roy to this day. This was one and forty yeeres after Nanarre had taken it.

The Kings of Tunis liued in great delicacie among their women, Musicians, Players, and such like, committing the gouernment to the Munafid, or high Steward, and other Officers. When he calls for a Musician, he is brought in hood-winked like a Hawke. The Inhabitants are exceeding prodigall in Perfumes. They haue a compound called c. Libasi, one ounce whereof being eaten, causeth laughing dalliance, and makes one as it were drunken, and maruelously prouoketh to lust. In the Kingdome of Tunis is placed the Lake Tritonia, where Minerva is said to haue thewed her selfe the Inuenter of Spinning, and of Oyle, and therefore worshipped.

Ezzab is the most Easterly part of the Tunetan Kingdome, the chiefe Prouince wherof is Mefrata. The Inhabitants are rich, and pay no Tribute. There grow Dates and Olives, and they traffique with the Numidians, to whom they carry the Wares which they buy of the Venetians. The Great Turke swayeth with his Ottoman Scepter, at this present, this Kingdome of Tunis, and all Africa, from Bellu de Gemera, to the Red Sea (except that little which the Spaniard hath.) At this day they are Mahometan and haue bene so these nine hundred yeeres past, from the time of Hucha. The Inhabitants of the Cities differ much from the Mountayners and ruder Rusticks. For they are studious, especially in matters of their Law, as in times past they were also in Philosophy and the Mathematickes. But these last five hundred yeeres their Princes and Doctors haue prohibited many Sciences, as Astrologie and Philosophy: according to the Mahometan custome they vse much washing and resorting to the Temples. They are very faithfull in their promises, and exceeding ieaalous. They goe through the World as Merchants, and in many places are entertayned as Readers and Masters in diuers Sciences, and are well esteemed in Egypt, Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, India, Turkie. The younger sort yeeld much reuerence to their Elders and Parents: and will not hold discourse of loue, or sing loue-songs, in their presence. But these Citizens are very proud and reuegefull. The Lords esteeme more of their beasts, then of their common people. The Country people in the fields and mountaynes liue hardly in labour and want. They are beaustly, thieuih, ignorant, vnfaithfull. Their women before they bee married, may liue as wantonly as they list: yea, the father maketh latefull loue to the daughter, and the brother is vnlovingly louing to the sister. The Numidians are trayterous, homicides, theues, and for reward, will doe any thing. Such also are the Libyans: without any kind of Letters, Faith, or Law, without Heauen or Earth; liuing (if that may be called a life) like wild beasts, for ignorances like Devils, for wickednesse like Dogges, for poeury. These things reporteth Leo of them, who liued among them: which may prouoke vs to thankfulness to that Great God, who hath giuen Vs such abundance for body and soule, in things present and future, temporall and eternall.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Kingdome of Tremisen, Algier, and other places, anciently called Mauritania

§. I.

Of Tremisen, and of the ancient Maurusij.

He Kingdome of Telenin or Tremisen, ^a beginning Westward from the River of Zha and Muluia; Eastward, it bordereth on the Great River; Southward, vpon the Desart of Numidia; and Northward, vpon the Mediterran Sea. It was by the Romans called Mauritania Cesariensis: the name came of the Inhabitantes called Mauri, and of the Greekes, Μαυροι: some say ^b of their colour, because it is obscure and darke. They were supposed to come hither first with Hercules out of India. More likely it is that they ^c descended of Phis, the sonne of Chame, Gen. 10. 6. Plinie mentions a River named Fut in these parts, descending from Atlas. Salust saith ^d they came with Hercules, who being dead in Spaine as the Africans report, his Armie being gathered of many Nations, was diuisedly diuided. The Medes, Armenians and Persians of that number, sayled into Africa, of which the Persians dwelt neere the Sea, their ships with the keeles turned vpwards seruing them for houses, and mixed themselves with the Getuli, entitling themselves Numidians. The Libyans adioyned themselves to the Armenians, and to the Medi, whom by corruption of Language they called Mauri. These Getulians and Libyans, he saith, were before very rude, wandring vp and downe without Law or Ciuility, liuing like beasts, lying and feeding on the ground: which testimony of Salust, Mela in like words confirmeth. But of these and other African people, let them which please learne of that Author, and of such as haue written Notes vpon him, as Gruterus, Glaucaninus, Rimus, Ciacconius, Putschinus, and others, Vitruuius ^e nameth Mauritania, Maurilia, Ortelius ^f testifieth, That in ancient Coines it is read Mauretania, and so g Tacitus readeth. Ptoleme diuideth it into Mauritania Cesariensis, which ^h Vellor Ptolema calleth Maur, and Tingitania. ⁱ Pliny ascribes this diuision to Caligula; Dion, to Claudius Cesar: of whom it was surnamed Cesariensis of the Mother Citie Cesarea, where hee planteda Roman Colony, before called Iol, the Royall Seat of Iuba, a man famous, for that hee first reigned ouer both these Mauritania's; but more famous for his Learning, whereby he still liueth in the learned Monuments of Pliny and others; Authour of much of our African report. Hee in his childhood was led in triumph at Rome; his father ^k Iuba, the successour of Boethus, had before slaine himselfe in the Ciuill Warres. Augustus restored him to his Fathers Kingdome; to which he left his sonne Ptoleme, borne of the daughter of Antonius and Cleopatra, whom Caligula slue, and then diuided Mauritania into two Prouinces, whereof this is called, as is said, Cesariensis, of the Colonie of Claudius Cesar. That which Procopius ^l hath written of the originall of these Maurusij, as he termes them, although in our first Booke mentioned, here also may seeme to deferre Relation.

When Iesua or Iesuo, the sonne of Nun or Nane, had inuaded the Land of Canaan, the people fled into Egypt, and there multiplying, pierced into Africa, replenishing with people all ^m that Coast, vnto the Pillars of Hercules, vning a semi-Phoenician Dialect; For all the Seacoast from Sidon to Egypt, was anciently called Phoenicia: They built the Towne Tinge in Numidia, where they erected two Pillars of white stone neere a great Fountayne, wherein was engrauen in Phoenician Letten, Weo flee from the face of Iesuo the Thiefe, the Sonne of Nane. These are supposed the first Inhabitantes of Africa, and for that cause Antaeus their King, which encountered in single combat with Hercules, was said to bee the Sonne of the Earth. Afterwards, when the Phoenicians came hither with Dido, they were here receiued for kindreds felle, and permitted to build Carthage; which after grew so mighty, that it subdued and expelled the Maurusij themselves. The Romans made the Carthaginians, and other Africans Tributaries, and caused the Maurusij to inhabit the furthest parts of Africa: but in ⁿ process of time, they obtaining many victories against the Vandals, seated themselves in Mauritania, till Iustinian remoued them. Thus saith Procopius. Panini Diaconus ^o recordeth also the same History, saying that he saith, the Egyptians would not receive them, and therefore they passed into Africa. The Maurusy in the time of Justinian were destroyed, and captivated in such multitudes, that a Maurusian slave was valued at the price of a sheepe. The Author of this was Salomon, an Eunuch, according to a Prophecie which they had amongst them, that one without a beard should destroy them. But captivity could not much empare their happinesse, whose very freedome was slavery. * For they lived in small bale cottages, exposed to the Summer Sunnes, and Winter Inowes, sleeping (except a few of the better sort) on the bare ground, alway wearing the same garment, howsoever the season differed, and that torne and ragged: wanting bread and all other necessities, neither grinding nor boyling that Corne they had. Thus miserable were their bodies, and their soules more. For they had neither feare of God, nor reverence of Men, nor respect of pledge, nor regard of oath, nor peace with any, but where feare constrained them. They had their women Prophetesses, which diuined by their Sacrifices; a thing vnlawfull for their Men to attempte. Of the numbers of their wiv's they bragged, that & the Christians which had not one wive, might feare the losse of their children, they which might haue fifty wiv'es, need not misdoubt issue and Posteritie. And yet they were by many wars brought to small numbers, and a few Tribes or Families;

¶ Leo sayth, that after the Romanes were expelled, the ancient Gouvernours called Beni Habdalenad of the Family of Magraua possesed these parts; who were after dispossessed by Ghamrazen, Sonne of Zeljen, whose Posterity reigned here almost three hundred and eightie yeeres. But they were much vexed by the Kings of Fez, and Tunis. It was in later times called the Kingdome of Telenin, or of Tremisen, stretching in length from East to West three hundred and eighty miles, in breadth not above five and twenty. The Kings could never stisfie the Numidians couetise, whose friendship they haue with great cost sought. It hath two frequented Haven-townes, Oran and Mersalcahir, both taken and holden by the Spaniards. They were taken in the time of Ferdinando King of Spaine; for which cause Abuchemmen the Telenin King was expelled by his owne Subiects, and Abuchemmen placed in his roome, which he could scarcely warme, before he was slaine by Barbarussa the Turke, who conquered this Kingdome. * But Abuchemmen fought to Charles the fit for aide, by whose helpe he recovered his Kingdome, and payed a Tribute to the Emperour. But Habdalia his Successor detayned the Tribute, and submitted himselfe vnto Soliman the Great Turke. Algier remayned to Barbarussa.

p. II.

Of BARBARUSSA; of Algier and the parts adioyning.

His * Barbarussa or Barbarossa, was a meane fellow of base condition, who in his youth sold Cheeles in Spaine for his liuing, & by his industry attained to great matters. There were * of them two Brethren, born at Mytilene in Lesbos, their Mother a Christian, their Father a Renegade Grecian, Horneius Barbarussa, and this Haridennus Barbarussa. They first stole a Galliot, and so committing themselves to Sea, by Piracy vnder Camaleas, a Turkish Pirate, they grew rich: and from one Gallie, came to haue a Nauie of their owne, with which they scoured the Coasts of Barbary. At the same time * two brethren contended for the Kingdome of Algier, one of which requested ayde of Horneius, who so helped him against his brother, that he helped himselfe to the Kingdome, by the murder of the King his Patron and Alley, which he did not long enjoy, being taken and slaine of the Spaniards, and his head sent into Spaine. But his Brother Haridennus succeeding him, became mighty both by Sea and Land, to the great damage both of the Mores and Christians; and Saliman moued by his fame, sent for him, and made him Admirall of all the Turkish Seas, and Sea forces, vnder whom hee grew dreadfull, not to these parts of Barbary alone, which he subiected to the Turke, but to those Countries of Christendome which are washed with the Mediterranean: euen Rome it selfe quaking for feare of a second Hannibal, who after so many ages should by Sea from Africa avenge the angry Ghost of old Carthage.

In the yeere 1538. the Pope, Emperour, and Venetians, had with ioynt forces set forth a Nauy of about two hundred and fifty Saile against him, but by mutual dissensions the wanted advantage of the Turkes against the Christians) they made themselves both sport and spoyle to this Turkish Pyrat. The Sea could no longer endure the successe of this Barbarian, but mad to see the Christians in christian madnesse, and vnwilling to submit his proud waues to the base chaldome of this base Turke, swelling with indignation, conspired with the Neighbour Element, which pretended equal quarrell for so often darkening his light, and poisoning his breath with those hellish smokes, and for vnrping those thunders, which had wont to be the ayrie priuledge of his middle Regions: these both agreed in their disagreeing, with tempestuous furie to spoile the Spoilers: the winde from the Atroceraunian Hills, and the Seas on the Dalmatian shore, so girt in the Turkes, with their equal vnequall firs, that twentie thousand, of them were captiued and shut vp in Neptunes prisons, to become loode to his Familie; and the new Conquerors on every shore, made their markets of Turkish commodities, and by wracks testified to the Earth, that they had wrecked themselves on her and their enemies. And yet did Barbarus recouer himselfe by new fortres, and hauing won Rhegium, came to Ostia, where he rode three dayes; the Romanes trembling meanwhile, and ready to leaue Saint Peter alone to locke out the Turkes if they came. So much more fortunate were his proceedings, then of Haly Bassa, who in the fight at Lepanto, lost his life and Naue, whereof * eightie fell to the Seas share, and an hundred and thirtie saile, to Dan Lepo and his Partners; the greatest blow that euer the Turke at Sea receiued, and had the greatest a Homer to sing it. But me thinks I see some Cynthia pulling me by the eare, and asking if the Pirats haue robbed me of my Religion, the most proper subiect of my Discourse. Truly that irreligious Que, while they seeke to win other things, care not to lose that. But this Algier hauing bene of old, and still continuing a receptacle of Turkish Roaers, could not be pilled ouer, especially in these Piraticall times, without some obseruation, being all the gate, whither by the Turkish forces first entred into Barbarie. John Leo writeth a little other Wits of Barbarus and Algier.

- 30 The Moores call this Citie Gezeir, the Spaniards Algier: and of old was called Melgens of that African Familie which founded it. I contayneth e about foure thousand Families: the buildings very sumptuous; Innes, Bath-stones, and Temples very beautifull: every Occupation hath a faterall place by it selfe. It hath adioyning Playnes very pleasant and fertile, one whereof is foue and fortie miles long, and almost thirtie broad. For many yeeres it was subiect to the King, some of Telenfin: but hearing that Bugia was gouerned by a King, they submitted themselves to him, paying him a Tribute, otherwise in manner free. Then did they build themselves Gallies, and molested with Piracies the Spanish Ilands of Majorica, Minorica, and Ieuiza. Ferdinando therefore prouided an Armada against them, and built a Fort within shot of the Towne: whereupon they requested peace, and promised Tribute. But Barbarus, when Ferdinando was dead, was faire for by the Citizens, and made Captaine ouer all their Forces. Hee soone after murdered Selim Esqem, an Arabian Prince, which had bene created Gouverneur of Algier; when Bugia was taken by the Spaniards: and possessed himselfe of the gouernment, and there coyned money, calling himselfe King: the neighbouring people yielding him obedience and tribute. This was the beginning of Barbarus's greatness: and at the most part hereof Leo was present, and lodged in his house which had bene Embassadour from Algier to Spaine, from whence he had brought three thousand books written in Arabike. And while I was at Tunis, I heard that Barbarus was slaine at Telenfin, and his brother Catrado succeeded. It was told me also, that the Emperour Charles the first had sent two armies to surprise Algier, the first whereof was destroyed in the Playne, the second slaine, and made slaues by Barbarus, in the yeere of the Hegira 921. Thus faire Leo. In the yeere 1541. * Charles himselfe with his Imperiall Naue passed the Seas, to like both purpose and effe, more ouer-comming himselfe in the patient bearing his losses, then his enemies whom he fought to assaile. He was moued to this Expedition by the complaints of his Subiects, against the Turkish Pirats, which vnder Asanaga, Barbarus's Lieutenant, infested all those Seas. But the tempestuous weather both at Land and Sea disappointed him, and after the losse of many, both men and ships, was forced to returne, and to make roome for his Souldiers, caused his Horses (their gallant breede, notwithstanding) to be cast ouerboard. Thus doth Algier still continue a sinke of Pirats; and now, saith Magnus, there are in it not many lesse then foue and twentie thousand Christian slaues, which in likehood

- 30 at this time are increased. Tripoli is also a seate of a Turkish Viceroy or Beglerbeg, and of Turkish Roaers. In the Kingdome of Telenfin is the Desart of Angad, wherein are store of Roes, Deere, and Ostriches, Arabian Theeues and Lions. The Cattle of Izli was sometime stored with Inhabitants, and stately walled. Since, it was inhabited with Religious persons, much reuerenced by all Trauellers. A little off runneth a Riuer, out of which they water their fields, which esse would yeeld them no fruit. Guagida betwix two stooles had enquier sitting, paying tribute both to the Kings of Telenfin, and the Arabians. Ned Roma was built by the Romanes, as the name testifieth, for Ned signifieth Like; and like it was, if Historiographers saile not, vnto Rome. Here, and at Teberic dwelt great store of weauers, Harsgol was sometime famous, but being destroyed by a King and Patriarch of Casraon, it bequeathed, as it seemeth, the greatnesse thereof to Telenfin, which after grew in renowne. to this Kingdome. When Abu Tefin reigned, it had in it sixteene thousand Families. Iosaph King of Fez besieged it seuen yeeres together, and almost famished them: but he being slaine by treason, they found victuals enough in their enemies campe (which they alailed and spoiled) for their reliefe. Fortie yeeres after, Abulbisen King of Fez after thirtie moneths siege rooke it, and beheaded their King. Here are many and beautifull Temples, having their Mahumetan Priests and Preachers. Likewise here are five Colledges most sumptuously built by the Kings of Telenin and Fez, curiously wrought with muslike worke, for the Arabian Mutes and Students, which haue their maintenance there. Their Bathes and Innes I omit. A great part of this Citie is inhabited with Lewes, distinguished by their yellow Turbants from the other Citizens, which being very rich, in the yeere of the Hegira 923. were robbed and brought to beggerie. The Turkes & are now Lords thereof, betweene whom and Charles the first, who had vndertaken their protection, the Citie is much impayred, as also by the warres betwixt the Seriffe and the Turke. Barbarussa subiected it, Batha is a great Citie, or rather was such: now ruined by warres. Not farre hence in Leo's time kept a famous Heremite, much esteemed for his holinesse: who in short time grew so rich in Horses and other Cattell, that none in that Region were comparable to him. He payd nothing, nor any of his to the King, or to the Arabians, because they suppoed him a Saint. I was told by his Disciples (saith Leo) that the tenth of his Corne is eight thousand bulshells a yeere. He hath five hundred Horses and Mares, ten thousand small Cattell, and two thousand Oxen, besides that, he hath yearly sent him from diuers parts of the world, of almes and offering, betwene foure and five thousand duckats. His fame is spread ouer Asia and Africa, his disciples are five hundred, which dwell with him, and liue at his charge, to whom hee enioyneth neither penance nor labour, but to reade ordinarie prayers: and giues them some names of God to obserue in their prayers, which they are to mumble so many times a day: for which cause multitudes resort to him to be his disciples, which after such instruction he sends home againe. He hath an hundred Tents, some for Strangers, some for Shepheards, and others for his Familie. This good and lustie Hermit hath foure wiues, and many slaues, and by them many sonnes and daughters gallantly attyred. His children also haue wiues and children, in so much that the whole Familie of this Heremite and his sonnes exceede five hundred. Hee is honored of the Arabians, and the King of Telenin is afraid of him. I, being desirous to know him, was entertained of him three dayes, and supped with him euery night in secret roomes, where hee shewed me among other things, bookes of Magicke and Alchymie: and would haue proued to me that Magicke was a true Science: whereby I thought him to be a Magician, because I saw him so much honored, and yet vsed neither sayings nor doings, but those Inuocations of God by certayne names. Thus saith Leo, lib. 4.

Oran.

Oran is subiect to Spaine, taken by Peter Nouarre, 1509. It hath ten thousand Families. The Turkes in vaine assaulted it, An. 2563. Their Piracies procured this Spanish thraldome: vnto which Mersalcahir, a most famous Hauen, is also subiect.

Tegdemi.

Tegdemi is as the Arabian name significth, Ancient. It sometime was famous, and abounded with men of learning and Poets. But hee which would further bee informed of the Cities of this Kingdome, let him reade Leo. The people of Betich vse to paint a blacke crosse on their cheekes, and another vpon the palme of their hand. The same is obserued of diuers others, which yet know not the reason thereof, being Mahumetans. The storie saith, that the Gothes inuading and ruling these parts, proclaymed freedom from tribute to all such as would become Christians: a badge of which Christianitie was this crosse, still kept, now their Religion is lost.

Catech. Magia. P. G.

Concerning their marriages in these parts, we reade that the Bride is carryed, not on her feet, but in the armes of two yong men, with her eyes cloied, and being married, is in like sort, without stirring her eyes or feet, conueighed to the Bridegroomes house: where she enters first with the right foote, in token of prosperitie (the left foote first touching ground, would portend finisier successe, as proceeding from a certayne Constellation and ineuitable destinie) with musike shee is entertained and conducted to the Bride-chamber, where shee sits downe, as taking possession of her house, and all the other women standing about her: after which shee is led with great pompe by women to the Hall, the men accompanying the Bridegroome to another room. The Bride is set on a bed couered with a white vail, the women standing by, and many gifts and presents are offered to her: two women being her instructers in the rites and ceremonies which shee is to obserue, called Magia, to whom the Bride giueth the money which is offered. The men which offer, if they bee of neere kinne, may vpon request see her face, her eyes still cloied. Neither may shee speake, but by those Magia is thiried and gallantly adorned, and brought to banquet with the women. They haue a dinner and a supper, furnished with exceeding varietie of dishes, of Honey and Rayns diuersly compounded: their flesh is not tasted before oyle be powred on it. There are neere as many many pots boyling, as gusts, and much superstition is obserued in killing their flesh towards the Sunne, with pronouncing certaine wordes, or else all is cast on the dung-hill. The Bride being conueyed to bed, may not signifie any griefe for smart or losse there suitaine. The next morning before day, the husband riseth, not saluting his wife, and taking a pot for water, and a vessell for meate, at his returne beates vpon the doore with a stone many times; till shee (then first) speakes to him, and ordering the said meate and water, begins to looke to her household-charge. The Magné presently come and congratulate her last nights dalliance, and desire issue thereof: and then cut her haire hanging downe on her backe, euen with her neck, that it should not hinder her husbands embraces.

- 10 The government of these parts is, as is said, Turkish. The Beglerbeg hath chiefe rule, but the Dinaw hath chiefe power of Iudgements and Iurisdiction: The Corasaw or Capitaine of the Janizaries, being in many matters as great as the Beglerbeg. The Beglerbegs of Algier and Tunis make their principall profits of their places (which they hold three yeeres, having first bought them at a deare rate) by their piracies, which with ioynt consent they exercise on these Seas; all in manner being fish that comes to net, if they meete them conveniently, notwithstanding any league or peace holden with the Grand Signior. They also giue entertainment to such Pirates of other places, as resort to them, either to sell their ill-gotten goods, or to loyene their strength with them. As of late Daniker and Warde haue bene famous in this infamie; the first, after his seruice with them and for them, receiuing his reward, by them suddenly killed at Tunis (where he was knowne, notwithstanding his disguising himselfe, with purpose to haue surprised their fleet): the other (a shame to our Countrey, of which he was) grew so rich by his Piracies, that hee shewed at one time to (the Author of these reports) Iohn Pointisse, a bagge of Jewels, conzaining almost halfe a bushell, besides his other purchases: And at last, that the end might manifest the wickednesse of these proceedings, he became an Apostata and Renegado from his faith; and loone after (as some haue reported, for others say he is still aliue, and Capitaine of the Turkes Gallies) dyed at Tunis: leauing his goods (for his goodnesse he had left before) vnto the Turks, his body vnto a sorten sepulchre, and his soule to pirates and robbers (if they think they haue any soule) say whither.

- Algier was by Barbanssa subiected to the Turke, about the yeere 1534. Tunis An. 1574.
30 Three and twentie yeeres after that Tripoli, in Barbarie, another Cage of like birds, and seat of a Beglerbeg, was taken from the Knights of Malta by Sinan Bassa. These Kingdomes of the Turke hath in Africa, besides the great Kingdome of Egypt, and what hee hath taken from Prestre Iohn.

In Egypt are said to be an hundred thousand Timariots, or Horse-mens fees, which for that tenure of their Land, without any charge to the great Turke, are to serue where it pleaseth him to employ them. In this kingdome of Algier are fortie thousand.

CHAP. X.

Of the Kingdome of Fez, part of Mauritania Tingitana.

Of the Poeticall and Historiell Antiquities, and part of Temesara.

- 50 Mauritania Tingitana (so called of Tingis, now Tanger, at the mouth of the Streits) is by Ptolemy bounded on the West, with the Westerne and Atlantike; on the North, with the Mediterran Seas; on the East, with the Riuier Molua or Malua, which diuideth it from Casparus; on the South, with the inner Nations of Libya. Niger faith, it was after called Steinens, of the Cite Setia: more truly, Steinens, of Striphis, which Procopius faith was the mother Cite of Tingitana. In this Prouince are now the famous kingdomes of Fez and Marocco. The ancient Inhabitants besides the Mawriss (of which wee haue spoken) were the Massei, Autioles, Bannuri, and the Gatalians which liued here, and in other parts of Africa, as the Tartars doe in Asia, and the Arabians in Africa, remoouing their dwellings (if Tent-wandering may bee so called) as their pastures faile them. So Silius writeth 60 of them:

Nulla domus, Nilis trahunt, migrare per arua
Mos, aij, errantes circumuectare Penates.
Houfe they haue none; but wandering still in Waynes,
They cart their household-gods about the Playncs.

The westerly point of Maunitania Pomponius beginneth at the Promontorie, called of their store of Vines, Ampelasia, & now Cabo de Cantero, as Olinarius affirmeth. In it was a Cave famous to Hercules, and beyond the same, Tingi, supposed to bee built by Anteus, for prosee whereof they shew his Target made of an Elephants hide, too huge and unwieldy for any man of later times, and holden in great veneration. Next to this Tingi (which gaue name to the Countrey, after by Claudianus Caesar, who sent a Colonie thither, called Traduñda Julia) was a high Mountayne called Abyla, to which on the Spanish coast was opposed Calpe, which two Hills bare the name of Hercules pillars; Hercules himselfe (if wee beleue fabulous antiquitie) making there a passage to the Ocean and Meditteran Sea, for mutual view and entertainment. They are now called Scuta on that side, and Gibraltar on this side. A little hence was Julia Constantia, a Colonie of Augustus; and Lixus, a Colonie of Claudianus. In this was Anteus his Palace, and his combate with Hercules, and the Gardens of the Hesperides, which some (as is said) place neere Bernice. Anteus, if his legend bee true, was three score and four cubits long, a cruell and inhospitall Tyrant, who in his encountering with Hercules, was three times hurled dead to the earth, and so many times by his mother (the Earth) reuived: which Hercules perceiuing, held him vp in the Aire till he had strangled him. Whereby they intend, that the Sunne reuiveth the earth, signified by Anteus and Hercules, but with his excessive heat doth kill it. The Hesperides were the daughters of Hesperus, brother of Atlas; Egle, Arethusa, Hesperusa. In their Gardens grew those golden apples (the dowrie of Iuno to Iupiter) kept by a Dragon, engendred of Typhon and Echidna, which had an hundred heads, and many voyces, attended by the Priest of the Hesperides: these Hercules fetched away. This was the poeticall tale; the truth whereof is said to bee, that the daughters of Atlas were by Pirats and Theeues, sent from Busiris King of Egypt, stolne; and redeemed by Hercules, who slue those theeues. These were borne to Atlas of Hesperia, daughter of Hesperus his brother, called therefore Atlantides and Hesperides, fixe in number. Atlas had an excellent kinde of sheepe, with yellow fleeces, which for this exploit he bestowed on Hercules: and taught him also the knowledge of Astronomie; in regard of which Science, Atlas is said to haue borne vp the Heauens with his shoulders, and Hercules to haue vnderaken his burthen. Whereas Natalis Comes placeth these gardens with Plinius, neere to Lixus, and yet nigh to Meroe and the Red Sea, betwixt which places is such a world of distance, it argueth how great errors great Schollers may fall into by want of that so-much-neglected studie of Geographie, without which, Historie that delectable studie is sicke of a halfe-dead pallie: one cause that hath moued me to ioyne in my studies and in this worke, the Historie of Tunis, with her manifold changes and chances and of Place together. Besides the Altar of Hercules, and wilde Oliues, there remayned nothing in Plinius dayes of that Hesperian garden. Niger findes there a tree Mallow, twentie foote high, and about a fathom about. Of Mount Atlas they tell wonderfull tales, of the selfe-fertilitie thereof, the Inhabitants neuer seene by day, the desert-like silence, the fires therein shining by night, the musike and mysticall rule of the Egyptians and Satyres, and the labours of Hercules and Perses there. Iohn Leo shall better acquaint vs with the truth, then those fables of credulous antiquitie. Out of him therefore and other later writers, wee will take view of the present face of Africa, there being little that can bee said of their ancient Rites, more then is already obserued. The Romans brought hither their Language and Religion. The Vandals vnder Gensericus passing out of Spaine, made conquest of all in manner which the Romans had in Africa, of whose crueltie Vittor Vincensis, an eye-witnesse, hath written three bookes. The manifold battels and alterations of estate betwixt them, the Romans, Maurians, and others, Procopius hath diligently recorded. It would bee harsh and tedious here to relate. The soyle, saith Mela, is more noble then the people: of the miraculous fertilitie whereof, Dionysius Placarnassensis, Amusifer, Boemus, and others haue written. I know not how truly, That their corne yeelds an hundred fold encrease, and in some places an hundred and fiftie; That there are seene Vines as great as two men can fathom, and grape-clusters a cubit long, &c. It is thought that Christian Religion was here preached in the Apostles time.

Leauing those things of more age and vncertaintie, wee will come now to the kingdomes of Fez and Marocco, which haue bene of Saracenicall erection in this Province of Tingitana. That of Fez stretcheth from Azamor to Tanger, and from the Atlantick Ocean to Mluka. This Riuer is the Easterne border, on the North it is washed with the Sea, on the South is the kingdome of Marocco, on the West, the Riuer Ommirabih. The Riuer Subu, Luccus, and others water it. Therein are numbred seuen Provinces, Temelsa, the Territorie of Fez, Azgar, Ellahabet or Habat, Errif, Gare, and Chaus or Elchaw: eury of which, saith Leo, had in old time a severall Gouvernour. Neither was the Citie of Fez the royall seat, but was built by a schismaticall Rebelle, in whose Familie the gouernment continued 150 yeres. And then the Marin familie preuailing, gaue it first the title of a kingdome, setting their abode and strength therein.

Temefna beginneth at Ommirah, thence stretching Eastward to Buragag, betwene Atlas and the Ocean. It is a playne Country, eightie miles in length, containing in it fortie great Townes, besides three hundred Castles. In the yeere of the Hegira 323, Chemim, the sonne of Menol, an Heremiticall Preacher, periwaded them to pay no tribute, nor yeeld subjection to Fez, because the iords thereof were vniust. Hee bearing himselfe for a Prophet, in small time gate into his hand the Spirituall and Temporall Sword, holding the same by force and Armes. But after that Ioseph had built Marocco, hee sought by Catholike Doctors of the Mahumetane Religion, to reduce them from their Heresie, but they slew them, and with an Armie of fittie thousand marched towards Marocco, to expell thence the House of Luntuna, but by this meanes brought destruction to themselves; Ioseph getting the better, and spoyling their Country, tentie moneths together, with great crueltie.

It is thought that a million of people by Famine, Sword, Rockes and Riuers, were consumed: and Temefna was left to bee inhabited of Wolves, Lyons, and Ciuit. Cats, a hundred and fittie yeeres: at which time King Manfor gaue the possession of Temefna to certaine Arabians, who fittie yeeres after were expelled by the Luntune Family, recovering the Kingdom from the House of Manfor; and after, the Marin Family preuailing, gaue it to the people of Zenete and Haora, in meede of their seruice, which they had done to the Marins against the King and Patriarch of Marocco. From which time they haue enjoyed the same almost two hundred yeeres.

Anfa was a Towne of great Trade with the English and Portugals, and by these vtterly razed: and so the Arabians serued the next Citie Manfora, Nuchalla, sometimes famous for their plentie of Come, of which it is recorded, that they would giue a Camels burthen for a paire of Shoes, hath now but a few bones left of her carkasse, namely, a piece of the wall, and one high Seeple, where the Arabians after they haue ended their Tilt, lay vp their instruments of Husbandrie, none daring to steale his neighbours tooles, in reuerence of a Saint of theirs, there buried.

Rebat, is a Towne furnished with Colledges, and Temples, the modell of Marocco. Ae Sella was King Manfor buried, where hee had built a stately Hospitall, and Palace, a beautiful Temple, and a Hall of Marble cut in Mosaike worke, with glasse-windowes of diuers colours, wherein hee and his Posteritie were buried. I saw, saith Leo, the Sepulchre, and copied out the Epitaphs of thirtie of them.

Madur Auzan, by the ruines testifieth her sometime proud buildings, Hospitals, Innes and Temples. In Thagia is visited the Sepulchre of a holy Man, which liued in the time of Habdul Mumen the Calif or Patriarch, who wrought great miracles against the Lyons, wherewith the Towne is much molested. Ettedle, a Mahumetane Doctor, wrote a Legend of his miracles, which Leo saith hee had read, and supposed that they were done either by Naturall or Diuellish Magicke. The Fessans after their Easter, yeerely resort to his Tombe, with such numbers of Men, Women and Children, and their Tents, that they seeme an Armie. It standeth from Fez an hundred and twentie miles, so that their going and returning in this Pilgrimage lasteth fiftene dayes. My Father carried mee yeerely thither when I was a Child, and since, I haue bene there many times, by reason of many vowes which I made, being in danger of Lyons. Where Zarfa stood, the Arabians now mow few Corne.

The Territorie of Fez hath on the West the Riuer Buragard; the East, Inauen; on the North, Subu; and Atlas on the South. Sella was built by the Romans, sacked by the Gothes, subiect since to Fez. The buildings are of Mosaike worke, supported with Marble Pillars: euen the Shops are vnder faire and large Porches, and there are arches to part Occupations. All the Temples are beautifull. In this Towne the Genowaiers, English, Flemings, and Venetians, vsed to trade. The Spaniards tooke it in the 670 of the Hegira, but lost it againe within ten dayes. Fanzara was destroyed by Sahid, who with certaine Arabians besieged Fez seuen yeeres together, and destroyed all the Villages in the Country about. Mahumora was made famous by the slaughter of the Portugals, whose blood dyed the Sea three dayes together, blushing to see the barbarous Barbarian spill so much Christian blood. Leo was there present, and numbred the slaine Christians at ten thousand, besides the losse of their Ships and Ordnance, whereof the Moores tooke vp foure hundred great Brass Peeces out of the Sea, in the yeere of the Heg. 921.

Of the Citie of Fez, as it was in L E O's dayes, and the Customes of the Inhabitants.

The Citie Fez, or Fesse, was built in the time of Aron the Caliph, in the 185. yeere of the Hegira, or Mahomettall computation. It had this * golden Title, because on the first day of the Foundation, there was found some quantitie of Gold. Galper Varrinus and Aldebre are of opinion, That the River Phut (so called of the sonne of Cham, before mentioned) is this River of Fez, by the Arabians thus altered: and that this River gave Name to the Region and the Citie; which opinion is also rectified by Leo. The Founder was named Iabur, *Aron*s neere kinsman, to whom the Caliphship was more due: For he was nephew of Hali, Mahumets coulin, who married * Falerna, daughter of Mahumet, and therefore both by Father and Mother of that kindred; whereas Aron was but in the halfe-blood, being nephew to Habbus, the vncle of Mahumet. Howbeit, both these Families were deputed of the Caliphate; and Aron by deceit c* vltured: For *Aron*s Grandfather faimed himselfe willing to transfere that dignitie to Hali, and cauled the house of Vmenet to lofe it; and Habdulla Seffice became the first Caliph, who persecuted the House of Hali openly, chasing some into Asia, and some into India. But one of them remayned in Elnadina, of whom (because hee was old and religious) he had no great feare. His two Sonnes grew in such fauour with the people, that they were forced to flee; and one being taken and strangled, the other, which which was this Idris, escaped into Mauritania; where hee grew in such reputation, that in short time he got both Swords into his hand, and dwelt in the Hill Zaron, thirtie miles from Fez, and all Mauritania payed him tribute. Hee dyed without issue, onely hee left his slave with Child; she was a Gorch, become Mahumetan, and had a sonne, which after his father was called Idrus. Hee succeeded in the Principalltie, and was brought vp vnder the discipline of a valiant Capitaine, named Rasid; and began to shew great prowesse at fifteen yeeres. He afterwards, encreasing in power, built on the East side of the Riuer a small Citie, of three thousand Families. After his death, one of his sonnes built another Citie on the West side; both which Cities so encreased, that there was small distance betweene them. And a hundred and eighty yeeres after, there arose ciuill Warres betwixt those two Cities, which continued a hundred yeeres. And as Asopi Kite serued the Moule and Frog, so Ioseph, of the Luntine Family, apprehending this aduantage, tooke both their Lords, and slew them, and thirty thousand of the Citizens. He brake downe the walls which parted the two Cities, and cauled many Bridges robe made, and brought them both to be one Citie, which he diuided into twelue Wardes,

The Citie is now, or at least in Leos time was, both great and strong. It seemes, that Nature and Art haue played the Wantons, and haue brought forth this Citie the fruit of their dalliance: Or else they seeme Courtiuals; both, by all kind Offices, seeking to winne her loue: So doth the Earth seeme to dance, in little Hills and pretie Vallies diuerlifying the Soyle: so doth the Riuer disperse it selfe into manifold Channels; no sooner entering the Citie, but it is diuided into two Armes, wherewith it embraceth this lovely Nymphy and these subdiuided, as it were, into many Fingers, in variety of Water-courses, insinuating it selfe vnto euery Street and Member thereof: and not contented thus in publike to testifie affection, findes meanes of secret intelligence with his Loue by Conduit-pipes, closely visiting euery Temple, Colledge, Inne, Hospitall, (the speciall Chambers of his Spouse:) Yea, and almost euery private house, from whence, with an officious seruice, he carrieth the filth that might offend either sight or sent of his Bride; which still enjoying, he wooeth; and euer wooing, enjoyeth. Only in hot Seasons he hath a cold suit: for the Riuer is dry; but then he hath six hundred Fountaynes to speake for him in his absence. Neither is Art behind in his proffered courtesies, but still presents her with Mosaike workes, as Chaynes and Jewels to adorne her; with fine Bricks and stones framed into most artificiall Fabricks, both louely for delight, and stately for admiration. The roofes of their houses are adorned with Gold, Azure, and other excellent colours, which are made flat, for the Inhabitants vsit and pleasure; whose Houses are richly furnished, euery Chamber with a Presse, curiously paynted and varnished. And who can tell the exquisitenesse of the Portals, Pillars, Cisternes, and other parts of this Cities furniture? Which, if they be not now so excellent, as when Leo liued here; yet, it is worth the sight, to looke vpon it with his eyes, as then it flourished, before the Count was remoued thence to Marocco, or the detouring bellies of Time and Warre had impaired her Beauties. Once, let the Temples therein a while detain your eyes; whereof there were in Fez, together with smaller Chappels, or Moschees, about seuen hundred; fifty of which great and faire, adorned with Marble Pillars, and other ornaments of the Chapters thereof wrought with Mosaike and carued workes. Euery one had his Fountaines of Marble, or other Stones, not knowne in Italy. The floor-s are couered with Mats, closely joyned, and so are the walls a mans height lined therewith. Euery Temple hath his Steeple after the Mahumetan manner, whereon they, whose office it is, ascend and call the people at the appointed houres to Prayer: there is but one Priest therunto, who sayth their Service there, and hath charge of the reuenew of his Church, taking accounts thereof, to bestow it on the Ministers of the said Temple; namely, those which keepe the Lampes light in the night, the Porters, and them which cry in the night-time, to call them to Church. For he which cryeth in the day-time, is onely freed from Tenths, and other Payments; othertwise, hath no Salarie or Stipend. There is one Principall, and (if we may so terme it) Cathedral Church, called the Temple of Carnuue, so great, that it containeth in a circuit about a mile and halfe. It hath one and thirty Gates, great and high. The Roofe is a hundred and fifty Tull-can b yards long, and little lesse then eighty broad. The Steeple is exceeding high. The Roofe hereof is supported with eight and thirty Arches in length, and twenty in breadth. Round about are certayne Porches, on the East, West, and North, euery one in length forty yards; and in breadth thirty. Vnder which Porches, or Galleries, are Magazines, or Store-houses, wherein are kept Lampes, Oyle, Mats, and other necessaries. Euery night are lighted nine hundred Lampes; for euery Arch hath his Lamp, especially that row of Arches which extends through the mid-Quire, which alone hath a hundred and fifty Lampes; in which ranke are some great Lights made of Brasse, euery of which hath sockets for one thousand five hundred Lampes: And these were Bells c of certayne Cities of Christians, conquered by Fessan Kings. About the walls of the sayd Temple within, are Pulpits of diuers sorts; wherein many learned Masters read to the people such things as pertaine to their Faith and Spirituall Law. They begin a little after breake of day, and end at ^d one hour of the day. In Summer they reade not, but af-er foure and twenty houres, or Sun-set, and continue till an houre and halfe within night. They reach as well Morall Philosophie, as the Law of Mahomet. Priuate men reade the Summer-Lectures; onely great Clarkes may reade the other; which haue therefore a large stipend, and Bookes, and Candles, are giuen them. The Priett of this Temple is tyed to nothing but his Mumpsimus, or Seruice. Alfo he taketh charge of the Money and Goods which are offered in the Temple of Orphans, and dispenleth the reuenues that are left for the poore. Every Holy-day he dealeth to the poore of the Cite, Money and Corne, according as their necessitie is more or lesse. The Treasurer of this Church is allowed a Duckat a day. He hath vnder him eight Notaries, each of which haue fix Duckats a moneth: other fix Clarkes, ¹⁰ gather the Rents of Houses and Shops, which belong to the Church, retayning the twentieth part thereof for their wages. Moreouer, there are twenty Bayliffes of the Husbandry, that ouer-see the Labourers. Not farre from the Cite are twenty Lyme-Kils, and as many Brick-Kils, seruing for the reparations of the Temple, and the houses thereto belonging. The reuenues of the Temple are ^a two hundred Duckats a day. The better halfe is layd out on the premisles. And if any Temple of the Cite or Molchee be without reuenew, they are hence furnished with many things; that which remains, goeth to the common good of the Cite.

^a This may be reckoned as old Rent with vs, which now may be exceedingly improved: for Leo wrote this, An. 1526.

In the Cite are two principall and most stately Colledges of Schollers, adorned with Mosaiques and carued workes, paved with Marble and Stones of Majorica. In each of them are many Chambers; in some Colledges are a hundred; in some more; and in some lesse. ²⁰ They were all built by diuers Kings of the Marrin Family. One is most beautifull, founded by King Abu Henon. It is adorned with a goodly Fountayne of Marble, and a Streame continually running: there are three Cloysters, or Galleries, of incredible beautie, supported with eight square Pillars of diuers colours, the arches adorned with Mosaike of Gold and fine Azure. The Roofe is of carued worke. About the walls are inscriptions in Verse, expressing the yeere of the Foundation, and prayles of the Founder. The Gates of the Colledge are of Brasse, fairly wrought, and the doores of the Chambers carued. In the great Hall where they say their Prayers is a Pulpit, that hath nine stayres to it all of Iuorie and Ebonie. This Colledge cost the Founder 480000. Duckats. All the other Colledges in Fez hold some resemblance with this, and in euery of them are Readers or Professors in diuers Sciences prohibited by the Founders. In old time the Students were wont to haue their dyet and rayment allowed for seven ³⁰ yeeres, but now they are allowed onely their Chamber; for the warres ^a of Sabid consumed their Possessions: So that now there remains but little wherewith they maintayne their Readers; and of them, some haue two hundred Duckats, some a hundred yeerely, and some lesse. And there abide in the said Colledges onely a few Strangers maintayned by the Almes of the Citizens. When they will reade, one of the Auditors readeth a Text, and the Reader then readeth his Comments, & brings some exposition of his own, and explaineth the difficulties. And sometimes in his presence the Students dispute of that Argument which he handleth.

^a Bellum, con-
sets.

There are many Hospitals in Fez, not inferiour in building to the Colledges aforesaid. In them, strangers were entertayned three dayes at the common charge. But in the time of Sabid ⁴⁰ warre, the King sold their Reuenues. Now, onely Learned men and Gentlemen receiue entertainment, and poore persons reliefe. There is another Hospitall for diseased strangers, which haue their dyet, but no Phisicke allowed them. Here also Mad-men are provided for. In this Hospitall, Leo, in his youth, had bene a Notarie.

There are in Fez a hundred Bath-stoues, well built, with foure Halls in each, and certaine Galleries without, in which they put off their clothes. The most part of them pertaine to the Temples and Colledges, yielding them a great rent. They haue a yeerely Festiual, wher- ⁵⁰ in all the seruants of the Bathes, with Trumpets and great Solemnitie, goe forth of the Town, and gather a wild Onion, which they put in a brazen Vessell, and bring it solemnely to the Hot-house doore, and there hang it vp, in token of good lucke. This, Leo thinks to be some Sacrifice, obserued by the ancient Moores, yet remaining. Euery African Towne had sometimes their peculiar Feast; which the Christians abolished.

Innes here are almost two hundred, built three stories high, and haue a hundred and twenty Chambers a peece, with Galleries afore all the doores. But here is no prouision of Bed or Board for Strangers. The Inne-keepers of Fez (in Leo's dayes) were all of one Family, called Eilebna, attyred like women, haue their beards, become womanish in their speech, yea degenerate ⁶⁰ euen to the Wheele and Spindle. They are to ^a odious (except to bise villaines that resort thither) that the better sort of people will not speake to them; and may not enter the Temple, Burie, or Bath, nor into those Innes next the great Temple, where Merchants are entertained. There are thousands of Mills, all almost pertaining to the Temples and Colledges reuenew. Each Trade in Fez hath a peculiar place allotted thereto, the principall wherof are next the great Temple; as Scriueners, Booke-sellers, &c. euery Trade by themselves.

Inne-keepers.

The Christian captiues rest only vpon Fridayes; and eight other dayes in the yeere Festiual to the Moores. There are six hundred Fountaines walled about, the waters whereof are conveyed by Conduits to the Temples, or other places, because the River is sometimes dry.
They have in Fez a Iudge for Criminal Causes, and another for Questions of Religion; a third, that deales in Matrimoniall Cases: From these there lyeth an Appelle to the high Advocate.

The Iudges of Mahometts Law, in matters of conscience, haue no allowance for the same.
Their Marriages are thus: When the Father of the Maide hath espoused her to her ^a Louer, they goe with their friends to Church, and haue with them two Notaries, which draw the Cousnants agreed betwixt them, into writing. The Father bestowes a Dowrie or Portion 10 of Money, Apparell, and such like; seldome, of Land. Which the Bridegroom fetcheth her home, she is set in a Cabinet, covered with silke, and carried by Porters, accompanied with her kinsfolkes, and much Minstrellie; and the Bridegroomes friends goe before with Torches, and her kinsmen after, toward the great Church. Then hee hasteth home, expecting his Bride in his Chamber, whom her Father, Brother, and Vncle, bring and deliuer to his Mother; and he setting his foot on hers, shuts the Chamber doore: at which a woman standeth, and receiueth of him a Napkin stayned; which she sheweth to the Assembly, as a testimony of the Brides Virginitie: But if shee bee not found a Maide, she is returned to her Friends with shame, and the guests goe home without their Feast. They hold great fea-20 sting also at the Circumcision of their male-children, which is the seuenth day after they are borne. The Barber or Circumciser is presented with gifts of all the inuited guests. Then fol-loweth mirth and iollity. They vse dancing; but the women apart by themselves without out men.

There is a remaynder of Holidayes instituted by the Christians, which themselves vn-derstand not. On Christmas Euen they eat a Saller made of diuers herbes, and seeke all kinds of Pulse which they feed vpon. On New-yeeres day, the children goe with Maskes on their faces to the houses of Gentlemen, and haue Fruits giuen them, for singing certaine Songs. On the Feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, they vse to make Bone-fires. They make a Feast called Den-villa (when their childrens teeth begin to grow) vnto other children. When a man dyes, the women put on Sack-cloth, and defile their faces with dirt. They call so their those wicked 30 men in womens attire, which haue foure square Drummes, to the sound whereof, they sing mournfull Dieties, in prayse of the dead party. At the end of euery Verse the women utter moist hideous shrieks and out-cries, tearing their haire, and beating their breasts and cheekes, till they be all embued with blood. And thus they continue seuen dayes, and then intermit their mourning forty dayes; after which space, they resume the same for three dayes, as before. But the better sort beaue themselves more modestly. At this time all the Widowes friends come about her to comfort her, and send her diuers Kindes of meats; for in the moun-ring-house they may dresse no meate at all, till the dead be carried out. The woman which solicit her Father, Brother, or Husband, neuer goes forth with the Funerall. At some Festi-uals, the Youth of one Street will fight with Clubs against the Boyes of another Street, and 40 sometimes betake them to other Weapons, and kill one another. Sometimes they vse their bloody Prayes without the City, the Officers forcing them to better order. There are many Poets, which pen amorous Sonets: and on Mahometts Birth-day, make Verses in his commendation, resorting early to the Palace, and there ascending the Tribunall, read their Verses to the people; and he whose Verses are best, is pronounced that yeere Prince of Poets. The Marin King on that day vsed to entertaine the learned men, and to reward the best Poet with a hundred Ducats; a Horse, a Woman-slave, and the Kings Robes which hee wore that day.

In Fez are two hundred Grammar Schooles, built like great Halls. Euery day they learne one lesson of the Alcoran. They read and write not in Bookes, but in great ^b Tables. In seuen yeeres they learne the whole Alcoran by heart. And then the Father inuitheth his sonnes 10 Schoole-fellowes to a Banquet: and his Sonne rides through the street in costly apparell, both which are lent by the Governour. The other Boyes ride and sing Songs in prayse of God and Mahomet. On Mahometts Birth-day euery Boy must carry a Torch to Schoole curiously wrought, some weighing thirty pound, which they light before day, and let them burne till Sun-rising, singing all the while the prayes of Mahomet. The Schoolemasters haue the remenant of the Waxe, which sometimes they sell for a hundred Ducats. They are free Schooles anciently built. In the Schooles, and also in the Colledges, they haue two dayes of recreation euery weeke, wherein they neither teach nor studie.

§. III.

Of their Diuiners and Setts, and other parts of the Fezan Territorie.

Here be three kinds of Fortune-tellers or Diuiners. One of which vseth Geomantical figures; others, powre a drop of Oyle into a glasse of water, which becommeth cleere as a Seeing-glasse, in which they say they see strange sights, ranks of Deuils, like Armies, some traueilling, some passing ouer a Riuer, &c. When the Diuiner seeth them quiet, he demandeth such questions of them as he will, and the Deuils with gestures returne answer. The third sort are Women-witches, which make the people beleue, that they are acquainted with Deuils of diuers sorts, red, white, blacke: and when they will tell any mans fortune, they perfume themselves with certaine Odours, whereby (as they say) the Deuill entrench into them, and their voyce is presently altered, as if the Deuill spake within them. And then they that come to enquire, aske their questions, and so hauing left their present for the Deuill, depart.

a. A female filthinesse.

These women vse vnlawfull lusts betwene themselves in mutuall filthinesse: & if faire women come to them, they wil demand the Deuils see, that they may haue such dealing with them. Yea, some adding themselves to these abominable practices, will faile themselves sick, and send to one of these Witches, which will asseme, That shee is possessed with a Deuill, and cannot be cured, except she become one of their Societie. The foolish Husband beleues, consents, and makes a sumptuous Feast at her Deuillish Admission. Others will conuise this Deuill with a Cudgell out of their Wines: others sayning themselves to bee possessed with a Deuill, will deceive the Witches, as they haue deceived their Wives. There are Exorcists, or Diuiners, called Mubazzimi, which cast out Deuils: or if they cannot, they excuse themselves, and say it is an azyrie Spirit. They write Characters, and frame Circles, on an ash-heape, or some other place: then they make certaine signes on the hands or foreheads of the possessed party, and perfume him after a strange manner. Then they make their Inchantment, and demand of the Spirit, which way he entred, what he is, and his name; and then command him to come forth. Others there are that worke by a Cabalisticall rule, called Zahragia, and is very hard for he that doth this, must be a perfect Astrologer and Cabalist. My selfe (it is Leo's report) haue seene a whole day spent, in describing one figure only. It is too tedious here to expresse the manner. Howbeit, Mahomet's Law forbids all Diuination; and therefore the Mahumetan Inquisitors imprison the Professors thereof.

There are also in Fez some Learned men, which giue themselves the surnames of Wise-men, and Morall Philosophers, which obserue Lawes not prescribed by Mahomet: some account them Catholike; others, not; but the vulgar hold them for Saints. The Law forbiddeth Loue-longes, which they say may be vsed. They haue many Rules and Orders, all which haue their Defenders and Doctors. This Sect sprang vp fourescore yeeres after Mahomet; the first Authour thereof was Elhesen Ibnu Abilhasen, who gaue Rules to his Disciples, but left nothing in writing. About an hundred yeeres after, came Elbaris Ibnu Esad, from Bagadet, who left Volumes of Writings vnto his Disciples; but by the Lawyers was condemned. Fourescore yeeres after, vnder another famous Professor, that Law reuiued, who had many Disciples, and preached openly. But by the Patriarke and Lawyers they were all condemned to lose their heads the giddie Receptacles of such phantasticall Deuotions. But hee obtained leave of their Chalph, or Patriarch, that he might try his Assertions, by Disputations with the Lawyers; whom he put to silence: and therefore the Sentence was reuoked, and many Colledges built for his Followers. An hundred yeeres after, Malsouach the Turke destroyed all the maintainers thereof, some flying into Cairo, some into Arabia. Not long after, Elgaculi a learned man compounded the Controuerisie, in reconciling these and the Lawyers, that the one should be called Conformers, the other Reformers of the Law. After the Tartars had sacked Bagdat, in the yeere of the Hegeira 656. these Sectaries swarmed all ouer Asia and Africa. They would admit none into their Societie, but such as were learned, and could defend their Opinions: but now they admit all, assemeing Learning to be needlesse for the Holy teacheth them that haue a cleane heart. Therefore they add themselves to nothing but Pleasure, Feasting, and Singing. Sometimes they will rend their garments, saying, They are then ruihed with a fit of Diuine loue. I thinke rather superstitious of belly-cheare is the cause; for one of them will eate as much as will serue three: Or else it is through wicked lust; for sometimes one of the Principals, with all his Disciples, is inuited to some Marriage-feast; at the beginning whereof, they will rehearse their deuout Orizons and Songs: but after they are risen from Table, the elder beginne a Dance, and teare their garments; and if through immoderate drinking, any catch a fall, one of the youths presently take him vp, and wantonly kisse him: Whereupon ariseth the Prouerbe, The Heremite Banquet; signifying, that the Scholler becomes his Masters Minion: for none of them may marry, and they are called Heremites.

Among these Sects in Fez are some Rules esteemed Hereticall, of both sorts of Doctors. Some hold, That a man by good Workes, Fasting, and Abstinence, may attaine to the nature of an Angel, the Vnderstanding and Heart being thereby so purified (say they) that a man cannot sinne, though he would: But to this height is ascended by fiftie steps of Discipline; and though they fall into sinne before they come into the fiftieth Degree, yet will not God impute it. They vse strange and incredible Fasting in the beginning, but after, take all the pleasures of the World. They haue a seuer forme of liuing set downe in foure Bookes, by a by a certaine learned man, called Esfrauer de Schranard in Corasan. Likewise, another of their Authors, called Ibnul Farid, wrote all his Learning in witty Verles, full of Allegories, seeming to treat of Loue. Wherefore one Elsargano commented on the same, and thence gathered the Rule and the Degrees aforesaid. In three hundred yeeres none hath written more elegant Verles; which therefore they vsed in all their Banquets. They hold, that the Heauens, Elements, Planets, and Starres, are one God; and that no Religion is erroneous, because euery one takes that which he worships, for God. They thinke, that all knowledge of God is contained in one Man, called Eloerb, elect by God, and wise as he. Forty among them are called Elemb, which signifieth Blacke. Of these is Elemb or Elomb elected, when the former is dead; threecore and ten Electors make the choice. There are leuen hundred three-score and five others, out of whom, those threecore and ten Electors are chosen. The Rule of their Order binds them to range vnknewe through the World, either in manner of Fooles, or of great Sinners, or of the vilest man that is. Thus some wicked persons of them got vp and downe naked, shamefully shewing their shame, and like brote beasts will sometimes haue carnall dealings with women in the open streets; reputed neuertheless by the common people for Saints, as we haue shewed elsewhere. There is another sort called Caballists, which fast strangely, eate not the flesh of any liuing creature: but haue certaine meates and habits appointed for euery houre of the day, and of the night; and certaine set Prayers according to the dayes and monethes, strictly obseruing the numbers of them; and carry square Tables, with Characters and Numbers engrauen in them. They say, that good Spirits appeare to them, and talke with them, instructing them in the knowledge of all things. There was amongst them a famous Doctor, called Bani, which composed their Rule and Orders, whose Booke I haue seene, seeming more to fauour of Magicke then the Cabala. Their notablest works are eight. The first, called Demonstration of Light, cohtyneth Fasting and Prayers. The second, their square Tables. The third, fourecore and nineteene Vertues in the Name of God contained, &c.

They haue another Rule among these Sects, called Smual, the Rule of Heremites; the Professors whereof inhabe Woods and solitary Places, without any other sustenance, then those Desarts afford. None can describe their life, because they are estranged from all humane Societie.

He that would see more of these things, let him read the Booke of one Elsacani, who writeth at large of the Mahumetan Sects, whereof are threecore and ewelue principall, each maintayning his owne for Truth, and the way to Saluation. Two are most prelominant in these dayes; that of Isabari in Africa, Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and Turkie and the other of Imamia in Persia, and Corasan, most lately broched. Although I haue spoken before of the Saraceni Sects, yet could not but follow Lee in his reports of them heere. As for those 4 Concraeni Sects, which by Art Magicke profess to find Gold, which indeed lose Gold to find it; and turne their Gold into other metals, and the Bookes that both these haue of their Sciences: likewise the Snake-charmers, and other bawle people, I passe ouer.

In the Suburbs of Fez are an hundred and fifty Cauers, hewne out of excellent Marble, the least of which will hold a thousand measures of Corne. This is the hinke of Fez where euery one may be a Vintner and a Baynde. Another Suburbe hath two hundred Families of Lepers, which are there provided for: and all of that quality forced to keepe there.

In new Fez the Iewes haue a street, wherein they were driven out of Spaine. They are Goldsmiths: for the Mahumetans may not bee of that Trade, because they say it is Viury to sell things made of Gold or Silver for more then their weight, which yet is permitted to the Iewes. They haue in exceeding contempt, not being permitted to yeare shoes, but in Road thereof vse lockes made of Rulles. They weare a blacke Turbant, and if any will weare a Cap,

A note for Viurers.

Cap, he must fasten a red cloth thereunto. They payed to the King of Fez monethly in Lees time one thousand and foure hundred Ducats.

The Mahometan temporall Lords are not by their Law to hold any other reueneue, then of euery subiect which possesseth an hundred Ducats, two and a halfe for Tribute, and of Corne the tenth measure yeerely. Yea, this is to be payed into the Patriarch or Califs hand, who should bestow that which remaineth ouer and about the Princes necessitie, on the common profit; as, for the poore, and maintenance of Warres. But now the Princes haue tyrannized further, especially in Africa, where they haue not left the people sufficient for their needments. And therefore Courtiers are odious (no lesse then the Publicani sometimes among the Semites) no man of credit vouchsafing to inuite them to their Tables, or receive gifts from them; esteeming all their goods theft and bribery. Nor may any Mahometan Prince wear a Diademe; which yet it seemes is now broken.

In Gnathis a Towne of Mount Zarhon is Idris, of whom before is spoken, buried; all Barbary religiously visiteth his Sepulchre. Pharao is the name of a Towne, by the vulgar supposed the worke of Pharao, which fond conceit grew from a Brooke, entituled, The Booke of the words of Mahomet, taken out of an Author, called Elasbi, which sayth with Mahomet testimony, that there were foure Kings which ruled all the World; Two faithfull, and two vnfaithfull: the two former, Salomon and Alexander Magnus: the two later, Nimrod and Pharao. The Latine Inscriptions there seene, shew it was the worke of the Romans.

Tame Lions.

In Piaira Rossa a Towne by, the Lyons are so tame, that they will gather vp bones in the streets, the people not fearing them. The like Lyons are in Gurayana, where one may drue them away with a staffe. At Agla, the Lyons are so fearful, that they will flee at the voice of a child; whence a Coward Braggart is Proverbially called a Lion of Agla.

Shame is the name of a Castle, so called of their shameful conuouiscence; which, when they once requested the King (then entertained amongst them) to change, he consented. But the next morning, when they had brought him vessels of Milke, halfe filled vp with water, hoping the King would not perceiue it; hee said that none could alcer nature, and so left them, and their name to them.

Of the five other Prouinces of this Kingdome, and some later Observations.

WE haue now passed two Prouinces of the Kingdome of Fez: the third is named Azgar, which hath the Riuer Buragraz, on the West; Banifar, on the South, the Ocean, on the North; and Eastward, the Mountains. Here standeth Casat Elcabir, which King Mawfor gaue to a poore Fisher, who had giuen him kinde entertainment in his Cottage one night when he had lost his company in hunting. In it are many Temples, one Colledge of Students, and a stately Hospitall: Hubar, the fourth Prouince or Shire of this Kingdome, is next hereunto; and containeth almost an hundred miles in length, and foure score in breadth: Elaggen, a Towne of Fez are permitted by an ancient Privilege of the Kings of Fez to drinke Wine, notwithstanding Mahomet prohibition: Arzila, sayth Lea, was taken by the English; then worshippers of Idols; about nine hundred yeeres after Christ. The Religion, I thinke, deceives him. He adds, that the Towne remained without habitation thirty yeeres, and then one of the Mahometan Patriarches of Cordoba; then Lord of Mauritania, redified it. Of the death of the English is not vnworthy the recording, who Thar Sen or Cenia (where written Suni) was taken by the Portugals, through the assistance of English Merchants, Anno 1415. Iulian, the Earle of Seni, brought the Moor first into Spain, in the yeete of the Heptem 921. In it were many Temples, Colledge, and learned men.

Errif begins at the Straits of Gibraltar, and stretcheth Eastward to the Riuer Nacor: an 140. miles. The Inhabitantes are vniuerted; but are excessive drinkers. Mecconne and Badi, or Oph, de Camera, are chiefe Townes in it. On Mount Bani Iers was built a faire Colledge, and the Mahometan Law publickly taught therein: the Inhabitantes therefore freed from all exactions. A Tyrant destroyed this Colledge, and slue the learned men. The Books therein were valued worth foure thousand Ducats. This was Anno 1509. In Mount Bani Iers is a hole, that perpetually exsisteth vp steepe Wood cast in, is suddenly consumed to ashes: some thinke it Hel-mouth. In Mount Bani Mezzada, were maintained many Mahometan Doctors.

Stors, and Students, which would perswade the people to drinke no wine, which themselves will not abstaine from.

Garet, the sixth Shire of this Kingdome, lyeth betwene the Riuer Melulo and Muluia. The seventh is Chaz, reputed the third part of the Kingdome, betwene the Riuer Zia and Gurugara. Herein standeth Tezza, adorned with Colledges, Temples, and Palaces. A little Riuer springing out of Atila runnes thorow the chiefe Temple, which is greater then that at Fez. There are three Colledges, and many Bathes and Hospitalls. Each Trade dwelleth by themselves, as at Fez. I was acquainted (saith Leo) with an aged Sire in this Clitie, reputed a Saint, and enriched exceedingly with the peoples offerings. From Fez did the people resort to visit him with their offerings, which is fiftie miles: he seemed to me to be a deceiver. In Mount Beni Iesseten are many Iron mines, and the women in great brauerie weare Iron rings on their fingers and eares. Ham Lisfan was built by the Africans, and borrowed the name from the Fountayne of an Idoll, whose Temple was nere the Towne: to which at certayne times in the yeere resorted men and women in the night: where, after sacrifices, the candles were put out, and each man lay with the woman hee first touched. Those women were forbidden to lye with any other for a yeere after. The children begotten in this adulterie, were brought vp by Priests of the Temple. The Moores destroyed this holy-Sewer, and the Towne, not leauing any mention thereof. In Mount Centopozzi are ancient build- ings, and nere thereto a spacious hole, or drie pit, with many roomes therein: they let men downe into the same by ropes with lights, which if they goe out, they perish in the pit. Therein are many Bats which strike out their lights. In the Mountaynes of Ziz there are Serpents so tame, that at dinner time they will come like Dogs and Cats, and gather vp the crummes, not offering to hurt any.

Thus much of the kingdome of Fez out of Leo, a learned Citizen of Fez, and great Translator; both in the Places and Authors of Afrike: whom Ortelius, Maginus, Butorius follow, commended by, Badinus, Possennius, and others, as the most exact Writer of those parts; and translated into English by Master Pontis, from whom if I swaue in diuers things, I impute it to the Italian copie of Ramusius, which differeth not a little, especially in these things I haue here set downe, from the English.

I thought good here also to adde out of others some such customs and rites as they obserue in Fez, and other parts of this Kingdome: Their Circumcision is vied in their priuate Houses. Women may not enter the Moschee for their often vndeanness, and because Eue first sinned; The eight day after a child is borne, the parents send for a Talby or Priest, and some old men and women, where after a few prayers said, the women wash the child all ouer with water, and giue the name, making a banquet. But sometimes the Circumcision is deferred diuers yeeres after this ceremony, as the Fathers thinke.

Their Fasts they obserue very strictly, not so much as tasting water till the stars appeare. Yea, diuers haue bene seene, by their rigour, in this superstition to faint, and some to die. At certayne Moore in the time of their Lent (which continueth thirtie dayes) in the companie of an English Gentleman, being thirstie with heat and trauell, went to a conduit in Morocco (where the same Religion is professed as in Fez) and there drinking, was so reuiled of the people, that in a desperate anguish hee flue himselfe with his dagger. Yet doth their Law allow an exchange some dayes of this Lent, with other dayes in the yeere following, if trauell then hinder. Their Feasts and Fasts are at the same times, and in the same manner that the Turkes obserue, of which is before spoken: Their Easter they call Ramedan; their Whitsuntide, Lidlaber; their Michaelmasse, Lashour; their Candlemasse, Ladjemaw: (if it be lawfull thus to parallell those vaine superstitions with Christian obseruations. In this last Feast, which seemeth to bee the same which Leo calls Mahomet's birth-day, every one must haue a candle for himselfe, and for every sonne in his house. The King hath that day candles carried to him, some like May-poles, other like Castles, fixe or eight men carrying one of them: so artificially composed, that some are in making six moneths. That night the King doth here all the Law read: the like is done in all other Churches. The Talby that cannot read all their Law in a night, is held insufficient for his place. They goe (saith my Author) fixe times in foure and twentie houres (which is once oftner then is written of the Turkes, except on their Sabbath) to their prayers, first washing themselves, as they doe also after the offices of nature, and after companie with their wiues, thinking thereby to be washed from their sinnes. Their times of prayer are, two houres before day, the first, when the Mondan, or Sexten cryeth in the Steeple (as you may reade in our Turkish Relations) and then may no man touch his wife, or prepare himselfe to pray (with washing or other deuotions) either in his owne house or at Church. After their publike prayers, the Talby sits downe, and spends halfe an houre in resolving the doubts of such as shall moue any questions in matters of their Law. These cond time of prayer is two houres after, when it is day. The third is noone. The fourth at four of the clocke in the afternoone. The first at the twi-light. The last, two houres after. In the first of these they pray for the day; in the second they give thanks for it; in the third time they give thanks for that it is halfe passed; in the fourth they desire the Sonne may well set on them; at twi-light they give thanks after their daily labours; the last time, they desire a good night. They thinke it vnseemely to eate meat with their left hands, and hold it vnclane, and doe all with their right hand. Their Sabbath or Friday is not exempted from worke: Onely they are then more deuout in going to Church.

Their Churches are not so faire generally as in Christendome, nor haue seats in them, ornaments, or bells: (onely the floors are matted) they are also poore for the most part, as are their Church men. Their Lyturgie is very short, not so long as the Pater noster and Creede: other set forme they haue not, but euery one prayes after his owne pleasure. Although the Moore may haue foure wiues, and as many concubines as hee can purchase, yet few marry toure, because the wiues friends will haue a sufficient bill of dowrie for her maintenance, which none but rich men can performe: and againe, the wiues challenge his nights companie, and that in course; if any be neglected, shee complains to the Magistrate, and he forceth the husband to his dutie, or else to send her home with her Dowry, and a Bill of diuorce. The Concubines are embraced with more stolne pleasures. That bill of Dowry holdeth the husband in awe, which else would make a slaue of his wife, or still change for yonger flesh. The Bride is bedded before her husband see her: and if hee finde her not a Virgin, hee may turne her home and keepe her portion by Law. For their funerall Rites; when one is dead, they presently wash him, and speedily put him into ground (the heat so requiring), and after that, the women at convenient times haue a custome to meete, and make memoriall of their deceased friends, with remembrance of their vertues, which they thinke caused men to haue more respect to their good name. Their other obsequies are before declared. The King vseth to sit in Iudgement on Fridayes in the afternoone: and the Musi sitteth with him at other times in Iudgement: but on the Friday he sits alooe by himselfe. Of these Multies are three; one at Marocco; another at Fez; the third, at Taradant in Sus, another part of this Seriffian Kingdome. Other Iudges sit all the yeere long two houres before noone, and as many after. Before these euery one pleades his owne cause: and if the witnesses can bee proued to be infamous of life, or not to say their prayers fixe times a day, their testimonie is disabled. The Scraianos are Talbies, which assist the Iudge, and in his absence supply his place. The Fokers or Saints (Lea before calls them Heremites) dwell in the best places of the Countrey, keepe great hospitalitie for all travellers, whither any man may come for a night, and be gone in the morning. They giue great example of morall liuing, and almes to the needie, compromising matters of difference betwixt parties, and repressing disorders. They are much loued and respected, and their houles are holden Sanctuaries, whose priuiledges the King will not breake, but vpon waightie reasons.

Of the Kingdome of Marocco, with a Discourse of the Kings thereof, and of the Seriffe, Xarif, or Iarif, and his posteritie, now reigning in Barbarie.

THE Kingdome is situate ^a betweene Atlas and the Atlanticke Ocean, bearing name of the chiefe Citie thereof: fruitfull of Corne, Oile, Grapes, Sugar, Honey, and Cattell. They make fine cloth of Goats haire, and of their hides chat leather, ^b which hence is called Marocchine. This Kingdome is diuided into seven Prouinces, through which we intend our next perambulation, taking Lea ^b for our guide: beginning at Hea, which on the North and West hath the Ocean, Atlas on the South, and the Ruer Edissual on the East. The people feede on Cakes of barley, and on a papper or harte-pudding of barley-meale, which being set in a plate, all the familie compass about, and rudely with Natures spoones claw torth those dainties. Naperie they vse none, a Mat laid on the ground, serueth for table and cloth, and stools too. Caps are the priuiledges of age and learning. Linnen shirts are almost banished this Countrey:

Country: and so are Arts liberall and mechanickall, except some simple Lawyer, which can make some shift to reade, and a Surgeon to circumcise their children: Their physicke is cauterizing as men deale with beaſts. They are alway in mutuall warres one with another, yet will not they iniurie a ſtranger, who if he would trauell amongst them, muſt take ſome harlot or wiſe, or religious man, of the aduerſe part with him. At Tedneſt, one of their Cities, ſuch reſpect is had to ſtrangers, that if a Merchant come hither, and hath no acquaintance; the Gentlemen of the Citie caſt lots, who ſhall be his Hoſt, and they viſe him kindly, looking onely for ſome Preſent as his departure, in token of thankfulneſſe. And if he be a meaner perſon, he may chooſe his Hoſt, without any recompence at all. In the midit of the Citie was a great and ancient Temple, with many Priests attending their deuotions; beſides other meaner Ordinaries. This Citie hath ſince been ruined and deſolate. In Teculeth were a thouſand houſholds, foure Hoſpitals, one beautifull Temple, and a houſe of religious perſons: deſtroyed it was by the Portugals, An. 1514. as Haleſchū had bene the yeere before. Ieuſugagen is another Towne of Hea, or of Hill rather, ſo full is it of confuſion, blood, and murders, beſides the want of Learning, Cuſtome, Iudges, Priests, or whatſoeuer elle may detainey thoſe men from a beaſtly or deuillish meta morphiſis. The Seriff, being made a Prince of Hea, brought me thither to be a Iudge, but for feare of treaſon amongst them, we were glad to leaue them. How farre off in manners is their neere neighbour Telegdelū: where a guard is let at the gates not ſo much to keepe out enemies, as to entertayne ſtrangers, whom at his firſt comming they aſke if he haue any friends in the Citie: if nor, they muſt prouide him entertainment at free-coſt. They haue a moſt beautifull Temple, furniſhed with Priests. Tangleſe, the next Towne, is a den of theues and murderers. When I was there, ſuch a ſwarme of Locuſts ouerſpied the Country (that ſcarce might a man ſee the earth) eating vp their fruits.

Culeſhat was built of a certaine S. Marie in our time, firſt a Preacher, attended with troups of diſciples, after, a cruell and mercileſſe Tyrant, murdered at laſt by one of his wiues, for lying with her daughter: and then his villanies being manifeſted, the people put all his followers to the ſword. Onely a nephew of his fortified himſelfe in a Caſtle, which he held maugre all their might, and burying his grand-father, cauſed him to be adored as a Saint. Homar Seif was the name of that Rebelle. The other parts of Hea are like the former, ſome exceeding hoſpitall and courteous, ſome brutiſh, without diuine or humane learning or liuing. Great ſtore of Iewes lue here, and in Mount D-menſera are of thoſe Iewes which are called  Carraum*, of the reſt accounted Sectaries. Theſe reueſt the Traditions, and hold them onely to the written Scriptures (as in our Iewiſh relation yee haue read.) In Mount Gebel-Ihadis are many Heremites, which lue on fruits of trees, and water, ſo reputed of the ſimple people, that all their doings are accounted miracles.

Sus is the ſecond Region of this Kingdome, lying Southward from hence on the other ſide of Atlas, ſo called of that Riuer which is the Eaſterne border thereof, otherwhere bounded with the Sea and the Deſerts. At Meſſa neere the Sea ſide is a Temple holden in great veneration. Many Hiſtorians aſſerme, that from this Temple ſhall come that luſt Caſaſi, of whom Mahumet prophecied. There alſo they ſay the Whale vomited vp Sonars. The rafters and beames of the Temple are of Whales bones, which viſually are left there dead on the ſhore. This the common people eſteeme to procede from ſome diuinitie of that Temple: but the true cauſe is certaine ſharpe Rocks a little off in the Sea. I my ſelfe was inuited by a Gentleman, who ſhewed me a Whales ribbe, ſo huge, that lying on the ground in manner of an arch, vnder it, as it were thorow a gate, we rode on our Camels, our heads not reaching to touch it. It had bene there kept an hundred yeers for a wonder. Amber is there found in abundance, which ſome thinke proceeds from the Whales, as either the ordure, or the ſperme, and ſeale thereof. Teijent is a Citie of Sus, wherein is a great Temple, and an arme of a Riuer paſſeth thorow the ſame. There are many Iudges and Priests, whom in their Eccleſiaſticall affaires they obey. Tarodant hath three thouſand Families: ſometimes the place where the Kings Lieutenant or Deputie reſideth, Teſſi is much greater, adorned alſo with a Temple, and furniſhed with Priests and Miniſters: Iudges and Lecturers payed at the common charge. In Mount Hanchiſa it ſnowes in all ſeaſons of the yeere, and yet the Inhabitants goe thinly clothed in the ſharpeſt winter.

The Region of Marocco is three ſquare: confined with the mountaynes Neſſa, on the Weſt; and Hadimeus, on the Eaſt; betweene the Riuers Tenſitt, and Eſſinual. The Countrey in fertilitye of ſoile reſembleth Lombardie. Marocco (which ſome thinke to be Bocanus Hemerus of Ptol-mey) was built (ſaith Leo) by Ioseph ſonne of Teſſin, King of the people of Lontuna, by the aduice of excellent Architects, and cunning workmen. In the time of Hali ſonne of Ioseph, there were in it ten thouſand Fires or Families, and more. It had fourie and twentie gates: was ſtrongly walled: furniſhed with Temples, Bathes, Colledges, Innes, after the African manner. One most stately Temple was built by Hali, and called by his name. But a loofter of that kingdom, called Abdul Mumen, caused it to be razed, and built againe, and called after his owne name, howbeit the name of Hali is still continued in the Title, all that has coist notwithstanding. This Abdul Mumen, who was the second that by rebellion succeeded in the kingdom, built another Temple, which Manfor, enlarged fiftie yards or elles on every side, adorning it with many pillars fetcht out of Spaine. He made a Cistern or Vault built vnder it, as large as the Temple it selfe; and covered the Temple with lead, with leaden pipes from the roote, to conuey the raine-water that fell thereon, into the Cistern: He built thereon a steeple like the Coliseo or Amphitheatre at Rome, of great hewen stone. The compasse of this steeple or tower is an hundred Tuscan yards or elles, higher then the steeple of Aienelli at Bononia. There are seven lofty one about another, very faire and light-some. Vpon the top of this tower is built a little turret, the top whereof is as a needle or spire: and it containeth fise and twentie yards in compasse, and is as high as two great lances, with three lofty therein, one higher then the other. On the top of this spire is a broach with three globes of siluer one vnder another, the greatest below, and the least highest. From the top hereof the Mountaynes of Azifi may bee easily seene, an hundred and thirte miles off; and a tall man on the ground seemes as little as a childe of a yeere old. The plaine Country fiftie miles about is hence discerned. It is one of the greatest Temples in the world; and yet not frequented; the people assembling thither to their deuotions, but on Fridayes: the Citie it selfe nere this Temple is runate, so that the passage is difficult by the ruines of houses. Vnder the porch or gallerie of this Temple were sometimes an hundred shops of Booke-sellers, and as many ouer-against them, but now * there is not one in all Marocco: Scarcely is the third part of the Citie inhabited (vnderstand it of the time when Leo writ this; for since that time Marocco by residence of the Kings there, hath flourished, as Fez hath contrariwise decayed) the rest being planted with Vines and Trees, the Arabians not suffering them to exercise any husbandrie without the walls. It was built An. 424. of the Hegira. After Ioseph the Founder, and Hali his sonne, Abraham succeeded, in whose time, a rebellious Preacher called Elmabeli, borne and brought vp in the Mountaynes, rebelled and with an armie encountered King Abraham, and ouerthrew him. The King fled, and was so hardly pursued by Abdul Mumen, whom Elmabeli had sent after him, whiles himselfe besieged Marocco, that the poore King, in danger to bee surprized at Oram, mounting on his horse, and taking his wife behinde him, set spurs to his horle, and so came all three downe together on the mercilesse Rocks. Abdul Mumen returning victorious, found this addition to his happinesse, that Elmabeli was dead, and himselfe was chosen King and Prelate (or Chaliph) by the fortie Disciples, and ten Secretaries of Elmabeli; a new custome in the Mahumetan Law. He maintayned the siege, and at the yeeres end, entred by force, and tooke Isaac, the little and onely sonne of Abraham, and stabbed him with his owne hands, killing most of the Souldiers hee there found, and many of the Citizens. His posteritie reigned after him, from An. 516. of the Hegira, to the 668. at which time the Familie of Maria depriued them, in which the Kingdom continued till the 785. yeere. Then the same decreasing in power, Marocco became subiect to certaine Lords of the old Hill, nere to the Citie. But of none receiued they so much damage, as of the Marin Familie, which held their Court in Fez, and had a Lieutenant onely in Marocco; Fez being made chiefe Citie of Mauritania.

* Leo reckons them in this Order. Abdul, Ioseph Manfor, Iacob Manfor, and this Mahomet Enafir: whereas Curio seems to insinuate a longer line or posteritie: hee being all directly and immediately succeeding.

Let me borrow of Cal. Sec. Curio in his Historie of the Kingdom of Marocco, which (for the most part) is taken out of Leo. He saith, that Abdul Mumen subiected to his Empire all Barbarie, from Messia to Tripolis; his Empire in Africa comprehending fourscore and ten dayes journey in length, and fiftene in bredth. He also possessed the kingdom of Granada in Spaine, sometime called Betica, and from Tariffa to Tarragon, and a great part of Castilia and Portugal. Neither had he alone this large Empire, but his sonne Iosaph after him, Iacobus Manfor his nephew, and their posteritie, till Mahomet Enafir, who, Anno 1212. in the 50 kingdom of Valencia was ouerthrowne of Alphonfus (as I take it) the ninth King of Castile, in that place which is called Las nauas de Tolosa; loosing in the battell threecore thousand men. In memorie of which battell and victorie, that Alphonfus adorned his Scutchion with a Castle Or, in a field purple: which custome his successors doe still obserue, because that day that golden kingdom, as a strong Cattle, confirmed to him by the blood of his enemies, was deliuered from those Miscreants. And thereupon, that kingdom of the Bastitanes (so it was before that time stiled) was intituled Castile. Moreover, hee instituted that knightly Order of Saint Iames, who haue in their habit puttrayed a purple sword, in token of blood. This Mahomet our Historians call Miramulmus. For Abdul Mumen intituled himselfe Miramulmus, the name signifying, The Prince of beleaguers, which others corrupting, call Miramulin, so as they did him Abed Ramon. Howsoever, it standeth for the Name and Armes of Castile; certainly Curio was not curious, nor carefull enough in adding, that this Abdul Mumen was stately Palaces in the said Castle, for his Guard, Officers, Armories, and other purposes fitting both Mars and Venus. There were also goodly and spacious Gardens, and a Parke with many kindes of wilde Beasts, as Giraffes, Lyons, Elephants, &c. There was a Leopard made of Marble, the Spottes not borrowed, but Natures handy-works. But alas! Devouring Time, that swalloweth his owne off-spring, was not content to have inglutted his insatiable paunch with the flesh of those beasts, and men, branded with Natures stampe of mortallitie; but even those curious and costly stones are now become grauæ-stones to themselves, prouoking the beholders at once to haue compassion and amazement; the Reliques of laborious Art still contending with Time, to testifie what greater excellence hath bene. The Garden is now become the Citie dung-hill, the Librarie in stead of Bookes is furnished with nells of 10 Doves, and other fowles. That overthrow which Mahomet the King of Marocco receiued in Spaine, was the occasion of the ruine of that Family, which was furthered by his death, leaving behind him tenne sonnes which contended amongst themselves for the Kingdome, and slew one another. Hereupon the people of Marin entred into Fez, and possessed themselves of that Kingdome: the Habdulud Nation seized on the Kingdome of Telenfin, and removing the Governour of Tunis, made whom they pleased King. After the ruine of the Manfors Progeny, the Kingdome was translated to Jacob, ioune to Habdulach, first King of the Marin Family. Lastly, this Kingdome declining, the Arabians by continuall outrages haue further distressed it, forcing the people to what pleased them. Thus farre Leo: who saw not the influence of a Starre, even in his dayes, in his eyes, and of his acquaintance, arising, which after in his exaltation brought a new alteration to Marocco, (restoring it to the former splendour and all those parts of Barbary: I meane the Seriffo, a name vially giuen vnto such as profess themselves descended of Mahomets kindred, from whence also this wee speake of his detur'd Pedegree. The historie I thinke here worthy to be inserted: the rather because this Western Starre is now declining, and by his fiere gleames, seemes to be neere his setting. And thus in effect doth Boterm relate the same.

Of the Kings of the Seriffian Familie.

- 10 ABout the yeere 1508 began to grow in name, through Numidia, a certaine Alsaique, borne in Tigumeder in the Province of Dra, being a subtil man, and no lesse ambitious in minde, then learned in those Sciences, whereunto the Maumetanes are most addicted. Hee, by confidence of his blood (descended of their Prophet) and of the divisions of the States of Africa, and the exploits there dayly achieved by the Portugals, attempted to make himselfe Lord of Mauritania Tingitana. For this cause hee sent his three Sonnes Abdel, Abnet, and Mahomet, to visite the Sepulchre of Mahomet. Much was the reverence and reputation of holinesse, which they hereby acquired amongst that superstitious people, which now beheld them as Saintes, and kissed their garments as most holy Reliques. These failed not in their parts of the play, to act as much deuotion, as high contemptiue lookes, deepe fetched sighes, and other passionate interfections of holinesse could expresse. Ala, Ala, was their yernfull note, their tood was the peoples almer. The old Father ioying to see his proiects thus farre proceed, and minding to strike whiles the Iron was hote, sent two of them to Fez, Amet, and Mahomet: where one of them was made Reader in the Amodoraccia, the most famous Colledge of Fez, and the younger was made Tutor to the Kings young sonnes. Advanced thus in fauour of the King and People, by their Fathers aduice, they apprehended the present occasion of the harmes sustained by the Arabians and Moores vnder the Portugals Ensignes: they demanded Licence of the King to display a Banner against the Christians, putting him in hope easily to draw those Moores to him, and so to secure the Provinces of Marocco. In vaine were Mulley Nazer the Kings brother his allegations, not to arme this Name of Sanctitie, which being once victorior, might grow insolent, and forget dutie in minding a Kingdome. They obtaine their desires, and with 2 Drum and Banner, with Letters of commendations to the Arabians and people of Barbary, they are foattended with forces and fortunes, that Ducala, and all as farre as Cape de Guer stoupes to their command: the people willingly yeelding their Tents to this Holy warre against the Portugals, enemies of their Faith. Hereunto was added the ouerthrow which they gaue to Lopes Barriga, a famous Portugall Captaine, the brightnesse of that sun-shine being somewhat eclipsed with the losse of their elder brother, if rather a Monarchie were not hereby furthered. By faire words they entered into Marocco. The Arabians of Ducala and
- 40 Xarquia, about this time trying their quarrels by dint of Sword in mutuall conflicts, presented a fit occasion to the Seriffs, to prey vpon them both; their strength hauing made them weake, and their weaknesse making the other strong. And now did they begin to vsurpe ouerargantie, presenting their Feslan King, with sixe Horles, and sixe Camels, and those but simple, whom before they had acknowledged their Soueraigne, with payment of the fifts of their spoile. The King of F. z before applauding his owne victories in theirs, began now to distaste, and to distrust: hee sent to them to demand his fifts, and the tribute also formerly paid him by the Kings of Marocco. Death, the common enemie of Mankind, here interposed her selfe on the Seriffian part, and tooke the King of Fez out of the world; the Scepter descending to his Sonne Amet, the Scholler of the young Seriff: who not onely proceeded not in his Fathers demands, but confirmed Amet the King in the Signiorie of Marocco, so that
- 50 in some small matters hee would acknowledge the soueraintie of Fez. But now the Seriffs, whose hearts continually encreased with their fortunes, sent him word; that being lawfull successours to Mahomet, they owed no man tribute, and had more right in Africa then he: if hee would respect them as his friends and Allies, so it were, if otherwise, they which had power to offend the Christian, should not bee destitute in defending themselves. The sword, the vnequalest arbitrer of equitie, is now made vmpire; the Feslan proclaimeth warres, beleegeth Marocco, and in his returne vanquished. Thus haue the Seriffs acquitted themselves of that yoaake, and now intend new conquests on the other side of Atlas, and in Numidia, and in the mountaines, which happily they achieved. Yea, the Portugals wearied
- 60 with the warres, which they were forced to maintayne in defence of those places they held in Africa (the expences so much surmounting the reuenue) abandoned them to the Seriffs, And now the want of enemies procured enmitie betwixt the Brethren, who trying the valour against each other, which before they had exercised ioyntly against their enemies, the illue was, that the younger, in two battels hauing overcome the elder, and at the second, which was Anno 1544. hauing taken him prisoner, confined him to Tafletre. Hea now sole Monarch of Marocco, conuersts his forces against the King of Fez, to try if he could bee his Master in the field, as hee sometimes had bene in the Schoole, and failed not of his attempt, but hauing once taken and freed him, the second time becauſe he had broken promise, he deprived him and his ſonnes of eſtate and a life. He alſo by meanes of his ſonnes took Tremizen, which ſooner after was recovered from them by Sal Araci Vice-roy of Algier, and Fez alſo added, by an ouerthrow of the Seriff, to the Turkes conqueſt, who gaue the government of Fez to Buaſſon, Prince of Vekis, But he in an vnifortunate battell with the Seriff, loſt his life and ſtate, Mahomet going after to Taradant, was by the way ſlaine in his Pavilion, by the Treason of ſome Turkes ſuborned thereunto by the King of Algier, of whom all (but five) in their returne were ſlaine by the people: Anno 1555. Mulley Abdala, the Seriffs ſonne, was proclaimed King.

Some write, that by occaſion of a Rebellion in Suſhee ſent to the bordering Turkes for aide, who firſt helped, after murdered him, and hauing ſacked Taradant, and ouer-runne the Country two moneths together, were in their returne, by the Mountainers cut off. Mulley Abdala hauing raigned ſeene yeeres, dyed, leauing behind him thirteene ſonnes; the eldeſt, Abdala, commanded the reſt to be killed: but Abdelmelech the ſecond brother eſcaped into e Turkie, and Mulley Hamet, the third brother, eſteemed of a ſimple and quiet ſpirit, not any way dangerous to the ſtate, was ſpared. The other tenne were put to death in one day at Taradant, where they had bene brought vp. This Abdala dying, left behind him three ſonnes; Mulley Muhomet, Mulley Sheek, Mulley Naſſar: the two younger eſcaped into Spaine, where Sheek is yet liuing and turned Chriſtian. Naſſar returned in the fourteenth yeere of Mulley Hamets Raigne, and had almoſt driuen Mulley Sheek, then Gouernour of Fez vnder his Father, to his heeles, had not ſuperſtition more preuaild with Naſſars followers, then Aſſurance. For when Lent came, his Souldiers would needs home to keepe their Eaſter at their owne houſes: for feare whereof Naſſar haſtily giuing battell, was there ſlaine. Abdelmelech before ſed into Turkie, now came backe with Turkiſh forces, and got the Kingdome from Mahomet, who fleeing, or as others write, ſending for ſuccour to Sebaſtian King of Portugal, obtained it. In the yeere 1578. Five thouſand Germans were entertayned in the Portugal pay for the expedition, and great forces were leuyed, the Pope ſending Stukely, that Engliſh Traytor (faſſely termed Margueſſe of Ireland) with five hundred Italians, to Sebaſtian, who the foure and twentieth of Iune tooke Sea, and the next day with a Fleet of one thouſand and three hundred ſayle; or as Dogliani ſaith it, ſetting in order his Armada of five hundred ſayle, and bleſſing his Royall Standard, with thirte ſix thouſand Footmen, and foure thouſand Horſe, ſet forth towards Africa: Where Abdelmelech being ſickly, had aſſembled an Armie of ſeene thouſand Footmen, and foure and fortie thouſand Horſemen. On the fourth day of Auguſt, they ioyned battell, and the Duke of Auerro, with his Portugals, made a great impreſſion into the Moores hoſt; which Abdelmelech labouring beyond his naturall force to withſtand, ſaued his people, but loſt his life, not by the Sword of the enemy, but by the weakeneſſe of his body, deliuered vp to death. His brother Hamet ruled the Armie (as yet ignorant of what had befallen) and made ſuch ſlaughter of the Portugals, that the Duke of Auerro, the King of Portugal, and other great Perſonages there fell, and Mahomet himſelfe was drowned, in fleeing ouer a Riuer. Thus remayned Hamet victorious, and at one time had the dead corpes of three Kings in his Tent. Such is the furie of Warre, the force of death trampling vnder foot the meaneſt, and triumphing ouer the greateſt. Stukely among the reſt receiued due wages for his treacherie, and diſloyalty to his Country, ſlaine out of his Country by the barbarous Barbarian. To Abdelmelech he was Maſter Edmund Hogan employed in Embaſſage, by the Maiſtie of our late Souldaigne, Anno, one thouſand five hundred ſeuentie ſeuen, and with all good Offices entertained. To Hamet his Succeſſor, was from the ſame Sacred Maiſtie, ſent Ambaſſadors, three yeeres. This Mulley Hamet in a Letter to the Earle of Leiceſter, thus begins. In the name of the mercifull and pitifull God. The bleſſing of God lyes vpon our Lord and Prophet Mahomet, and thoſe that are obedient vnto him. He ſlayed off the ſkin from the carkeſſe of Mahomet, ſo drowned in the battell, as is ſaid, and filled it full of Straw, and ſent it through all Provinces of his Kingdome for a ſpectacle. He raigned ſeuen and twentie yeeres. He ſent an Embaſſage into into England, ^b Anno a thousand sixe hundred and one, performed by Abdala ^a had Anoune.

His people did so feare him, that Abdala ^c Cremer his Customer, having one onely Sonne, (who in an idle businesse and busie idleness, would needs feed his curious eyes with the sight of the Palace where the Kings Concubines were) caused him to bee strangled before his face.

He governed the Alarbes (which are supposed to bee of Arabian Race, and said to vse the Arabike Language, Inhabitants of the plaine and Champaine Countries of Marocco, Fez, and Sus) in peace and subiection receiuing their tenths duly paid. The Brebers or Mountainers are the Natives and ancient Inhabitants, chased by the former into strong Cities, and the Natural Forts of Hills (as our Progenitors sctued the Brittaines, forcing them to the Mountains of Wales and Cornwall) a people of another Language (called Tamaset) and disposition, which hee could not so easily tame, and therefore in policie hee drew them into forreine Expeditions, especially against the Negros, thereby extending his Empire so farr: that way, as by Camell it was fixe moneths iourney from Marocco, to the extreamest bounds. Likewise he ved them to goe with the ^d Caravans to Gago to fetch home his yeerely Tribute. He conquered Tombuto and Gago, about the yeere 1594. as appeareth by the Letters of ^e Lawrence Madoe, who saw thirty Mules laden with Gold come from thence to Marocco, and fith that Tombuto rented threecore Quintals of Gold. He was much delighted in Astronomie; as ^f M. Thomas Bernber hath written in a Letter to Master Edward Wright, to whom hee sent for Mathematicall Instruments to be vfed in that yeerely Voyage to Gago our the fandie Sea, where they vfed Needle and Compasse.

His provisions for his Ingenues or Sugar-gardens, for his buildings, maintenance of his women (rather for the pompe then the sinne) llet passe. For passed they are now, and gone, together with himselfe, his three Sonnes, by Ciuill Warres, leauing scarce hope of good, or place for worse state then is now in Barbary, and hath bene these many yeeres. Hee dyed of the Plague, which was so violent in these parts, that by Wilkins s report there dyed about foure thousand and seven hundred in one day and night thereof in Marocco, and in one yeere seven hundred thousand Moores, and seven thousand seven hundred Jewes. In the Citie of Far ^g (I thinke he meaneth Fez) dyed the same yeere five hundred thousand, besides those which perished in the Countrey and other places: so many (sayth hee) as if Barbary had bene the common buriall place of the World; and the liuing were not able to burie the dead, neither did the earth couer and bury them, but they buried and couered the earth, the high-ways being strowed with dead, infected, and infectious carcases. A plentifull Haruest found not Labourers to inne it, but shed it selfe on the ground; and the cattell mourned for want of Milkers. There was no want of store, and soone after (the plague ceasing) no store but of want: Famine succeeding in place, and exceeding the others cruelties. And lest a third furie should be wanting, the warres betwene the late Hames Sonnes, followed the former at the heeles, that as with a threefold cord, Barbary is welnigh strangled and dead.

§. III.

Of the Ciuill Warres in Barbary: And of some other parts of that Kingdome.

^h He Sonnes of Hames were Mabomet, commonly called Sheck, a title proper to the Kings eldest Sonne; Boseres his Brother by the whole blood; Sidan, by another woman; as Nassar and Abdela. Muley is a title of honour, given to the Kings Children, and all of the blood Royall. Muley Sheck was made Gouvernour of Fez in his Fathers life time, Boseres of Sus; and Sidan, of Tedula, in the mid-way betwene Fez and Marocco. Muley Sheck so displeased his Father by his vnbridled courses, that hee went with an Army to Fez to displace him, and to set things there in order, leauing Boseres (late-ly returned from Sus, because of the plague) in the government of Marocco. Sheck tooke SanQuary with five hundred of his best Souldiers, from whence his Father caused him to bee brought by force, and sent him prisoner to Mickanes; but before hee could finish his purposes, the fourteenth of August 1603. he died. Sidan had followed his Father in this Expedition, and taking advantage of his presence, seized on the treasures, and proclaimed himselfe King of Barbary, and heire to his Father. What Sidan had done at Fez, the like did Boseres at Marocco, and at Taradant. Nassar made some stirres, but soone after died of the Plague. Boseres sendeth Basfar Isidar to encounter with Sidan, who was now come with his forces a gainst him, and because him selfe had not the heart, to hazard his person in battell, knowing that it would be no small discouragement, if there were none his equall in blood, hee on certain conditions, freed his elder brother Muley Sheek, who the sixth of January 1604. chased Sidan out of the field. Hence all old quarrels, and feuds, and robberies, and a world of other mischiefs now * began to fill all the parts of Barbary. Muley Sheek in Fez proclaims him selfe King. Thus is all inverted, many Kings and few Subjects: none now in this vn-certainly paying their accustomed tenths, intending rather mutual feuds and battles betwixt their severall Tribes and Kindreds, then common fidelitie and allegiance. Sidan by aide of the Great Foquere, or Heremite, obtayneth Sus, the people yeelding obedience to none but whom that Religious person shall appoint them: by means of him also, a peace was concluded betwixt Boferes and Sidan in August, 1604. Thus was the warre continued betwixt Sheek and Boferes. Abdela, Sheek sonne, drue Boferes out of Morocco, in the latter end of the yeere 1606. vining his victory with bloody cruelty, besides the sifting and pillage of the goods in the City. Blood is a slippery foundation, and pillage a pill'd wall: so fell it out to Abdela, who soon lost the City to Sidan; which he had taken from Boferes, after a bloody fight fought betwixt them in April after. Here Sidan puts to the Sword three thousand Fel- sians, which had taken Sanctuary, and came forth daunted, vpon promise of Pardon, which Boferes after with like peradoulness, and breach of promise, requited on three thousand Morochians. The Shracies (which are Mountayners neere to Algier, but no more respecting the Turkes there, then the Brebers doe the Serif) fell at variance, and began to mutinie in the Army of Sidan, whom they serued; and cut off the Bashas head, who was their Generall, which caused Sidan to execute vniuersall cruelties against all of that Tribe in Morocco, giuing the Shracies goods to the Murtherer whomsoever. On the twentieth six of Nouember 1607. Abdela ioyneth in battle with Sidan, prouoked by those Shracies who thirsted for reuenge of Sidan's tyrannies, where many English, vnder Captaine Giffard, and other Capitaines were slaine, Sidan chased, and Morocco recouered.

But whilst these brethren contend, Muley Hamet Bosonne their Cousin, rich in treasure, richer in hopes, thought it fit time to take vp that Kingdome, which these with warring it lost. He gathered together whatsoever forces he could make, and came to wards Morocco. Abdela heard and feared, and hauing spied a man vpon a Hill with a Speare in his hand, with white Linen like a flagge vpon it: his feare (an vntrusty Messenger, told him, that all Bosonne's Armie was behind the Hill, although it were then a full dayes march from thence and) lent him wings to flye to Fez. The man was but a silly Moore, which had washed his Linen, and dyed it on his Speares point. Bosonne entrench Morocco, and proclaymes him selfe King, but loseth both City and Kingdome in April following, 1608. and after a second ouertrow recouered by Sidan now Master of Morocco, hee was by Alkeid Azou his meanes poysoned. Muley Sheek, loth to leaue Morocco to Sidan, sendeth Etina an Italian Merchant into Spaine, with promise to the Catholike King, of Allaroche, Saly, Alcazar, and other Townes to turne Spanish, if he would helpe him to his right in Afrique. This Negotiation was well entertained, and the Spaniard now hath * Allaroche. Since this time rare accidents haue hapned by certain Religious persons, after the Moores account, which History is thus reported.

A certaine Foquere, Talbie, Heremite of Saint (names giuen by diuers to the same) called Side Hamet Ben Abdela, liued in Wed Sowre, forty dayes journey beyond Morocco Eastward, where sometime hee entetayned Sidan to his great content, fleeing then to his b Horne or defence in time of distresse. This man the Moores report to be a great Magician, that he could tread three hundred Horle at one pit of Barley, and the lime no whit diminished, that he had foretold of plenty the last yeere, which came accordingly to passe, that hee could by his Art secure men from the danger of Gunshot. Hee being of great reputation for Wealth, Learning, and Holinesse, gathered a band of men, and conducted them to Morocco. Sidan with an Armie of sixteene thousand, giues him battle at Morocco, the c tenth of May 1612. and was ouerthrowne. For he went him selfe, and led his Company on the mouth of the Ordnance without harme; he causing (as the Moores report) that the bullets should still remaiue in the Peeees when they were discharged, 4 as he had often for the confirmation of his people made triall before, letting fortie Gunners to shoot at as many others without harme by the like Art. Thus hee lost none of his owne, and many of the other were slaine. Sidan fled to Safia, and embarks his two hundred women in a Flemming: his riches, in a Marilion: This was taken by Don Luy the Spanish Admirall, wherein were thirteen chests of Gold (or as Master Ioseph Kelle then at Safia reported to mee, fifty fardels of Arabike Bowkes, valued at a Million of treasure; he law ten of those fardels.) The other ship at Santa Cruz, met Sidan, and deliuered him his women, Men were more necessary, which he wanted, and yet (worse then their want) some offered their seruice for pay, and receiuing it, for-took him, whereby he was forced to flee into the Mountayns, where he is said yet to remaine, Side Hamet, now called Mully Hamet Ben Abdela, placed a Gouvernour in Marocco, another at Taradant, the cheife City of Sus.

- Since I published these Relations, certaine Letters haue beene printed, and entituled News from Barbary, which more largely discoules of this Saint: That hee is about thirtie fixe yeeres, very ciuill and plaine in habit, his Turbant of course Calico, his Altheek or loofe Gowne of Lile Grogam, a plaine Sword by his side, hanged with a plaine leather chong, a man of great Wildome and Learning, an Astrologer and Politician, He hath drawne to him Alcaid Azu afore said, the principall Counsellor of the Land and many other Saints and principall men, and since his coming hath married the Widdow of Muley Boforis. He alledgeth certaine Prophecies which foretell theie his proceedings in reuiuing their Law, rooting out the Xeriffes, and establishing peace in his Reigne, which shall continue fortie yeeres, after which Christ (as hee saith) shall come to Iudgement. The Talbies and learned men doe confesse, that they find these Prophecies of him in their Bookes: to wit, both his name, his beginning at Missa, his course, and certaine bodily characters, as a Wart about his right eye, a blacke or gray tooth before (which Master Kebie saith he saw) a Ring in the palme of his right hand, and a Spurre in his right foot, a bunch of haire betweene his shoulders, and others to the number of seuen; all which agree to him. At his beginning he put forth only one Tent and a Kitchin, and then resorted to him the Shrokies, a Sainctish people in their Law, but otherwise in behaviour very Sauages, of which a hundred and fiftie, or two hundred serued him without pay, with whom he brake Albadge Lemere his forces (situant to Sidan) being fise hundred strong. His Shrokies encreased to fise hundred, with whom and others that added themselves by the way, he ouerthrew Sidan forces three times before the battle. Then did he subdue certaine Mountayners, which Sidan (nor his Father) could neuer bring vnder. By the way to Marocco hee was to passe a Riuer, and warned his people that none should take vp water in their hand to drinke, which some doing, anon after dyed. Comming to Dets, where hee found a great Power to withstand him, hee comforted his fearefull followers, with promise, that to morrow they should see more with him, then against him: and removing his Tents that night, there seemed another Armie greater then theirs, till they came at Dets, and then vanished, the enemies first with fight thereof hauing fled, and left all to the spoyle. This, saith our Authour, & our Countinman M. W. with diuers others, sweare they haue seene (if any credit, or the name of our Countinman bee to be giuen to a Renegado) He himselfe with some other of our Nation went to see him, and receiued kinde entertainment, with promise of fauour to the English, willing them to take knowledge that hee was sent by Gods appointment to releue all of all forts, and to aduertise what they had seene, saying they should see more strange matters come to passe: meaning, as they ghesied, the conquest of Spaine, France, and Italy, with which opinion he posseseth the foolish Moores. For when hee hath let peace in those parts, hee tels them of a Bridge (recorded in their Writings to haue beene in former times) which shall appeare in the mouth of the Straits, to carry them ouer. But what will bee the issue is vncertaine, the people loone after beginning to disobey, the Shabenites and Brebers robbing to the gates of Marocco. Another Reporteth that every day they flee from him more and more, and Muley Sidan is expected againe. Him yee last left at Santa Cruz, from whence (as by later intelligence I haue receiued) he went to Side Hia, another famous Poquere in the Mountaines of Atlas, at whose Zowia (or Religious Houle) being arrived, hee late downe on a stone, nor would enter till he had obtained conference: where they agreed on conditions, that Sidan should leaue his tyrannies, and proclayne pardon to the aduerser party, Hia promising accordingly his best assistance.

- This the next yeere 1613. was performed. Side Hia gathering an Armie of 90000. men, most of which were Brebers of the Countrey of Hea or Haha, with which hee marched towards Marocco. Mully Sidan in the meane while had giuen diuers battels or slaughter skirmishes to Mully Hamet, with losse to himselfe, notwithstanding his promise of seuen dayes sacke of Marocco to his Souldiers, if they could recover it. Mully Hamet was nere Azamor at this approach of Hia, from whence he made more haste then speed (being then about fiftene thousand strong) with a thousand Horse riding before, and leauing the rest of his Armie to follow. With this handfull of men, and heart full of manly courage, he set vpon the great Armie of Side Hia, three times preuailing, but at last with multitudes was ouerthrowne; his Horse first, and himselfe after, being slaine with a shot, his wonted Deuill, or Imposture, now failing, Hia killing, and many of his followers vpon him; till a certaine Alcaide knowing him, cryed that Bomboli, that is, the King of clouts or rags was slaine; whereupon all forsooke him and fled, his other troupes now also comming to the flight, which before his indiscretion and impatience would not suffer him to vie in the fight.

Thus died this glorious vainglorious Saint, a man of great valour, which hee had tryed in thirty leuall & Battailles and skirmishes: in which he obtained the better, both against Sidan and the Mountaynes, whole Corne-fields he burnt, destroyed their Vineyards, and in two or three daies had cut down sixty thousand Oliue-trees. The place of this battle betwixt Hamet and Hia, was in or neere the Gardens (which are said to extend foure miles from Marocco) the time in October, 1613. Alcaid Azau was then in Marocco, with the Sonne of Hamet: both which vpon this disaster fled with abundance of Treasure, but by the Larbies were taken, and Azau his head presently smitten off, as the supposed contriuer of many policies to their detriment: Hamets Sonne was carried to Marocco, and presented to Sidan, where after diuers contumelies, opprobriously carried on an Alle diuers dayes, he was at last slaine. When Side Hia had slaine Hamet, hee grew suspected to Sidan, because hee did not then presently proclaime him, nor durst he aduenture to the City, till Hia had remoued his forces further. The City meane while fullayned diuers abuses by the Souldiers; as before by the Vsurper, in so much that Sidan wept when hee entred and saw the beauty of his Palace defaced (which some say is comparable in greatnesse and stateliness to the best in Christendome) and kept within doores three moneths or more. After this coming forth, hee brake his Covenant with Hia; and those which before he had pardoned, were now put to death, and some also grievously & tortured. Whereupon Hia tooke armes againe, and came neere to Marocco with a great Power, which suddenly he was forced to disperse, and to returne home for feare of Treason by Side Luffan a great man in his Armie, which was reported to hold intelligence with Sidan, and to haue written to him.

Thus barbarous and miserable is the present State of Barbary, Sidan (the only Suruiuer of the Brethren) possessing Marocco; Fez acknowledging no Soueraigne, but the City gouerned by the Magistrates thereof, and in the Countrey each Cast or Tribe by it selfe; Aduly Abdelah, the Sonne of Aduly Shek, liues sometimes at Alcaides, sometimes at Alcasar, little respected, maintayning himselfe by spoyle and robbery; and Side Hia enioying the Royall profits of the Kingdome of Swi. He liues commonly at Taradani, holds the Countrey subiect, but arrogates not the title of King: His word is Lanjerel hoc layenore Side Hia, that is, Let the Truth lue, and Side Hia flourish. A late Letter from thence signifies the feare that Sidan had of Hia's third approach to Marocco, in which respect he sent two thousand Souldiers into the Countrey of Draa, thence to enter into Swi, if such inuasion happened. But we haue bene too tedious Actors of this Barbarian Tragedie. Wee must forward on our Pilgrimage and now hauing glutted our eyes with blood, let vs take more quiet vlew of the other parts of this Kingdome.

Agmet was sometimes called a second Marocco, b from whence it standeth foure and twenty miles. The Hills and Valley about it, adorned with Gardens and Vineyards, a faire Riuer, and fertile fields, yeelding ffrise fold encrease, haue assembled Natures Forces to ioyne with Arte (if Magicke may be so termed, and the Histories write true) for the common good of Agmet, and Marocco. The Riuer runneth (as is thought) to Marocco vnder the ground: which secret passage is attributed to the Wizards of Ioseph, Founder of Marocco, lest the water course should be cut off from the City. This fruitfull Agmet in Leo's time was peopled only with Foxes and wild beastes, sauing that a certaine Heremite held the Castle with a hundred of his Disciples.

The c Mountaynes are very rude, according to their rough and cold places of habitation, many of them couered continually with Snow. In Nissfa they gaze and wonder at strangers: in Semede they forced Leo to play the Iudge and Notarie (accepting no excuse) eight dayes; and then set him in a Church-porch, and after a certaine Prayer, presented themelues with their presents before him, Cockes, Hens, Nuts, Garlike; and some of the better sort a Goat, which all he gaue his Host; money they had none for him.

In Secfin there is at all times of the yeere, Snow. There are many great Caves, wherein they winter their beasts in November, Iannary, and February. They wear no shoes, but certaine Sandals, and are lustie men at ninety or a hundred yeeres old. Tennilla is an Hereticall Hill and Towne, which hath a faire Temple. They are of Elmabeli his Sect, and challenge any stranger which comes amongst them to dispute. In Hantera are many Iewes of the d Carraim Sect.

The fourth Region of this Kingdome is Guezula, confining with the Hill Ilds on the West, Atlas on the North, Hea on the East. They haue no walled Townes, but great Villages: neither haue they King or Gouvernour; the cause of Ciuill Warres amongst them: yet doe they obserue three dayes in a Weeke truce, when euery man may trauell or barter safely. A certaine Heremite, who was reputed a Saint, was Authour of this three dayes truce in each weeke. Hee had but one eye. I my selfe, sayth Leo, saw him, and found him to bee trustie, courteous, and liberrall.

Duc-

Duccala the fifth Region lyeth betwene Tenifit and the Ocean, Habib and Omitabili. At Azaphi the Prince was (in Leo's time) murdered at Church, while he was in his deuotions, by a subiect, who was chosen Gouverneur; but the Portugals obtayned the place. Azamur, a Citie exceedingly addicted to Sodome, was also punished with Portugall flauerie, and moſt of the Countrey thereabouts. In the Hill, called Greenehill, lue many Heremites, of the fruits onely there growing. Here are many Altars and Saints after the Mahumetan faſhion.

Mahumet King of Fez, in the yeere of our Lord 1512. pallied this way with his Armie, and at euery Altar made a ſtand, and there kneeling, would thus ſay; My God, thou knoweſt that my intent of comming to this wille place, is onely to helpe and free the people of 10 Duccala from the wicked and rebellious Arabians, and from our cruell enemies the Canitians: and if thou doeſt not approue it, let thy ſcourge light onely on my perſon; for theſe people that follow me deſerue not to be puniſhed. Hence he ſent me Ambaſſadour to Marocco.

Leo an Ambaſſadour.

Haſcora the ſixth Region of Marocco, is ſituate betwene the Riuer Tenifit and Qudelhahid. Alemdin in Haſcora was conquered to the King of Fez by a Merchant, whole Paſſemour the Prince had taken away; for which adulterie he was by the Iudges condemned to be ſtoned. The Prince of Temcenies was ſo addicted to Arabian poetrie, that hee gaue Leo, then a youth of ſixteene yeeres old, ſixtie durats for certaine verſes hee had made in his praile, and twice as much he ſent to his vnckle for the ſame, with a horſe and three ſlues.

Tedles is the ſeuenth Prouince of this Kingdome, lying betwene Guadelhabid and Omirabili. Teſza the chiefe Towne is beautified with many Temples, and hath ſtore of Prieſts. The Towne walls are built of a kinde of marble called Teſza, which gaue name to the Town. Mount Dedes is in this Prouince, where the people (for the moſt part) dwell in Caues vnder the ground; they haue neither Iudges nor Prieſts, nor honeſt men among them. For other places, if any thinke vs not more than tedious alreadie, let them reſort to Leo, whom all follow in their Relations of theſe parts. When any Chriſtian * will turne Moore, it is their 20 cuſtome to ſignifie it to the Chriſtians in thoſe parts: and in place and time appointed, an equal number of both ſorts being aſſembled, and ſitting the one ouer againſt the other, the partie in the middle and preſence of both, is demanded of which he will be, and the Chriſtians may vie what arguments they can to diſſwade him: which is done three ſeueral times.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Arabians populations, and depopulations in Afrike, and of the naturall Africans; and of the beginnings and proceedings of the Mahumetan ſuperſtition in Africa: of the Portugals forces and exploits therein.

Auing often mentioned the Arabians in our former Chapters, it ſeemes fit to ſpeake ſomewhat of the comming of that Nation, and their Religion, into Africa from the Eaſt, as alſo of the Armes of the Portugals (before often ſpoken of) which from the Weſt haue made ſome impreſſions in theſe parts. The Arabian Mahumetiſme, euen almoſt in the infancy thereof, pierced into Africa. In the yeere * of our Lord 637. Omar inuaied Egypt, and Odenan in the yeere 650, paſſed further with foureſcore thouſand fighting men, and defeated *Grego-
10 rina Patricius*, and impoſing a tribute on the Africans, departed. In Leontius time, in the yeere 698. They inuaide and poſſeſſe Africa, and appoint Gouvernours of their owne: in the yeere 710. They pierced into Numidia and Libya, and ouerthrew the Azanaghi, and the people of Galata, Oden, and Tombuto. In 977. hauing paſſed Gamben, they infected the Negroes; and the firſt that dranke of their poiſon, were thoſe of Melli. In the yeere 1067. Iauia ſonne of Ababequer, entred into the lower Ethiopia, and by little and little infected choſe people which conſiue vpon the Deſarts of Libya and the reſt, and pierced into Nubia and Guinea.

Conſtantinus the Emperour * among the Prouinces or great Amerships, ſubiect to the Saracens, numbred Africa for one: the number and order whereof hee hath tranſcribed from 10 Theophaues, and I here from him. The firſt of theſe was Perſia or Chioraſſan; the ſecond, Egypt; the third, Africa; the fourth, Philiftiem or Rhamble; the firſt, Damalus; the ſixt, the Cuemps or Emeſſa; the ſeuenth, Chalep; the eight, Antiochia; the ninth, Charan; the tenth,

Elmabuti and Abdul Mamen, preferred the Arabians, and induced them to make warre upon those their enemies, whom easily they conquered. He also brought all the chiefe and principall of the Arabians into the westerne Kingdomes, and assigned them more noble places for habitation, to wit, the Prouinces of Duccala and Azgar: to those of meane condition hee appointed Numidia, which at first were, as it were, slaves to the Numidians; but after recovered their libertie, and obtayned the dominion of that part of Numidia assigned them, every day encreasing in power: those which inhabited Azgora and other places in Mauritania, were all brought into seruitude. For the Arabians out of the Deserts, as it fishes out of the water. Atlas on the one side, and the other Arabians on the other side, suffered them not to passe into the Deserts, and therefore they laid downe their pride, and applied themselves to husbandrie, dwelling in their Tents, and paying yeerely tributes to the Kings of Mauritania, from which those of Duccala, by reason of their multitude, were free. Many Arabians remayned still in Tunis, which after Manfors death, they tooke and made themselves Lords of the Regions adioyning; where some of them bare great sway till Leo's time: the other deprived of their wonted pay at Tunis, committed great robberies and slaughters of Merchants and Travellers.

The Arabians, which inhabited Africa, are diuided into three peoples, Hylal, and Chachin, which are said to descend of Ismael, therefore by the Mahumetans esteemed more noble: the third is termed Machil, deriued from Saba, and came thither out of Arabia felix. The diuisions and subdivisions of these into their severall Tribes and Families, which Leo hath done, would perhaps to our nice Readers seeme but an harsh heape of strange names; and for their sakes I will referre the studious hereof to that our Author.

The Tribe Echeg, which Manfor placed in Duccala, and in the Playnes of Tedles, in later times suffered much damage by the Portugals on the one side, and the Kings of Fez on the other: they are about one hundred thousand men of warre, halfe horse-men. The Sumaites in the Deserts neere Tripolis can arme fourescore thousand men: Sahid in the Deserts of Libya, canbring into the field almost an hundred and fiftie thousand of their Tribe. The Ruche are not rich, but in agilitie of body miraculous, and account it a shame if one of their foot-men be vanquished of two horse-men; nor is any amongst them so slow, that he will not out-goe any the swiftest horse, be the iourney neuer so long. The Vode dwell betwene Gualata and Guading, and are esteemed about threecore thousand Warriours. The other kindreds of them are exceeding many, dispersed through Africa, some-where commanding, other-where subject. And as they liue in diuers places, so doe they obserue differing customes. Those which dwell betwene Numidia and Libya liue miserably: they make merchandize of their Camels with the Negros, and many Horses which are sold into Europe, termed horses of Barbarie. They are much addicted to Poetrie, and make long Poems of their warres, huntings, and loues, with great elegance, and that in rittime, like the vulgar Italian Sonets. They are (the destinie of Poets) courteous, but poore. The Arabian Inhabitants betwene Atlas and the Sea, are more rich in corne and cattell, but more base and barbarous in conditions. Amongst the Arabians neere Tunis, a good Poet is highly esteemed, and amply rewarded of their great men, neither can the neatnesse and grace of their verse easily be expressed. When they goe to warre, they carry their wives with them on Camels, and that (to make vp the wonder) to incourage them. The Arabians betwene Barbarie and Egypt leade a wretched life in those barren Deserts, forced, not onely to exchange their cattell for corne, but to pawne their sonnes in great numbers to the Sicilians, who if they breake day, make slaues of them: and therefore they exercise all robberies, and sell any stranger (they can lay hold on) to the Sicilians for corne.

Now for the naturall and native Inhabitants of Africa, the white men (so they are in comparison of the Negros) are diuided into five peoples, Sanhagia, Musmuda, Zeneta, Haoara, and Gumera. The Musmuda inhabit the Regions of Hea, Sus, Gozola, and Marocco. Gumera inhabiteth the Mountaynes alongst the Mediterranean, from the Streets to Tremizen. These two dwell seuered from the others, and maintayne continuall warres one with another. As Authors say, they were wont to haue Tents, and the wide fields for their habitation, and chose that were conquered, were sent to inhabit Cities; the Conquerors were Lords of the fields. The Tribes or Peoples Zeneta, Haoara, and Sanhagia, inhabit Temeline. The Zeneta chased the Familie of Idriu from the dominion of Africa and Fez: and were againe themselves, after that, deprived by the Zanhagian families of Luntuna, and of Abdul Mamen. The Benemarini a Zenetan familie repouered the Empire long after.

They are in these times * diuided into Brebers and Alarbies. The Brebers inhabit the Mountaynes: the Alarbies, the Playnes. Both of them maintayne deadly feuds, and will fight forer battels in such quarrels, then in seruice of their King. Insumch, that vpon losse of any great man, cruell battels haue bene fought, and ten thousand men slaine at a time. The

* Ro. C. Histories of Barbarie.

The Alarbies haue their fairest Virgin riding on a Camell, with a flagge in her hand, decked in all pompe to sollicite her kindred to reuenge, and goeth forth in the field incouraging them to follow. The kindred spareth no blood to saue their Virgin, which the other side striveth to winne, holding that a continuall glory to the seventh generation. When a man is killed, his Tribe seeketh not reuenge on the murderer only, but on the first man of the Tribe he meets with. The Brebers doe likewise. Their women follow them in their hatels, with a certaine colour in their hand called Hanna, which will staine, and therefore they throw it vpon such as offer to run out of the field, the basest ignominie that can befall them.

The Larbie and Breber doe differ as much in language, as Welsh and English; the one is giuen to Husbandry, the other very much to Robbery. Muly Sidau in these late warres, seeing the Larbies also become robbers, caused the next Dwarre (a Towne of Tents) belonging to that Tribe which herein had faulted, to bee destroyed Man, Woman, Child, Kine, Sheepe, and whatsoever belongeth to them, by his Soukiers. But after hee had lost the field in the battell with Muly Sheek, they foraged vp to Mirocco gates, trusting to the strength which that Tribe could make, being fiftene thousand Horie. This Tribe or kindred was called Woled Enid.

b See lib. 1. In Africa they are much subiect to the Cough: in so much b that on the Fridayes when they are in their Mahumetan Sermons, if one fall a coughing, another followes, and so from hand to hand all take it vp, and hold on in that sort, till the end of their Sermon, no man bearing what hath beene said.

c The generall vices of the Africans, cha 8. For their morall conditions, Leo thus describeth them, as wee haue somewhat mentioned before: The inhabitants of the Cities in Barbary are poore and proud, irrefull, and writing all iniuries in Marble: vntractable and vnfriendly to Strangers: a simple, and credulous of impossibilities. The vulgar is ignorant of nature, and esteeme all workes thereof diuine and miraculous. They are irregular in their life and actions, exceedingly subiect to cholers, speake aloft and proudly, and are often at buffets in the streets. Thus base is their disposition, and no lesse is their estimation with their Lords, who make better account of their beasts. They haue no chiefe men or Officers to rule or Counsaile them. They are ignorant of merchandize, being destitute of Bankers and money-changers, and euery Merchant is constrained to attend his wares himselfe. No people vnder Heauen more couetous; few amongst them, which for loue of God or man will entertaine a stranger, or requite a good turne: alwayes encombred with melancholy, they addit themselves to no pleasures: the reason whereof, is their great poouertie and small gaires.

The Shepheards, both in the mountaynes and fields, liue a labourfome and miserable life, a beastly, theuishi, ignorant kinde of people, neuer repaying any thing committed to them. The young Women before they marry, may haue their Louers in all filchinesse, none of them belittling her virginie on her Husband: if they bee once married, their louers doe no more follow after them, but betake them to some others. The brutish Father makes this odious loue to his Daughter, and the beastly Brother to his whoorish Sister. The most of them are neither Mahumetans, Iewes, nor Christians, but without faith, and without so much as a shadow of Religion, neither making any prayers, nor hauing any Churches, but liue like beasts. And if any hath any smacke of deuotion, yet hauing no Law, Priest nor any Rule to follow, hee is forced to liue like the other. Many of them, both in Cities and fields, are found fauoring of better things, both for Arts, Merchandize, and Deuotion, as the same Leo sheweth: but thus are the most inclined.

a Ant. Guern. Now, to adde somewhat further of the Mahumetan Religion in Africa, Anno 714. (as some doe reckon) the Saracens, by the incitement of Iulius Earle of Sura, as in our third booke is related, invaded and conquered Spaine. Leo in his fift booke attributeth this to Muse Gouernour of Africa, vnder d Qualid the Calipha of Damasco, whose next succellour deposed Muse, and sent Iezul to Caiazoan to succeed in his roome, whose posteritie there gouerned till that House was depriued of the Caliphship, and the seate thereof remooued from Damasco to Bagdet. Then was Elagleb made Lieutenant of Africa, and held it with his posteritie after him 170. yeeres. After which time El Mabdi an heritticall Calipha dispossest them. Of this El Mabdi and Elcam, and their supposed heresies, I haue no certaine Historie. Certaine it is, that the Mahumetanes from the beginning were diuided, as appeareth of Irdia in our Historie of Fez: and more fully in the Catalogue of Mahomet next succellours, which were the next not in blood, but in power. So did Eubae or Abubacer challenge it, and after him Homar and Ottoman: contrary to the Testament of Mahomet, who appointed Habib heyre. Muamur also murdered Hali and his sonne, to obtaine the Soueraintie. Thus were they diuided about the true succellour of their false Prophet; which fire is not yet extinct. Another diuision was about the interpretation of their Law. e Abubacer gaue foundation to the Sect Melchita or Melici, embraced by the Africans: Homar was author of the rabians not refusing the Portugals service, till the Scrif arose in Africa, as euen now was shewed, and chaled the Portugals thence.

Thus Spaine hath reuenged her selfe of the Mahumetan iniuries by her two Armes : of Castile (which at last draue them out of Granada, and tooke diuers Townes in the Mainie of Africa from them, and King Philip now in our dayes hath expelled the remainders of that Race quite out of Spaine :) and Portugall, which thus freed it selfe, and burthened them, by another course did yet more harme to the Mahumetan profession. For Henry Iohn of Iohn the first, set forth Fleets to discover the Coasts of Africa, and the Ilands adiacent, diuers of which were by the Portugals possessed, and made way to the further discoveries and conquests of that Nation in Africa, and India, to these our dayes, where they haue taken diuers Kingdomes and Cities from the Moores. Of which other places of this Historie in part, and the larger Relations of Barrins in his Decades, of Oserini, Maffars, Marmol, Arthas, Larrie and others, are ample witnesses.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Biledulgerid and Sarra, otherwise called Numidia, and Libya.

Ee have now, I suppose, wearied you with so long discourse that part of Africa on this side Atlas, but such is the difference of the Mindes wearinesse, from that of the Body, that this being wearied with one long journey, if the same be continued with a second it is more then tired : the other after a tedious and irksome way, when another of another nature presents it selfe, is thereby refreshed, and the former wearinesse is with this variate abated, yea

although it bee, as this is, from a better to a worse. Euen the mounting vp this cold hill, and thence to view the Atlantike Ocean on the West, Southward and Eastward the Deserts, will neither make the Soule breathelesse with the steepe ascent, nor faint with so wide prospects of manifold Wildernes; this of barren Earth, and that of bare Waters ; a third seeming to be mixt of both, a Sea without waters, an Earth without soliditie, a land not to hazard Ships with her priue ambushments, but with open violence swallowing men, and disdaining to hold a foot-print as a testimony of subiection ; a winde not breathing ayre, but sometimes the higher Element in fiery heates, and sometimes the lower in sandie showres : once a Nature mocking Nature, an order without order, a constant inconstancie ; where it is Natures pastime to doe and vndoe ; to make Mountaines and Valleys, and Mountaines of Valleys at pleasure. Strange is the composition of these placés, but stranger is that of the Minde, which feedes it selfe with the cruell hunger, and satiates thirst with insatiable thirstinesse of these Deserts. And whereas the body feareth to be drowned, euen there, where it is as much feareth to want water, in this sandie journey : the Soule (modell of Diuinitie, life of Humanitie) feares no such accidents to it selfe, but in a sweetnesse of variete delights to survey all that her first and Ancient inheritance (howsoever since by sinne mortgaged and confiscated) and being sequestered from all societies of Men, can here discourse with God and Nature in the Desarts. Hither now, after so long a Preamble, we bring you, and at first present vnto your view Numidia, where you shall bee feasted with Dates which haue given the name Biledulgerid (that is, Date-Region) thereunto, and before is made one entire part of seuen, in our diuision of Africa. Ludouicus Marmolus writes it Biledul Gerid. Obserue by the way with Aldrete, that this Numidia is that of the Ancients, which is part of Barbary, but more Southerly ; nor hath this Libya of Leo the same bounds with that of the ancient Geographers.

The Easterne border is Ehoacat, a Citie distant one hundred miles from Egypt ; the Westerne is the Atlantike Ocean ; the Northerne, Atlas ; the Southerne, Libya. This is the basell part of Africa ; the Cosmographers not deigning it the name of a Kingdom, the inhabitants thereof are in many places so farre distant from any other. As for example, Tellec a Citie of foure hundred Housholds is seperated from allover habitations three hundred miles. Some places thereof are better peopled. The Numidia described by Ptolomey, Mela, and Plinie, is of a farre lesse bounds, and is rather a part of Barbary, then of this which we here describe : called (saith Plinie) Metagontia, and famous for nothing but Marble, and wilde beasts : The Numidie called Nomades of their Pastoral life, and charge of Pastures, carrying their houses on their Carts. The Cities whereof were Cyrrha, called now Constantin, 60 and Iol, now, as some write, Bugia. The Numidians are notorious for excessive Venerie. For the Religion of these, whom Leo termeth Numidians, bee saith, That in old time they worshipp worshipped certayne Planets, and sacrificed to them; and were like to the Persians, in worship of the Sunne, and the Fire, to both which they built Temples, and like the Vestals in Rome, kept the fire continually burning. Christian Religion began to quench this Fire (as it is thought) in the Apostles dayes, which after was perverted by Arrianisme, subverted by Mahometisme. Iewish Religion had here some footing alio, before that Chritianitie was Preached to them.

The Numidians live long, but lose their Teeth beimes (sowre sauce for their sweet Dates) and their eyes also pay wicely tributes to the Sands, which the windes very busily and often send as their Searchers and Customers, till at last they can see to pay them no more. In all Numidia the French disease (as wee call it) is vnknowne, and in Libya. I haue knowne such Lees, an hundred persons that haue bene cured of that maladie, onely by passing ouer Aras and beating this ayre. This disease was not heard of in Africa, till King Ferdinand expelled the Iewes out of Spaine, and the Moores by lying with the Iewes wnes got the same; and generally infected Barbary, calling it therefore the Spanish disease. The Plague also infected Barbary once in ten, fiftene, or fwe and twentie yeeres, and destroyeth great multitudes, because they haue little regard or remedie for it. In Numidia it is scarce knowne once to happen in an hundred yeeres, and in the Land of Negroes neuer. Worse diseases then Pox or Plague possesse the Numidians, namely, ignorance of Dreine, Morall and Naturall knowledge, Treason, Murther, Robberie, without all respect of any thing. If any of them are hired in Barbary, they are employed in base Offices, Scullians, Dung-farmers, and what not. Neither are the Libyans or Negroes much better.

Of the Numidians and Libyans, are fwe peoples; Zenaga, Guenzaga, Terga, Lemta, and Berdeia, and live all after the same manner, and order, that is, without manners or order at all. Their garments of base cloath, scarce couer halfe their bodie. The Gentlemen (Gentlemen must pardon me the abusing of the Name) to bee distinguished from the rest, wear a jacket of blew Cotton with wide sleeves. Their Steeds are Camels, on which they ride without Stirrups or Saddles, and vse a goad in stead of Spurres, and a leather fastened in a hole borderethow the gristles of the Camels nose, serues them for a Bridle. Mattes made of Rushes are their Beds, and Wooll growing on their Date-trees, yeelds matter for their Tents. Their food is often-times patience with an emptic belly: which when they fill, bread or meate after any sort is absent. Onely they haue their Camels milke, whereof they drinke a dish-full next their heart: and certainedly flesh sodde in Butter and Mlke. eury one with his hands raking out his share of these dainties, after drinking the broach; and then drinke vp a cup of Milke, and Supper is done. Whiles Milke lasteth, they are not for water, especially in the Spring-time, all which season, some neuer wash hands or face, because they neuer goe to the places where they may haue Water. And the Camels haue ioyned with their masters in this necessesse, not regarding water, whiles they may feed on grass.

All their life (or that space rather, before they dye, not worthy the name of life) is spent in Hunting, and robbing their enemies; not staying about three or foure dayes in a place, as long as the Grasse will serue their Camels. They haue ouer eury Tribe One, in manner of a King, whom they honour and obey. Very rarely is a Iudge found amongst them, and to him such as are litigious, ride sometimes fwe or fixe dayes iourney. Him will they amply reward with a thousand Duckats more or lesse by the yeere. As for Letters, Arts, Vertue, they dwell not in these Defarts. They are very jealous, which is the death of many. Yet are they liberal after their manner to Strangers, as I my selfe (it is Leo report) can testifie. For going ouer the Defarts with a Carauan of Merchants, the Prince of Zenaga encountered vs with fwe hundred men on Camels, and cauled vs to pay our Customes: and then inuited vs to his Tents. There did hee kill many Camels to feast vs, both young and old, and as many gelled, and Ostriches, which they had taken in the way. And when the Merchants shewed themselves loth, that hee should make such slaughters of them, he said, That it were shame to entertaine them with small Cattell onely, being strangers. So wee had Roast, and Boyled; and Bread of Panike, very fine; and Dates great plentie. Hee honoured our companie with his presence; but he ate together with his Nobles, separate from vs: and had with him certaine Religious and Learned men, to sit with him, which all the Meale-time touched no Bread, but onely Flesh and Milke: the reason, the Prince gaue vs, because they were borne in the Defarts, where no Corne grew. Onely they ate Bread on certaine solemne Feasts; as, at Easter, and day of Sacrifices. Thus did this liberal Prince spend on vs ten times the value of his Customes. After this manner also live the Africans, called Sanna.

The Tracts of Numidia, most in name, are these: Data, which extendeth it selfe two hundred and fiftie miles in length; where are great store of Date-trees, whereof some are male, and some female; the first brings forth onely Flowers; the other, Fruit. And they take a flowered bough of the male, and engraft it in the female; otherwile, the Dates prove nought and almost all stone. They feed their Goates with the stones of the Dates beaten, and therewith they grow fatte, and yeeld store of Milke. Segelmelle was built (if any list to beleue b Bieri, an African Colmogropher) by Alexander the Great. Heere were certain Colledges and Temples. The people of the Countrey liued on Dates. They haue no Fleas: a small pruillage; for they haue infinite store of Scorpions.

Fighting hath industrious and wittie people; whereof, some become Merchants; others, Students, and goe to Fez; where haueing obtayned the degree of Doctors, they returne into Numidia, and are made Priests and Preachers, and so become rich. Tegerarin hath Traffique with the Negros. They water their Corne-fields with Well-water, and therefore are forced to lay on much soyle. In which respect, they will let Strangers haue their houses Rent-free, 15 only the Dung of Themelues and their Beasts excepted. They will expostulate with that stranger, which shall in some nicer humour goe out of doores to that businesse, and aske him, if hee know not the place appointed thereunto. Heere were many rich Jewes, which by meanes of a Preacher of Telenlin were spoyled, and most of them slaine, at the same time that Ferdinand chased them out of Spaine.

Techort is a Numidian Towne, exceeding courteous to Strangers, whom they entertaine at free-cost, and marrie their Daughters to them, rather then to the Natiues. Pefcara is exceedingly infested with Scorpions, whose sting is present death: wherefore the Inhabitants in Summer time forsake their Citie, and stay in their Countrey-possessions till No-

Libya extendeth it selfe from the Confines of Eloachar vnto the Atlantike, betwixt the Numidians and Negros. It is one other of the Seven parts, into which wee haue diuided Africa: the Arabians call it Sarra; that is, a Desart. Plinie e in the beginning of his fift Booke, sayth, That all Africa by the Græcians was called Libya. Taken in a more proper sense, it is duerly f bounded by the Ancients, and therefore wee will heere hold vs to Leo's description. The name Libya is deriued from Lobi, a Mauritania King, as some e affirme. Herodorus f saith, of a woman named Libya. Among the Libyans are reckoned e the Libyænes, Libi-ophenices, Liby ægyptii, and diuers other Nations, euen of the h Ancients accused, for want of inward and outward good things, cunning only in Spoyle and Robberie. The Libyans worshipped one Psaphon i for their God, induced thereto by his subtiltie. For he had taught Birds to sing, П с а р н о н is a great God: which being set at libertie, chaunted such note in the woods, and easily perwaded the wilde people to this deuotion; which e Athan saith, Ammon had endeoured in vaine. It was the custome of Women to howle in their Temples, k whence some of the Bacchanall Rites were borrowed by the Græcians. Vnto the Libyans are reckoned those Nations, whose barbarous Rites are before related in the seventh Chapter of this Booke. Wee will now come to later Obseruations. l Men may trauell eight dayes, or more, in the Libyan Deserts ordinarily, without finding any water. The Deserts are of di-uers shapes, some couered with grauell, others with sand, both without water: s heere and there is a lake, sometimea shrub, or a little grasse. Their water is drawne out of deepe pits, and is brackish, and sometimes the sands couer those pits, and then the Trauellers perish for thirst. The Merchants that trauell to Tombuto, or other places this way, carrie water with them on Camels; and if water faile them, m they kill their Camels, and drinke water which they wring out of their guts. Their Camels are of great abilitie to sustaine thirst, sometimes trauelling without drinke twelue dayes or more. Otherwise they were neuer able to trauell thorow those Deserts.

In the Desart of Azaoad there are two Sepulchres of Stone, wherein certaine letters engrauen testifie, that Two Men were there buried; one a very rich Merchant, who tormented with thirst, bought of the other, which was a Carrier or transporter of wares, a cup of Water, for ten thousand Duckats, and dyed neuer thelesse; both buyer and seller with thirst.

n A. Cadomasto.

Their lues for lewdnesse resemble the Numidians before mentioned, but for length come much short of them, few attayning to threecore yeeres. n They are (as little need as they haue thereof) often plagued with those clouds of Grasshoppers, which couer the ayre, and destroy the earth.

The Libyan Desart of Zanhaga beginning at the Westerne Ocean, extendeth it selfe farre and wide betwene the Negros and the Numidians, to the Salt-pits of Tegaza. From the Well of Azaoad, to the Well of Araoan, an hundred and fittie miles space, is no water; for lacke whereof, many both men and beasts there perish. Likewise in the Desart Gogdem, for nine dayes journey no drop of water is found. In the Desart of Targa is Manna found, which the Inhabitants gather in little vessels, and carrie to Agadez to sell. They mingle it with their drinke, and with their portage: it is very whollome. Tegaza is an inhabited place, where are many veynes of Salt, which resemble Marble, they digge it out of pits, and sell it to Merchants of Tombuto, who bring them victuals. For they are twenty dayes

journey from any habitation, the cause that some times they all die of famine. They are much molested with the South-east winds, which maketh many of them to lose their sight. Bardeos was found out largely by one Hamar, a guide vnto a Carauan of Merchants, who lost his way by reason of a maladie that fell into his eyes, yet blind as hee was, hee rode on a Camell, none else being able to guide them: and at euery miles end caused some find to be giuen vnto him, whereon hee smelled, and thereby at last told them of an inhabited place, forty miles before he came at it: where, when they came, they were denied water, and were forced by force to obtaine it.

The Rivers that arise out of Atlas, and by the vnkindnesse of their Kinde, fall this way, finding these thirsty Wildernesses to yeeld them the readiest channels, are traisted along by the allurements of the sands, stooping and crouching to them, till being further from wildernesses, they are either swallowed vp of great Lakes, or else whiles they hold on their pursuit for the Ocean, lose themselves in the search, and whiles they are liberal to the thirstie sands in the way, at last dye themselves (I cannot say, dye themselves, as else whete in the World) for thirst in the Desarts. And yet through these waylesse wayes, doth couerousnesse carry, both the Arabians in their rouings, and Merchants with their Carauans to the Negros for wealth: whither: I thinke, at last you expect the coming of this our Carauan also.

CHAP. XIII.
Of the Land of Negros.

Of the River NIGER, Gualata, Senaga, and Guinea.

Niger arum terra, or the Land of Negros, * either is so called of the River Niger, or of the blacke colour of the Inhabitants: some thinke the River is named Niger of the people: it hath on the North those Desarts which we last left: on the South, the Æthiopike Ocean, and the Kingdome of Congo on the East, Nilus; on the West, the Atlantike. Leo makes Gago in the East, and Gualata in the West, the limits thereof. On the side of the River Canaga it is sandie and desert, beyond, it is plentifull, being watered with Niger, which runnes thorow the middle of it. There are no Hills neere the banks of Niger, but wooddie places
40 diuers, receptacles of Elephants. Raines doe neither good nor harme: onely Niger ministers them plenty, as Nilus in Egypt: Their encrease is likewise alike; fortie dayes together after the middle of Iune doth Niger encrease, at which time the Negro Townes are Islands, and the way to them by Boats; and as many it deceaseth. The Merchants in Iuly, August and September, trade in Boats made of a hollowed tree (like the Indian Canoes.) * This River some thinke, ariseth out of a Desert called Saw, from a great Lake: some with lesse likelihood, thinke it is an arme of Nilus; * and some with no truth, thinke it to be deriued from Paradise. It is by Geographers 4 brought from a Lake, which they call Niger, within two degrees of the Equinoctiall, and running thence Northwards, hides himselfe from the violence of the Sunnes surie, vnder a Mantle of Earth, sixty miles together, and then the Earth discouering him; hee runnes not farre, but in reuenge he couereth a great: art of the Earth, and drowneeth him in the same in a Lake called Borneo, till the Earth againe with her strong Armes elapses him in the straiter banks, and forceth him to turne his streame Westward, in which way hauing gotten Fresh helpe of some other streames, that send in their succours; he againe preuaileth, and overthrowes the Earth in the Lake Guber: but hee getting vp againe, makes him flee to the Ocean for ayde, with whose tide-forces assisted, he rends the Earth into many lands, which hee holds as Captiues betweene his waterie * armes of Senaga, Gambia, and diuers others, which euer let slip their hold, and yet euer hold them in euerslasting captiuitie. In this combat whiles both parts swate in contention a fatter excrement is left behind, which all this way hearens the Earth with admirable fertilitie: especially then when the Cloudes in the 60 Summer time take Nigers part, and daily marshall their mighty shoures to the Rivers ayde, shooting off continually in their march their Aire Ordnance, with dreadfull lightnings, wherewith the amazed Earth shrinkes in her selfe, and the insulting waters for three monethes space trample over all, and send Colonies of fishes to inhabit the soyle, engirting meane-while all the Townes with a strait siege. But when the Sunne, in his Autumne Progresse, sends forth the Winds to summon the Clouds to attend on his fiery Chariot; The Earth by degrees looks up with her dirty face (benighted with walking) and makes use of the flame, which cannot runne away with the fleeing waters, to serue her all the yeere after, as Treasurer of her plenty and abundance.

m Leo lib. 7.

Biebris and Mesoudi, ancient African Writers, knew little of these parts: m but a Mahumetan Preacher in the 360. yeere of the Hegerra, made the people of Luntuna and Libya, of his faithlesse faith: and after that, they were discovered. They lined, saith Leo, like beasts, without King, Lord, Common-wealth, or any government, scarce knowing to low their grounds to clad in skins of beasts: not having any peculiar wife; but lye tenne or twelue men together, each man chusing which he best liked. Warre they wage with no other Nation, nor are desirous to trauell out of their Countrey. Some worship the Sunne at the rising: Others, as the people of Gualata, the Fire: and thole of Gaoga are Christians like the Egyptians: Ioseph King of Marocco subdued them: and after that the five peoples of Libya, of whom they learned the Mahumetane Law, and other Artes, and the Merchants of Barbary frequented those parts. The Libyans diuided them into fiftene parts, each third part of thole five peoples possessing one.

n Anno 1526.

But the present King of Tomburo, Abuaci Izchia, being made Generall of the Forces of Soni Hel the former King, which was a Libyan, after his death slue his Sonnes, and brought the Kingdom to the Negros, conquering many Prouinces. After which he went to Mecca on Pilgrimage, and thereby set himsele in debt an hundred and fifty thousand Ducats. A great part of thole Parts by their difference of Language and Religion, is yet unknowne to vs.

o Ric. Rainoldi. Hist.

Gualata was subdued by the King of Tombuto, a beggerly Countrey. This Region adioyneth to Cape Blanco. The Portugals, when they discovered these Coasts for Henry the Infanta, traded hence for slaues as tarre as Canaga, or Senaga (to which our Nation hath since traded) and is an arme, as is said, of Niger. Heere begins the Countrey of Guinea or Ginny, in which we will first giue description of the Kingdomes and Nations along the Coast: next, we will set downe some obseruations of former times: in the third place, those of the Dutch, and lastly, of the Iesuits.

lerric. Theop. Her. indic. tom. 3. l. 4. 444.

The Portugals reckon all to Guinea, from Sanaga, in sixteene degrees to the North; and the Angolan limits in thirteene degrees of Southerly Latitude: so called of Gemus situate on the said River: All the Kingdomes of Congo and Angola they terme the Lower, the Southerly part, the Higher Guinea: Senaga, Sanaga or Zanaga, the Ancients called Stachirus or Darat. From hence Southward is Cape Verd or the Greene Cape, anciently called Aspinarium, against which are twelue Ilands, which beare name of this Cape, which being desert were first inhabited by the Portugals.

Anno 1446. On the Coast (for wee must leaue these Ilands to their due place) the first Kingdome is that of the Ialophs or Ialoes bounded with Zanaga on the North, the Sea on the West, on the East the black Ialoes, called Fulli Gafalli, on the South the Berbecines; a Region containing a hundred and five and twenty leagues in length. The Countrey is rich in Fruits and Gold, whereof in p Tubucato is great store. In these parts are many Portugals turned wilde and barbarous after the fashion of the Natives, hauing in manner put off all Christianity: in nakednesse, in figuring their skinnies with indelible Characters and formes of diuers creatures, and in like behaviour conforming themselves to the Negros. They are called Tangos mroz, and through all Guinea procure such Commodities as they may sell to European Merchants. Southwards from hence are the Kingdomes of Ala and Broccall, inhabited by the Berbecines: these worship the New Moone, and sacrifice to certaine Trees, which they embue with the blood of the faire Sacrifices, and with meale of Rice. When the King of Ala goes to Warre, hee assemblh his chiefe men into a Groue neere the Palace: where they digge a Ditch in a round Circle, and there euery man declareth his opinion: after this consultation the Ditch is closed, and vnder paine of Treason, all which hath bene spoken must bee concealed; and as it were thus buried. The Maydens beautifie themselves with fish skinnies-figures as yee haue heard, on their bodies and faces, cut and pounced, with the iuyce of Hearbes made to endure: they also bore their lips, especially the lower, inserting in the holes bones and peeces of Wood; and weightie things to make it hang from the vpper lip: Opinion can giue lothsomeNESse the prize of Beautie. The Kingdome of Broccall extends to Gambea, which River is so great, deepe, and strong, that the Sea in thirtie leagues from the mouth (which opens it selfe five leagues in digorging his full stomacke) can scarcely lubble it vnto his salt qualitie: Some thinke it proceeds from the same Fountayne with Niger; whence these peoples are called Negros, gros, some, that this and Zanaga proceed from the same head. Midway between the Greene Cape.

Alongst both sides of this River dwell the Mandingæ, a perfidious and Idolatrous Nation, which haue certaine Iochinters called Bexerins to performe their Priestly duties. The River is sayled vp a hundred and threecore Leagues, horrible Precipices and Cataracts, forbidding further passage by water: they call this tall a Bow, for the obliquitie of the fall, suffering men to passe vnder without wetting. Many fertile and pleasant Islands are contained in the diuided armes of this streame. The Inhabitants haue Shippes of good enginnesse and strength. Not farre hence to the South is Cape Saint Mariæ, from which to the River of Dominico is thirtie leagues, peopled by the Arriari and Falupi. Here is also the River Calamanqua, inhabited on the North by the Iabundi, on the South the Beihuni, to whom on the E. st adioyne the Cafangæ; the King is subiect to the King of Iarem, and hee to another more within Land, and so in degrees vnto the Monarch of Mandingæ, whose chiefe Citie is Songus, about a hundred leagues Eastward from the Cape of Palmes; to this King the most of the former are subiect. The Cafangæ worship an Idoll called China, which is nothing else but a bundle of staves or poles pitched into the ground, and fastened together with paste made of the meale of Rice and Miller, which they sprinkle with the blood of sacrificed Kine and Goates. Some hang on the top thereof two or three skuls of Dogges. The Temple to this godly Deitie is some shadie Tree, and there they offer also Miller, and the Wine of Palmes. To secure their Seede they sticke one of these poles in the ground. The Portugals buy slaues in these parts, sold by reason of the Kings vncreasonable tyrannie.

Cafangæ.

The Burami adioyne to the Cafangæ on both sides the River Irim or Dominico; as farre as Rio Grand, Here also they buy slaues. The men and women file their teeth: the women to keepe their tongues in order, euery morning take a draught of water into their mouthes, and there hold it till Dinner or Breakfast time, meane-while doing their household businesse, not spitting, eating, or talking. The chiefe Towne of the Burami is eight leagues from the Hauen, where the chiefe King to whom the rest are subiect, resides. Their Houses are of Earth: couered with leaues. The Bijagæ inhabit neere the great River, a fierce warlike robbing people, possessing also leuenteene Illes: the Portugals haue there the Towne of the Crosse. The Beafares also in these parts are dispersed, of whom the King of Guinala carrieth the greatest state and pompe, at whole death all his Wiues and Seruants, and dearest Clients, and the Kings Horse, are slaine and intombd with him to serue him in the other life. The like vsage is in very many of these Guinean Kingdomes, to which they adde further cruelty in the manner: for they cut off their toes and fingers, and beate their bones as it were in a Morter three houres (longer then which they could not out-lue this torture) and then in the sight of those which were to vndergoe the like fate, thrust them into the neck with a sharpe flake, so finishing their blinde Martyrdome. On the otherside the River is Biguba a Portugall Towne, the best they haue in these parts: the Natiues are Beafares, whose King being dead, the strongest is his Heire, the cause of much Warre. Betwene this and Cape Sierra Lione (so called of the Lyon-like roaring made there by the waues, if not of the Thunders and dreadfull stormes) are the Mallusiens, Bagaliens, and Cizolines. In these parts Grapes and Sugar-canes grow wilde: store also of Cotton, Brasill Wood of seuen colours, Graines called Malegetta of the name of the Region, long Pepper, Miller, besides Waxe and Iuory. Out of their Palmes they draw Wine and Oyle, and a certaine excellent Sope, forbidden (as is also the long Pepper) for the excellence to bee carried into Portugall.

They haue Apes called Beris exceeding great, and so indutious, that being brought vp in the house, they supply the roomes of a seruant; going on their hinder seere, bearing things in the Morter, fetching water home in Vessels, which yet if none bee ready to take from them, they will cast downe and breake, and then howle. Here is store of Iron better then ours, but their best Commodity is Gold, but no Forreiners know the Mines whence they haue it. The Portugals called their Castle here built, Saint George of the Mine, in the fifth degree of Northerly latitude. In Sierra Lione are thirtene Rivers which fall into the Sea. On the River Das Piedras the Portugals haue a Towne, Capor and Tambassire two other Rivers, fall from the Hills Machamala, in which is a great Rocke of most pure Chrysall. Two of these Rivers, Tagaris on the North, and Bangua on the South of this Lion-hill, make it a Peninsula in some places so neere, that they carry their Boates by Land from one to the other. The Inhabitants are the Cumbæ, and the Natiues called Capi; these more ingenious then the other Guineans. They haue their Kings which administer Law, hauing to that purpose round Galleries not farre from their Palaces called Funkes, where is a high Throne for the King, and lower Seates on both sides for his Counsellors called Salategus.

Their Lawyers or Aduocates they call Troens, which wear parti-coloured garments, wouen with feathers, hold staves in their hands whereon they leane whiles they pleade, and haue Vizors to hide their a blushing if any such cause happen in the Kings presence, who hauing heard the pleading of these, and the aduice of the Counsellors pronounce the sentence. In the Creation of a Solarequis the rite obserued is this: they place the person to be created in a faire seat of wood, and then the King strikes his face with the inwards of a Goat, that the blood and flesh runnes downe his breast, then sprinkles him with meale, and after puts a Cap on his head. When the King dies, his Sonne, Brother or next Kinsman succeeds: but before his full Regalitie, they bind him at his house, and lead him bound to the Palace, there whip him; after this they loosen him, attire and leade him to the Iudgement Seat, where the eldest Counsellor makes an Oration concerning his right and dutie, which ended, he puts a Hateher into his hand which they vse in Executions, and after this all acknowledge subiection, No lesse strange is their custome for their Mayders.

b Lib. 7. c. 10.

In euery City or Village they haue a house, seuered like a Monastick Cloyster from the rest, in which all the Marriageable Virgins are kept and instructed a yeeres space by some old man of best estimation. This done, they are brought forth well apparelled with Musicke and Dances: there the youngmen make their choice and bargaine, with the Father, paying also the Old man for his yeeres schooling. Sorcerers are beheaded, and their bodies cast to the Beasts and Fowles: for other offences they are sold and made slaves. They wear gold Rings hanging at their Noses, weighing twenty or thirtie Crownes: these with their Eare-rings and Bracelets are buried with them. The Cumbz are not of the ancient Natives, but were barbarous and deuourers of mans flesh, continually warring on the former. These about the yeere one thousand five hundred and fifty wasted all the Countrey; and at last seate themselves here, driving the Capi from their habitations. If they tooke any chiefe men, they deuoured them, the meaner they sold for slaves to the Portugals, reseruing the younger for Souldiery. They would sell them more then Dogge-cheape, yea some of the Natives would sell themselves slaves to auoid this barbarous enemy. But now being here seled, they are growne more milde and gentle. Of these are detenced; as some thinke, the Giachi or Iagges, of which we shall speake else-where, called by this name in Congo, in Angola Gindz, in Abassia Gallz in Mombaza Zimbz or Imbiz, and here Cumbz, and Manes, by themselves Imbangole: a Nationlesse Nation, breeding without generation, and vncertaine of what monstrous humane-inhumane Deuillish Originall.

§. II.

Observations of those parts out of CADAMOZA; and other Ancient Navigators.

c Cadamoze.

NOW for further particulars of the Guinean Nation, we will begin with the Navigations of former times. The people inhabiting on the River Sanaga, Alusi & de Cadamozi, a Venetian, calls Azanaghi, and saith, that when first the Portugals sayled thither, they simpliciter, was such, hauing neuer before seene a ship that they tooke the ships for great Birds with white wings, out of some strange place comming thither: but when they saw them strike sayle, they changed their opinion, and thought them to be fishes, seeing them as farre off: but when they saw them the next day so farre off from their place, they tooke them for night-goblins or spirits.

This did he learne of diuers of the Azanaghi, slaves in Portugal. They hid their faces no lesse then the priuities, esteeming the mouth vnmeet to be seene, whence they belched such fowre breath. They had a kind of Muffler to hide it, and part of the nose onely discouering the same at meate. Other Governours they then had not, only more reuerence was done to the most rich, A beggerly, theuist, lying, trecherous Nation, as any in the World. They anoint their haire euery day with fat of hih for great gallantry, wherof they stinke exceedingly. And lest you should thinke better of their Eyes then of their Nose, then women esteeme it the greatest part of goodly feature, to haue large Breits, which by Arte and industrious stretching of them, they enlarge, and some of them haue them hanging to their Nauell.

Neere vnto these are certaine Negrs; which suffer not themselves to be seene of any, not to be heard speake: but haue excellent Gold which they exchange with other Negros, which bring vnto them Salt, such as the Minerall Sale of Tagazza, and leauing the same, they goe away from thence halfe a dayes iourney: the Negros come downe in certain Boates, and and lay at euery heape of Salt a quantity of Gold, and goe their wayes. When the Salt-Merchants returne at they like the summe, they take it; if not, they leaue the Gold still with the Salt, and goe their wayes: and then the other returne, and what heapes of Salt they find without Gold, they take for their own: the other, either they leaue more Gold for, or els leaue altogether. This seemeth hard to beleue, but many of the Arabians and Azanbazi testified it to our Author for truth. The Merchants of Meli affirmed to mee, that their Prince had once by a plot taken one of them, thinking to haue learned the condition of that people, but either of sillenness, or because hee could not, hee neither ate nor spake, and within three dayes dyed. Their stature, they which had taken him, affirmed to bee a hand higher then themselves: and that their nether lip was thicke and red, and so great that it hung downe to their brest, and it together with their Gummies bloudie: their teeth great, and on each side one very large: their eyes standing out: terrible they were to looke vpon. And because they had apprehended this man by their ambushment, they returned not in three yeeres: but after forced by the need of Salt to cure their dysfales (whence haply that deformitie proceeded) they renewed that Traffique.

To leaue these farre within Land, and come to the Riuer Senaga Cadamofo lustly marvellled at the partition which that Riuer caused: for on the one side the Inhabitants were well proportioned, very blacke, and the soyle very fertile: on the other side, the Inhabitants, meagre, small, swart, and the ground barren. The people, that dwell on the banks of Niger, are called Gilofi. The Kings name in my time (which was almost an hundred and three score yeeres since) was Zuebaki. He had thirtie Wiues. When Richard Rainaldi was there 1591, the Kings name was Amar Melik. All that Region betwixt Senaga, and Gambia is called by one general name, Gia Les: of which Maffew and Barriu write, That in an accident of ciuill warres Bemain came to the King of Portugall for aide, and was there royally entertayned and baptized with his followers: of which, some were of such admirable dexteritie and nimbleness of bodie, that they would leape vpon a Horse as hee galloped, and would stand vpright in the Saddle, when he ranne fastest, and rume themselves about, and suddenly sit downe and in the same race would take vp stones laid in order on the ground, and leape downe and vp at pleasure. This Bemain was shamefully murdered by Peter Vaz, the Portugall General, and the hope of Christianity in those parts disappointed. This was Anno 1489.

From thence Cadamofo went to Budomel: the Prince whereof was had in great respect by his people: which when they come into his presence, kneele on both their knees, and bowing their heads to the ground, cast sand ouer their shoulders, and on their heads, with both hands, and then to goe towards him on their knees; and when they speake to him, cast sand ouer their shoulders still, with their head bowed downe, the Prince scarcely deigning them a looke, or word. For euery light offence hee would sell their Wiues and Children. He suffered our Author to goe into his Moschee, where his Arabian Chaplaines, after their manner, mumbled their Mattens ten or twelue times in halfe an houre; all the company rising and falling againe to the Earth, and kissing it. He also heard him willingly confute the Mahumetan, and approoue the Christian Faith: but said, hee thought it was harder for a Christian to bee slued then a Negro, because God was a iust God and Lord, who had giuen vs to many good things in this World; to them nothing in comparison, who should therefore in the other World haue their Paradise, which here they wanted. Easily might he haue bene turned to Christianity, but for feare of losing his State. His Wiues prouide him his dyet, as it is vsuall among the Negros, and none but his Priests and some principall men eate with him; which is after a beaustly sort lying on the ground, the dish set in the middle, and all taking out the meate with their handis. They eate litle at once, but eate often, foure or fve times a day.

From Osbeber to Sune it raines not there. They haue great Serpents, and many, which they vse to charme: and the Prince when hee would poyson his Weapons, did (as was reported) make a great Circle, and enchanted by his Charms all the Serpents thereabouts thereto, and then killed that which seemed to him most venomous, letting the rest goe with the blood thereof, and the Seed of a certaine Tree, he tempered a poyson for that purpose, with which a Weapon infected, drawing neuer so litle blood, did kill in a quarter of an houre. They haue great store of Parrats, which are instructed by a maruellous naturall cunning to preuent the Serpents, which would els destroy their nests. They build there-cunning on high trees, and on the end of some tender bough thereof they fasten in such sort, that the hangs downe two spannes, thereunto weauing and working their nest in such sort, that the Serpents for feare of falling, dare not aduenture to deale therewith. The Negros came about Cadamofo, with wonder to see his apparell, and the whitenesse of his colour (never before had they seene any Christian) and some of them with spittle rubbed his skinn, to see whether ther his whitenesse were naturall, or no: which percelling it to bee no tincture, they were out of measure astonish'd. They would then give nine, or sometimes fourteen slaves, for a Horse turnish'd. And when they buy a Horse, they will bring some of their Enchanters, which make a fire of herbes, and set the Horse over the smoke, vetering certaine words; and after that anoint him with a thin oynment, and shut him vp twenty dayes, that none may see him, hanging certaine tumprey about his necke, thinking that hereby they are more secure in battle. Gunnes seemed to them, for their hideous noyse, to be of the Deuill. Bag-pipes they thought to be a huing creature, that thus sang in variable accents. But when they were suffer'd to handle them, they thought them to be some heavenly thing, that God had made with his owne hands, to sound so sweetly. They beheld the Shippe with great curiositie; and eyes that were carued in the Prow of the Shippe, they took to be cyrandered, by which it saw how to direct the course at Sea. They said, the Christians that could thus make Voyages by Sea, were great Enchanters, and comparable to the Deuill, themselves had enough to doe to trauell by Land. Seeing a Candile burne in the night, they which knew not to make any light but their fires, esteemed it wonderfull. Honey they haue, which they sucke out of the Combes, but the Waxe they hauled away, till they were instructed how to make Candles thereof.

Senega (Botem saith) comes from the Lakes Chelonidi. Sauntus affirmeth that Senega is the same which Ptolemy calls Darahidus, Gambea or Gambra, that which hee calls Stachur, and Rio Grande is Niger.

Cadamo doubled the Promontorie, called Cape Verde, or the greene Cape, because of the greene trees which the Portugals (which had first discovered it in the yeere before) found there growing in abundance; as Cape Blanco, or the White Cape, was so called of the White Sands there. The Inhabitants they found were of two sorts, Eurbaicini, and Sereri. They haue no Prince. They are great Idolaters, and haue no Law: but are very cruell. They payson their Arrowes, with which, and the situation of their Country, they haue preferred themselves from the Kings of Senega.

In Gambra they were, some Idolaters of diuers sorts, some Mahumecans. They were also great Enchanters. Their hoing as at Senega, false that they eate Dogges flesh. Here the Prince hunted an Elephant, and gaue them to eate: the flesh is strong and viandous. The Elephants delight in mire like Swine. They hunt them in the Woodes: for in the Plaines an Elephant would, without running, soone take and kill the swiftest man (whom yet they hurt not, except they be first prouoked) if with coming and often turning, hee bee not disappointed.

Here was a kind of fish Cadamo calleth it Cavallo, and his Latine Interpreter, Piscis Caballinus; I take it for the Hippopotamus, or River-horse, which is (sayth he) as bigge as a Cow; his legges short, with tuskes like to a Bores, but so great, that I haue seene one of two spannes, and longer, clouen-footed, and headed like a Horse: hee liueth on both Elements, sometimes in the Water, other-whiles on the Land. The women vpon their breasts, neckes, and armes, had certaine workes, done with a Needles point, heated in the fire, in manner as with vs they worke hand-kerchiefs. This being done in their youth, would neuer out. The like flesh-branded workes they vse at Cape Sagres, as Pietro de Sintra, a Portugall, obserued vpon their bodies and faces. The Inhabitants there are Idolaters, and worship Images of Wood, to whom they offer some of their Meate and Drinke, when they goe to their meales. The goe naked, couering their priue parts with the barkes of trees. This is in Guinea.

A little from thence they found men who vsed as great brauery in their eares, which they bored full of holes, and wore therein Rings of Golde in rowes or ranks. They wore one great Ring in another hole bored thorow their Nose, like to Buffes in Italy: which when they eate their meate, they tooke away. The men and women of sort wore such Rings also in their lips, in like sort as in their eares, an Ensigne of their Nobility and greatness, which they put in and out at pleasure. Beyond the Riuer of Palmes they found others thus beringed, and for greater gallantry wore about their neckes certaine Chaynes of teeth, seeming to bee the teeth of men. They tooke a Negro, whom they carried into Portugall, who affirmed, if a woman which onely could vnderstand him, did interpret him rightly, that in his Country were Vncomers.

Other Observations of later times by Englishmen

And these Countreys have since beene sought to by French, Flemish, and many of our English Merchants. In the yeere 1553. ^x Thomas Windham, and Anthony Pymdeado, a Portugall, in two English ships traded alongh those Coasts, as farre as Benin, where they presented themselves to the King, who sat in a great Hall, the walls whereof were made of Earth without windowes, the roofe of thinnne boards, open in diuers places. His Nobles about him neuer looke him in the face, but sit cowering vpon their buttockes, with their elbows vpon their knees, and their hands before their faces, not looking vp till the King command them. And when they depart out of his presence, they turne not their backs vpon him. Such reuerend regard doth that Negro King receiue of them.

The next yeere ^x Master Iohn Lock went for Captaine into those parts, to trade for Gold, Graines, and Elephants teeth. And after that, diuers Voyages were thither made by William Towerse, who obserued at the River of Saint Vincent, strange trees, with great leaues like great Dockes, longer then that a man could reach the top of them; and a kind of Peale by the Sea-side growing on the Sands like trees, with stalkes leuen and twentie paces long. Diuers of the women had brefts exceeding long. At the Cape Tres puntas they made him twear, by the water of the Sea, that hee would not hurt them, before they would trade with him. King Abaan a Negro entertained our men kindly; hee caused to bee brought a pot of Wine of Palme, Palme, or Coco, which they draw forth of trees, as we have elsewhere observed; and their Ceremonies in drinking are thus: First, they bring forth their pots of drinke, and then make a hole in the ground, and put some of the drinke into it, and after that cast in the Earth a gaine, and thereon set their pot, and with a little thing made of a Gourd, take out of the same drinke, and put it vpon the ground in three places: and in diuers places they haue certaine bunches of the pills of Palme-trees set in the ground before them, and there they purin some drinke, doing great reuerence in all places to the same Palme-trees. All these Ceremonies done, the King tooke a cup of Gold, in which they put Wine; and whiles hee dranke, all the people cryed Abaan, Abaan, with certaine other words; and then they gaue drinke to euery one. The like Ceremonies they vse in all the Countrey.

In Benin the people goe naked till they be married, and then are clothed from the waste to the knees. Their bread is a kind of Rootes, called Inamia, which when it is well sodden, may be preferred before ours. They haue here great spouts of water falling out of the Aire, which if they light on a ship, doe endanger the same. They fall like the pillars of Churches, As for those Voyages to thole parts, made by Rutter, Fenner, Ingram, or others, I referre them to Master Hackluyts Collections. One writeth, that the King of Benin hath sixe hundred Wives: with all which twice a yeere he goeth in pompe, the Gentlemen haue, some of them, fourescore; some fourescore and ten: the meanest, ten or twelue. At Cape de Lopo Gonsalues, some pray to the Sunne, others to the Moone, or to certaine trees, or to the Earth; esteeming it a great sinne to spit vpon it, from whence they receive their food, Men and women sinke their bodies, putting thereon grease mixed with colour. They will not drinke before they put out some, and drinke not when they eate. They offer their wives to strangers. The King keepeth his Daughters, when they are growne, for Wives; and the Queenes, with like incestuous abomination, vse their Sonnes. They paint their bodies red: vñ Bananas dried in stead of bread, and lay all their meates in a dish together.

About the Castle of Mina they are subiect to such Wormes, as Master Jenkinson hath observed to grow vpon men at Boghar in Baetria, by drinking the water of the Riuer there; which are an Ell long, and must be pulled out by degrees, every day a little, if they breake by the way it is very dangerous. The torture they cause is vnspokeable: they breed in the armes and legges, yea, sometimes in the yard and eod: one man hath had ten of them at one time.

These wormes come out of their legs, or some sicke part.

The Inhabitants of Benin observe Circumcision, and some other Superstitions, which may seeme Mahumetan, but are more likely to bee ancient Ethniack Rites. For many Countreies of Africa admit Circumcision, and yet know not, or acknowledge not Mahumetisme, but are either Christians (as the Cophi Abassines) or Gentiles: they cut or rase the skinned with three lines drawne to their Nauell, esteeming it necessary to saluation. They will not easily doe injury to any, especially a stranger. They haue Birds in such respect, that it is deadly to any that shall hurt them. And some are appointed to haue a peculiar care of them, and to provide them food; which they doe in high Mountaynes, where they lay meate for them: which they come and eate.

Arthus writes, That the Inhabitants of Guinea give Religious respect vnto certaine trees. And in the yeere, one thousand five hundred ninetie eight, certaine Hollanders cutting them, and not ceasing at the perswasion of Negro's, whole Superstitions in that case they derided: passed from words to blowes betwixt them, & the Dutchmen were forced to get them to their ships: one of their company being slaine in the chase. But the Murderer was offered to the Hollanders to be punished; which they refusing, his Countymen cut off his head, and quartered his bodie; bestowing the one as a monument of reuenge, ouer the flaine parties graue, the other on the Fowles, vmburied. Their trees are alway greene: some haue leaues twice a yeere. They seldom see the Sunne, either rising or going downe, by the space of halfe of an houre. Their Winter beginneth in April, which yet is their time of Haruest. Mays was brought thither out of America. In April, May, and Iune, they haue much raine, and the same very dangerous to the bodie, and rotting the clothes, if it bee not presently dried. It is often as warme as if it were sodden. They haue some Snakes thirty foot long, as much as sixe men can carrie: they haue also a beast like a Crocodile, called Lanhadi (we haue spoken of the like about Pegu and Bengala) which neuer goeth into the water: Spiders as bigge as the Palme of ones hand, which doe not spinne; store of Cameloons; Dogges woolly, with sharpe snouts, of diuers colours, which cannot barke, driuen to the Market as sleepe, tied one to another; blue Parrets; many sorts of Apes; blacke Flies which seeme to burne: In Senega some Snakes haue mouthes so wide, that they swallow a whole sheepe without tearing; they haue winged Dragons, with tayles, and long mouthes with many teeth, being blue and greene, which some Negroes worship. They bore a hole in the Palme-tree tree whence issueth a white iuyce, first sweete, and after by standing it becomes fowre.

and after by standing it becomes sowre. It is somewhat like the Coco-tree. The Palmita is without branches, the fruit grows on the top, which within is like Pomegranates, full of graines, without of a golden colour. They buy Gentilitie with gifts, a Dog, a Sheepe, a Cow but seeme to live long. In their Winter they have much sicknesse and mortalitie. The goods of the deceased descend not to his Children, but to the Brethren, if he have any : otherwise, to his Father. If it bee a Woman, her Husband deliverech her marriage goods to her brethren. When the King dies, the Sepulchre is made like a house, and as well furnished as if they were alive, being guarded night and day by armed men, robbing him any thing which he shall need.

Their Noses are flat, not naturally, but by pressing them downe in their Infancie, effecting it a great part of beautie. Their hot stomackes can digest raw flesh ; and therefore * Alexander Aphrodisiens, and Caelius Rhodiginus, that thinke their naturall heate, extracted to the outward parts, to be the cause of their blacknesse, are deceived. They eate the enemies which are slaine in the warres (which are very rife amongst those Nations) and those which are taken, are everlasting prisoners. And in some more important warres which they undertake, they will burne their dwellings before they goe, lest either the enemy might possesse them by conquest, or themselves become too mindfull of a returne. In these warres they provide themselves of some good light Armour, wearing at such times no other apparell. Their Women are unfaithfull Secretaries in Natures most hidden secrets, vsing in the sight of men; women, boyes, and giles, to be delivred of their Children, whom after they circumcise, whether they be of the male or female sexe.

of the Marriages, Manners, Religion, Funerals, Government, and other Rites of the Guineans, collected out of a late Dutch Author.

And if we may leave to follow a Dutch guide, well acquainted in these parts, whereof he hath written a very large Treatise, you may teast with them at their spouals, and againe, after a view of their lives, at their Funerals. At the marriages of their Daughters they give halfe an ounce of Gold, to buy Wine for the Bride; the King himselfe giuech no other portion. The Bride in the presence of her friends sweareth to be true to her Husband, which the man doth not. For Adulterie he may divorce her; and the Adulterer payeth to the King foure and twenty Pesos of gold, and the husband also may drive him out of Towne : but the Dutchmen payd no fine therefore, the Women only were blamed, and payd foure Pesos. If the husband suspects his wife, hee makes tryall of her honesty, by causing her to eate salt with diuers Fetisso ceremonies hereafter mentioned, the feare whereof makes her confesse. They have many Wiues, if they can buy and keepe them : each dwelleth in a house by her selfe, though there be ten of them : they eat and lodge asunder; sometimes they will bring their cheere together. The Husband closely takes which he will have lye with him to his room, where their bed is a Mat. The Women after travell wash themselves, and accompany not with their husbands for three moneths after. The Child newly borne bath a cleane cloth wrapped about the middle, and is layd downe on a mat. The Mothers vsa to beare their Children at their backs, and so travell with them, none proving lame, notwithstanding that shaking of their bodies : they gae them the best out of their shoulders. When it is a moneth old, they hang a net about the body, like a shirt, made of the barked of a Tree, hanged full of Fetissos, to secure it from the Devil, who otherwise would (they thinke) carry it away. They hang the laire full of shels; and Corals about the necke, armes, and legges, applying diuers Fetissos or wretches, with superstitious fancies, that one is good against Vomiting, a second for Falling, a third for Bleeding, a fourth to make it Sleep, a fifth against wilde Beasts, and so on in the rest, giuing to each Fetisso a severall name. They quickly learne them to eate, and then leave them about the house like dogs : they soone learne to goe, to speake, to swim. When they are fift borne, they are not blacke, but reddish as the Brasilans. Each woman brings vp her owne : they teach them no civilitie, and beat them sometimes cruelly with staves. When they are eight, or ten, or twelve yeeres old, they learne them to spinne Bark-threads and make nets : after that, they goe with their Fathers to fish. At eightene yeeres old they begin to set vp for themselves, two or three of them together hiring a house and Canoe : and then they cover their privities, grow amorous, and their Fathers looke out wiues for them. They have little haire on their face at thirty : they wear nayles as long as the joynt of a mans finger, as a token of Gentilitie : which is also observed by Merchants: they keepe them very cleane, and as white as Iuorie. They are great in flesh beyond Men of these parts. At three score and ten, or foure score, their blacknesse decays, and they grow yellow. They haue small bellies, long legges, broad feet, long toes, sharpe sight, quick wit, Eltridge mawes; are spitefull, curiously neat, Drunkards, Theeues, Lecherous, and sub:ct to the Poxes, whereof they are not ashamed, as neither of shewing their nakednesse. Yet it is holden shame with them to let a fart, which they wondered at in the Hollanders, esteeming it a contempt.

in Guinea.

Their orna-

The Women goe long naked, are libidinous, and would boast of their fishinesse, if they could haue their pleasure with the Dutch, decking themselves of purpose. They wear beades about their neckes, and straw Fetissos about their feet. (The Mulato women in Mina cut their haire short for brauerie.) They cut three gashes on their fore-head an inch long, and likewise on their cheekes neere their eares, which they suffer to swell and colour it with painting. They make also white strakes vnder their eyes. They curl and fold the haire of their head, making a hill in the midst like a hat, with frizzles round about. They use long combs with two teeth onely, each a finger length: these they use also for salutation, plucking them out and in, as heere, men put off or on their hats: they make also white spots on their faces, which as farre off shew like pearles. They rafe their armes and breasts with diuers cuts, on which euery morning they lay colours, which cause them to shew like blacke silke doublets cut and pinked. They haue earrings and bracelets of Copper: the unmarried Maides wear thirty or forty on each arme of Iron: the common Queenes wear copper rings with beles on their legs.

These women are strong, nimble, well proportioned, good house-wiues, home-keepers and cooks: not very fruitfull. The riches of the Guineans are store of Wiues and Children. They take great pride of white teeth, which therefore they rub with a certaine wood: they shew like Iuorie. Their garment is a sadome or more of Linnen cloth, which they wear about their bodies, from beneath the breasts to the knees: vpon which they girt a piece of blue or yellow cloth, whereon hang their knives and keyes, and diuers wispes of straw, or Fetissos. When they goe to Market, they wash them from top to toe, and put on other clothes. They buy no more but for that day, or meale.

The R-hijo. and the Gui-
nians

They stamp their Millia as wee doe spice, fanne it in a woddin dish, sleepe it ouer-night with a little Maia, and in the morning lay it on a stone, and (as Painters their colour) grinde it with another stone, till it be dowe, which they temper with fresh water and salt, and make rolls thereof twice as bigge as a mans fist, and bake it a little on the hearth. This is their bread. Their dyet is strange: as raw flesh, handfils of graine, large draughts of Aqua-vite, Dogs, Cats, Buffles, Elephants, though stinking like carrion, and a thousand magots creeping in them. There are little birds like Bulfinches, which make their nests on small ends of twigs for feare of Snakes: these they eat aliue with their feathers. The Moores say that within land they eat dried snakes: and these will eat dogs guts raw, which our Author hath seene: and a Boy left in pawne on shipbord for debt, which had meat enough, yet would secretly kill the Hens, that he might eat their raw guts. They will eat old stinking fish dried in the Sun: yet can they be daintie if they may haue it. Some make a kind of Ale of Mays and water foddren together, called Poitau. Sometime foure or fise together will buy a pot of Palme-wine, which they powre into a great Caba, which groweth on trees, and some of them are halfe as big as a kilderkin, round about which they sit to drinke, each sending a litle pot-full to his best wife. When they first drinke, they take it out with a small Caba, & laying their hands on the head of him which first drinketh, one aloud Tantiss, Tantiss: he drinkest not all off, but leaues a litle to throw on the ground to the Fetisso, saying Iou, spouting out some on their Fetissos on their armes, and legs, otherwise thinking they could not drinke in quiet. They are great Drinkers, and feed as vnmanerly as Swine, sitting on the ground and cramming, not staying till the morsell in the mouth be swallowed, but tearing their meat in pieces, with the three mid-fingers casting it into their mouths ready gaping to receiue it. They are alway hungry and would eat all day long: yea the Dutchmen had great stomacks whiles they were there. He that gets most, must be most liberal, industrious to get, and as prodigall in spending vpon their liquor.

Before the Portugals trade they had no Merchandise, but were naked: and the people within Land were afraid of them, because they were white and appalled. They come to trade in the ships in the morning: for about noone the wind (before blowing from land) comes from Sea, and they are not able to endure the roughnesse thereof. They beleue, that Men, when they die, goe into another World, where they shall haue like need of many things, as heere they haue, and therefore use to put with the dead Corpes some parts of household. And if they lose any thing, they thinke that some of their friends, which in the other world had need thereof, came thence and stole it. Of God being asked, they said he was blacke and euill, and did them much harme; their good, they had by their owne labour, and not by his goodnesse.

goodness. Circumcision they vse, and some other Turkish Rites. They hold it vnaet and irreligious to spit on the ground. They haue no Letters, nor Bookes. They obserue a Sabbath, herein agreeing, and yet disagreeing, with Turke, Iew, and Christian, for they obserue Tuesdayes Rest, from their Fishing and Husbandrie. The Wine (of the Palme-tree) which is that day gathered; may not be sold, but is offered to the King, who bestoweth it on his Courtiers to drinke at night. In the midst of the Market-place they had a Table standing on foure Pillars, twolines high, whose flat couer was made of Straw and Reedes wouen together. Heere were set many strawne Rings, called Fetisso, or Gods, and therein Wheat, with Water and Oyle, for their God, which they thinke eates the same. Their Priest they call Fetissero, who euery Festival day layeth a Seat on that Table, and sitting thereon, Preacheth to the people, the contents wherof I could neuer learne: which done, the Women offer him their Infants, and hee sprinkleth them with water, in which a Newt or Snake doth swim, and then besprinkleth the Table aforesaid with the same water, and so vttering certaine wordes very loude, and stroking the Children with certaine colour, as giuing them his blessing: hee drinke of that water, the people clapping their hands and crying Iou, Iou, and so hee dismisseth his deuout assembly.

Many weare such Rings of Straw next their bodies, as preseruatiues from those dangers, which else their angry God might inflict on them. In honour of the same Deitie (or Deitill, as it seemes they conceiue him to be) they bechalke themselves with a kind of chalkey Earth, and this is vnto them in stead of their Morning Mattens. The first bitte at meales; and first draught, is consecrate to their Idoll, and therefore they besprinkle therewith those Rings, which I said they weare on their bodies. If Fishers cannot speed at Sea, they giue a piece of Gold to the Fetissero, to reconcile their frowning Saint. He therefore, with his Wiues, walke a kind of Procession thotow the Citie, smiting his breast, and clapping his hands with a mighty noise, till hee come at the shore: and there they cut downe certaine boughes from the Trees, and hang them on their neckes, and play on a Tymbrill.

Then doth the Fetissero turne to his Wiues, and exhortates with them, and withall hurleth into the Sea Wheat and other things as an offering to Fetisso, to appease his displeasure towards the Fishermen. When the King will sacrifice to Fetisso, hee commands the Fetissero to enquire of a Tree, whereto he ascenbeth Diuinitie, what he will demand. Hee with his Wiues, come to the Tree, and in a heape of alhes, there prouided, prickes in a branch, plucked off the Tree, and drinking water out of a Bason, spouts it out on the branch, and then daubeth his face with the alhes: which done, he declareth the Kings question, and the Diuelli out of the Tree makes answer. The Nobles also adore certaine Trees, and esteeme them Oracles: and the Diuelli sometimes appeareth vnto them in the same in forme of a blacke Dog, and otherwhiles answereth without any visible apparition. There are which worship a certaine Bird, which is spotted and painted (as it were) with Stars, and resembleth the lowing of a Bull in her voyce. To heare this Bird lowing in their journey, is to them a luckie boding, saying, Fetisso makes them good promises, and therefore let him, in that place where they heare it, a Vessell of Water and Wheat. And as the Earth and Ayre yeeld them Deities, so the Sea is not behinde in his liberalitie, but yeelds certaine Fishes to their Canonization. In this respect they take not the Tunie at all, and the Sword-fish they take, but eate not till his sword be cut off, which is dried, and holden in great veneration. The Mountaines would bend their fullen browes, if they should not haue some redde letters in their Kalendar, to which they toppes aspire, threatening to scale Heauen, or ouerwhelme the Earth, if the Fetissan portion did not pacifie their angry moode, by daily presents of meate and drinke set thereon. Neither can Nature alone vniuersp this Pranilege, but Art, in other things her emulous coruall, and faire vnequall competitor, in this matter of God-making, commonly gets the vpper hand. And therefore they with their Funerals they obserue it: for when one is dead, they make a new Fetisso, or Ring of Straw, and pray it to heare the dead partie companie, and protect him in his journey into the other World. They lay the dead body on a Matte on the ground; wind it in a Wollen cloath, set a stoole vnder the head, which is couered with a Goateskinne, the body is strawed ouer with alhes, his armes layd by his sides, his eyestopen: and so continueth halfe a day, his best-beloued wife sitting by (as the Husband doth also at the death of his wife) crying Away, and wiping her face with a wispe of straw. Women goe round about the house singing and beating on Basons, and about the corpse likewise, and then againe about the house. The eldest Morimi or Gentlemen, goe about from house to house with a Bason, wherein each puts the value of twelue-pence in Gold, with which they buy a Cow, with whose blood the Fetissero appeaseth the Fetisso. The friends and kinsfolke assembling, prepare a Henne, and then setting themselves in a corner of the dead mans house, they place all his *Fetisso*s on a row, the greatest in the middlest, adorning the same with

Tuesday Sabbath: they call it Die Fetisso.

Garlands of Pease and Beans, like to the Popish praying-Beads. Then they sprinkle the same with the blood of the Henne, and hang a chaine or Garland of herbes about their neckes. After this, the women set the Hen, new hatched, in the middle of the Fetisso's, and the Fetisso takes water in his mouth, which amidst his Exorcismes and Charms he spouts on those Fetisso's, and taking two or three herbes from his necke, he rols the same in forme of a ball, which after certaine ceremonies he layeth downe, and so doth, till all his Herb-garland bee spent; and then makes them all into one great ball, and therewith besmeareth his face, and thus is it made a Fetisso; and the partie deceased is now at rest. In the meane time the deamst of his Wives filleth all the house with mourning, the neighbours and friends, with Songs and Musickes (such as they haue) and Dances. And at last they take vp the Corps, and carrie it to the Grate, which is foure foot deepe, and cover it with stakes, that nothing may fall therein. The Women creeping about the Sepulchre expostulate with him, Why hee would leave them? Then doe they hurle on earth, so that none can get in to the Corps; for hee hath with him his Houhold, Armour, and whatsoever he vied in his life time; Wine also (if before hee loved it) to drinke in the other World. Lastly, they cover the Sepulchre with a Rooft, to defend all from Raine. If the King dies, not only greater solemnities is vied: but the Nobles (thinking it necessarie for so great a Personage to haue attendants) offer vnto him, one a Sonnet; another a Wife; a third, his Sonne or Daughter, till there be many of both Sexes in that other life to attend him. All which are suddenly slaine at vnawares, and their bloudie carcases buried together with the King. Yea, the Kings wives who holden him best, refuse not this last and euelllasting service, as they suppose; but yeld chemselues to die; that they may liue with him. The heads of all these, thus slaine, are set vpon poles round about the Sepulchre: Meate, Drinke, Rayment, Armes, and other Vtennells are added for their vse, and buried with them. After the buriall they goe to the Stat, or Ruler, and there obserue other Rites: some washing, while others play on Basons and Instrumets. The Widow or Widower is layd backward on the water with diuers wordes of complaint. At last they cloath chem, returne to the dead-mans house, make great cheere, and drinke themselues drunke.

They, in victricacies of criminal accusations, as of Adulteries, Murders, and such like, haue a certaine water offered them to drinke by the Fetisso, made of those Herbes whereof their Bal-Fetisso is made, and in effect like the coldest water. Nam, those daring to drinke, for feare of sudden death thereby, if hee be guilty. They dare not come out of their houses in Triumpe. For then, they say, many of them are carried away by the Demill and throwne dead on the ground. When they pray for Raine, they wash themselves, and cast Water over their heads with diuers words, and spitting in the water.

Their Kings are Elctius, and must be liberal, or else are expelled. Once a yeere he makes a great feast for the common people, buying to that end all the Palmes wine, and many Kine, the heads of which are painted and hanged in the Kings chamber, in testimonie of his bounty. Hee inviteth also his neighbour-Kings, Captaines and Gentlemen, and then prayeth and sacrificeth to his Fetisso, which is the highest Tree in the Towne. The men with Feecill, Drumming, Singing, Leaping; the Women with Dances, honour this feast. Every King holdeth his feast apart, one soone after another, in the Summer-time. The King cometh liell abroad. In the Morning and Euening, his Slaves blow or sound certaine Trumpets made of Elephants teeth: his Wives doe then wash and anoynt his body. He hath also his Guard. Hee sits (in state) on a stolle, holding in his hands the tayle of a Horse or Elefant to driue away Flies: gallantly adorned with Rings of Gold on his Armes and legges and necke, with corall Beads also, wherewith likewise he maketh diuers knots on his beard. His Children (if they will haue any thing) when they are of age must get it: the common people would not like that he should maintaine them idle. Onely be belovewd on them their marriage-gift, and a Slave. They chuse by most voyces a successor in another kindred, who inheriteth the treasure of the dead King, and not his owne Children.

Counterfeits are tried by the Fetisseri Pot, as is said: if it be for Murther, hee may receive his life with honesty, one moiety to the King, the other to the Courtiers: if he cannot, the Executioner binds his hands behind him, covers his face, leads him to a place alone; and causing him to kneele downe, thrusts him through, and then (for before they thinke him not dead) cuts off his head, and quarteering the body, sautes it to the Fowles and Beasts. His head is boyled by his friends, and the broath eaten, whan then they hang it by the Fetisso. They make solemnne oathes and promises on this manner: they wipe their faces, shoulder, breasts, and all their bodies, on the soles of yood feet, thrice saying, San dan san, stamping, kissing the Fetisso on their armes and leggs. The land is all the Kings, and therefore they fight till his land, and then by composition for chemselues. They begin on a Tuesday, and when the Kings worke is done, haue a feast in honour of their Fetisso to prosper their Husbandrie.

Observations of the Coast and In-land Countries, out of BARBERIUS
Blacknesse.

- 10 AND 1604. certaine Iesuites were sent into these partes, the chiefe of which was Balthasar Barrerius, who conuerted some of those Negro's to the Romish Christian profession. One of which was the King at Sierra Lione, Christened with the name Philip, his Father a man of an hundred and thirtie yeeres, about the same time finishing his life. A Letter of this Philip vnto King Philip of Spaine, is published by Iarris, in which hee desireth more Priests to bee sent into thoir partes, offers him to build a Castle at the Cape, and concludeth with wishing him as many yeeres as the Heauen hath Starres, and the Sea Sands. The King of Bena gaue great hopes of his Conuersion, which were suddenly dashed, by meanes of a certaine Mahumetan (for so farre hath that Pestilence infected) who making a flattering Oration of two houres long, inclined the King to his faithlesse Faith. This Kings Dominion extendeth nine dayes journey, and containeth seuen of their pettie Kingdomes. Wee haue before spoketh of the Mandinga, neere to Gambea.
- 20 These haue of late yeeres embraced Mahomet, and by Armes and Merchandize (the vsuall meanes) sought to propagate it to others, being excellent Horse-men, and courageous, vsuall placed in the fore-front. Their Priests are called Bexerins, which write Arabick Amuletts to secure such as weare them in battell. These Preach to the people, and drawing forth parchment rolls, spread them with great deuotion on the Pulpit, and standing a while with eyes fixed to Heauen, as it were in Diuine conferences, presently will them to thanke God, and his Prophet for the pardon of all their finnes: then reades hee his Scrolls, the people tending two houres together without once stirring their bodies, or turning away their eyes. One of them is chiefe ouer the rest, who hath taught the King of Bena a certaine Incantment or Witchcraft, to make the Deuill the Instrument of his Reuenge vpon any offender; which makes him dreadfull to all: Two of the Portugals confesseing the experiment thereof vpon themselves: The like appeared in a huge Serpent, which they call the King of Serpents, of most beautifull colours, as bigge as a mans thigh, which the King played withall without any harme. The Iesuite speakes of one Man which had threescor and twelue Sonnes; and fiftie Daughters, which multiplied beyond credit. All the kindred mourne at the death of the great Men, assembe to the corpes, and offer, of which offerings one third is the Kings, the second the nearest kinsmans which is charged with the Funerall, the third is put into the Graue, together withall that Gold which they haue treasured for this purpose through their whole life, hiding it closely from the knowledge of all; so that if they die suddenly, their Gold is perished with them. Yea their Sepulchres (the Iesuites report) are kept secret; and made in the channels of Riues, diuerting the streame, till it bee made, to preferre
- 40 these treasures to the vse of the dead. At the yeeres end they renew the memorie of the deceased with mourning and festiuall solemnities, the more drunkenness, the greater honour. They haue Idols of wood and straw, and their Chinas before mentioned, made of Poles in forme of a Pyramis, within which are many white Palmires that come not forth, and it is vn-certaine what they eate. Before these they will adiuire their Seruants to fidelitie, wishing that Serpents, Lizards, or Tygres may teare them if they runne away, which they feare with religious awe, and dare not flee vpon any hard visage. Euery Kingdome hath a place sacred to religious awe, and dare not flee vpon any hard visage. The King once a yere sacrificed Goates and Hens, which were there kept, there being no feare of stealing them, where none durst aduenture to set foot on land.
- 50 And now leauing the Coasts of Guinea; Benin, Melegere, and the other Regions of the Negros adioyning to the Sea; we will looke backe againe into the In-land Countries: where of Gualata is an hundred miles distant from the Ocean, and hath already beene mentioned. The next thereto, in Leo Relations, is Gheneoa, which is not the same with Guinea, and before mentioned, if Leo had true intelligence, but is situate betwixt Gualata, Tombuto, and Meili, and in one place bordereth on the Ocean, where Niger falleth into the Sea. They had great Traffique with the Merchants of Barbarie. They haue Gold vncoyned, and vse also In-great Townes. There is neither Towne nor Cattle, but one, where the Prince, with Priests, Doctors, and Mechaunt reside. Those Priests and Doctors goe apparelled in white, the rest in blacke or blue Cotton. In July, August, and September, Niger ouerfloweth it. Tachia, the King of Tombuto, conquered it, and kept the King prisoner at Gago, till his death, Meili is the head Citie of a Kingdome, which hence taketh name, and hath in it great store of Temples, Priests and Readers or Professours, which reside in the Temples, because they have no Colledges. They are more ingenious then other Negroes, and were the first that embraced the Mahometan Law. Iscbia also subdued them.

Salt deare,

Tombuto was founded in the yeere of the Hegira 610. And it is situate within twelve miles of a branch of Niger. There are many Wells to receive the overflowing waters of that River. Salt is brought them five hundred miles from Tagazza, and is very deare. 1. at my being there (saith Leo) saw a Camels burthen fold for foure score Duckes. The King had many Plates and Scepters of Gold, some whereof weighed thirteene hundred pounds. They which speake to him, cast Sand ouer their heads, as Cadamosto obserued at Budomel. The King would admit no lewes into his Citie, and hateth them so extremely, that hee would confiscate the goods of such Merchants, as held Traffique with them. Hee greatly honoured men of Learning, and no Merchandize yeilded more gaine then Bookes. There were many Iudges, Doctors, and Priests, to whom hee allowed their stipends. The people vsed much Dauncing in the streets, from tenn to one of clocke at night. They mingle Filth, Milke, Butter, and Fleish together in their Gallimaufrey kinde of dyet, neither toothome nor holsome. Hamet, King of Morocco ^b, conquered the same Kingdom 1589. and also Gago, and other Countries of the Negroes, extending his Empire fixe moneths journey from Morocco, by Camels: whose riches thereby acquired, appeare in the Letters of Lawrence c Mado; and we before haue touched.

Gago is much frequented by Merchants, and things are sold at excessive rates. In an hundred miles space you shall scarce find one in those parts that can reade, or write: and the King accordingly oppresteth them with taxations.

In Guber they low their Corne on the waters, which Niger, with his overflowings brings vpon the Countrey, and haue abundant recompence. Iscbia, King of Tombuto ^d conquered the King of Guber; of Agadez also, and of Cano, which haue great store of Merchants: Likewise of Calena, and Zegzeg, and Zanfara; in which I finde little worth the remembrance. Cano hath some Reliques of Christianitie, and they are named by the Apostles names, Guagara was not onely oppressed by the said Iscbia of Tombuto, but by Abraham King of Borno.

Borno consisteth with Guagara on the West, and extendeth Eastwards five hundred miles. The people haue no Religion, neither Christian, Iewish, nor Mahometane; but like Beasts liue with their Wines and Children in common: and as a Merchant which liued long amongst them, and learned their Language, told Leo, they haue no proper names, as in other Nations, but as they giue him some name of distinction by his height, fatnesse, or other peculiar accidents. The King warreth with his neighbours: hee is defended of the Libyan people Bardoa. For maintenance of his Warres he will giue great prices for Horses, exchanging fifteene or twentie Slaues for one, which Slaues he tooke from his enemies. When I was in this Kingdom, I found there many Merchants that were wearie of this Traffique, because they staid for their Slaues till the King returned from his Warres. Yet the King seemes to bee rich: all his Horse-furniture, Stirrups, Spurs, Bridles, Bits, were all of Gold; and his Dishes, Platters, or whatsoever he did eate or drinke in: yea, his Chaires for his Dogges were for the most part of most fine Gold. He hath many both white and blacke people, subject to him.

Gaoga bordereth Westward on Borno, and thence trendeth to Nubia, betweene the Deserts of Seta on the North, and another Desert confining on a winding crooke of Nilus, about five hundred miles square. It hath neither Ciuillitie Letters, nor Government. The Inhabitants haue no vnderstanding, especially they which dwell in the Mountaines, who goe naked in the Summer-time, their priuities excepted. Their houses are made of boughes, which easily take fire. They haue store of Cattell. A hundred yeeres before Leo's time they were brought in subjection by a Negro slaue, who first slew his Master, and by helpe of his goods made preyes in the next Regions, exchanging his Captiues for Horses of Egypt: and so became King of Gaoga. His Nephewes Sonne Homar then reigned, and was much respected by the Soldan of Cairo. Leo was at his Court, and found him a man passing liberall. He much honoured all that were of the lineage of Mahomet.

The Nubie in olde times were many Kingdomes; as ^e Serabo affirmeth, not subject to the Ethiopians; and were then Nomades, or Wanderers, and Robbers. As it is now taken (John Leo being our Author) Nubia stretcheth from Gioga vnto Nilus, having the Egyptian Confines on the North; and the Deserts of Goran on the South. They cannot aske out of this Kingdom into Egypt. For the River Nilus, whiles it is couetous of largenesse, loseth his deepnesse, and couering certaine Plaines, becometh so shallow, that both men and beasts may wade ouer. Dangala is their chiefe Towne, and hath ten thousand Families, built on stilts, their houses being Chalk and Straw. The Inhabitants with their traffique to Cairo become rich.

There is in this Kingdome great store of Corne and Sugar, Cuite, San Jall, and Iuorie. They have strong poyson, one graiue whereof giuen to ten persons, will kill them all in a quarter of an houre; and one man, if he alone take it, presently. An ounce hereof is sold for an hundred Ducats. It is not sold but to strangers, which first take their oath that they will not vlie in their Countrey. And if any sell thereof secretly, it costs him his life: for the King hath as much for Custome, as the Merchant for price.

Some ^b Portugals trauelling thorow Nubia, saw many Churches ruined by the Arabians, and some Images. The Iewilli and Mahumetan Superstition have there almost prevailed. In old time they had Bishops sent them from Rome, which by meanes of the Arabians was after hindered.

10 The Nubian King warreth with the Inhabitants of Goran, called Zingani; who speake a Language that none else vnderstand; and with others in the Desarts, on the other side of Nilus, towards the Red Sea, whose Language seemes to be mixt with the Chaldean, and resembles the speech of Suchen, in the Countrey of Prester Iohn. They are called Bugiba, and lue very miserably. They had once a Towne on the Red Sea, called Zibid, whose Port answereth directly to that of Zidem, which is forty miles from Mecca. This Zibid for their robberies was destroyed by the Sultan. Ostelinus saith, that in Nubia they were sometimes Christian, and now are scarcely of any Religion at all. They sent into Prester Iohns Countrey for Priests, when Aluarez was there to repaire their almost ruined Christianitie, but without effect.

Now if any would looke that we should here in our Discourse of the Negro's assigne some cause of that their Blacke colour: I answer, that I cannot well answer this question, as being in it selfe difficult, and made more, by the varietie of ^a answeres, that others giue hereunto. Some allege the heate of this Torrid Region, proceeding from the direct beames of the Sunne; and why then should all the West Indies which stretch from the one Tropike to the other, haue no blacke people, except a few in Quareca, which haply were not Naturals of the place? And if this were the cause, why should Africa yeeld white people in Melinde, and neere the Line? blacker at the Cape of Good Hope in five and thirtie, then in Brasill vnder the Line?

30 Some leauing the hot impressions in the Aire, attribute it to the drinelle of the Earth: as though the Libyan Desarts are not more dry (and yet the people no Negro's) and as though Niger were heere dried vp. Some to the hidden qualitie of the soyle; and why then are the Portugals children and generations white, or Mulatoes at most, that is, tawnie, in Saint Thomee, and other places amongst them, as also the Inhabitants of Melinde, Madagascar, and other places, in the same height, in and adioyning to Africa? Some ascribe it (as Herodotus) to the blacknesse of the Parents Sperrme or Seed; and how made they the search to know the colour thereof, which if it hath (a thing by others denied) by what reason should it imprint this colour on the skinne? And how comes it that they are reddish at their birth, yellowish in age? Some ascend aboue the Moone, to call some heuently Constellation and

40 Influence into this Constellorie of Nature; and there will I leave them: yea, I will send them further to Him that hath reserved many secrets of Nature to himselfe, and hath willed vs to content our selues with things revealed. As for secret things, both in Heauen and Earth, they belong to the Lord our God, whose holy Name be blessed for ever, for that he hath revealed to vs things most necessary, both for body and soule, in the things of this life, and that which is to come. His incomprehensible Trinitie, which the Angels with couered faces in their Holy, Holy, Holy-Hymnes resound and Lande in Trinitie, hath pleased in this varietie to diuerse his workes, all seruing one humane nature, infinitely multiplied in persons, exceedingly varied in accidents, that we also might serue that ^b One-most God: that the Iawnie Moore, blacke

50 N'gro, duskie Libyan, Ash-coloured Indian, Oliue-coloured American, should, with the whiter European become one sheep-fold, vnder one Great Sheepheard, till this mortalitie being swallowed up of life, we may all ^c be one, as Hee and the Father are one; and (all this varietie swallowed vp into an ineff. ble vnity) only the Language of Canaan bee heard, onely the Fallowen name written in their foreheads, the Lambes song in their mouthes, the victorious Palmes in their hands, their long Rebels being made white in the blood of the Lambe, whom they follow whither sooner He goeth, filling Heauen and Earth with their euerslasting Hallelulabs, without any more distinction of Colour, Nation, Language, Sexe, Condition, all may be One in him that is One, and only blessed for ever. 40 of the name and division of Æthiopia.

ron*, to let vs on the Æthiopian Territory; the Sea is faire distant, and the River Nilus which parteth them (whether loth to mixe his fresh waters, with the Seas saltnesse, or fearing to fall downe those dreadfull Cataracts, or dreading the multitude of Pits, which the Egyptians make in his way to intrap him) here sheweth his vawillingnesse to passe further forward; and distracted with these passions, hath almost lost his Channell, dissuoluing himselfe in such lingering and heartlesse manner, as Man and Beast dare here insult on his Waters; and I also have aduentured to take the advantage of these shallowes, and wade ouer into this anciently renowned Æthiopia. The name Æthiopia came from Æthiop, the sonne of Vulcan: before, it had bene called Æthiopia, and after that Atlantia. Lydius deriueth Æthiopia of At, and Thebes, the Land of, or beyond Thebes, which was called Ægyptus Superior, next to Æthiopia. Chytrius saith, it is deriued of aidu, splendoe, and of visus, of the Sunnes burning presence. Two Æthiopia's are found in Africke, as Plinius witnesseth out of Homer (so ancient is the diuision) the Easterne and Westerne. And this partition is by some followed, as namely by Orosius. Others diuide the same into the Asiaticke and African.
Author hercof is Herodotus in his Polihymnia, which reckoneth two sorts of Æthiopians in

ἡ ἑθιοπία, ἢ γαῖαν τῆς Ἀφρικῆς οὐρανίου γῆρας ἔχει, &c. This haue I inserted out of Stephanus for testifying the more iudicious. Scaliger addeth that the Language in which their Ecclesiastical and sacred Bookes are written, is as farre from the true Ethiopticke, as the Dutch or Italian. The tongue is most elegant, if care and diligence be added: and is called Libertie, because the Arabian Conquerors (therefore only free) did vie it. The Ethiopians themselves call it Chaldee; yet is it nearer the Hebrew then the Chaldee: it is onely learned by Booke, and of their Priests. They indeed haue other Histories of themselves, from the flood downwards, but whereto a man must not rashly giue credit. They call themselves Ethiopians.

- 10 To take now some exacter view of these parts; leaving those m Jewish monstrous Fables of Monsters of threescore and ten cubits, & their great lyes of the little Pigmey. Christians with such other stuffe, fit for them to write, who are iustly credulous of h yes, because they believed not truth: let vs see what others haue written, both of the people and place; and first of the first, and most ancient Relations.

Of the Nations neere the Falls of Nilus, and of Meroe.

THe Cataracts or Falls of Nilus, which separate Ethiopia from Egypt, are by the most Authors reckoned two, the greater and the lesse: Stephanus addeth a third at Bonchis, an Ethiopian City. These are Mountaines which inroch vpon the River, and with their loftie lookes and vndermining trecherie, hauing drawne vp the Earth, which should afford him a Channell, into their swelling and ioynt conspiracie, as with a mixt passion of feare and disdain, make the waters in their haste and strife overthrow themselves downe those steepe passages: the billowes bellowing and roaring so terribly with the Fall, that the Inhabitants (as some affirme) which dwell neere, are thereby made deafe: and the River amazed and dizzie, whirles it selfe about, forgetting his tribute to Nepetne, till forced by his owne following waters, hee sets, or rather is set forward on his journey.

They are n now called Catadbi, which signifieth noyse, of those dreadful and hideous out-cries, which there are cauled. Thus saith Bermudeus of those Falls in the Kingdome of Goiamé, which rush downe from a Rocke almost halfe a league high, and steepe, sounding like Thunder.

Betwixt these Falls and Meroe, Strabo placeth the Troglodytae, of which we haue already spoken: and the Blemmyes Nuba and Megabari. They are Nomades, without Towne or habitation, and addicted to robbery. Procopius testifieth, that these were accustomed to doe much damage on the Romane Confines: and therefore Dioctesius brought them out of their barren Territories, and gaue them Elephanthia, and the Region adioyning for habitation, communicating to them the Roman Rites and Superstitions, and built the Citie Philas, in hope of future friendship. Caelum non animant; they changed the Soyle not the Soules, but were no lesse iniurious to Oasis, and other the Romane subiects. They worshipped some Gods, borrowed of the Grecians; Isis, and Ofris, of the Egyptians; and Priapus. The Blemmyes also offered humane Sacrifices, with cruell inhumancie, to the Sunne, till Iustinus time, whoooke away those bloudie deuotions. As for the tale that those Blemmyes wanted heads, and had their eyes and mouthes in their breasts, the Authors had either no eyes to see the truth, or more head then they should to deuide lyes: as we may say of other shapelesse and monstrous shapen of people, which f Phiv and Salmu, out of other Authors report, to inhabit the vnknoone parts: some wanting lips, some nostrils, some tongues, or mouthes, &c. indeed all wanting truth. Rather would I counsell the studious of Geographie, to learne the names of the Peoples and Nations of these Regions, of Plinie and Solinus: which because we haue but names of them, I forbore to name.

Meroe doth inuite mee to a longer entertainment, being an Iland which Nilus with louely embraces claspeth about, according to Iosephus and Cedrenus, sometimes called Saba, as now also the Abissines name it; the Egyptians call it Nauile Babe; the Inhabitants, Nenbe; our Maps, Guegere; to which Tibnet addeth more, * if not more then truth. The Iland, after Heliodorus (the Bishop of Tricca) his description, is three square, each of which triangle limits are made by three Riuers, Astaboras, and Asaboba; (Strabo calls it Assapus, and Ailofic bis) this from the South, that from the East drowning their names and waters with Nilus; it it is in length three thousand furlongs, in bredth a thousand, plentifull of Elephants, Lions, Rhinoceroses, Corne, and Trees, besides her hidden treasures, and Mines of Iron, Braile, Silver, Gold, and Salt. It hath also Heben wood, as Lucan ¹ singeth, Lata comis Hebeni, I received that name of Meroe, sister of Cambyses, or after ² Eusebius, of Meyra, the Mother of Cheophris, King of Egypt. They worshipped a Barbarian God, and besides, Tan, Heracles, and Isis. They cast their dead into the River, others reserved them at home in glasse shrines, others in earthen receptacles buried them nere to their Temples. They esteemed them for Gods, and sware by them. They ordained him King, who excelled in strength, or in person, or in husbandry of cattell, or in wealth. Their Priests enjoyed the chiefe ranke of honour, who lending their Herald or Messenger, enioyned the King his death, and set vp another in his room. At length a certaine King abolished this custome, and rushing with his armed Souldiers into their Temple, where was a golden Chappell, slue all those Priests. This was at Meroe the head Citie of the Iland, where (Pausanias ³ sayeth) they shewed the Table of the Sunne, and that they were the iustest men of all the Ethiopians.

Concerning that Table, and the expedition of Cambyses into these partes, HERODOTUS ⁴ relateth, that CAMBYES designed at once three inuasions; against the Carthaginians, the Ammonians, and Macrobians (all in Africa.) These last haue their names of their long liues, which they draw forth farre beyond the vsuall course. Hee placeth them on the South shores of Africa, but Mela ⁵ in Meroe; Seneca, Plinie, and Solinus beyond, That Table of the Sunne, Herodotus and Mela thus describe. Nere to the Citie was a place alwayes furnished with varietie of roasted meates, there set in the night by the Magistrates, and eaten on the day by such as listed, and therefore of this open feasting, called the Sunns Table: whom the ignorant people also thought to be the Cater of these dainties, Cambyses sent an Embassage vnto the King with presents, but principally to elpse the Countrey; whom the Ethiopian requited with a Bow, and bade that the Persians should then inuade the Macrobians, when they were able to shoot in such Bowes: thanking God that hee was contented with his owne. And becau'e he had sent him golden Chaines, he asked to what vse they were; they said, for ornaments: hee answered with smiling, thinking them to bee Chaines for punishment, That he had stronger fetters then those. The like account hee made of his Purple Robes, Oyntments, and Wine: and asked further what the Persians eat and when they told him bread made of Wheate (the nature whereof they declared) and withall, that the oldest Persians exceeded not fourescore yeeres: hee said, that it was no maruell of their short liue, that fed vpon dung: neither could they liue so long, were it not for that drinke of Wine which they vsed; it was not extraordinary ⁶ there to attaine to a hundred and twenty yeeres, their meate was boyled flesh, and their drinke Milke. Hee brought them to a Fountaine, wherein being bathed, they smelled as of Violets, it was so subtile that nothing could swimme thereon, not wood, or other lighter matter: this water was supposed to lengthen their liues. He brought them also to the Prisons, where they saw many manacled and bound with Chaines of Gold, Lastly, hee shewed them their Sepulchres made of Glasse, in this manner: After they haue embalmed the dead Corps, they anoint it with a kind of pargetting mortar, and then put it in a case or coffin of Glasse, through which it shinieth, and is apparant without any ill fauour. This they keepe one yeere in the house, offering thereto Sacrifices, and the first fruits of all things: and then carrie it out of the Citie. Thus saith Herodotus. Wherein, that which some Penny-father would most admire, their golden letters how common and rife is it in another sort with vs: euery couetous Miser, manachling, fettering, strangling himselfe with his Gold, in shew his ornament, in affect his God, in effect his Deuill, Iaylor, Chaines, and Hell, The Macrobij (Mela addeth) vsed Braile for honour, Gold for punishments.

Of the Table of the Sunne before mentioned, thus writeth Fr. Lays de Urraca, ⁷ in that his large History which hee hath composed in Spanish, of Ethiopia: that the King in a curiouse brauerie, and sumptuous vanitie, caused there to bee set by night in a certaine field store of white bread, and the choyest Wines, hanged also on the Trees; great varietie of Fowles, rosted and boyled, and set on the ground, Mutton, Lambe, Veale, Beefe, with many other dainties ready dressed. Trauellers and hungry persons which came hither and found this abundance, seeing no bodie which prepared, or which kept the same, ascribed it to Super Hospitalis his bounty and hospitality, shewing himselfe a Protector of poore Trauellers, and called this field the Table of the Sunne. The report hereof passed through the World, and brought many Pilgrims from farre Countreies, to visit the same. King Cambyses sent his Embassadors to see it. Plato the Prince of Philosophers hauing travelled through Asia as farres Caucasus and gone also to the Eractmanes, to see and heare Hiarcas in a Throne of Gold, amongst a few Disciples, disputing of Natures Mysteries, and discoursing of the Starres and Planets, returned by the Persians, Babylonians, Arabians, and other Nations, and entred into to Ethiopia, led with desire to see this renowned Table, and to eate of those delicacies. The Ethiopians, since their Christianity, in zealous detestation of Idolatry, will not to much as name this field, and these ancient Rites, and give in charge to the Priests at this day, that they handle no countenance of the like vanities, because they were inventions of Idolaters. Calus & Rhodiginus affirmeth, that this Table of the Sunne grew into a Prouerbe, to signifie a house well furnished and provided. Thus saith Fryer Luy: I doubt, farther then wee may safely follow in that of Plato's Pilgrimage hither.

Of the Pillar of Semiramis is before spoken out of the relation of Xenophon de Aguinotia: concerning which, and his other companions and brethren, howsoever Possennus, Gorgias, and others doe reprove Amur for abusing the World with those glorious Titles & hand Ancient names; and proude them to bee counterfeit: yet in my mind that of Xenophon seemeth to fauour of some truth (whether of antiquity or no, I meddle not) and that more then others of the same Edition. In that Pillar consecrated to the memory of Ninus the Inscription testifieth, that Cus or Cus was the Ethiopian Saturne; as Cham the Egyptian; and Nimrod the Babylonian. When Cus¹ was dead, they say, Regma his Sonne succeeded in the Ethiopian Kingdome; and after him Dodan; after whose time is no record of certaine succession. Diodorus sayeth, they chose him which was most comely of personage for their King. Memnon is chanted by Homer and the Poets, which lost his life at Troy in defence of Priamus, and was (some say) King of Ethiopia. Of the speaking Image of Memnon, yett haue I seen in our Egyptian Relations. As for the wife of Moser, whereof Iosephus¹ sayeth, That the Ethiopians having ouer-rune, and almost subdued Egypt, and none daring to make head against them, Moser (whom Thermatis Pharaohs daughter, had brought vp) was chosen Generall of the Egyptian Army, which he conducted into Ethiopia, and comming to the siege of Saba, Tharbis the Ethiopian Kings daughter tell in loue with him, and sent her Seruants to intreat of a Marriage with him: which hee accepted, vpon condition of deliuering the Towne vnto him; and that being done, married her: all this seemeth rather to be a Jewish Fable; thinking there by to erredie their Law-giuer, then agreeing to Moser, the Truth, and Scripture; and might haply arise from that speech, That Moser¹ his wife was an Ethiopian; of which wee haue spoken already. Neyther is it likely that Moser would accept of Treason for the dowry with his wife, leake d with the blood and ouerthrow of her Country and Citizens, and yett from hence doe some deriue = the originall of their Nation. After the Father of this supposed Tharbis, Derianus is said to reigne, who valiantly withstood Bacchus (which is thought to be Osiris, the Egyptian King, and after, their God) when hee invaded Egypt with an Army: Diadorius mentioneth Abrisanes, a King of Ethiopia: Cephru also is numbered in that Royall Catalogue; but of all, = Ganges was most famous, who with his Ethiopian Armie passed into Asia, and conquered all as farre as the River Ganges, to which hee left that name, being before = called Chliaros. Hee conquered as farre also to the West, vnto the Atlantike Ocean, & gaue name to the Country of Guinea; which name, some say, is corrupted of Gangina, the name it had receiued of Ganger. These things are written by some, & I will not swear for the truth, as safely we may do for that which the Scripture mentioneth of some of their Kings, in the dayes of Asa and Hezekiah, Kings of Iuda; whose puissance then was such, that a Zarah brought into the field a Million of men: and Tirhaca was Coriuall vnto proud and = blasphemous Sennacherib, in sure for the Monarchy of the World. But whether he came out of this Ethiopia, or any other parts of Asia or Africke, is not very certaine. Before that time the Ethiopians had warred vnder Seshak King of Egypt, whom some take = for Sesostris. The Babylonians in Nabuchodonosors time conquered Egypt and Ethiopia, as some expound the Prophecie of Ezechiel. And the Persian Empire extended from India to Ethiopia: Agatharchides writeth, that the Inhabitants on both sides the River Atabara, live on Roots dyed in the Sunne: they are much infested with Lions, and not lesse with a lesse creature, but greater Enemy, the Gnats, which drive them to hide themselves in the waters from their fury, when the Dogge-starre riseth; which; with these his Armies of Gnats bayeth the Lions also, whom their buzzing and humming noyse chase out of the Country. He speaketh of other their Neighbours which feed on the tops of twigs, running and leaping on the trees; and from bough to bough with incredible agility: others dwell on trees for feare of wild beasts, on whose flesh and in want thereof, on their hides, they live: as Oldhedges, Elephants, Chathoppers are the daily dyet to others: to which he addes the Cyanomorphs, which are nourished with the Milke of Bitches of which they haue great Herds; which perhaps our Reader will not beleue, neyther can I force him.

Heliodorus in his Historie (which although for the substance it be fayned, as a loue Discourse, yet must hold resemblance with things done) and for the variety and conceit thereof, commended by that learned a German Philosoph; and by our English b Philop (the Prince of Poetrie) imitated in his Arcadia; collecth of Hydaspes his Æthiopian King, that after his victory at Syene, and having there performed his deuotions, and scene their Nidescopium (like to that at Memphis, and now at Cairo) and enquired the originals of their Feasts, and holy rites done in honour of that Riuer: when c he came to the Cataracts, hee sacrificed to Nilus, and the Gods of the Borders. He then sent Messengers to the Wisemen, whom hee calleth Gymnosophistes, which are the Kings Counsellors, at Meroc, to certifie them of his victory, and to call a publike Assembly wherein to gratifie the Gods for the same, with Sacrifices and solemne pompes, in the field consecrated to the Sunne, the Moone, and Bacchus. Perfusa, the Queene, deliuered those Letters to the Gymnosophistes, who dwelt by themselves in a Grove, consecrated to Pan; and before they would give answer, consulted with the Gods by prayer, and then Sysmireas the chiefe of them promised all should bee fulfilled. The Sacrifices were to be done to the Sunne and Moone, and therefore, except Perfusa the Queene, which was Luna's Priest, no woman, for feare of contaminating the Holies of those Pure and Bright Deities, might be present. Hydaspes was Priest of the Sunne. Much preparation was made of Beasts for their Hecatombes; and much concourse of people crossing the Riuer in those Boats of Canes or Reeds. There were presented the Images of their Gods, Mammon, Perfusa, and Andromeda; and nigh to them late the Gymnosophistes. Three Altars were erected; two ioyntly to the Sunne and Moone, a third to Bacchus by himselfe; to him they offered all sorts of Beasts; to Sol, white Chariot-horses; to the Moone, a yoke of Oxen. And when all things were ready the people with shouts demanded the Sacrifice, which usually was accustomed for the health of their Nation: That was, some of the strangers taken in the wars to be offered: First, triall d was made by Spits of Gold, heated with fire, brought out of the Temple, whether the Captiues had euer knowen carnall copulation, for treading on the same with their bare feete, such as were pure Virgins receiued no harme, others were scorched. These were offered in Sacrifice to Bacchus; the other, to those purer Deities. These things haue I here inserted, not as done, but as like to such things, which among the Meroites were vsed to be done, and agreeing with the generall deuotions of those Æthiopians. Philostatus e reporteth like matters of their Gymnosophists, and of the Grove where they kept their generall consultations: otherwise, each of them by themselves apart, obseruing their studies and holies. They worshipped Nilus, intending in their mysticall interpretation the Earth and the Water. They enterdayned strangers in the open Ayre, Thesphesion was then (in Apollonius his time) chiefe of their Societie. At his command, an Elme did speake. They held the Immortality of the soule. The Æthiopians sacrificed to Mammon and to the Sunne.

Lucius, after his scoffing manner gratulates the Æthiopians that fauour; which Iupiter vouchsafed them, in going on feasting, accompanied with the rest of the Gods, and that twelue dayes together, if Homers f reckoned truly. But more s seriously else hee has unfolded that Mytery, shewing that the Æthiopians were Inuentors of Astrologie, helpeth therein by the deerenesse of the Skie in that Region, and like temperature of the season. Of them the Egyptians learned, and furthered that Science. In his Testificat^h of Dancing, he affirmeth, that the Æthiopians vsed their haire in stead of a Quiver, and neuer drew Arrow from thence to shoot in battle, but with a dancing gesture.

Diodorus i Siculus telleth, that the Æthiopians were accounted most ancient of all other men; and that not onely Humanitie, but Diuinity, was borne and bred amongst them: Sollemnities, Pompes, Holies, and Religious Rites, were their Invention. And therefore (saith he) Homers brings in Iupiter feasting with the Æthiopians. The reward of their pietie, was the Immunity of their Region from forreine Conquests. * Macrobis interpreteth Iupiters Bannet with the Æthiopians, of that Ocean, which Antiquitie imagined to be vnder all the Torrid Zone, that the fiery bodies of the Starres, supposed to bee nourished with moisture, might there quench their thirst. So would those good men drowne a great part of the African and American World, in hospitality to the Starres, by their imagined middle-earth Ocean: which experience hath now sufficiently confuted.

Cambyses attempted and lost his Armie, and Semiramis entred, but soone returned: Hercules and Dionysus over-ran the rest of the World; the *Ethiopi*ans eyther for their deuotion they would not, or for their strength, could not conquer. The Egyptians, some say, were Colonies from hence; yea, Egypt it selfe the dreggs of that soyle, which Nilus carrieth out of Ethiopia.

The Egyptians borrowed of the *Ethiopi*ans, to esteeme their Kings as Gods, and to haue such care of their Funeralls, the vse of Statues and their Hieroglyphicall Letters. Pierius and others haue written therof at large. Their best men they choise for their Priests: & he among them, who, when the God is carried about, shall be possessed with some Bacchanall furie, is chosen King as by diuine appointment, and is of them worshipped as a God. His gouernment is gouerned by Lawes. They doe not put a Malefactor to death, but an Officer is sent to him with the signe of death, whereupon he goeth home and slayeth himselfe. One would haue fled out of his Country; but the Mother of the Malefactor killed him, because he would not after his Country manner kill himselfe.

The Priests in Meroe exercised this authoritie (as is before said) ouer their Kings, and would send them word, that the Oracles of the Gods commanded them to die, neither might they reiect the diuine dispensation; and thus with arguments, not with armes, they perswaded them to a voluntary death. But in the time of Ptolomeus Secundus, King of Egypt, King Ergamenes well skilled in the Greeke Sciences, and Philosophie, relected that Superstition. They say, that the custome yet (till Diodorus time) remayneth, that if the King bee maymed, or by some accident want any member, his Courtiers also will deprime themselves of the same. Yea when the King dyed, his friends thought it good fellow-shap to dye with him, esteeming that death glorious, and the surest testimony of friendship.

The *Ethiopi*ans dwelling neerer to Arabia, armed their women in their warres, till they attained to a certaine age: the most of which were a Ring of Brasse in their lips. They which dwelt further vp into the Country, were diuerly conceited of the Gods; For some they thinke immortal, as the Sunne, Moone, and the World: some mortall; as Pan, Hercules, Iupiter, for their vertues exalted to that dignitie. Strabo tels it in the singular number, that they thought that God to bee immortal, which is the cause of all things. Their mortall God was Vincetina, and wanted name: but they most commonly esteemed their Kings and Benefactors, for Gods. Some that inhabit neerer the Line, worshipped no Gods: and were much offended with the Sunne, and hiding themselves in the Fennes, cursed him when hee did rise. These things you may reade gathered out of Diodorus, and Strabo, in Cerinus, Boetius, Dracutius, and Thamasa, with some other additions. Sardin saith, v that the *Ethiopi*ans were Circumcised; as were also (besides the Soues, Egyptians, and Arabians) the Troglodites, Macrones, Creophagi, and Inhabitants of Thermoodon.

As we haue shewed of the Macros, or long-lived *Ethiopi*ans, so there were others called Brachio, of their shorter liues, whereof were reckoned two sorts: the Silonij neere to the Red Sea, and the Eremij, which some take for the Troglodites. They liue not aboue forty yeeres. Plinarch & out of Asclepiades reporteth the like, saying, that they were old men at thirty yeeres. The same Author telleth that they and the Arabians could not indure Mice: and that the Persian Magi did likewise, esteeming them Creatures odious to God. Alexander ab Alexandro writeth, concerning the education of their Children, that, the *Ethiopi*ans feared their new borne Infants in the forehead, to prevent the distillations of Rheumes from the braine. And when they are somewhat growne, they make tryall of their forwardnesse, by setting them on the backs of certaine Fowles, on which if they fit in their flying, without feare, they bring them vp very carefully: but if they thinke and quake with feare, they expose them as a degenerate issue, vnworthy education: Their Letters they wrote not side-ways, after the Greeke or Hebrew manner, but after the present Chinian custome, downwards. They had seuen Characters, eury of which had foure significations. What manner of writing they now vse, appeareth in Damianus a Ge, or of Zaga Zabo rather, an Ethiopian Bishop, in his Treatise of their Religion, done into Latine by Damianus: but more fully in Iosephus Scalger de Emendatione Temporum, who hath lent vs a long Treatise in that language and writing, with the same words expell'd in Hebrew and Latine Characters and the interpretation of them also into Latine, in foure severall Columnes. He that listeth to reade some Philosophicall speculations of Nature in these *Ethiopi*ans, wherein they differ, and wherefore, from others, let him reade Celsus Rhodiginus of that Argument: hee saith, that they were expert in naturall Magicke. Nicephorus writes, that Alexander the Great sent Assyrian Colonies into Ethiopia, which many Ages after kept that Alexander the Great sent Assyrian Colonies into Ethiopia, which many Ages after kept their owne Language, and like enough their Religion. * Dem. Nigr. are farre distant from Nilus, are * said to live a miserable and heaſily life, not diſcerning in their luſt, Mother, Daughter, or any other name of kinned. Of their ancient exploits, wee haue no continued Hiſtorie.

About the time of Chriſt, it appeareth that Candace was Queene of Ethiopia. Shee was a maſculine Virago, as Strabo teſtifieth, who lived at the ſame time, and followed Antius Gallus in this Expedition. Hee forced Candace to ſend her Ambaſſadours to Auguſtus for peace, which ſhee obtained. Secundus * Victor mentioneth this Ethiopian amballaſſe. Plinius ſaith, the name Candace continued to the Ethiopian Queenes many ſucceſſions; whence perhaps Dioſcorides collecteth, that Ethiopia was governed onely by Queenes. Dioſcorides relinquisheth that part of Ethiopia, which the Romans held beyond Egypt, as not able to beare the charge. Iuſtinian ſent his Ambaſſadours vnto Helioſian the Ethiopian King, and to Eſmiphian King of the Homerites, his Arabian neighbour, to aide him againſt the Perſian. This Helioſian had warred againſt the Homerites for quarrell of Religion, becauſe they were many of them Iewes, and others Gentiles, himſelfe being a Chriſtian, and becauſe they made many forraiges into the Chriſtian Countries. He ſo farre prevailed, as hee made that Eſmiphian, a Chriſtian, their King; whoſe yoke they ſhook off ſoone after: and Abram, a ſlave, viſturped the State. He had beene ſervant to a Roman at Adulis, a Citie of Ethiopia; worthy mention eſpecially in this matter for the ominous propheſie of ſervants. For the Citie it ſelfe was built by fugitive ſervants, which ranne from their Egyptian Maſters: and this Abram a ſervant there, obtained to be a King: neither could the Ethiopian with all his might depole him. The like amballaſſe to Archeus King of Ethiopia was ſent by Iuſtinus for and againſt the Perſian: both which I mention, to ſhew the greatneſſe at that time of his State, nothing comparable notwithstanding to that which after beſell them. Among the Ethiopian Antiquities, Plato teſtifies, as Oroſius * cites him, that many plagues and vncouth diſeaſes infeſted, and almoſt altogether hee deſtroyed Ethiopia, about that time that Bacchus invaded India. If any delight himſelfe in ſuch Legendarie droſſe as the counterſeit * Abdias, ſet forth by Wolfgangus Lazius, hath in it, touching the Magicians and Enchantments, and ſome other ceremonies of Ethiopia, I am loth to blot my paper with them: not becauſe we are not certaine of the truth (for in others we may be deceived) but becauſe wee are certaine of the errors, to groſſe, that they may be ſeene and felt. Maruell that * Lazius an Hiſtorian, would with his Notes illuſtrate ſuch a hotchpotch of darkneſſe. And yet our Countreiman * Harding leaving the cleare waters of Truth, hath ſwallowed the ſame will, as the Jewell of our Church hath taught him. The Bunuch of Candace was the firſt Ethiopian Chriſtian, as Luke Act. 8. and Eusebius * doe ſhew.

But before we come to their Chriſtian conuerſion, wee are firſt to declare their conuerſion to Iudaisme (if it be true which the Ethiopians write) in the time of Salomon. The Ethiopians hauing lived before a vagrant liſe, like the Nomades of old; and the Arabians, and other Libyan Nations, not farre from them in Aſia and Africa at this day: Ara the Ethiopian King firſt fixed a ſettled abode at Axuma, and made it the Royall Citie; i after whom followed Agab, and in the third place Ghedur, or Sabanni, which ſubdued all Ethiopia, and left the Kingdome to his daughter Makeda, that reigned eightie yeeres. Anno 50. of her reigne ſhee viſited Salomon. After her they reckon theſe Kings till Chriſts time; Melch, Ardeus Anda, Gigaſio, Zangna, Guaſio, Anter, Bahara, Canada Chanze, Endur, Guaſa, Endrath, Chadlet, Seiya, Agaba, Anſena, Bregua, Guaſe, Befelugna, Baazena, in whole time they ſay Chriſt was borne: Genebrard ſets downe the times of their Reigne, which hee confeſſeth, and it ſelfe conuinceth to be falſe. This Queene of Sabs before mentioned in our diſcourſe of Arabia (of which Countreie * I thinke ſhee then was, and theſe Abſſenins ſince that time hence deſcended, and tranſplanted) is by * Iosephus called Nicaul, the Queene (ſaith he) of Ethiopia and Egypt. But Zaga Zabo ¹ in the Ethiopian Hiſtorie which hee wrote, and cauled to be done into Latine by Damianus a Gozi, calls her Maqueda, whole Hiſtorie the Ethiopians haue written in a Booke is bigger as all Pauls Epistles. The ſumme of his report is this: Shee was a worſhipper of Idolls as her Anceſtors had beene, when ſhe filled her eares with the renowne of Salomons name: and then ſent a meſſenger to Ieruſalem, to learne the truth, who at his returne confirming thoſe former reports, ſhee went herſelfe to viſit him. Of him, beſides many other things ſhee learned the Law, and the Prophets. By him ſhee conceived alſo a ſonne, of whom ſhee was deliuered in her iourney homeward, and named him Melch. After twentie yeeres education in Ethiopia, ſhee ſent him to Salomon his father, to be inſtructed of him in wiſdome, deſiring him to conſecrate her ſonne King of Ethiopia, before the Arke of the Couenant; ſhee ordained alſo, that women ſhould not henceforth inherit, as before had bin accuſtomed, Salomon did this, and changed his name to Damand after long inſtruction, ſent him back to his mother, attended with many noble companions, among whom was Azarias the sonne of Zadok the Priest. This Azarias caused Tables to be made like to those in the Arke; and pretending to sacrifice for the good successe of his journey, went in and stole the Tables of the Law, leaving in their room these later counterfeites, which he revealed not to any, till he came to the borders of Ethiopia. Then David being made acquainted with the fact, danced for ioy, as his Grandfather David had done before the Arke wherein the Tables were inclosed, his people making great ioy. His Mother resigned to him the Empire, and from that time to this, the Kingdome hath passed in a right Line, from male to male: Circumcision also with the Law of Moses hath bene observed. The Officers which Salomon appointed his Sonne, are still continued in the same Families and orders; nor may the Emperour chuse them out of any other stocke then these of the Jewes. This long Legend I report, not for the truth, but for that Religious conceit wherewith it is accepted in Ethiopia; for who knows not, that none but the High Priest, and that but once a yeere, entred into that holy place, where the Arke was, that I speake not of Nadab and Achims fire, with other diuine Iudgements? Isaiah touching; and the Bethhemites viewing the Arke at so deere a rate, could but make dreadfull so damnable an attempt. Besides, wee should haue looked for our blessed Saviour out of Ethiopia, where Salomon his Heires still reigne; (if these say true) and not goe to Salathiel and Zorobabel, descended of another brother, and therefore further off from the throne of their Father David, on which Christ was to sit, and to which he was borne, next and apparant Heire, even according to the flesh. And yet doth Genebrard credit these reports, and Baronius also in part, as Luis de Vresia reporteth. This Luis hath written three large Bookes in Spanish, collected (as he sayeth) out of Don Juan de Baltasar, an Ethiopian of great account, who had bene Embassadour from his Master Alexander the Third, the great Negus, into Persia and other places, and came into Spaine with his licence to imprint his Ethiopian History. Out of him Luis reporteth, that the former Booke, whence Zago Zabo the Bishop, Embassadour to the King of Portugall, had taken those things, is Apocrypha: yet so, as that it is true concerning that report of Maqedas conception, and the Royall Diligent from thence till these times. The stealing of the Tables hee denieth; and affirmeth, that the truth was, that Salomon had bestowed on the Queene of Saba a fragment of the Tables, which Moses brake in his zeale for the Israelites Idolatry with the Golden Calfs. For that conception by Salomon, hee proueth it by the Ethiopian Records, the title of their King, and his Armes; which are the same, which the Tribe of Iuda gaue, viz. a Lion rampant, crowned, in a field Or, with this Inscription, The Lion of the Tribe of Iuda hath overcome. Since they were Christians they haue added to this Armes a Crosse, which the Lion holdeth in his right foot. And in this right they lay challenge to Ierusalem for their Inheritance. Now for the fragment of the Table which Moses brake, it is receiued for a truth throughout Ethiopia, and it is still preferred in the Hill Amara as the greatest Jewell in the World. Baltasar had often seene and handled it. It seemeth to be of the Chalcedonie stone, shining, and transparent; and is a corner of a square Table, the broken edges yet being manifest, with the letters, some broken, some whole, much differing from the common Hebrew (which Genebrard sayth the Jewes inuented, thereby to differ from the Schismaticall Kingdome of the Israelites, of the ten Tribes; the Samaritans still retaining the former, as both hee and Sealigner affirme.) But these letters cannot bee read; for hee brought a learned Jew, skilfull in all the Eastern Languages, Persian, Arabike, Indian, Chinois, &c. yet knew them not. This relique is with such deuotion admired of the Jewes, that when they passe but within sight of that Hill Amara, they prostrate themselves on the ground with reuerence, and for this cause make much of the Ethiopians (wherefoeuer they meete them) as a people beloued of God, to whom he hath imparted such a Relique. They tell also a tale (I thinke so likewise of the former) of the Queene of Saba, that in her journey homewards she had a reuelation concerning a piece of Wood which shee saw, that it should bee the same whereon

30 Christ should after die for Mankind: wherefore adoring the same with much deuotion and teares, she wrote to Salomon thereof, who hid it in the earth foure Stades, where the Poole of Bethesda was made afterwards, and by vertue thereof wrought Miracles. But the Ethiopian Superstition hath Fables enough of her owne, and needeth not the officious helpe of Romish Saints in this kind.

As for that succession of Iewish Officers; Luis denyeth it (himselfe therefore denied by later examiners) and sayth, the Jewes are no where more hated then in Ethiopia; and Alexander the Third, late Emperour among them, banished all Iewes and Moors out of all his Dominions: The Officers of the Emperour are (sayth hee) the Sonnes of the Tributary King his Vassals, and the noblest of his subiects. And for the Jewes which came with Menelek, or Menelkes, (after called David) his next successor Iofu (so hee calleth him) becoming an Apostata, reduced Idolatry: and whereas David his Father had given them one of the Temples dedicated to the Sunne in mount Amara, to make it a house of Prayer, to the God of Israel, salting forth the Idols therein; now in this Iosues dayes some of them returned to Ierusalem, or to other Prouinces of Africa, and some inhabited the vtmost parts of Africa, neere the Cape of Good Hope, and Desarts not before inhabited. And the said Dan Iuan de Balasar, being sent by the Emperour into the Lands of Monopopata (so he calleth it) and of Galeses, of Barbazin, of Mandinga, and of Zape, which are inhabited of Idolatrous Gentiles, hee found among them some of these Iewes descended of that exiled stocke (as themselves also hold) which had forgotten their Iudaisme, and all knowledge of the Scriptures, onely had retained some reliques of it, and abstinence from Swines flesh, differing also from those Gentiles, in worshipping one God, whereas the other acknowledge One great God, whom they call Caramu, but worship also Tigres, Lions, Flies, Spiders, Snakes, Lizards, and whatsoever first I meete them in the morning. These Gentiles call the Iewes Tabagueros, and will not admit them to purchase houses, or inheritance, but ecyther vse them as Interpreters, or Factors for Merchants (which is the highest step they can attaine to) or else to employ them in base drudgeries, to be their porters, slaughter-men, and such like, that they seeme rather slaves to those barbarous Nations, then to enioy any liberty of freemen. Rightly may those Nations be called Barbarous, which seeme rather to barke then to speake, and yet they scorne that any should abuse them, with the basest of titles in their opinion, to call them Tabagueros, and reuenge it with the death of the wrong doer. But I feare me our Frier will be found a Lye, howeuer I am forced to relate many things out of him, hauing written so largely of this Ethiopian subiect with such boldesse, and pretending such assurance from reports of that Balasar, as if no doubt were to be made of his assertions;

CHAP. III.

Of PRESBYTER IOHN: and of the PRIEST-IOHNS in Asia: whether that descended of these.

Aming now declared the antiquities of Ethiopia, drawne out of ancient Authors, let vs neerer hand behold, what neerer our times, Others haue reported thereof. Wherein first we will here insert out of a Scaligers annotation, vpon the Ethiopian Ecclesiasticall Calendar or Computation of times, somewhat remarkable, and fitting to our present purpose. The name (sayth hee) of the Christian Ethiopians is not now first made knowne to vs. For their Church not onely at Ierusalem and Constantinople, but at Rome also and Venice, hath had liberty a good while to vse their owne Rites. The Portugals, and Francis Aluarez haue further discovered them: Before, we onely heard the name of Ethiopia. A wonder it is, that some ages since, their Emperours name was made knowne to vs out of Asia, rather then out of Ethiopia it selfe. Three hundred yeeres agoe, the Ethiopian Kings reigned in Asia, especially in Drangiana, the borders of Susiana, India, and China, vntill the Tartars dispossessed them of the Asian Empire. For Cingis first, the first Tartar King, slue Vincam, the Ethiopian Emperour: and his Posteritie chaled the Abissines out of Moine and China, and forced them to flee into Africa. Often haue I marvelled that a people of no knowledge in these times of Sea-affaires, could attchieue so mightie exploits, as to propagate their Empire, from Ethiopia to China. Since that time the knowledge of that Emperour hath come to vs in the name of Pretegiann: (which in the Persian tongue (as much now of reckoning in Asia, as the Latine in the West) signifieth, e Apostolike, inferring thereby that he is a Christian King of the right faith. For Pretegiann signifieth Apostles, and Pretegianni Apostolicalls; Padescha Pretegianni, the King Apostolicall, in Arabian Melich ressuli, in Ethiopian Negusich Chawarrazani. Of this greatness of their Empire, in Asia are witnesseth those Ethiopian Croffes, which are sene in Giaplat, China, and other places. Yea, the Temple of Thomas the Apostle in the Region of Malabar, hath nothing in it but is Ethiopian, the croffes, building, and name it selfe. It is called, e Hanarijan, which in Ethiopian is as much to say, as, Apostle: which Marcus Paulus talisly expoundeth, a Holy man. This name in the Author seemeth to be giuen not to the Church, but to the Apostoll himselfe: Paulus addeth that the remainder of the Christians subiect to Pretegiann abode in Tenduch. The neighbouring Arabians call them now Habassi, and wee from thence Abissines, or Abassenes: they call themselves Chaldeans: for their ancient and elegant Language, in which their Books are written, is neere to the Chaldean and Assyrian. Moreouer, the Ecclesiasticall History testifieth, and out of the same Nicephorus, lib. 9. c. 18. that that many Colonies were sent out of Assyria into Ethiopia. They are there called Axumites. of their chiefe Citie, but by themselves, as Aluares affirmeth, Chascumo. More may we see hereafter of their Rites, and other things worthy of knowledge, in the Institutions ^d of that tongue which we have diligently, and Methodically written.

These words of Scaliger have made me take some paines in the search of the premises; for hee differeth from the opinion of others, which have written any thing of Presbyter, or Priest Iohn (as they terme him) in Asia, whom the Tartars subdued. Ortelius ^e maketh a Presbyter Iohn in Asia, and another in Africa, if I vnderstand him. As for that Pncam, William de Rubruquis, which trauelled those parts in the morning of the Tartar-greatness, Anno 1253. reporteth that one Cin Can reigned in Kara-Catay, or blacke Catay, after whose death a certaine Nestorian Shepheard (a mightie Gouverneur of the people called Tayman, which were Nestorian Christians) exalted himselfe to the Kingdome, and they called him King Iohn, reporting of him tenne times more then was true, as in the Nestorians wont. ^f For notwithstanding all their great boasts of this man, when I trauelled along by his Territories, there was none that knew any thing of him; but only a few Nestorians. This Iohn had a brother, a mightie shepheard called Out, which inhabited three weekes journey beyond him: hee was Lord of a Village called Cara Carum, his subiects called Critor Merkits, were also Nestorians, But their Lord abandoning Christianitie, embraced Idols, and retained with him Priests of the said Idols. Tenne or fiftene dayes journey beyond his Pastures, ^g were the Pastures of Moal, a beggerly Nation, and neere them the Tartars, Iohn dying, this Out became his Heire, and was called Out Can, (whom others call Pnc Can) and his droues and flocks ranged vnto the Pastures of Moal. About the same time one Cyngis a Blacke-smith in Moal, stole many of Out & Cans Cattell: who in reuenge with his forces spoyled the Moals and Tartars. They agrieved, made Cyngis their Captaine, who suddenly brake in vpon Out, and chased him into Cataya; tooke his Daughter and married her, and had by her Mangu, that was then the Great Can when our Author wrote this. These Relations fauour not of any such Monarchie as should extend from Ethiopia, to those parts of Asia.

Marcus ^h Paulus telleth, that the Tartars were Tributaries to this Pncam, (so he calleth him) which faith hee, after some mens opinion signifieth in our language, Priest Iohn, but through his tyrannie provoked to rebellion, they vnder the conduct of Cyngis, slae Pncam. And afterwards hee faith, that a Tenduc was vnder the subiection of Priest Iohn; but all the Priests Iohns that there reigned after Pncams, were tributarie to the Great Can; and in his time reigned one George, who was a Priest and a Christian, as were the Inhabitants. But hee held not so much as the ⁱ Priests Iohns had done: and the Great Cans did still ioyne in affinitie with this Familie, marrying their Daughters vnto chele Kings. This George was the fourth after Priest Iohn, and was holden a great Seignior. Hee ruled ouer two Nations, called by some Gog and Magog, by the Inhabitants, Fog ^k and Mongul, where some were Manu-metanes; some Heathens, other Christians. It appeareth by their Histories, that Scaliger was ^l deceived, to thinke that this Priest Iohn had so large an Empire, seeing Rubruquis in the same Age, or soone after, could in his owne Countrey heare so little of him: and his posteritie in ^m Marcus Paulus his time, continued tributarie Kings vnder the Tartar. The name Priest was given them of that function, which hee tellifieth, George received, and Iohn perhaps of that first Shepheard that vnrped Can Cans estate. To let passe therefore that Presbyter Iohn in the North-east, we stumble on another mid-way betwixt that and Ethiopia. For so Iohannes ⁿ de Plano Carpini (sent Embassadour to the Great Can, from Pope Innocent, Anno 1245.) and Vincencius ^o in his Speculum, tell of the King of India Major, called Presbyter Iohn, being induced by the Tartars vnder the leading of Tosut Can sonne of Cyngis, who before had subdued India Minor: Hee by a Stratageme acquitted his Realme of them. For making mens Images of Copper, he set each of them vpon a saddle on Horle-backe, and put fire within them, placing a man with a paire of bellowes on the horle-back behind every Image. And so with many Images and Horles in such sort furnished, they marched against the Tartars: and when they were ready to ioyne, by kindling a fire in each Image, they made such a smoke, that the Indians wounded and slue many Tartars, who could not see to requite them thorow the smoke: but were forced to leaue that Countrey, and neuer after returned. Here now wee meet with a new Presbyter Iohn in India Major, which whether he were the same with the Ethiopian, let vs a little examine.

India is by Marcus ^p Paulus diuided into three parts, the Lesser, Greater, and Middle; the first of them hee boundeth from Ciamba to Murlah, and faith, it had in it eight Kingdomes; the first of them hee boundeth from Ciamba to Murlah, and faith, it had in it eight Kingdomes, the first of the Middle called Abafcia, had in it seuen Kingdomes, three whereof were Saracens, the rest Christians. Sixe of them were subject to the seuenth. It was told me, faith hee, that after their Baptisme with water, they vied another Baptisme with fire, branding three markes on their their forehead and both their cheeks. The Saracens vied one brand from the forehead to the middle of their nose : They warre with the Solden of Aden, and with the Inhabitants of Nubia, and are reputed the best warriors in India. The greater $\S$ India extendeth from Malabar, to the Kingdome of Chelmacoran, and had in it thirteene Kingdomes. This Abacia by the bordering enemies of Nubia and Aden is apparant to bee this Ethiopia where we now are : euen by their Brands wee may know them : And this the Ancients called India. For Sidonius $\S$ collecth the Ethiopian Memnonius, Indians : and Aelianus $\S$ placeth Indians at Asaboras, one of the Rivers of Merce : $\S$ Virgil also bringeth Nilus out of India. Ulfage $\S$ collocat inde decessu ab Indis : which must needes be meant of Ethiopia. Nicephorus $\S$ reckoneth the Sabians and Homenites people of Arabia vnto India. Sabellicus $\S$ complaineth of the confounding of these names India, and Ethiopia, saying, that moit men did thinke Ethiopia next to Egypt, to bee that India, where Alexander ouerthrew Porus. This confusion of names, I thinke, did first grow from confusion of Nations. For as is before obserued out of Euangelus the Ethiopians arole from the River Indus, and settled their habitation neere to Egypt. Perhaps they brought the Indian name also to these parts. Or else the ignorance of these remote Countries might doe it : in which respect, not onely a third part of the old World, but another new-found World, is now named India. Therefore Acosia and Adrianus Turnebus $\S$ esteeme India to be a general name to all Countries which are farre off, and strange to vs, although it be properly attributed to the East Indies.

Now if any wonder at such an extravagant discourse of India heere, let him know that in our search for Presbyter Iohn, which then was knowne to withstand the Tartars in Asia, I cannot see how hee can bee the Abissine or Ethiopian : but rather thinke that when a mighty Christian Prince was found in Ethiopia, they did imagine him to bee that Presbyter Iohn, of which they had heard in Asia, being furthered in this error by the name, India, which, as is said, did generally comprehend both the true India, and this, more truly called Ethiopia. Now for that Presbyter Iohn in India, I take him for some Christian King : for at that time there were many Christians, as appeareth by Venetius, in manner disperfed throughout Asia : and some, called Saint Thomas Christians, remaine in India to this day. Why I thinke it not to agree to the Abissine, my reasons besides the former, are, the distance of place : all that huge tract of Arabia, with the wide Seas on each side, separating India from Ethiopia : the vnpassable Delaies by Land : No mention in Historie who should dispossesse them of that India Assia, where the Tartar had neuer any great power : the Histories $\S$ which wee haue of those Indian Princes, the Kings of Malabar, of Decan, the Samorin, &c. are against it : the difference of Religion : for those Indian Christians of Saint Thomas, are not branded with hore $\S$ Irons, nor Circumcised, nor agree in other Rites with the Ethiopian : the Ethiopian Historie challengeth no such large extents to their Empire, except in Africa, where they seate them in a continuall deicent, from the time of Salomon, till now, whereas those Presbyter Iohns, had their dwelling and abode in Asia, as their Stories signifie. And further, the name $\S$ Presbyter Iohn is a name vnknowne in Ethiopia, and by ignorant mistaking of the Europeans, applied to that Ethiopian Emperour when first they heard of him, as saith Zago $\S$ Zabo his Embassadour to the King of Portugall, who reproouth the men of these parts : saying, that he is named of them Belul, which signifieth Excellent, or precious, and in the Chaldean tongue, Ioannes Encor, which signifieth the same. Sabellicus saith, the Ethiopians called him Gyan, Lufchoia calleth him, Bel Gyan : (Bel signifieth the highest, and Gyan, Lord.) But $\S$ Frier Lays out of Balsasar the Ethiopian, sheweth that in the hill Amara are ancient records which testifie that from the time of that Queene that came to Salomon, the Emperours haue beene called Beldgian, the signification whereof is, a precious Stone, or a thing of great value : which Title hath continued to those Emperours, as Pharao to the Egyptians, and Cesar to the Romans. Some also of the Royall bloud (which are usually kept, as after shall appeare in the hill Amara) when they are elected to the Empire, it there bee many of that Imperiall issue take Orders, and become Priests, not procreating any Children. Such saith hee in our times haue beene Daniel the second, Paphnutius, that succeeded to Naum and Alexander the third his successour, all which were both Priests and Kings : and therefore by the Ethiopians which resort to the Holy Sepulchre at Ierusalem, and vied to speake Greeke, were called Priest Beldgian. This by corruption of the name by Merchants, and such as knew not the signification and also for breuities sake, was pronounced Priest Gyan or Iohn.

Now for the Priest Iohn in Asia, hee tells that when Saint Thomas was martyred in India, the three $\S$ Magi, who had visited C. M. I. S. T., by the leading of a Starre, in his Infancie, and had after bene consecrated Bishops ouer their severall Kingdomes (you must not deny their royaltie) by the Apostle : choise one amongst themselves to bee Priest and King, who was called Priest Iohn. If you beleue nor Peter de Natalibus, out of whom the Frier cites this, I should bee too much troubled in perswading you. Hee telleth also out of Ordo Frisingensis, that that about the yeere 1145. one Iohn a Christian, both King and Priest, reigning in the furthest parts of the East, warred vpon, and ouer-came the Medes, Assyrians, and Persians, and had intended to free Ierusalem out of Saracenicall seruitude, but not finding passage ouer Tigris, was forced to returne. This is like to bee that Prebiter Iohn, whose posteritie vsed that stratageme before mentioned against the Tartars. And to him, I thinke, mighte sely agree that Title of Presegiar (easily deflected and altered to Priest Iohn) whereof you haue heard out of Ioseph Scaliger. I haue seene a Manuscripte ^u in old French, pretended to be a Letter from Priester Iohn, to the Emperour Frederike, wherein is discouered of the sice, greatnesse, puissance, wealth, and other rarities of his estate: but finding so many monstres, and vncooth relations therein, I could not bee so prodigall of faith, or penurious of iudgement, as to value his authoritie at any high rate: wherein Sir Iohn Mandeuill seemes to haue bene a lender or borrower, so iustly doe they agree, in disagreeing from both probabilitye and possibilitie of truth: yet both in the one and the other, wee may obserue the like situation of Priester Iohns dwelling in these parts of Asia, neere Persia: and that such a multitude of fables could not but haue some truth for their ground. My conclusion is, That for that name of Presegiar, I like well Scaligers interpretation, and thinke that it may agree either to this, or some other Christian Prince at those times in India, which is farrer neerer to Persia, and from whence the Indians borrowed their Royall Titles, both in those times and since, as Garcia ab Horta ^x and Linschoten the v. Idalbam or Adelbam, the Title of the King of Goa, and the Countries about, commonly called Idalcan, is not a proper name, but a Title of honour, signifying (as Admiraldek, Iosh, to. 1.) Lord, or King of Iustice: Nisamalcan, the pearle of the Kingdome, and such like: Ismael the Sophi (which name also is by some interpreted Eletu, because they pretended to bee or doe so, and others, the reprobate followers of a reprobate Religion) added the Title of Xa or Sha, to such as embraced his new Sect, as Nisomaxa, &c. If the borrowing of names from the Persian language (so general in those parts) bee still obserued: no maruell if some Christian King in those times might stile himselfe Presegiar, or Apostolicall (which others not vnderstanding, called Priest Iohn, or Prete Ianni) as being compassed with so many Saracens, the enemies of the Apostles, besides Heretikes and Heathens. At Mosul is yet a Patriake, who in Pan-lus ^z time was of farrer greater iurisdiction, and as an Easterne Pope, ordayned Archbishops and Bishops, through all the parts of India, besides Cairo, and Bildach: and therefore no maruell if in India there were some great Christian Prince, able to make a head against the Tartars in those times: For euen in Cranganor ^a are yet supposed to bee threefoore and ten thousand Christians: besides a great number in Negapatan, and in Malipur: and very many in Angamale, and fiftene thousand on the North of Coclin, where the Archbishop that dependeth on the Patriarke of Babylon, or Mosul, resided: All which haue no communion with the Greeke, Roman, or Ethiopian Churches. And for the Ethiopian names or crosses, either their Merchants when their state was great, or slaues, which taken from them are euen in these times sold dearest of any other, and mount to great preferments of warre, vnder these Lords, might leaue such impressions: or, some other, which as they professed one Christ, so might haue some wordes and ceremonies common with the Ethiopian: although I must needs acknowledge, that many of those crosses haue not crossed my way, nor any other Ethiopian foot prints.

Pardon me, gentle Reader, if I seeme tedious in this dispute, seeing it is necessarie both for the vnderstanding of the extent of the Power and Religion of this Precious or Priest Iohn: and Scaliger hauing ascribed such large bounds to his Empire, I could not but examine the same, otherwise professing my selfe (non magis amica veritas) euen willing, if I must needs erre, to erre with him, who hath in many tongues, and arts, shewed himselfe perhaps the worthiest General, and generallest Worthy, against Error, that euer wee haue had, the Al-pha of learned men in our Age, as our learned ^a Morton testifieth of him, and a great light of learning, acknowledged by ^b Royall testimonie. His authoritie I would not seeme to contemne, and therefore haue entred this long search. But Scaliger himselfe hath since altered his opinion in the last Edition of his Emendation; in which these later Editions of this worke, might haue excludel all this long dispute, but that it may serue to illustrate both this and other parts of our Historie, and therefore doe still suffer it to remaine.

other Authors.

O come now to the Æthiopian Greatness of this great Æthiopian; his Title would be a sufficient Text for a more sufficient gloss, then we can give. In a Letter to King Emanuel, after divers words concerning the Trinitie, follow; These Letters sendeth Atani Tinghill, that is, the Frankincense of the Virgin, which was his name in Baptisme, but at the beginning of his Reigne, he tooke to name David, the belov'd of God, Pillar of the Faith, descended of the Tribe of Juda, Sonne of Daud, Sonne of Salomon, Sonne of the Pillar of Zion, Sonne of the seed of Jacob, Sonne of the hand of Marie, Sonne of Nahu according to the flesh, Emperour of the Greater and Higher Æthiopia, and of most large Kingdomes, Territories and Jurisdictions, the King of Xoa, Caffare, Fatigar, Angote, Baru, Baaliganze, Adea, Vangue, and Goame, where Nilus springeth; Of Damara, Vaguedmedri, Ambeza, Vagne, Tigri-Mahon; Of Sabaym, the Countrey of the Queene of Sabz, of Barnagasio, and Lord as farre as Nubia, which confineth upon Egypt. 60

Heere

Heere are names enough to skarre a weake braine, a great part whereof are now his (as some say) in Title onely. For at this present, if Barras and Botera bee beleued, his Neighbour haue much enroched vpon him: as a little before we haue shewed (a thing wholly denied by the later Relations of Frier Luis de Urrea.) Yet seeing we are to trauell through all these Countreys, we will leaue the question of dominion to him and his neighbours, to try it with the sword: Our pen shall peaceably point out the places, and after that, the conditions, Barrigasso is the nighest to vs, at least, by the neere situation of the red Sea, nighest to our knowledge. It stretcheth from Suachen almost to the mouth of the Streyt, and hath Abagui, or Altapus, on the South, It hath no other Port on the red Sea, but Ercocco. Neither hath the Prete any other Port but this in all his Dominion, being Land-locked on all sides. Anna 1558. f. The Turks committed heere great spoile: They haue since taken from the Prete, all on the Sea side, and specially that Port of Ercocco, and the other of Suachen or Susquem, and forced the Governour or vnder-King of this Prouince, to compound for a yeerely summe of a thousand ounces of Gold: besides his Tribute to the Ethiopian. To him are also subiect the Governements of Dabila, and Canila. And the Turke hath a Batta at Suaquem, called by Tiplomery, Sebastiannum. Tigri-Mahon lyeth betwene Nilus, Marabo, two Rivers, Angote, and the Sea. Tigrai hath in it Cazumo, which is supposed the Seat-Royall of that great Queen, which visited Salomon. Angote is between Tigre-Mahon & Amara. Heere in Amara is a steepe Hill, dilating it selfe in a round forme, many dayes iourney in compass, 30. environing with the steepe sides, and impassible tops thereof, many fruitfull and pleasant Vallies, wherein the kindred of the Prete are surely kept, for the auoiding of all tumults and seditions. Xoa hath store of corne and cattell: Goisame hath plenty of Gold: as Bagu-medri hath siluer. In Fatigar is a Lake on the top of a high mountaine, twelue miles compass, abounding with great varietie of fish; and thence runne many Rivers, Rored with the same fish.

Damut is ennobled with slauerie. For the slauers that are hence caried captiues, in Arabia, Persia, and Egypt, proue good fouldiers. The greater part of this Kingdome are Gentiles, and the residue Christians. The Oxen (as Bermudez relateth) are almost as great as Elephants, their homes very great, and serued for vessels to carie and keepe Wine and Water, as 30. Barrels of Tankards. There is found also a kinde of Ypocras, wilde and fierce, fashioned like a horse, of the bignesse of an Ass. Negre herunto he addeth a Province of Amazons, whole Queene knoweth no man, and is honoured as a goddesse: they say, they were first instructed by the Queene of Saba: both like true, as that which followeth of Grifons, the Phoenix, and fowles so bigge, that they make a shadow like a cloud. Couchie is subiect to Damut: they are Gentiles: The Prince called Ayenger, that is Lord of riches: he shewed vs (saith Bermudez) a Mountaine glistering in some places like the Sun, saying, all that was gold. More gold is said there to be, then in Peru, or in these parts iron. The head of the Monasteries of Amara Christened him, Graden the Emperour being his God-father, and named him Andrew. Gueguere was sometimes called Alensa: the Inhabitants are confederate 40. with the Turkes and Moores, against the Abissines. Dancali and Dobas, are neere the red Sea, inhabited with Moores.

Many of these Countreys are diuersly placed by diuers: through ignorance of the exact situations; which Aluarez in his so many yeares trauell in those parts, might well haue acquainted vs with, if he had first acquainted himselfe with rules of Art: to haue obserued by Instruments the true site and distances.

In the Kingdome of Angole, iron, and salt is currant money. The Moores of Dobas haue a Law, prohibiting marriage to any, that hath not first slaine twelue Christians. The diuorces and marrying the wiues of their brethren deceased, is heere in vfe much like as 50. with the Iewes.

In Bernagasso, Aluarez and his company, in their trauell were encountred with many great Apes as bigge as Weathers, their fore-parts haire like Lions, which went not lesse then two or three hundred in a company: they would climbe any Rocks: they digged the earth, that it seemed as it had been tilled.

In the Countrey of the Gijannamori, as they trauelled, they crossed a certaine brooke or River, that came downe from the Mountaines, and finding a pleasant place, shaded with the Sallows, there they reposed themselves: at noone, the water of the brooke was not sufficient to driue a Mill. And while the company stood, some on one side the brooke, some on the other, they heard a thunder, which seemed a farre off, but saw no likelihood of raine or winde; when the thunder was done, they put their stuffe in order to be gone, and had taken vp the Tent, in which they dined, when one of the company going by the brooke 60. ken vp the Tent, in which they dined, when one of the company turning about, they bout his buisnesse, suddenly cried out, Looke to your felous: whereupon turning about, they saw the water come downe a speares depth with great furie, which caried away part of their

By commandement of the Queene Alagorda, which visited Salomon, women e are (say they) circumcised: Both sexes are circumcised at eight dayes old: and the males fortie dayes after; the females fourescore; (ynlesse they selfe halten the same) are baptized. As for the rites of their Christianitie, it belongeth not to this place to expreile. Their circumcision Zabo faith, is not observed, as if it made them more worthy then other Christians, for they thinke to bee saved onely by Faith. They vie this and distinctions of meates, and Mosailall rites, yet say as he ibat catib, stendit not de pisse him that cateth not, and not condemning others that refuse them; but yet thinking that neither Christ, nor the Apostles, nor the Primitiue Church had disannulled them, interpreting also the Scriptures to their purpose. Of their agreeing with other Churches in the most points of substance, the Author of the 4 Catholic Traditions hath written; and when I make a Christian Ystianism of these parts, it shall bee further discovered.

The succession is not tyed to the eldest, but to him whom the father appointeth. For Daud, which sent his Embassage to Portugall, was the third some in order, and for modestie in refusing to sit in his fathers Throne, which in the same triall his oelter brethren had accepted, was preferred to that which he had refused; the other relected for their forward acceptation. The King offered e the King of Portugall an hundred thousand drammes of gold, and as many Souldiers towards the ludding of the Moors, besides other things meete for the warre. It seemes, the difference of the Ethiopian, and Popish superstition was the chiefe hinderance in this busines: neither partie being able (if willing) to reconcile their long-receiued differences from each other, and the truth. Eugenius the Pope, and the King, then named The Seed of Iacob, F. had written to each other: & Aluarez yielded e obedience to the Pope, in the name of the Prete at Bologna, in the presence of Pope Clement the seventh, and Charles the fifth. But all this sorted to none effect. For Pope Paul the fourth sent an Ambassage to Clandius, then the Abissine Emperour, employing in the same thirteene leuities, one of which was made Patriarke, and two Bishops, in their hopefull Ethiopian Hierarchie. Ignatius, the Founder of the Iesuites, wrote a long Letter also, which Messias and Iarris haue inserted at large. Thus in the yeere 1555, John the third, King of Portugall, vnderooke the charges to conuey them thither: and sent Consalus Rotergius, to prepare them way by a former Ambassage to Clandius, whose eates hee found fast elided to such motions: Whereupon the new Patriarke stayed at Goa, and Onidus one of the Bishops, with a Priest or two went thither, where when they came, they found Clandius laine, and his brother Adamas, a cruell man, and an Apditate sometimes from his Faith, in the Throne. Hee cast the new Bishop into bands, and drew him into the warres with him, where the Emperour was discomfited, and he taken and strippet of all, and at last miserably dyed; and with him the hope of Romish Abissia. John Nonnus Barretus, the designed Patriarke; refused (as Messias saith) the Archbishoprick of Goa, whete his brother was Vice-roy and reuayned subiect to the Iesuiticall Societie to his death. In the yeere 1559, Ioannes Bermudez, I returned to Lisbon. He wrote a discourse of his Ambassage from the Ethiopian Emperour to John the third, King of Portugall, and of his adventures in those parts befallen him. In which he relateth, that Abnna Marcus being at the point of death, An, 1535, the Emperour willed him to nominate his Successor, whereupon hee appointed this Bermudez, and ordered him with all sacred Orders; which hee accepted vpon condition of the Popes confirmation, whereto the Emperour consented, desiring him to goe to Rome to giue obedience to the Pope, and from thence to Portugall to conclude Tagezanno (so he calleth him) his Ambassage. Paul the third confirmed him Patriarke of Alexandria: Hee apprehended Tagezanno, as Quandemel enioyned, and clapt Irons on him. His Emperours request was a marriage to be had with the Kings sonne of Portugall, the Ethiopian succession to remaine his Downie: also to send men against Zeila, and Pioners to cut therow a Hill, thereby to bring Nilus to annoy Egypt. Foure hundred and fiftie were sent accordingly by Garcia of Noronyas. But Quandemel was dead, and Gradens was Emperour, who ouer-threw the Moore, and slue the Kings of Zeila and of Aden. This Emperour fell out with the Portugall, and sent to Alexandria for another Abnna, whose name was Ieseph, so that none acknowledged Bermudez, but the Portugall. Sabellinus, saith, hee had conference with some Ethiopian, which said that their Lord ruled ouer threescore and two Kings. They called him Gyann, which hee first they called Mighty. They wondered why the Italians called him a Priest, seeing hee neuer receiued Orders, onely hee bestowed Benefices; and is neither called John nor Adamas, but Gyann. Some report of him things incredible, as one Web an Englishman in his Tales of his Trauels. Hee hath gold enough that vp in a Cane, to buy the moytie of the world, as L. Regius, affirmeth, and can rayse an Armie of ten hundred thousand (saith Sabellinus). Yet the Priests are not employed in militarie seruice, but onely the Cauis, which are men brought vp theeto. They warre not in the Lent, except against them felous with excommunication.

They wondered why the Italians called him a Priest, seeing hee neuer receiued Orders, onely hee bestowed Benefices; and is neither called John nor Adamas, but Gyann. Some report of him things incredible, as one Web an Englishman in his Tales of his Trauels. Hee hath gold enough that vp in a Cane, to buy the moytie of the world, as L. Regius, affirmeth, and can rayse an Armie of ten hundred thousand (saith Sabellinus). Yet the Priests are not employed in militarie seruice, but onely the Cauis, which are men brought vp theeto. They warre not in the Lent, except against them felous with excommunication.

circumcised. Both sexes are circumcised at eight dayes old: and the males fortie dayes after; the females fourescore; (ynlesse they selfe halten the same) are baptized. As for the rites of their Christianitie, it belongeth not to this place to expreile. Their circumcision Zabo faith, is not observed, as if it made them more worthy then other Christians, for they thinke to bee saved onely by Faith. They vie this and distinctions of meates, and Mosailall rites, yet say as he ibat catib, stendit not de pisse him that cateth not, and not condemning others that refuse them; but yet thinking that neither Christ, nor the Apostles, nor the Primitiue Church had disannulled them, interpreting also the Scriptures to their purpose. Of their agreeing with other Churches in the most points of substance, the Author of the 4 Catholic Traditions hath written; and when I make a Christian Ystianism of these parts, it shall bee further discovered.

of fasting, so weakening their bodies, that the Moores make that their Haruest of Abissine captives. Of this their fasting, Almaraz faith, that they begin their Lent ten days before vs: and after Candlemasse, fast three dayes in remembrance of Ninuius repentance; many Friars in that space eating nothing: and some women refusing to suckle their children about once a day. Their generall fast is bread and water, for filth is not easily had, they being farr from Sea, and ignorant to take it. Some Friars eat no bread all Lent long for deuotion; some, not in a whole yeere; or in their whole life, but feede on herbes, without oile or salt: that I speake not of their girdles of Iron, and other their hardships; which my pen would willingly expresse, if my method forbade mee not. This fasting (as exposing their State to hostile insasions and insolencies) may finde place and mention here; Their Friars and Priests in Lent eat but once in two dayes, and that in the night. Queene Helen, that sent her Ambassadour to King Emmanuel, was reported to eat but three times a weeke, on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. On Sundayes they fast not. In Tigray and Tigreman they fast neither Saturday nor Sunday: and they marry (because they have two moneths priuiledge from fasting) on Thursday before our Shrouetide. They that are rich, may there marry three wives, and the Iustice forbids them not; only they are excommunicated from entering the Church.

Some affirm, that the Princes of Egypt haue time out of minde payed to Pretre Iohannes a great tribute (continued by the Turkes, which Luyt faith is three hundred thousand Zegui, every Zegui being sixteene Riels, and with vs eight Shillings) for that by him the furious spirit of Nilus is slacke and cooled, being detayned in the way by many Sluces for that purpose made. The great Turke denying this; the Abissine taxed those Dammes to be broken, and by drowning Egypt in vacuout manner, forced that great Monarch to composition. Almaraz denies both the Mountaynes of Lusia, and the melting of snow; which is supposed the cause of this Ruers basiness; and ascribeth the overflowing of Nilus to the extreme raines in Ethiopia, whose Fountaynes diuers Portugals haue seene (he faith) in Goyame. The Turke not withstanding hath (by wishing vpon him) erected a new Beglebegus in his Dominions. Almaraz thud there fide yeeres, and was once within thirtie miles of Nilus, but in all his trauels neuer saw that Riuer. So little access he the Ethiopians (barred out by vnpassable passages) vsually to the same.

Andrea Corsali reporteth, that the Prinse David was of olive colour, but shewed his face but once in the yeere, hauing at other times his face covered for greater state, and therefore also spake to none, but by an Interpreter. The Inhabitants are branded with fire, which they vse not for Baptisme, but in obseruation of a custome of Salomon, who so marked his flaves, as they asume. Friar Luyt giueth another reason thereof, saying, that when the world groined vnder Arrianisme, the Abissine Emperours caused his Subjects to brand themselves with a threhold marke or stampe in the forehead, to testifie their faith of and in the Trinitie: which now sinder their commerce with the Roman Christians, is in manner wholly left, except in the finer and more vnciuill parts of Barnagasso, the borders of the Empire. The same Author faith, that in Ethiopia are Elephants, the Rhinoceros, and (besides other beasts) the Vnicorne in the Kingdome of Goyame, and in the Hills of the Moore, but seldom sent, only the horse is found, which he callet in manner as the Hart. There are also (he faith) birds of Paradise: and such store and varietie of flowers all the yeere long, that their Eunuchs are alway decked with them. There is one flower not any where else knowne, called Ghyabula, much resembling a Mary-gold; but exceeding faire in varietie and excellency of colours, fragrant smell, abundance of leaues in the flower, and with a more rare quietie; beginning to open at noone, and so by little and little opening more and more till midnight, alway the sent encreasing with the opening: after midnight it shuts by little and little, till noone; denying by the same degrees her pleasing offices to both senses, of Sent, and Sight. He tells also of a little Bird, to which Nature hath committed the tuition of this Flower, which all the time that it is open flies about it, drives away things offensive, sings sweetly, and spreads her selfe thereon; with other things very strange. I dare not asseme very true. He mentioneth also a bird, called the Rhinoceros of the ayre, much bigger then an Eagle, and bating a bow-shotted hill or beake foure fode long, and a horse betwene the eyes, with a black line along it. It is a cruell fowle, and attendes on battells and camps. The Portugalls had sight of one at the Red Sea, when Soliman the Eunuch had his Naue in the Red Sea. There are fishes alid called Rhinoceros of the Sea, many of which are paid the Pretre for Tribute.

Many many other Ethiopian rarities wee might obserue out of this Anchour, but (if it deserue credit) the Hill Amara after his description, may furnish you for and beyond all the rest of Ethiopia, as a second earthly Paradise.

CHAP. V.

Relations of Ethiopian rarities, collected out of Friar LWYS, a Spanish Author.

§. I.

Of the Hill Amara.

10 THe hill Amara hath already beene often mentioned; and nothing indeed in all Ethiopia more deserveth mention, whether wee respect the naturall site, or the employment thereof. Somewhat is written thereof by Geographers, and Historians, especially by Alvarez whom we have chiefly followed in the former Relations of this Countrey, as an eye-witnesse of the most things reported; but neither they, nor he, have any thing but by relation, saying that he passed two dayes journey along by the said Hill, and that also had almost cost him his life. But John de Balthazar (saith our Friar) lived in the same a long time, and therein served Alexander which was afterwards Emperour, and was often by commandement of the same man, when he was Emperour, sent thither: out of his Relations, Friar LWYS saith hee hath borrowed that which here we offer you. And here we offer you no small favour to conduct you into, and about this place, where none may come but an Ethiopian, and that by expresse licence, vnder paine of leaving his hands, feet, and eyes behind, in price for his curiositie, and not much lesse is the danger of such as offer to escape from thence: Alvarez himselfe being an eye-witnesse of some such cruell executions inflicted for that offence. This Hill is situate at the Naull of that Ethiopian Body, and Centre of their Empire, vnder the Equinoctiall Line, where the Sunne may take his best view thereof, as not encountering in all his long iourney with the like Theatre, wherein the Graces and Muses are Actors, no place more graced with Natures store, or furnished with such a store-house of bookes, the Sunne himselfe so in lowe with the sight, that thy first and last thing hee vieweth in all those parts, is this Hill; and where Antiquitie consecrated vnto him a stately Temple: the gods (if yee beleue Homer, that they resided in Ethiopia) could not there, nor in the world find a fitter place for entertainment, all of them contributing their best store (if I may so speake) to the banquet, Bacchus, Iuno, Venus, Pomona, Ceres, and the rest, with store of fruits, whollome ayre, pleasant aspect and prospect; secured by Mars, lest any sinister accident should interrupt their delights; if his garrisons of Souldiers were needfull where Nature had so strongly fortified before; onely Neptune with his ruder Sea-deities, and Pluto with his black-guard or bar-king Cerberus, and the rest of that dreadful traine (whose vnwelcome presence would trouble all that are present) are all, save Charon, who attends on every fealt, yea now hath ferried away those supposed deities with himselfe, perpetually exiled from this place. Once, Heav-
20 en and Earth, Nature and Indultrie, have all bene Corriuals to it, all presenting their best presents, to make it of this so lowely presence, some taking this for the place of our Fore-fathers Paradise. And yet though thus admited of others, as a Paradise, it is made as Prison to some, on whom Nature had bestowed the greatest freedome, if their freedome had not bene eclipsed, with greatnesse, and though goodly starres; yet by the Sunnes brightnesse are forced to hide their light, when grosse and earthly bodies are scene, their noblenesse making them prisoners, that one Sunne onely may shine in that Ethiopian Throne.

30 same for the space of 30. leagues, the forme thereof round and circular, the height such, that it is a daies worke to ascend from the foot to the top, round about, the rock is cut so smooth and even; without any vaequall swellings, that it seemeth to him that stands beneath, like a high wall, wheron the Heavens as it were propped; and at the top it is ouer-hanged with rocks, jutting forth of the sides the space of a mile, bearing out like mushrooms, so that it is impossible to ascend it, or by ramming with earth, battering with Canon, scaling or otherwise to win it. It is about 20. leagues in circuit compassed with a wall on the top, well wroght; that neither man nor beast in chase may fall downe. The top is a plaine field, onely toward
40 the South is a rising Hil, beautifying this Plaine, as it were with a watch-tower, not seeming alone to the eye, but yeelding also a pleatane spring, which passeth through all that Plaine, paying his tributes to every Garden that will exact it, and making a Lake, whence issueth a River, which hauing from these tops espied Nilus, neuer leaues seeking to finde him, whom 50 he cannot leave both to seeke and finde, that by his direction and conuoyance hee may together with him present himselfe before the Father and great King of waters, the Star Tle way vp to it is cut out within the Rocks, not with staires, but ascending by little and little that one may ride vp with ease; it hath also holes cut to let in light, and at the foote of this ascending place, a faire gate, with a Corpus du Garde. Halfe way vp is a faire and spacious Hall cut out of the same Rocke, with three windowes very large vpwards: the ascent is about the length of a lance and a halfe: and at the top is a gate with another guard. The aire about is wholesome and delectable; and they liue there very long, and without sickness. There are no Cities on the top, but palaces, standing by themselves, in number foure and thirtie, spacious, sumptuous, and beautifull, where the Princes of the Royall blood haue their abode with their Families. The Souldiers that guard the place dwell in Tents.

There are two Temples, built before the raigne of the Queene of Saba, one in honour of the Sunne, the other of the Moone, the most magnificent in all Ethiopia, which by Candace, 10 when shee was converted to the Christian faith, were consecrated in the name of the Holy Ghost, and of the Crosse. At that time (they tell) Candace ascending with the Eunuch (whose proper name was indica) to baptize all of the Royall blood, which were there kept, Zacharie the eldest of them, was in his baptisme named Philip, in remembrance of Philip converting the Eunuch, which caused all the Emperours to be called by that name, till Iohn the Saint, who would be called Iohn, because he was crowned on Saint Iohns day 1 and while they were busie in that holy worke of baptizing the Princes, a Doue in fierie forme came flying with beames of light, and lighted on the highest Temple dedicated to the Sunne, whereupon it was afterwards consecrated to the Holy Ghost by Saint Matthew the Apostle, when he preached in Ethiopia. Those two Temples were after that given to the Monasticall Knights of the Militarie Order of Saint Anthony, by Philip the seventh, with 20 two great and spacious Couents built for them. I should lose both you and my selfe, if I should leade you into their sweet, flourishing, and fruitfull gardens, whereof there are still in this Plaine, curiously made, and plentifully furnished with fruits both of Europe plants there, as Peares, Pippins, and such like; and of their owne, as Oranges, Citrons, Limons, and the rest; Cedars, Palme-trees, with other Trees, and varietie of herbes and flowers, to satisfie the sight, taste and sent. But I would entertayne you, onely with rarities, no where else to be found; and such is the Cubayo tree, pleasant beyond all comparison in taste, and whereunto for the vertue is imputed the health, and long life of the Inhabitants; and the 30 Balmee tree, whereof there is great store here: and hence it is thought * the Queene of Saba carried and gave to Salomon, who planted them in Iudaea, from whence they were transplanted at Cairo long after. The plentie of Graines and Corne thete growing, the charmes of birds alluring the eares with their warbling Notes, and fixing the eyes on their colours, joyntly agreeing in beautie, by their disagreeing varietie, and other Creatures that adorne this Paradise, might make me glut you (as sweet meates vsually doe) with too much store. Let vs therefore take view of some other things worthy our admiration in this admitted Hill, taking the Friar for our guide, whose credit I leaue to yount censure.

§. II.

His liberall reports of the Librarie, and incredible treasures therein.

SUCH is the stately building of the two Churches aforesaid, with their Monasteries, the pillars and rooves of stone, richly and cunningly wrought, the matter and the workmanship conspiring magnificence; that of Jasper, Alabaster, Marble, Porphyrie; this with painting, gilding, and much curiositie; the two Monasteries, containing each of them 1500. religious Knights and Monkes; each housing also two Abbots; one of the militarie Knights; the other spirituall, of the Monkes, inferior to the former. In the Monastere of the Holy Crosse are two rare places, whereon Wonder may iustly fasten both her eyes: the Treasurie and Librarie * of the Emperor, neither of which is thought to be matchable in the world. That Librarie of Constantinople, b wherein were 120000. bookes; nor that at Pergamus of 200000. nor the Alexandrian Librarie, wherein Gellius c numbeth 700000. (had the fire not bene admitted, too halitie a Student, to consume them) yet had they come short, if report ouer-reach not, of this whereof wee speake; their number is in a manner innumerable, their price inestimable. The Queene of Saba (they say) procured bookes hither from all parts, besides many which Salomon gave her, and from that time to this, their Emperours haue succeeded in like care and diligence. There are three great Halls, each about two hundred paces large, with bookes of all Sciences, written in fine parchment, with much curiositie of golden Letters and other workes, and coit in the writing, binding, 60 and covers: some on the floor, some on shelves about the sides: there are few of paper, which is but a new thing in Ethiopia. There are the writings of Enoch copied out of the stones wherein

An. 1608. they were fixe; euey of which lues by himselfe, and that in great estate and maiestie in royall Palaces, with spacious Halls richly hanged, remoued to another Palace at pleasure; they meet alrogether when they will play, hunt, walke, and on Holy-dayes to Diuine Seruice; they take place according to their ages; each hath his ten seruants for ordinarie attendance, which are the Ionnes, or defended of the Tributary Kings: for baser offices, the great maiestie or military Abbot employeth the Souldiers that guard at the foot of the Hill, which without licencie may not ascend. They haue other graue persons to instruct them in vertue and learning. Euey Cite, that is, euey habitation of a thousand houses, is at their owne charge to send thither threemen, a Gentleman, a Citizen, and a Plebeian, for the guard of the Hill, which make vp the number of seuen thousand five hundred, there being two thousand and five hundred Cities in the Empire. The militaire Abbots order them in their seuerall Wards, the baser at the foot of the Hill, the Citizens at the middle, and the Gentlemen at the top; their Capitaines changed at euey two moneths end. Besides the Souldiers Tents, are many others of Merchants and Officers. No woman may ascend, nor hath done since Queene Candace was heere baptized by her Eunuch: the Princes lue single, and marrie not, as Aluarez hath (saith our Fryer) vntreuly affirmed of them.

vet. Hist. Eshiep.

When the Emperour is dead, many solemnne ceremonies are obserued, both religious and ciuill about the Election of another, which is in the authoritie of the two militaire Abbots of St. Anthony: Order in the Mount. Oathes are taken both of the Electors and Elected, the first to vie sinceritie, the other to raigne iustly, obseruing and causing in his Empire to be obserued, the Lawes of God, Christian Religion, the foure first Councils, of Nice, Ephesus, Chalcedon, and Constantinople: and (if the Fryer reach not, for in their Holy Churches safe I relye not much on their H. shewesse) to acknowledge the Florentine Council, and the Popes Supremacie, and lastly, the Constitutions of Iohn the Saint, and Philip the Seuenth, ancient Emperours; which done, in solemnne Proffession of all Estates they goe to Church, and hauing set the Emperour in his Throne, the Princes of the Blood are brought out of the Palace, where in the time of the Election they had been incloied, to kisse his hand, and sweare fidelity, cloathed in the habite of the Knights of St. Anthony: the same oath is giuen also by the Kings his Vassals, (four of which are present at the Election) the Counsellors, Prelates and other, according to their place. After this, othes are made on the Towres of the Mount, to giue notice of this Election, which being leene by the neerer Cities, they also by the like fires (as it were) proclaim the same in a moment through all the Empire; which is confirmed by Posts sent thence on Dromedaries, by the Abbot of the Abbey of the Holy Ghost, one of the Electors, and the Councell vnto the Citie of Saba, and the mother of the New-Elect, if she be liuing, and to his neere kindred, to come and reioyce with him. The next day the Emperour goeth, in black habite to the Palace where the Princes are, and saluteth them with kinde embracements, one by one, with his Bonnet in his hand: which is done in the next place by the Prelates, whom in honour of their Ecclesiasticall dignities the Princes re-salute standing, with their heads vncouered. The tributarie Kings follow, not with embracements, but kissing their hands, rendering their salutations, and after them the Embassadors. The Emperour, hauing remained sometime in private talke with them, goeth to the Abbey of the Holy Ghost, and putting off his black habite, is clothed in Scarlet; and being on horsebacke, attended with his Family, the Abbots and Counsellors, passeth to the Abbot of the Holy Crosse, where the two Abbots of that Abbey meet him; and after oath giuen to preferue the ancient customes, present him with the keys of the Treasure and Library: the Emperour bestowing as much of the said Treasure as he pleaseth. After all other ceremonies, the Counsellors of the Court come to the hill with 15000 Knights of Saint Anthony Order (which are the Emperours Guard) and the eldest Sons of the King, to conuey him solemnly to Zambta the Citie, where Court and Councell reside, where with all solemnity and magnificence he is likewise received, and conducted into the Palace, and placed on his Throne of twelue Steps, with acclamations of long life and happinesse on all hands. Five dayes Festiuall being here passed in a publicke reioycings, he goeth to Saba to take the oaths of all his subiect Kings in person (where of only foure had been present at the Election) and one holding the Crowne, another the Scutcheon of the Armes of that tributarie King, he sweareth on the Scepter (which is a golden crosse) true fidelitie and obedience, and the Emperour puts on the Crowne againe on his head; and the said Scutcheon, with his Armes, he giueth into his hand, and licenceth him to depart to his Pausillon without the Citie. These Kings are truly Kings, and succeed in the inheritance of their Fathers, receiuing the tribute of the subiects of their seuerall Kingdomes, and are not Deputies, or Vice-Royes, at the meere pleasure of the Emperour: but if one bee vpon iust cause displaced, his sonne succedeth: and therefore the Prete is called King of Kings

Kings. The eldest sonne of euery of the Kings attend alwayes on the Emperour, and haue attending on them ten seruants of the sonnes of the Nobles of their Kingdomes.

The Emperours are bound by ancient custome to take a wife of the posteritie of those three Magi which adored Christ in his infancie, whom the Ethiopian and Romane Tradition calleth Kings by the names of Gaspas, Melchior, Balthasar; of which, the Ethiopians say, that Melchior was of Arabia and Balthasar of Persia, which being forced by persecution of Arrians, came into Ethiopia, in the time of Iohn the Saint, which reigned after Philip the 7th, and receiued of his hands the Kingdome of Fatagar, and Soa, the former giuen to the posterity of Balthasar, the other to the linage of Melchior. The Fryer addeth, That all the legitimate descendents of these three Families are born with a starre on one of their sides; and that at the Iubile, in the time of Gregory the thirteenth, 1575. there were three of those three Families at Rome; with that naturall ensigne of the supernaturall & miraculous Star. Yea, the legitimate Mohumetans in Arabia & Persia, remaining of thole kindreds, haue the same signe, as Don Iohn shew to him, that he had seene. The Councell gouerneth according to the 127th Statutes, made by the first Philip, and Iohn the Saint. Nothing is punished with death but treason, vnder which name they also comprehend murder & adultery: of this mortall sentence the Lyons are the Executioners, which in euery Citie are kept for that purpose. Some Italians had been found guilty of the sin against Nature, a thing for which the Ethiopians (as some of the P ancients for Parricide) had no Law, as not thinking any would so far degenerate; and therefore knew not how to punish them: but it was committed to the Latine Councell, which aduised them to bee burned; a punishment not knowne before in those parts, yet fitting to thole vnnaturall burnings. The fault and punishment being of equall strangeness, the Emperour would not haue it executed there, but sent them to Goa to the Portugall Viceroy for that purpose. Heretic and Apostacie are likewise punished with death. That Latine Councell was instituted by Alexander the third, for causes and persons of Europe to be tryed, and iudged by Iudges of their owne, resident at the Court (as the Grand Councell is) and chosen of each Nation two, of the Venetians, Florentines, and Portugals: the two former come thither by the way of Cairo. Andreu Onida a Iesuite, sent thither by the Pope with the title of Bishop of Hierapolis, and after Barretus his death, his Successor in the Patriarchship of Ethiopia, was Author and Counsellor to the Emperour of this Institution, and by him made President of the same. This man (Antonio Massari, and others say) had miserable entertainment, with the residue of his society: but by Fryer Lays (from the relation of Don Iohn) tels, That he liued and dyed in great honour amongst them, as he doth elsewhere imagine exceedingly their respect to the Romane Papacy and Religion. Credat Iudeus Apella, Cui bono is the rule of my taith to Fryers and Iesuites in their Relations: In Naturall and Morall Histories, which serue not to the building of Babylons Towre, I receiue them with attention, with thanks, and if need be, with admiration in some things; but when they come with Silue in stead of Morte, and would get Rome a Name, I remember their Vowes and Profession; and yeeld no further attendance. That Clandius which was then Emperour, and his Successor Adamas, were of Scismaticall and Tyrannicall quality, as other Historians affirme, Fryer Lays not onely denies, but extollet h their good parts.

He which now is Emperour, was elected An, 1606. and called himselfe Zarabchaerast, a front or hind of the linage of David sister of Saint Peter, and Saint Paul. He is a man haughtie and valourous, and was therefore chosen, because the Turkish Empire was so full of seditions, and the Sophi had sent his Embassadour to them, to chuse a fit warrior, that they might with ioynt forces assault the Ottoman.

Here are in all the Cities of Ethiopia two Schooles or Colledges, for the instruction of youth; one for the male sexe, the other for the female; each diuided into three parts, the first for the Gentlemens children, the second for Citizens, the third for the baser vulgar, with their severall instructors, and without communion, medling, or conversing of the one with the other. The Seminarie or Colledge of Boyes is a quarter of a league without the City, the other within. There are they taught Letters and Religion. All, euen the Kings themselves, are bound to send their children thither to be instructed: and the Priests resort thither for Confession, and ministring the Sacrament to them. They may resort home at Festiual times: otherwise they are there detained. The Virgins, from twenty to twenty, the other, from ten to sixteene yeeres of their age. They haue not only this order in their wel ordered Schooles, but in their disorderd disorderly Strews, the deuils workes, houses, and suburbs of Hell, which yet in Rome, and places of that Religion, are permitted and admitted the Cities, and his Holinesse selfe is not a little enriched with (that which God prohibited) The price of the Dogge, and of the Whore. The Ethiopians permit not any to bee strange women, but strangers of other Countreys, which may not enter into their Cities: nor may the Nobles enter into the common houses which belong to the Citizens, or these to those of the Plebeians, nor any but to those peculiarly designed their state, vnder paine of death, as adulterers, to bee cast to Lyons. These women are hired by certaine Officers at a common price, and if they distaste and forsake that beastly trade, they send them to some places subiect vnto the Portugals, not admitting them to conuerse with their women for feare of infection.

But to leaue these Beasts, the Ethiopians giue great respect to their Physicians, which are onely of their Gentry, and that not all that will, but onely such as certaine Officers shall chuse, of euery Citie to be sent to their generall Vniuersities (of which there are seuen in Ethiopia) there to be taught naturall Philosophy (Logicke and other Arts they know not) together with Physicke, and the Arts of the Apothecarie and Chirurgian. They are there maintained at the publike charge of the Cities that send them. When the Doctors and Instrumters see them fit for Graduates, they go with them to the Monks of Alleya, and of Pharmanes, who with a Monkes Cowle, or Hood, and other Doctoricall Ensignes, doe inuett and inaugurate them in that Degree. They are great Herbarists: They make Mummie otherwise then in other parts, where it is either made of bodies buried in the Sands, or taken out of ancient Sepulchres, where they had been laid, being inbalded with Spices: For they take, a captiue Moore, of the best complexion; and after long dieting and medicining of him, cut off his head in his sleep, and gashing his body full of wounds, and therein all the best Spices, and then wrap him vp in Hay, being before couered with a Seare-cloth; after which they burie him in a moist place, couering the body with earth. Fieue dayes being passed, they take him vp againe, and remouing the Seare-cloth and Hay, hang him vp in the Sunne, whereby the body resolueth and droppeth a substance like pure Balme, which liquor is of great price: The fragrant sent is such, while it hangeth in the Sunne, that it may be smelt (he saith) a league off. The priuiledges of Physicians are, that they are freed from the common custome of giuing one in three of their sonnes for the Emperors warres, that they may ride on Elephants in the Cities, which is allowed onely to the Emperors, Prelates, and Priests that are Virgins. They may also wear Minier-hoods, and are free from Subsidies and Payments. Theologie and the Chaldee tongue is taught onely among their Priests and Ecclesiasticall persons in their Churches and Monasteries. They reade Diuinitie in their native tongue: the Text is the foure first generall Councils: the Scripture they reade in Chaldee, which is with them as Latine with vs. They handle not questions as the Schoolemen, in Logicall disputations and Arguings, but copiously and eloquently interpret the Scriptures.

c Of this Chaldee, see supra.

Because we haue mentioned their Cities Saba and Zambra, let vs take some brieue view of them, and so leaue this Spaniard, whose Discourse hath (I hope, not without some delight) thus long holden you. Besides these two Cities, none haue aboue three thousand houles in them. But these are populous and magnificent, with Towers, Temples, triumphant Arches, Obeliskes, Piramides, and the like tokens of industry, Antiquitie, and Maiestie. Saba was founded by that Queene which visited Salomon, and was the mother-Citie of the Empire. It hath five thousand houles, great and sumptuous, the streets spacious, with Portals or Pent-houses, that men may walke safe from the Sunnes violence. It hath foure chiefe Gates, all of Alabafter and Iasper, wrought with Antique-workes; the Gate-doors of Cedar curiously carued. The wayes that leade to these Gates, for the space of two leagues are set with Palmes, Planes, Oranges, Cedars, Cypresses, and other trees on both sides, for shade & fruit: the foure high streets goe thorow the Citie acrosse, and where they meet, is an Arch or Vault erected on high Pillars, fairly wrought and gilded, with the brazen Image of S. Matthew, their supposed Patron as bigge as a Giant, gilded also: the worke of Architects sent by Francis Duke of Florence, Neere to this Citie are Mines of Gold, Gardens, and other places of pleasure and profit.

Zambra is greater, containing thirty thousand houles, and innumerable concourse of people. It stands in the Kingdome of Cafates, and nigh that great Lake, which hereof is called Zambra: where the Emperor, leauing his wonted maner of remouing vp & downe in Tents haue fixed his Court-royall: and yet without the Citie are many Tents that belong to the Court. Here the Prete liueth, with two and forty sons of Kings, & with his great Councell, and the Latine, Alexander the third built the Palace here 1570. by the Duke of Florence his workmen. If I should follow the Frier further, I could leade you on in a delectable way, but doubtfull, like the Poets writings, and bring you into Elifan, but fabulous fields, fertile in all things but truth: wherein let the Reader pardon that I haue already been so long, rather then tedious, in this Vtopian Ethiopia: at the first much suspected by me, as by many passages in the Story is expressed: but since largely written against by Godignus, a Iesuite, and by latter Relations found by ther vncertaine or false; whose paines shall helpe make vp another Chapter, and then will we proceed in our Pilgrimage.

§. I.

The severall Countreies of Abassia, Their Situation, Inhabitants, Rivers and Lakes.

IF I should haue left out the former Chapter for the vncertaine truth or certayne falsehoods therein contain'd, some perhaps would censure for the Pilgrims words, or the Friers inuention, haue desired it, were it but as a Comedie to delight our tyred Reader. For my selfe, had my Intelligence so well serued me at first, it had been easier then, not to haue admitted, then here now to haue omitted it. I haue therefore suffred it still to enioy a place, rather for your delight then credit, and here would giue you those things that are more likely; I hope, I cannot warrant more true; such as Nicolas Godignus and others haue written. Some things being the same, which before out of Aluarez & others are mentioned, besides other things exacter or later. And first of the Countrey it selfe. * Iouanes Gabriel, Captaine of the Portuguese Souldiers, in these parts, hath written, that the Abassine Empire consisteth fixe and ewentie Kingdomes in ancient right, diuided in foureteene Regions: eight of these Kingdome lye in successe order from Swachen towards the West; the first of which is Tigras, containyng seuentene great Tracts, vnder so many Lieutenants or Gouvernours, which rule all affaires of Peace and War. The Turkes possesse the Sea-parts, the Saracens the Coast adjoining; the Inland is inhabited promiscuously by Christians, and Ethnicks. They are blacke of hue, deformed in shape, in condition miserable, of conditions wicked. They haue goodly Rivers dried vp in Summer, where yet with little digging, both water is found, and fishes, called Sagasi. The next Kingdome to Tigras, is Dancali, hauing the Red Sea on the East, thence extending Westwards, not farre nor fertile inhabited by Moores tributaries to the Abassine. Angore, Amara, Boa, Leca, are foure Kingdomes inhabited by Christians only. The seuenth Kingdome is very large, of seuentene Tracts, partly inhabited by Ethnicks, partly by Christians; it is called Abagamedri. Dambei hath also Ethnicks mixt with Christians, being but two Tracts. On the other side of Dancali towards the Red Sea, Aucagne trends along the Coast, possessed by the Moores, not subiect to the Abassine. Adel followeth in twelue degrees Northerly, in which is Zila, sometimes called Analistes, a famous Mart; the whole Kingdome is inhabited by Moores, ynneighbourly Neighbours to the Abassines, whence came Gradagna, or Gradamar, the Mahumetan King, which had wel-nigh subdued all Ethiopia, when the Portugals opposed themselves, who after diuers overthrowes, tooke him, and cutt off his head. After this is Dahali, which trendeth towards Membras: the Inhabitants, some Christians, some Ethnicks, pay tribute to the Prete, Occie followeth, more within land; the Inhabitants, Moores and Ethnicks, subiect to the Abassine. Arim and Fatiga the next Kingdomes are Christian; Zinger, Ethnick. Roznagum the sixteenth Kingdome is Christian, but not subiect to the Abassine Empire. From hence extend other Kingdomes towards the North; Roxa of Ethnicks; Goma of Christians and Ethnicks subiect to the Emperour. The next are Conche and Mahaola small and altogether Ethnickes, Gorona a great Kingdome of twenty Tracts, Christians and Heathens, almost wholly compassed by Nilus, able for plenty to feed many Armies, with which it is vniuersally infected. The Seedman followes the harvest man, & presently after the reaping, sows new Seed without other tillage. The three last Kingdomes lye towards Egypt, Damote, Suse, Isculum: through this euerie Yeare passe great troupes of Pilgrimes to Ierusalem. The seuentene these Regions or Prouinces I forbear to mention. Of all these Kingdomes at this day only Tigray, Abagamedri, Dumba and Gorama, are obedient to the Abassine. There are foure principall Rivers in this Ethiopia: Taueca running from the South to the North; the sandy Earth in the way, continually stealing; and vnder earth passages robbing him of the watery Tribute which he intendeth to the Sea: neere it are high vnpassable Mountaynes, inhabited by Abassine Iewes, which still obserue the Mosaicall Law, fierce and terrible to their Neighbours, and could neuer be conquered by the Abassines. The second River is Oara, exceeding Nilus in watery store, which he belloveth in like manner on the Countrey by which he passeth into the Zuilan Sea. The waters are pleasant; but the Abassine Christians will not drinke thereof, because passing through the Countreys of Mahumetans, it yeelds them nourishment. The third River is Gabea, which neere to Mombaza visits the Ocean. The fourth is Nilus. There are as many Lakes: The first Acha, in Angore: The second, Dambeabahar; that is, the Sea of Dambea, not farre from Gulbai, where the Emperours in these times reside, if they betake themselves out of their Tents into the City. This Lake is sixty miles long, and five and twenty broad, receiues on one side the waters of Nilus, is full of fishes, and Riuer-horses, which sometimes are dangerous to passengers; two Iesuits in one of their Boates made of Rushes, hardly escaping their assaults. Many small Ilands are in this Lake, in one of which is a Towre, their Treasury, and to which M. Iesuits are confined. The third Lake is Zella in Occie: the fourth Xacala, not farre from it.

§. II.

Of the Soyle, Fruits, Creatures, Seasons, and Climate.

* Ant. Fernand.
Soc. Ies.

Antonia * Fernandez in an Epistle dated here in June 1610, numbred about fortie Prouinces in Abassia, but in substance agrees in the former. The Soyle (he sayth) is hollow, and full of deepe Cliffs: in the midst of the plaine fields you shall often see steepe and high Rockes of solid stone, which in time of warre serue them in stead of Forts. The whole Region is full of Metals; but neglected partly by the sloth of the Inhabitants, partly for feare to bring Turkish Inuasions vpon them, if such baits were discovered. They take so much Iron only, as they finde without digging on the face of the Earth. Corne, Herbes, Trees are there in variety, but these not excellent in their fruits, except one, the fruit whereof saues their liues by the vertue it hath against Wormes, whereto themselves with this fruit: they haue Peaches, Pomegranates, Citrons, Indian Figges, but not in great plenty: They haue Hares, Harts, Goats, Swine, Elephants, Camels, Buffles, Lions, Panthers, Tigres, Rhinoceros, and other like Beasts. One so huge, that a man on horsebacke may passe vpright vnder his belly, feeding on leaves from the tops of trees, and formed like a Camell. Their Riuer-horses doe much harme to the fruits of the Earth, being of vast bodies, and their mouth three quarters of a yard in the opening. In the night they come forth, and if the Husbandmen did not keepe diligent watch, would doe extreme harme to the Corne; they feed also on grasse. In the water they are very fierce, and like Dogges assault men and teare them. They are so afraid of fire, that one Boy with a burning firebrand will chase away thousands of them. Some there are which hunt these beasts with Lances and Arrows, and liue on their flesh little differing from Beefe. There is also found in their Rivers and Lakes the Torpedo or Crampfish, of strange effect in Nature; if hidden in the hand and not stirring, it makes no alteration; but if it moues it selfe, the arteries, ioynts, sinewes, and all the members of the body, suffer an exceeding torture and astonishment, which presently ceaseth with letting goe the Fish. The Ethiopians haue a superstitious conceit, that it is good to driue away Devils out of Men, thinking it torments those Spirits no lesse then humane bodies. They say (I haue not made tryall thereof my selfe) that if this fish be laid amongst dead fishes and there stur it selfe, it makes them also to moue as if there were life in them. There are many of them in Nilus in the end of the Prouince of Goyama, where is a bottomlesse Lake (so the Portugall thought that could not found the bottom with his Pike) whence continually springs abundance of water, being the head of that Riuer: little at the first, and after a dayes journey and a halfe running to the East, and then entrench a Lake supposed the greatest in the World, passing swiftly through the midst thereof without mixture of waters, and casting it selfe ouer high Rockes, takes freer scope, but presently is swallowed of the Earth, so that it in some places it may be stepped ouer. After five dayes iourney towards the East, it winds it selfe againe to the West, and so passeth on in his way towards Egypt.

Camelopardalis.

There is a great heape of bones by reason of these sacrificed beasts.

Egypt. The Ethiopians affirme, that it is easie to diuert the Riuer course, and to famish Egypt, but I thinke it farre easier to say then doe it. Low places in Abassia are intemperately hote. Their Winter continues from May to September; and then begins in the Red Sea, which I have obserued (Fernandes reports it) to flow in all time of the Moones increase, and to flow continually out all the time of the decrease. In their Winter it raineth and thundreth commonly euery afternoon. In the Kingdome of Zambea in which we now liue, wee may see both the Poles, the Antarktike higher, with his Crosse-starrs. In this Tract of Heauen there is as it were a cloud or blot; supposd more thinne then other parts: about it are many Starrs lesse then those which illustrate the other Pole. They beginne their yeere with the Spring on the first of September, numbing twelue moneths, in each thirty dayes, reckoning the oddes dayes betwene August and September by themselves. The Abasines expresse their ioy most by eating and drinking, and therefore on Hollidays resort to their Churches, which are shaded with trees, where are set Vessels full of a liquor, which they vse in stead of Wine (which they make of Honey, adding Opium) and thereafter their holies, they serue their bellies, drinking to drunkenness, quarrells, fighting. They haue Grapes, but (except in the Vintage season) they straine their dried Raisons; inasomuch that Peter Paer a leisuie writ from thence, Anno 1604. that the Emperour desiring him to say Masse after the Romane rite, they could find no Wine to doe it.

p. III.

and their late miseries.

They tow little more then they must spend. And for their apparell, the richer buy it of the Moores, attiring themselves after their fashion; the rest both Men and Women vse a kinnie, or some coarse peece of linnen, without adorning by Arte. When they doe reuerence to any, they cast off this cloth from their shoulders to the 30 Natell stripping themselves halfe naked. They wear their haire long, which issues them for a hat or head-tire, and for greater neatnesse and gallantry they curl it in diuers manners, and anoint it with Butter, which in the Sunne shewes like dew on the grasse. So curious are they herein, that for feare of disordering their curls, they haue a crotch fastned in the Earth, whereon at night they lay their neckes, and so sleepe with their heads hanging. They brand themselves on the whole body, specially on the face. The nilles of their little fingers they suffer to grow to the greatest length, imitating, as much as may be, the spurs of Cocks, which also they sometimes fasten and fit to their fingers. Their hands and feet (which commonly are bare) they dye reddish with the iuyce of a certaine bark. They are a slothfull people, scarcely prouiding necessaries for life, not giuing themselves to hunting or fishing: and 40 although the materials of Woollen, linnen, Cottons, are at hand, yet doe the most of them couer their bodies like beasts, with rude skins; each man commonly wearing a Rimmes skin, the ends fastned at his hands and feet. They lye on the hides of their Kine, without other Beds. In stead of Tables they haue great troughes rudely hollowed whereof they take their meate without cloth or Napkin. Their vessels are of black Earth, few of them are Merchants, besides the Mahumetans. They haue no great Citie, but many vnfortified Villages. Their greatest Towne hath scarcely sixtene houses. They vse litle writing, no not in their publike Iudgements: they haue no Bookes, but for their Holies, and Officers for their accounts. And because we haue mentioned their Iudgements, it shall not be amisse to expresse 50 their forme out of Fernandes. The Emperour hath a House called Cula, low, without any vpper storie. To the doore all such come as haue any suite, euery one according to their differing Language, crying, Lord, Lord: some also imitating the voyces of Beasts, whereby is knowne of what Prouince they are. Then doth the Emperour commit their case to the Vmbare (so are the Iudges called of the word Vmbare, which signifies a three-footed stoole, on which each of them sits, some on the right, others on the left hand. In the Townes the Lords are Iudges, where when any one sueth, the Lord sends one of his Seruants to the Defendant, assigning him a time to make his appearence; and then the Plaigniffe and Defendant plead each his owne case (this is the fashion in Barbary also, and many other places) and after they haue both said what they can, all that are present giue sentence. From this they may appeale to the Vmbares, from them to the Azages, or Supreme Iudges, and from these to the Emperour. Sometimes Iustices Itinerant or Visitors, are sent into the Prouince to enquire of 60 Crimes, which places being bought, cause Iustice to be sold, and these to be Legall Theeues, more dangerous then Out-lawes.

In the flourishing state of the Empire, they say, the Emperour was wont to hold a continuall Progress in the Empire, esteeming it base to live in any City: But wheresoever he abode, there was presently a City of Tents, having due places assigned to all publike and private employments, Churches, Hospitals for sicke, and for the poore, Visiting-houses, Shops of severall Trades, and the like. They say also that this moving City was thirty miles about, and that many thousand Mules, besides Camels, and innumerable Porters attended on the baggage at every remove. But if these things were ever true, the case is much altered in this last Age; and every day growes worse and worse; those things which yee have heard out of the Frier being falses. Neyther was there ever any such Emperours, Alexander the third, by him so often mentioned; but what with the Turkes on the North side, the Moores on the East, the Gallæ from other parts, and intestine Rebellions, each challenging his right, not by Election or Inheritance, so much as by the Sword, all things are brought almost to nothing; and the Æthiopian greatness is now in a great Eclipse. And for that Baltasar which the Frier pretends his Authour, Gedigum sayth, that he being examined hereof, affirmed them to be the Friers Inventions: something he confessed he had published not true, but such as hee thought could doe no man harme. Whatsoever therefore in this Booke is borrowed from that Spaniard, I doe neither in all things disclaime; nor can exact credit thereto; this being the lyers reward, that even in true reports he is doubted. More full Relations of the present State of this Empire, I referre to our next Æthiopian Visitation. The Gallæ before mentioned, are a Nationlesse Nation, eyther the same, or like in conditions to the Giachis or Agges, of which we shall anon speake, which as in Congo and other parts, so here also brought confusion and desolation where they came.

As for those Patriarches, Barretus and Ouedius, Gedigum hath bestowed on each of them a Booke in Relation of their Lives: and inserted Epistles of their owne, to prove the Frier a Lier; Barretus desiring to berid of that Title, which he could not make reall, and Ouedius having a Briefe or Bull from Pius Quintus to free him, and send him to Japan; which hee yet refused upon hopes of better successe, eyther amongst the Christians, or Ethnicks in those parts, many of which in Damus and Sinaxis had desired Baptisme, and by the wicked Emperour were rejected. He propoundeth also an Overture to send five hundred Portuguese Souldiers into those parts, by which strength they might succour themselves, and their followers; an argument of their weaknesse, which could with so small a handful be overcome.

This may be added, that these Æthiopians have their blacke colour in such climature, that they paint Christs, the Angels, and Saints blacke; the Deuill, Judas, Carpenter, Pharisæe, and wicked persons they paint white. They take Sale out of Minerals in pieces of halfe a foote, which serves there instead of money, ten or fiftene of those pieces being the price of a slave; the cause that when Paez, the Iesuit first entred these parts, his Gold could doe him little service, and when a Saracen in his company had dressed him a Hen, yet durst not he take of it, for offending the scrupulous Abissines, who will eat nothing which a Turke hath killed. Hee writes that their houses are base and little, round, of earth, covered with tharch, containing but one room, except the Palaces of great Men. In that yeere 1603, the Grass-hoppers did great harme, which ate vp all that was Greene where they came: a greater misery of Ciuill Warre accompanying, the Emperour being deposed and imprisoned, and another legitimate (for the former was a Bastard) brought out of Prison to the Throne. This new King

* This seemes a common appellation to their Kings. Paez lib. 1. fol. 1605.

Abissalac Caged wrote kind Letters to Paez, to bring him the Lawes of Portugal, and Ouedius Bookes, praying God, that after fouen yeeres imprisonment, The same which the builders refused, was become the head of the corner. He was presently assaulted and much distressed by the Gallæ, whom at that time hee overcame. Not so other Traytors, the chiefe of which was Zacelacem, who slew the Emperour Sauemgul, and executed one Iacobi, whom after heere-linquished and took part with Sauemgul which overthrew Iacobi, and after that imprisoned Zacelacem, who escaped the Prison, but not a Traytor to reward, being slaine by his bandenemen, whose Oxen hee would haue taken away. This Sauemgul still infested with Treasons, for woe an Heremite or Anachoret, which had liued a solitary life twenty yeeres together, conspired against him, aspired to Souerignty, besides many many Others, and the Gallæ, and the effect of both, Robbers and Theues through the Countrey deuiued of any notion with the Romish Church, and writ Letters to the Pope, dated Octob. 14. and to the King of Spain for supplies of Souldiers, Decemb. 10. 1607. the Copies of which letters had inserted in his first Booke. So farre from truth is that Frier which in these times proclaimes such felicity in Æthiopia, vnder I know not what Alexander, the birth of his growing braine

Thiopia Exterior or Inferior, is that Southerly Tract of Africa, which to Ptolemy and the Ancients was vnknowne. It comprehendeth all that great wedge of Land (such is the forme) which beginning in the West, at the Countries about Zaire, stretcheth to five and thirtieth degrees of Southerly latitude, and from thence Northwards, to the entrance or mouth of the Arabian Gulfe; all this way besieged and enuirowed with the Ocean. Maginnu diuideth it into five parts, Aian, Zanguebar, Benomoptapa, Cafraria, and Congo: but Congo is here taken in a very large sense. Aian, after the Arabians account, containeth all that Region which lyeth betweene the mouth of the Red Sea, and Quilimanci; being, for the most part, on the Sea-coast inhabited by the said Arabians: but in the In-land parts thereof, are people which are a blacke heathenish Nation. It comprehendeth two Kingdomes, Adel and Adea; the former of which extendeth from that mouth of the Sea before mentioned, to the Cape Guardafu, by ^b Ptolemy called Aiomana. South and West it bordereth vpon the Dominions of Prete launi, about the Kingdome of Fatigar. The chiefe Citie is Arar. Zeila also before spoken of, and Barborapertayue to this Kingdome, Citie without the Streight, on the Sea, much frequented with Merchants. Zeila is situate in eleuen degrees, where Ptolemy placeth the Analites. It is stored with varietie of merchandize, and yeldeth some representation of Antiquitie in the buildings thereof, consisting of lime and stone. The King is a Moore, and esteemed a Saint among the superstitious Mahumetans, for his continuall warres with the Christian Abassines, whence he transporteth innumerable slaves to the Arabians and Turkes, receiuing in exchange armour and other helpes for his warres. Anno 1541. Gradameth the King before mentioned, or Gradagna, by the helpe of some Portugals, which Claudius the Abassine had in his warres, was slaine, and his Armie ouerthrowne: but his successor, An. 1559. slue Claudius in battaile, and got (as Iohn de Castro affirmeth) the greatest treasure of the world: the Moore acknowledging diuine assistance in this victorie, triumphed on an Ass. Zeila was burnt and sacked by the Portugals, An. 1516. as Andrea c Corsali, who was then present in the action, testifieth.

Adea is situate betweene Adel, Abassia, and the Sea. The Inhabitants are Moores, descended of the Arabians, who many hundred yeeres agoe, partly by their rich traffique, and especially by force of armes, became Lords, not onely of Aian, but of all the Sea-coast, to Cape 40 dos Corrientes, which is somewhat to the South of the Southerly Tropickes. In all which space, before the Portugall Discoueries, that part of the Cities which lay open to the Sea, was open and vnfortified, but toward the Land were walled for feare of the In-land people, Adea payeth tribute to the Abassian. In this Kingdome is Magadazzo, being it selfe a petite Kingdome of the Moores, which are of an oliue colour. ^d Braua was a free Towne, which, with Pate and Gogia, were taken by the Portugals, vnder Trifsan de Cugna. All the Countries adioyning to Prester Iohn, as Dauid the Emperor in his Letter to King Emanuel relateth, are either Moores or Gentiles, of which some worship wood and fire, some the Sunne, others Serpents, &c.

Zanzibar, or Zanguebar, is a name by the Arabians and Persians giuen to that Tract, extending from the Riuer Qualimanci, which Ptolemy calls Rapirus, to the borders of Benomotapa. Some in a larger extent, include Benomotapa and Cafraria. Saunius affirmeth, That it is a lowe, fenny, and woody Countrey, with many Riuers, which by extremitie of moisture cause the ayre to be intemperate. From the waste vpwards they goe naked. Herein are contained the Territories of Melinde, Mombaza, Quiloa, Mosambique, and others. Melinde ^e is the name of a Kingdome, and of the chiefe Citie thereof: the Inhabitants especially nere to the Sea, are Moores, and build their houses after the manner of Europe. The women are white, and the men of colour inclining to white, notwithstanding the situation vnder the Line. They haue black people also, which are Heathens for the most part. Of leile condition is ^f Mombaza (which is said to haue some resemblance with Rhodes) but enemie to the Christians, and was ruined by Thomas Catigao, in the yeere 1589, for receiuing Alebeck the Turke, as Ampara in the same Coast, by Alphonso Mello, a yeere or two before.

B. III.

Of Quilola, Sofala, and Ophir.

Quila stands nine degrees to the South of the Line: the name of a City and Iland, which is a Kingdome of the Moores, and extendeth her Dominion farre in the Coast. It was built (as Marmolus affirmeth) about the foure hundred yeere of the Hirara (so he nameth it) by one Ali, Sonne of Sultan Hafez, who negotiating with his other brethren, by reason their Mothers were Persian, and his an Abissine, sought new Adventures in these parts, and bought this Iland: the History of whom, and of his Successours, you may find in that ⁴ Author.

The King grew mighty by the Trade of Sofala; but it was made tributary to Portugall by Vascon Gama, Anno 1500. In the yeere 1505, the Portugals for denyall of that Tribute, deputed Abraham, the Arabian King, of his Scepter, and built a Fort there; which the Moores soone after destroyed, together with the new King made by the Portugals. The people are whitish, their women comely, rich in attire: their houses faire built, and richly furnished.

Between Cuaua and Cuama, two Rivers which spring out of the same Lake with Nilus, are the Kingdomes of Mombaza, Mozimba, Macuas, Embroe, and against them the Promontory Prassina. Heere is Molambique, * by which name is signified a Kingdome in the Continent, and an Iland also, with a faire Harbour, which with two other Ilands are in the mouth of the River Moghincats, in fiftene degrees South. Molambique is inhabited by Portugals, which haue there a strong Castle: here the Portugals Shippes winter. In this Iland are Sheepe, with tayles of five and twenty pound weight (a beate common in Africa.) Hens blacke both in feathers, flesh, and bone, and sodden, looke like Inke, yet sweeter then other in taste: Porke very good, but for the deare sawce. There are some Mahumetans, as they were all, before the Portugals arrivall there. They haue trade in the Continent, in Sena, Macurus, Sofala, Cuama, a people for the most part differing in speech and behaviour, each Village fighting with her Neighbour, capturing them: and some (as at Macurus) eateth them. Their chieftest living is by hunting, and by flesh of Elephants. In every Village is a new King. The Captaine of Molambique, in his three yeeres gouernment, maketh three hundred thousand Duckets gaine especially, by Gold, from Sofala.

Vp, further within Land the people goe almost naked, and were so simple, when first the Portugals traded thither, * that Ludonice Baribema, or Vertomannus, for his Shirt, and another for a Razor, and a little Bell, bought fiftene Kowes of them; and then they were ready to fall together by the eares among themselves for the Bell, who should haue it. But they could not enjoy their purchase, being driuen to their heeles by three Female Elephants, which hauing young ones, were very fierce, and made them leaue their Kine to saue themselves. In these Seas the Moores layle in Vessels sowed with Leather, the sayles of Palme-tree-leaues calked with Gumme, gathered off the trees in the Woods.

Sofala lyeth between Cuama and Maignie, two Rivers. Heere the Portugals haue on a little Iland (whence the whole Kingdome hath his name) a Fort and Factory of very rich Trade, the people bringing great quantity of Gold (whereof they haue plentifull Mines) for their Cloth and other Commodities: it is supposed amounteth two Millions yearly. Ortelius * is of opinion, That this Cephalo, or Sophala, is that which in Salomon time was called Ophir, from whence so great quantity of Gold was brought by his Naue. Iosephus * seeks for it in India: Eusebius * in the Red Sea, imagining it to be an Iland there placed: Dom, * Niger, Tremellus, and Iuinius in Aurea Chersonesus, where Malacca standeth (although we reade not of any great quantity of Gold found in that soyle.) * Gaspas Varrimus is of the same minde, but reckoneth to the Chersonesus both Pegu and Samotra, with all that lyeth betweene them. And in Samatra they haue a Tradition, that Salomon had his Gold from thence: and in the Letter of the King to his Maiestie, hee entitleth himselfe King of the Mountaine of Gold, Solida, Vanabius * with lesse reason, applyeth it to Spagiola, discovered by Columbus, and by Columbus himselfe so called. Avia * Montanus, Philip Merus, Possellus, Goropius, would by their authority much moue vs to thinke with them, that Ophir is Peru, if the ignorance of the Load-stone, and those huge Seas, esteemed by Antiquity vnnauegable, did not detain vs from consent: & where should Peru yeeld him Iuory, where neuer was yett seene an Elephant? Doctor Des that famous Mathematician hath written a very large Discourse of that Argument, which I haue seene with Master Hakluyt, much illustrating what the Ancients haue written of those Seas and Coasts, and concludeth that Quila is the Kingdome of Aua (subiect to Pegu) and Ophir is Chyrie or Aurea before mentioned, first, possessed by Ophir, mentioned Genesi 10. that golden name eating vp the former of Ophir.

He thinketh, that Salomons Gold, Iuory, &c. came from the Eaſt-Indies.

But ſome reaſons doe yeeld great cauſe of coniecture for Sofala, both becauſe of the plenty of the commodities which Salomons ſeruants are ſaid to bring with them, and becauſe of ancient buildings of ſtone-works, which the 9 Inhabitants call, The worke of Demus; ſuppoſing it impoſſible for men (gheſſing of others by their owne ignorance) to haue built: which alſo haue ſtrange Letters, that the Moores (though learned) could not read: (and why might they not be the old Hebrew Letters, which the Phœnicians of old, and Samaritans to this day obſerue, as elſewhere we haue ſhewed.) And further, Thomas Lopez telleth, that certain Moores related vnto them of the riches of thoſe Mines; that ſhips from Mecca and Zidem viſited to trade there; and that yearly there were taken forth of the Mines two millions of Mittigals, euery Mittigall being a Duckat of Gold, and a third part: That the Warres in thoſe Countries at that time had ceaſed the Traffique: and that they had Bookes and Ancient Writings, which teſtified, That theſe were the Mines whence Salomon in his three Voyages fetched his Gold, and that the Queen of Saba was naturall of the parts of India. As for India, ye haue ſeuen now read that it was a name giuen to many Nations, and among the reſt to Ethiopia. And if a man conſider the ſmall ſkill which that Age of the World had in Marine affaires, ſtill as much as might be holding their courſe within the ſight of Land, hee can ſcarce thinke, that long Navigations could then be performed. Barrus accounteth all Sofala to the Empire of Benomotapa, of which we ſhall ſpeake anon; wee haue now mentioned the ſame, by reaſon of the Ile which is ſubiect to the Portugals. Theſe, beſides Gold, here haue great Trade for Iuory of which Barrus ſaith, that in Benomotapa are yearly ſlaue foure or five thouſands, and of Water-horſes (whole teeth are accounted Iuory alſo) all the great Riuer in Africa are full. Theſe feed ſometimes on the Medowes, where the Mariners haue chafed them, as Lopez reporteth: and after long chafing by Land, they haue taken the water; where, in reuenge, they haue aſſaulted the Mariners in their Boats, and bitten chips off the ſame, being, by the thickneſſe of their Hides armed againſt their Pikes, and haue made them afraid, that they would ouerwhelme the Boat.

Of Monoemugi, the Moores, Baduines, Capbars, in theſe parts.

Methin the Land, (behinde theſe parts, is the Kingdome of Monoemugi, which is rich in Gold: their vnfortunate Warres with Benomotapa, haue made them knowne. Nilus is their Weſterne border, and Abiſſia on the North. They haue little red Bals made of a kinde of Clay in Cambaya, and reſembling Glaſſe, which they weare for ornament, and vſe for money. This King warreth with the Benomotapa, and hath terrible Souldiours, called Giacqui, or Agab, or Agog, who inhabite between the Lakes whence Nilus and Zaire take their beginnings; which haue a wandering life, like the Nomades, in Cottages which they make in the fields. They are of ſtature tall, and of countenance terrible, making lines vpon their cheekes with certaine iron Inſtruments, and turning their eye-lids backward, eating their enemies.

Theſe not long ſince (as ſome ſay) inuaded the Kingdome of Congo, and forced the King to keepe in a ſmall Ile, where himſelfe was taken with a Droptic; and his people famiſhed, as after ſhall follow in due place. The Amazones of Monoemugi are euery way equal vnto them in prowefſe. Little is knowne of the Religion of theſe Heatheniſh Nations nor of other Kingdomes, whereof we haue little but the names to relate, Gorous, Colta, Anzuga, Moneulo, Baduis.

Now, for thoſe Moores which inhabited the Sea-coaſts as we haue ſaid, they are diſperſed as farre as Benomotapa, but are not all Catholike Mahumetans, eſpecially ſuch of them as haue conuerſed, and taken their habitations further within Land. And the firſt Moores or Arabians that came to inhabite thoſe Coaſts, were baniſhed perſons, called as the Chronicles of Quilna is reporeed, Emoradin of Zaide, the Nephew of Hocem the ſonne of Hali, whoſe Doctrine they followed in ſome opinions, contrary to the Alcoran, and therefore eſteemed Hereticks.

Long after them came three ſhips with great multitudes of Arabians, that fled from the King of Laza their enemy, vnder the conduct of ſeuē Brethren, which built Magadazzo, and after that, Braua; which in manner of a Common-wealth, was till the Portugals time gouerned by twelue Aldermen, or chiefe Gouernours, that deſcended of the ſeuē Brethren.

Baduini.

These Moores and the former differing from each other in their superstitions, could not agree, and therefore the Emozadin were forced vp higher into the Countrey, and thereby marriages mixed themselves with the Casers (so the Arabians call all Heathen people) and became Mungrels in a Galli-maufrey of Deuotions, whom therefore the Sea-coast-Moores called by a general name, a Baduini, which in Arabia and Egypt, is the title of the people that lue in the Champaine, and In-land Countreys: and those that lue neere the Sea-coast are called Arabians.

b In a great written Booke giuen by Sir W. Ral. to M. Haq.

They make no difference of meats, Don Iohn de Castro writeth, that Badoli signifieth a man that liueth onely by cattell: and that the Troglodites, and Nations from Mcinde and Magadnxa to Cape Guardafu, and on both sides of the straits, and on the Arabike Sea, to Ormuz (occupying rather then inhabiting the soyle) are called Badoica. They are (saith he) sauege, without truth or ciuiline, they are Mahumetanes, but accounted badde Moores, Thieues and Robbers, eating raw flesh, drinking milke, their habite filthy; very swift, holding warre with all men; (as was prophesied of Ismael their Progenitor) from Zeila to Souchen with the Abexijs, from thence to Alcocer with the Nobijs, from thence to Soez with the Egyptians, from Soez to Ormuz with the Arabians. They haue no King nor great Lord, but lue in troupes and fashions; permit no Towne in their fields, haue no certaine habitation, but wander from place to place with their cattell, Their Xique determineth suits as hee listeth, Their lodging is in Caves and holes, of the most in Tents, their colour very blacke, their Language Arabicke.

The Heathens in those parts are giuen to Auguries and Witcheries: and in their highest attempts and greatest resolutions, yet will leaue off, if any of these phantasies bode vn-luckinesse. The fruits, birds, beasts, and seeds, are in manner like to the people, all wilde. The ayre is vnhealthsome. But what vnhealthfomeneesse can there be found, where gold is found? which makes men commit themselves (no maruell what they commit with others) to the most scorching heats, to contagious ayres, to tempestuous Seas, and the darke prisons of the dismembelled Earth.

Modestly had almost forbidden me to recite that, which may with some easie obtaine a Plaudite, in the last Act and finishing of this Chapter, concerning the Casars. Linschoten shall recite it for me. They lue, saith he, like beasts (he speaketh of those which lue neere Mosambique, and those especially more within the Land) they are blacke as pitch, with flat noses, thicke lips, some haue holes both aboue and vnder in their lips, and, as it were, other mouths in their cheekes, wherein they thrust small bones to beautifie themselves: for which cause they raze and seare their bodies with Irons. If they will make a diuellish forme and Picture, they represent a white man in his apparell, as thinking nothing more vgly. Some also file their teeth as sharpe as Needles. They haue Villages wherein they dwell together, and in euery Village a Lord or King, to whom they are subiect. Religion and Faith are vnknowne to them. They vse mutuall warres, and some eate mans flesh. When they take Prisoners in warre, or kill their Enemies, they observe a more then beastly testimony of their great valour, which is after this manner.

They cut off their priuy members (to deprive them of all hope of generation) and then dry them well for preseruatiou: after which they come before the King with great reuerence, in the presence of the principall men of the Villages, and there take these members, so dried, one by one in their mouthes, and spit them on the ground at the Kings feet, which the King with great thanks accepteth; and the more to honour them, causeth them all to be taken vp and giuen to them againe, which is from thenceforth an Ensigne of their Knight-hood. For they take all those members, and tye them on a string like a bracelet or chaine; and at all solemne meetings, as when they marry or goe to a wedding or feast, the Bride, or wiues of these Knights, doe weare that chaine about their necks, being, saith our Author, among them as great an honour as the Golden-Fleece, or the Renowned GARTER with vs, and their wiues as proud thereof, as if some Crowne or Scepter had besafene them.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Benomotapa, and the parts adioyning.

Of the Empire of Monomotapa.

BEnomotapa, ^a called also Benomotaxa, and Monomotapa, is a large Empire, so entituled after the name of the Prince thereof (for Benomotapa is with them a Title, as Cæsar or Emperour with vs, the Portugals call him Emperour of the Gold) extendeth after some mens reckoning almost a thousand Leagues in compasse, betwene the great Lake, whence Nilus springeth on the North-East, Magnice and Toroa on the South, and the Sea-coast of Sofala on the East. It is betwene the Sea and the fresh waters, accounted a huge Island, betwene Cuama and Corrientes it is pleasant and wholesome and fruitfull: and from the Cape Corrientes to Magnice, it abounds with beasts; but it is cold. Their principall Cities are Zimbas (haply the same which Ptolomey ^b calls Agisymba) and Benamataza; that one and twenty, this fifteene dayes journey, from Sofala. Of the abundance of Elephants in Benomotapa is said before; whereof Æthiopia is euery where stored with manifold herds: ^c although I dare not subscribe to their opinion that esteeme Elephants as common there, as heere we haue Oxen. It is a creature nine cubits high (in their largest stature) and five cubits thick: with long and broad eares, little eyes, short tayles, and great bellies. Of their disposition is spoken already. Some say five thousand are yearlyaine in these parts.

The Mines neereſt to Sofala, are those of Manica, which are in wide Champaines compassed with mountaines, ninety miles in circuit. The places where the Gold is, appeare and are knowne by the drinſſe and barrenneſſe of the soyle, as if Nature it selfe could not horde vp 30 Gold in her spacious chest, but she must needs proue bare and barren of her wanted good work; and how much lesse vnnatural and degenerate mankind? The Province is called Matuca, the people Botonghi (which although they are betwene the Line and the Tropike) yet in Winter haue such ſnowes in the mountaines, that if any abide there, they dye frozen in them; and in Summer-time the ayre in the tops of those hills is so cleare and pure, that some of our men, which were then there, saw the New-Moone, the same day that shee had kissed her bright and bountifull Brother.

And who can now charge that bright Eye of the World, with the obscure darkneſſe of this Peoples hue, which so cold Winters, nor pure Summers, can lessen or lighten? Yea, even in the cold Countries neere the Cape of Good-hope, the Æthiopians haue no hope or hap of good colour; whereas the hotter Countreys of Libya, and in manner all America 40 (notwithstanding the Sunnes strait looking, and acerenesse, not allowing them a shadow to attend them in the greatest height of his bounty) know not this blacke tincture in the Natives thereof.

But to returne (and who will not returne?) to the Mines: There are other Mines in the Provinces of Boro and Jiquiciu, in which and in the Rivers, is found Gold not so pure. The people are carelesse and negligent to get, and the Moores which traded with them, were faine to giue their wares in trust, with promise by such a time to pay them in Gold, and the people would not faile in their word.

Other Mines are in Toroa, wherein are those buildings which Barrus attribureth to 50 some former ^a Prince, and I for the reasons before alledged, to Salomon. It is a square Fortresse of stone; the Stones of marvellous greatneſſe, without any signe of mortar or other matter to ioyne them. The wall five and twenty ſpannes thicke, the height not holding proportion. Over the gate are letters, which learned Moores could neither reade, nor know what letters they were. There are other buildings besides, of like fashion. The people call them the Court, for an Officer keeps it for the Benomotapa, and hath charge of some of his women, that are there kept. They esteeme them beyond humane power to build, and therefore account them the workes of Deuls, and the Moores which saw them, said the Portugals Castles were no way to bee compared to them. They are five hundred and ten miles from Sofala, Westward, in one and twenty degrees of Southerly Latitude: in all which space is not found one building ancient or later; the people are rude, and dwell in Corteges 60 or Tabber.

All the people of this Region is of curled hayre, and more ingenious then those which are constant in battaile, & most constant in inconstancie: for when they make shew of flight, they will returne (spying their advantage) with the greatest fury. They dwell in certaine Countreys betwix the Idles, and at certaine times have men to accompany with them for generation, to whom they lend their Males, reserving all the Female Children to themselves. Thus we find Amazons, which the Ancients reported in Asia, and Diodorus in such they have now in these times, if this report bee true, in Ethiopia: and Hudierius Scimitar had sold the like in America. Others deny it: and none hath yet written of them from his owne sight. For my part, no amazonian hath yet conquered my credit.

In the yeere 1560, Consalus 1 Silueria, with two other Ieluites, went from Goa to the Kingdome of Inhamban, and Monomotapa: and coming to Inhamban, they went to Tonge, the City Royall, where they baptized the King and all his people in a short space, naming the King Constantine, the Queene Mary. Thence went Consalus to Monomotapa, and so preballed with his Images, Preaching, and contempt of the World, that he wanne the King and his Mother, with multitudes of others to Baptisme. But soone after, the King, by suggestion of the Moores, flue him. Sebastian in reuenge rayled an Armie of sixteen hundred, most of them being Gentlemen, which he sent vnder the conduct of Francis Barreto, the Benomotapa fearing the Portugals forces, offered reasonable conditions, which Barreto refusing, was discomfited, not by the Negro, but by the Ayre; the malignity whereof (the sowre sauce of all these Golden Countreys in Africa) consumed his people. There are 20 other Kingdomes adioyning to Monomotapa, and the Mountaynes of the Moone, Marana, Melemba, Quinbebe, Berreca, Baugau, of which I can give you but the names.

30 Aphraria, or the Land of the Caphars is next to be considered, which Magnum boundeth betweene Rio de Spiritu Sancto, and Cape Negra, extending to the Cape of Good Hope Southwards. Why hee should call this part the Caphars, I know not: for the Arabians, of whom this word is borrowed, give that name to all the Heathen people in Africa; yea both the Arabians, and all of their Religion, call all such as receive not that Superstition, Caphars, even Christians also, as Master Jenken long since told vs. And for the Heathens in Africa, Barris affirmeth, that it is by the Moores given to them all: signifying, Wilde Law, or lawlesse people. Zanguebar is in this respect called Cafaria. It should seeme it is appropriated to these the Southerliest Nations of Africa; for want of other the more true proper names which were unknowne. With the names of the Capes, and other places of note, Master Pory hath already acquainted his English Reader: Only that notable and famous Cape of Good Hope, (so named ^b by Iohn the Second, King of Portugal, for that hope which he conceived of a way to the Indies, when it was first discovered) deserveth longer mention. It hath three head-lands, the Welmost beareth name of Good Hope: the middlemost Cape Falso, because they have sometimes in their returne into the Indies, mistaken this for the former: betwene which two Capes runneth into the Sea, a mighty River, called by the Portugals Rio dulce, which springs out of a Lake called Gale, situate among the Mountaynes of the Moone, so much celebrated by the ancient Geographers: The third and Eastermost, is that of Agulhas or Needles about five and twenty leagues from the first: both which seeme as two hornes, wherewith it threatens the Ocean, which these parts is found oftentimes tempestuous, and when it cannot praye away against this rough-faced and horned Promontory, it wrekes the whole malice upon the ships, whose ribs in the enraged fit, it would brake if they were of Iron; as Linschoten ^d testifieth of his owne experience. True it is, that sometimes it is passed with more ease; but not so usually: and Linschoten tels, that at his returne from India, the Saint Thomas, a new Carricke, was heere cast away, & of their ship wherein he layed, in such danger, that one while they prayed, another while murmured, another suffered such good Catholikes to endure such torments, and the English Hereticks and Blaphemers to passe so easily. The waves there (say they) strike against a ship, as if they stricke against a Hull, that if it were of stone it would be broken.

When they had paſſ'd this Cape, they loſt their Admirall, Captaine Raimond, and neuer ſaw them, or heard of them more. And foure dayes after they found as terrible an Enemy from aboue, and encountered with a Thunder clap, which ſlue foure of their men out-right, their neckes being wrung aſunder. And of tourelcore and fourteene men there was not one vntouched; but ſome were blind, others bruſed in their legs and armes, or breſts, others drawne out, as if they had bene racked; which all yet, God be thanked, did after recover.

The lame Sir Lames Lancaſter was after this ſent General for the Eaſt India Company, which hauing made a ſtocke of threeſcore and twelue thouſand pound, bought the Dragon of ſixe hundred tunnes, the Helſtor of three hundred, the Aſcenſion of two hundred & foureſcore, the Suſan of two hundred and threeſcore, and ſent in them in Merchandize and Spaniſh Money, to the value of ſeuē and twenty thouſand pound. The Scorbute ſo weakened their men, that they were not able to hoyle out their Boates, except in the Generals ſhip, whoſe men (ſtrinking euery morning three ſpoonefulls of the iuyce of Limons) were healthfull. He bought a thouſand ſheepe in Soldania & forty two Oxen as bigge as ours, the ſheepe greater, but hairy, and might haue bought more, for old Iron. The people, he ſayth, are rawny; Cornelius Houman ſayth, Oliue blacke, blacker then the Brailians, their haire curled and blacke, as in Angola, not circumciſed, clocke like a brood-hen in ſpraking, paint their faces with diuers colours, ſtrong, active, ſwift, ſubieſt to Mouomotapa: they ſlue ſome Flemings for wrongs, which made the Engliſh warie in trading with them. Sir Edward Michellborne found here great reliefe. Beſides great Herds of Oxen and Flocks of Sheepe, heere is abundance of Deere, Antelopes, Baboones, Foxes, Hares, Oſtriches, Cranes, Pellicans, Herons, Greſe, Ducks, Phealants, Partridges, &c. A great Bullocke they might buy for an old Iron hoope not worth two pence, a Sheepe for a piece nor worth two good Horſenayles. The people liued on the guts and filth of the meate which our men caſt away, not ſo much as waſhing the ſame, but couering them ouer with hot aſhes, before they were through hot, pulled them out, and ſhaking them a little with their hands, did eate both ſkins, excrements, and aſhes. They hūe vpon raw fleſh and certayne Roots. Sir Henry Middleton, a General of the foure ſhips aboue-named, found (in his returne) three and fifty men dead in the Helſtor at this Bay, and but renleft: The Suſan was loſt, it was thought for want of men. And long before the Trade of the Engliſh (which is now very much increaſed in the Eaſterne parts) Giananni da Empoli ſelleth, That neere the Cape, the Countrey people would giue them a Kow for a little Bell. The men and women were clothed, or rather a little couered with hairy ſkinnes, the women beautifying this their beaſtly habits with the tayles of the beaſts, hanging downe before and behind to couer their ſhame. Theſe women had large and deformed pap's. Religion they could obſerue none amongst them, and thought that they eat their fleſh raw.

The Hollanders alſo in the yeere 1595. trafficked with theſe Caſres, which were valiant; but baſe in appattell, couered with Ox or Sheep-skins wrapped about their ſhoulders, with the hairy ſide inward, in forme of a Mantle; their priuy parts couered with a Sheepes tayle, faſtened before and behind with a Girdle. But now we ſee it made a daily matter to the Portugall, Engliſh and Dutch, ſo capable of Hope of Good, that the Cape of Good Hope is not like feared; although at home many take exceptions as if there were no good hope of publique good, & wiſh that they would carry out of Europe leſſe Money, & bring home more men: but of this elſewhere is ſpoken at large. I cannot omit, that vpon the top of this Promontory, Nature hath as it were framed her ſelfe a delightfull Bower, here to ſit and contemplate the great Seas, which from the South, Eaſt and Weſt beat vpon this ſhore: and therefore hath here formed a great plaine, pleaſant in ſituation, which with the fragrant herbes, variety of flowers, and flouriſhing verdure of all things ſeemes a terreſtriall Paradiſe. It is called the Table of the Cape. That which from hence lyeth to Cape Negro, hath not to our purpoſe any thing notable. This alſo deſerueſt mention, that notwithſtanding all the damages of this dreafull Promontory, and the Seas on this ſide and beyond, James Beſtelius, a Portugall, to recover the fauour of his Prince, Iohn the third, by the firſt bringing newes of a happy accident that then befall in India, in a little Boat or Veſſell ſcarce eightene footes long, and fix broad, ſayled from Cochlin to Dabul, and from thence alongſt the Arabian and African ſhores, doubling this terrible Cape, and miſſing Saint Helena, came yet ſafe to Liſbone, worthily welcom'd both for his miſſage, and the meſſenger, that duſt aduenture to encounter Nepherites (ſtronger forces, notwithſtanding ſo weak furniture.

The Hollanders at the Cape of Good Hope, (if you will heare other teſtimonies) had of the Inhabitants two Kine for two ruſty Knives, and one much greater for a new one: two fat Buls and three Sheepe for a barre of Iron, weighing threeſcore and ten pound. The people make make much account of Iron: they are of short stature: darkish colour: their armes are adorned with Copper and Iuory, their fingers with Rings of Gold, and with Beads of bone and wood. They brand their bodies with diuers marks: And because they alway anoint themselves with greafe and fat, they yeeld a ranke smell. If wee killed a beast for our vie, they would take the inwards, and eat them raw: the fish being not well clesned from them. At their Feasts they would seeke a beast in his hide, fastned on foure flickes with fire vnderneath. They liue miserably, yet for gallantry wear bones and pieces of dried flesh about their neckes. Neere this Cape are weeds growing in the Sea fure and twenty fathome long.

- 10 The Ascension built their Pinnaſſe, Anno 1608. at Soldania, about fiftene or sixtene leagues from the Cape of Good Hope, and there tooke in for their prouision about foure hundred head of Castell, as Oxen, Steeres, Sheepe, and Lambes, together with fowles and fresh water. They filled their Boat with Scales at the Ile Pengwin, a little from thence. Such was the brutish nature of the Inhabitants, that when the English had cast out of their ship one of those Scales, and the same had lien fourtene dayes, and now swarmed with crawling Maggots, they would take them vp and eat them; as they would also doe the guts, garbage, and panch of the beast. They more esteemed Iron, then Gold or Siluer. Heere the first night after they weighed Anchor. The Ascension lost the Vniou, and the Good Hope their Pinnaſſe (so neere the Cape of Good Hope) which, mee thinkes, obseruing what after befell them,
- 10 ſeemes an ominous preſage, written in these names, of their other losses which followed, concluded with the losse of their ship on the Coast of Cambaya. It is morally true, that ascending and aspiring minds lose Vniou (9 for enely by pride doth man make Contention) Vniou being gone, Good Hope followeth, Qua concordia cresunt, discordia & res & spes perunt: and so it befell in this their Tragedie, after the losse of those Vessels which bare such names. The ship was lost by the Masters indiscretion, but yet hath the honour (huruiuing her faces) that shee was the first English ship that euer layed on those Seas.

Although we haue bene tedious in this Cape and the Bay of Soldania, yet I haue thought it not amisse to adde somewhat out of later Relations. Master Copland writes that the Ayre here is so wholesome, and the Earth so fertile, as might with helpe of Art become a Paradise. Euen Nature it selfe hath diuersified the Soyle in an entercourse of Mountaynes, Plaines,

- 30 Woods, Melowes, Streames, as intending so pleasant a variety, in a seeming artificiall Order. Their many sicke men, exposed on shore in Tents, within twenty dayes were all (one excepted) found assed first day. They bought nine and thirty Beues, and one hundred and fiftene Sheepe for a little Brasse or Copper cut out of two or three old Kettles. The people are lousy, but were at the first afraid by reason of some unkindnesses receiued from the Dutche, which had bene there to make trane, and had killed and stolne their Cattell. They are of middle size, well limmed, very nimble and active, dance in true measure: wear short Clokes of Sheepe or Seales skings to their waste with a Cap of the same, the haire inwards, a Rats skin about their priuities, some of them haue soles tyed about their feet, their
- 40 neckes adorned with Chaines of greasie Trypes (or guts also in many doubles) which they would sometimes pull off and eate flinking and raw; they did also eate the entrayles by vs throwne away, halfe raw (and would scramble for it like hungry Dogges) loathsomely besmeared with the blood: they wear Bracelets of Copper or Iuory about their armes with Ostrich feathers and shels. The habit of women is like the former, which at our first coming seemed shamefast, but at our returne would impudently vncover that which here must bee couered with silence; their breasts hang downe to their middles; Their haire is curled: Copper with them is Gold, and Iron Siluer: their Houses little Tents in the Fields, made of skins, at their pleasure remoued. On the high Hill called the Table may be seene an hundred miles about: some ascended and thence tooke obseruation of many Bayes and Riuers. Hee
- 50 thinks these parts might be profitably planted with an English Colony.

One sayth of this people, that they are idle, not so much as hauing a Canow, nor knowing to take cyther for fowle or fish, whereof they haue store; theuſell and swiftly running away with that which they haue stolne. By trading with the Dutche and English, their prices of things are rayſed, as you here see, to some more Copper or Iron, then at the first Discoueries. Their Beasts are large, their Sheepe smooth and short haired (not woolly) like a young Calfe, with long and broad eares, hanged like Hounds; their hornes short and tender, easily broken; their tayles greater then any part of a mans legges, some weighing 40. pounds, their Beues are large, and most of them leane. The men haue but one stone, the other being cut away when they are young; the reason seemes to bee some reasonlesse Superstition brought towards the Sunne, which they point vnto being demanded thereof. The Hollor brought thence one of these Saluages, called Cory, which was carried againe, and there landed by the Newyee gift, June 21. 1614. in his Copper Armour, but returned not to them whiles the the Ships continued in the Road, but at their returnes in March was twelve-moneth after, he came, and was ready to any service, in helping them with Beeties and Sheepe. The wilde beeties are dangerous in the night, as Lions, Antilopes and others, some of which in one night, carried away twelve pieces of meate, laid in the River to water, covered with a stone of two hundred weight, which was remoued also a very great distance. The Penguins in the land nere to Soldania, haue flumps in stead of wings, and with their feet swimme fast. There are Seales a shoale and sleeping in an Heard, on the Rocks: Myce, and Rats, and Snakes innumerable. There are fallow Deere, Porcupines, Land Tortoyses, Snakes, Adders, wild Geese, Ducks, Pellicans, Crows with a white band about their necks, Penguins, Gulls, Pintalos, Alcatrafes, Cormorants, Whales, Seales, &c.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Kingdome of Congo, and the other Kingdomes and Nations adioyning.

I.
Of Angola.

THe Kingdome of Congo (vnderstanding so much by the name, as in times past hath bene subiect thereto) hath on the West, the Ocean; on the South, the Capbars, and mountaynes of the Moone; on the East, those Hills from which the Rivers issue and runne into the Fountaynes of Nilus; and on the North, the Kingdome of Benin. Of these Countreys, Pigafetta, from the Relation of Odoardo Lopez, a Portugall, hath written two booke, out of whom P. du Larric, Botero, and others, haue taken most of their reports.

And in this we will begin with the most Southerly parts; in which we first come into the Kingdome of Matama (this is the Kings proper name) who being a Gentile, ruleth ouer diuers Provinces, named Quimbebe. This is a Kingdome great and mightie, extending from Brazual to Baga midri: the ayre thereof is wholsome, the earth outwardly furnished with store of fruits, inwardly with mines of Cryfall, and other metall. The Signiorie; toward the Sea-coast are very meane, and want Hauens.

Angola sometime a Province of the Kingdome of Congo, is now a great Kingdome it selfe and very populous. They speake the same language (with small difference of dialect) that is used in Congo; whose yoke they cast off since the Congois became Christians. Diaz first discovered these parts for the Portugals An. 1486. And the Portugals vsed to trade quietly with the Angolans: but some of them trading as high into the Countrey as Cabaz-zi; the Royall Citie, which is an hundred and fiftie miles from the Ocean, were there by order from the King put to the sword, vnder pretence of intended treason. This was done 1578. Paulo Dias: (to whom the King Sebastian had giuen the government of these parts) receiuing licence to conquer three and thirtie leagues along the Coast to him and his heires, to reuenge himselfe for this despitefoll done to his people, armed such Portugals as hee had, and with two Gallies and other Vessels, which he kept in the River Coanza; hee went on both sides the River, conquering and subduing many Lords vnto him. The King of Angola receiued a mightie Arme of a million of men; as is supposed. For they vse to leaue none at home, that is fit to carrie a weapon: and make no preparation for victuall, but such as haue any carrie it vpon the shoulders of their seruants, and therefore no manuell if their food beeing soe consumed, their camps be soe dissolved. Small likewise is their provision of armour for offence, and for defence much lesse. Diaz, sent to the King of Congo for aid, who sent him sixtie thousand men with which, and his owne Nation, he made his partie good against the confused tribes of the Angolans. The traile of Angola is yet continued, and from thence the Portugals buy and carry to Brasil, and other parts yearly, a world of slaves which are brought within the Land, and are captiues taken in their warres. Paulo Dias at his death bequeathed the felicitie as much as might maintayne his hundred of that Spaine in those parts. Master Thomas Thuermer, one that had liued a long time in Brasil, and had also bene at Angola, reported to me, that it was supposed eight hundred and twentie thousand slaves (a number almost incredible) yet such as the Portugals (as they say) were yearly shipped from Angola to Brasil, and the House of Albuquerque. He said to me a rich Portugall in Brasil, which had ten thousand of his owne, working in his Ingenios, (of which he had eight score) and in his other employments. His name was John du Paul, exiled from Portugall, and thus enriched in Brasil. A thousand of his slaves at one time, entered into conspiracie with nine thousand other slaves in the Countrey, and barricaded themselves for their best defence against their Masters, who had much adoe to reduce some of them into their former seruitude.

To returne to Angola, we may add the report of another of our Countrey-men, Andrew Battell (my neere neighbour, dwelling at Leigh in Essex) who serued vnder Manuel da Silva Pereira, Gouernour vnder the King of Spaine, at his City of Saint Paul; and with him went large into the Countrey of Angola, their Arme being eight hundred Portugals, and sixtie thousand Naturals. This Andrew Battell testifieth, that they are all Heathens in Angola. They had their Idolls of wood in the midst of their temples, fashioned like a Negro, and at the foot thereof was a great heape of Elephants teeth, conyaining three or foure tunns of them;

these were piled in the earth, and vpon them were set the skulls of dead men, which they had slain in the warres, in monument of their victorie. The Idoll they call Mokisso, and some of them haue houses built ouer them. If any be sicke, he accounteth it Mokisso's hand, and sendeth to appeale his angrie god, with powring wine (which they haue of the palme-tree) at his feet. They haue proper names of distinction for their Mokisso's, as Kissungu, Kaliketu, &c. and vie to sweare by them, Kissungu wy, that is, by Kissungu. They haue another more solemne oath, in triall of Controuersies: * for which purpose they lay a kinde of Hatchet, which they haue, in the fire, and the Ganga-Mokisso, or Mokisso's Mokisso taketh the same red hot, and draweth it neere to the skinne of the accused partie; and if there bee two, hee causeth their legges to bee set neere together, and draweth this hot Iron without touching betwene them; if it burnes, that partie is condemned as guiltie, otherwise hee is freed.

For the ceremonies about the dead, they first wash him, then paint him, thirdly apparell him in new clothes, and then bring him to his graue, which is made like a vault; after it is digged a little way downe, vndermined, and made spacious within, and there set him on a seate of earth, with his beades (which they vse in chaines and bracelets for ornament) and the most part of his goods, with him in his lasting home. They kill Goats, and shed the blood in the graues, and powre wine there, in memoriall of the dead.

They are much giuen * to diuination by birds. If a bird die on their left hand, or crye in some manner which they interpret ominous and vnluckie, they will cease from the enterprises which they haue in hand. Their Priests are * called Gange, and so highly reputed, that the people thinke it in their power to send plentie or scarcitie, life or death. They are skillfull in medicinall herbes and in poysons; and by familiaritie with the Duell foretell things to come.

In Angola euery man taketh as many wives as he will. There are mines of silber, and of most excellent copper. They haue many Kine, but lous dogs better then any other flesh, and fat them to the shambles. Andrew Battell saith, that the dogs in those Countries are all of one sort, prick-eared Curses of a meane bignesse, which they vse also to hunt with, but they open not; (for they cannot bark) and therefore they hang clappers made of little boards about their necks. Hee hath seene a M. lisse sold for three slues. Lopez affirmeth, 36 that a great dogge was exchanged for two and twentie slues; which might happen vpon some extraordinarie occasion. The money in Angola is glasse-beades, which they vse also, as is said, for ornament. The King of Angola hath seemed willing to become Christian, and hath sent to the King of Congo for that purpose, but could not obtayne any Priests in that scarcitie to instruct him.

Andrew Battell.

This Kingdome hath many Lordships subiect thereto, as farre on the Sea-coast as Cape Negro. Towards a Lake called Aquelunda, lyeth a Countrey called Quizama, the Inhabitants whereof being gouerned after the manner of a Common-wealth, haue shewed themselves friendly to the Portugals, and helped them in their warres against Angola. The houses in Angola are made in fashion like a Bee-hiue. The women at the first sight of the newe 40 Moone, turne vp their Bummes, in despiight, as offended with their menitiuous cosures, which they ascribe vnto her. The men sometimes in a valorous resolution, will deuote themselves vnto some haughie attempt in the warres: and taking leaue of the King, will vow neuer to returne, till they bring him a horse-head, or some other thing very dangerous in the enterprise, and will either doe it, or die. Horse tayles are great Jewells, and two slaves will bee giuen for one tayle, which commonly they bring from the Riuer of Plate, where horses are exceedingly increased and growne wilde. They will by firing the gralle round about, hemme the horses about with a fierie circle, the fire still streightning and approaching neerer, till they haue advantage enough to kill them: Thus haue the European Cartell, of horse and kine, so increased in that other World, as they spare not to kill the one for their 50 hides, and the other for their tayles.

Of Congo.

* Od. Lopez.

NEXT to Angola Northwards, * is the Kingdome of Congo, the western Line whereof Lopez extendeth three hundred threescore & fifteen miles, the Northern five hundred and fortie; the Eastern, five hundred; and the Southern three hundred and threescore. The breadth thereof from the mouth of Zaïre, crossing ouer the Mount:ynes of the Sunne, and the Mountaynes of Crytal, is six hundred miles: And yet is it much frighted of the ancient bounds, only the title except, which still holdeth the old stile; 60

Don ALVARO King of Congo, and of Abundos, and of Matamba, and of Quixama, and of Angola, and of Cacongo, and of the seven Kingdome of Congere Amolaza, and of the Longelungos, and Lord of the River Zaire, and of the Anziqua, and Anziguana, and of Loango. The present Kingdome is divided into sixe Prouinces, Bamba, Songo, Sundi, Pango, Batta, Pemba. Bamba is the chiefe for greatnesse and riches, then gouerned by Don Sebastian Mani-Bamba; the word Mani is a title of honour, and signifieth a Prince or Lord: when need requireth, the Mani-Bamba may haue in campe foure hundred thousand men of warre. There is in mines of siluer: and on the Sea-coast a kinde of shells which they vse for money: for siluer and gold is not vsed for money amongst them. In this Prouince are yeerely bought by the Portugals about fise thousand Negros. There are among them very mightie men that will cleaue a slaue in the middle, or cut off a Bulls head at one blow: Yes, one of them did beare on his arme a vessel of wine, containyng the fourth part of a Butt, and might weigh three hundred and fise and twentie pound, vntill it was cleane emptied. There are certaine creatures as bigges as Rammes, and haue wings like Dragons, with long tayles and chaps and diuers rowes of teeth, and feede vpon raw flesh. Their colour is blue and greene, their skine be-painted like scales, and they haue but two feet. These the Pagan Negros doe worship for gods, and at this day many of them are kept for a miracle: And because they are very rare, the chiefe Lords doe curiously preferue them, and suffer the people to worship them, in regard of the profit which accrueth to them, by the offerings which the people make vnto them. Other creatures of these parts are mentioned in the first Chapter of the former Booke. Peacocks are not common, and are very deare, their feathers being vsed for Royall Ensignes. The King of Angola bringeth vp some in an inclosed wood, and suffereth none to keepe them but himselfe. To speake at large of the other fise Prouinces, would bee tedious to the Reader, and Master Hartwell hath taught Lopez to speake English, of whom such as are desirous, may be further satisfied. Over-against the Ile Loanda, where the shell-money is gathered, is vpon the Continent, the Towne of Saint Paul, inhabited with Portugals and their wives.

The Rivers of Congo are many; Bengo, Coanza, Dande, Lembe, Ozone, Loze, Ambriz, and the greatest of all, Zaire: all which haue some, either affinitie in mutuall mariages of their streames, or consanguinitie in the Fountaynes from whence they flow, which are certayne Lakes, one of which is Zembre, the other Aqualunda. In all these Rivers are common the rarities of Nilus, the ouer-flowing of the waters, River-horses, Crocodiles, and such like. Andrew Bastell told mee of a huge Crocodile, which was reported to haue eaten a whole Alibamba, that is, a companie of eight or nine slaues chayned together, and at last payed for his greedinesse; the chaine holding him slaue, as before it had the Negroes, and by his vndigestible nature deuouring the Deuourer; remayning in the belly of him after he was found, in testimonie of this victorie. Hee hath seene them watch and take their prey, haling a Gennet, Man, or other Creature into the waters. A Souldier thus drawne in by a Crocodile, in shallower waters, with his knife wounded him in the belly, and flue him. In their Summer it rayneth not, and then the places in their Winter (the time of the Sunnes neereest presence, attended with daily raynes) covered with water, doe grow thicke, and matted with abundance of little trees, herbes and plants, which the fatned wombe of that moist soile conceiue by the directer beames of the Sunne, and the ouer-flowing waters in the Winter carry away, as it were small * Ilands; lifting them vp together with the rootes and soile, the young Trees and Deere standing and growing thereon, carried captiue vnto Nephtunes eternall prisons. In Bengo and Coanza they are forced to set vp, for a time, houses vpon cratches, their other houses being taken vp for the Rivers lodgings. Zaire is of such force, that no ship can get in against the Current, but neere to the shore: yea it preuailes against the Oceans saltnesse threecore, and as some say, fourescore miles, within the Sea, before his proud waues yeeld their full homage, and recieue that salt temper in token of subiection. Such is the haughtie spirit of that streame, which ouer-running the low Countries as it passeth, and swollen with conceit of daily Conquests, and daily Supplies, which in Armies of showres are by the clouds sent to his succour, runnes now in a furious rage, thinking euen to swallow the Ocean, which before he neuer saw, with his mouth wide gaping, eight and twentie miles, as Lopez affirmeth, in the opening; but meeting with a more Giant-like enemy, which lyes lurking vnder the cliffes to receiue his assault, is presently swallowed in that wider wombe; yet so, as alwayes being conquered, hee neuer giues ouer, but in an eternall quarrell, with deepe indented frownes in his angrie face, foaming with disdain, and filling the ayre with noyse (which fresh helpe) supplies those forces which the Salt-Sea hath consumed. In this River is a fish called Ambize Angulo, or Hog-fish, that hath, as it were, two hands, and a tayle like a target, which catcheth like a Porke, and whereof they make Lard, and hath not the fauour or taste of fish. It feedeth on the grasse that groweth on the bankes of the River, and neuer goeth out: it hath a mouth like the moozell of an Ox: there are of them that weigh five hundred pound a peece. Obseruing where it feedes, with weapons in their boats, they hinder it from taking water, and hauing taken it, present it to the King (it is vpon perill of life) they smoke it as wee doe Bacon, and telereut for dainties.

About the year 1490. Iohn the second, King of Portugall, sent Consaluo di Sosa, with three ships, and Priests in them, to bring the King and people of Congo to Christian Religion, * which was effected: and although hence arose ciuill warres amongst them, yet the matter was at last ended to the aduancement of the Christian Religion (such as the Portugals taught, and no doubt, infinitely better then their Pagan superstition; howsoever spotted with many Romish stains) and from that time to this, now an hundred and twentie yeeres, hath Congo continued Christian, vnder Iohn, Alfonso, Pedro, and the rest of their Kings.

When the first Bishop of Saint Thomas went into Congo, to take possession of his Pastorall charge there (for the Kingdome of Congo was annexed to the Bishoprick of Saint Thomas) from the Sea-side to the Citie, which is an hundred and fiftie miles, King Pedro caused the wayes to be made smooth and trim, and covered ouer with mats, that the Bishop should not let his feet vpon any part of the ground, not adorned: all the wayes, trees, and higher places (warning with people, offering Lamber, Kids, Chickins, Partridges, Venison, F-sh, and other necessities, to testifie their zeale. And at last arriuing at the Citie of Saint Sauvour (before called Banza, which signifieth a Court, and is commonly attributed to all the chiete Cities, where the King of any of those Countries holdeth his residence) hee was there receiued by the King and his Nobles, and ordainued the Church there to be the Cathedrall Church of his See, which had belonging to it eight and twentie Canons, with other Officers, and Ornaments vsuall.

D. III.

Of their Heathenish rites: Also of their strange Trees, and of the Ile Loanda.

After Don Pedro succeeded Francisco, and after him, Diego: who being dead, his sonne and two other Competitors of the Kingdome were slaine, and Henrico brother to Diego, was made King, and after his death, Aluaro, whom the Guacra draue out of his Kingdome, till King Sebastian sent Francisco di Gouea to expell them.

The greatest, and most zealous Prince for Christian Religion, was Alphonso, who, on paine of death, forbade to all his subiects the hauing, or worshipping of Idols, which he commanded should be all brought, and deliuered to the Lieutenants of the Countrey, together with their Characters and Witcheries. For before euery man adored that which best liked him: some, these Dragons before spoken of: others, Serpents, which they nourished with their damniest piousness. Some worshipped the greatest Goats they could get; some, Tigris; and the more vncouth and deformed any beasts were, the more in their beastly and deformed superstition were they obserued. Bats, Owles, and Scritch-owles, birds of darkness, were the objects of their darkened deuotions: Snakes and Adders enuened their soules, with a more deadly poyson, then they could doe their bodies. Beasts, Birds, Herbes, Trees, Characters, and the formes of those things painted and grauen, yea the skinned of them, being dead, stuffed with straw, had their shares in this diffused varietie, and confused masse of irreligious religion. The ceremonies they vsed to them, were, kneeling on their knees, casting themselves grouelling on the earth, desiling their faces with dust, verball prayers, reall offerings. They had their Witches, which made the people beleue that their Idols could speake: and if any man had recouered of any sickness, after hee had recommended himselfe to them, they would ascribe that the angrie Idoll was now appeased. All these Idols King Alphonso caused to be burned in one heape, in stead whereof, the Portugals gaue them Images of Saints and Crucifixes to worship. This may seeme an exchange rather, then a ceasing from superstition, were not some fundamentall substance of Truth communicated (besides those blinde shadows) wherewith, no doubt, God draweth some out of darkness (this darkness notwithstanding) in a true and sauing, though a dim and shadowed light; wherewith as farre going before vs in affection, as we before them in knowledge; I dare not but in the hope of saluation of some, thanke God for this glimpse of heavenly light, rather then rashly to censure and sentence them to a totall and hellish darkness.

* Lopez,

Emmanuel since first supplies of religious persons, to confirme them in their Christianitie, and his sonne, Iohn the third sent also Iesuites to that purpose, who erected Schooles among them; and they also send their sonnes into Portugall to learne the Sciences and knowledge of Europe. God Almighty graat that those Fountaines may be clenfed of all Popish mire; that thence more wholesome waters may flow, to the watering of this Ethiopian Vineyard.

They vie in Congo to make cloathes of the Enzinda tree, of which some write the same things that are reported of the Indian Fig-tree, that it sends forth a hairy substance from the branches, which no sooner touch the ground, but they take root and grow vp, in such sort, that one tree would multiply it selfe into a wood (if Nature set not some obstacle.) The innermost barke of the Inzanda, by beating, is made excellent cloth. Other trees there are, which the Tides cover, and are discovered by the Ebs, laden at the root with Oysters. But more admirable is that huge tree called Alicunde, of which my friend Andrew ^{c Battell} supposeth some are as bigge (besides their wonderfull tallnesse) as twelue men can fathome. It spredeth like an Oake. Some of them are hollow, and the liberal clouds into those naturall Caskes disperse such plenty of water, that one time three or foure thousand of them, in that hote Region, continued foure and twenty houres at one of those trees, which yielded them all drinke of her watery store, and was not emptied. Their Negros climbed vp with pegs (for the tree is smooth, and therefore not otherwise to be climbed, and so soft, that it easily receiued pegs of a harder wood, driuen into her yeelding substance with a stone) and dipped the water, as it had been, out of a Well. He supposed that there is forty tunne of water in some one of them. It yeeldeth them good opportunitie for honey, to whichend the Countrey-people make a kinde of Chest, with one hole into the same, and hang it vpon one of these trees; which they take downe once a yeere, and with fire or smoke chasing or killing the Bees, take thence a large quantitie of honey. Neither is it liberrall alone to the hungry and thirstie appetite, but very bountifullly it cloathes their backs, with the barke thereof, which being taken from the younger Alicundes and beaten, one fathome which they cut out of the tree, will by this meanes extend it selfe into twenty, and presently is cloth fit for ^d wearings; though not so fine as that which the Inzanda tree yeeldeth. It serues them also for boats, one of which cut out in proportion of a Scute, will hold hundredths of men.

Of their Palme-trees, which they keepe with watering and cutting euery yeere, they make Veluets, Sattens, Tassatas, Damasks, Sarcenets, and such like; out of the clenfed and purged leaues thereof, drawing long and even threads for that purpose.

And for their Palme-wines, which they draw out of the top of a kind of Palme, which at first is strong and inebriating wine, and in time declineth to a lowre and holefome vinger: of the stone of the fruit, which is like an Almond, they also make bread, of the Shale of the fruit, Oyle, which also serueth them for Butter: Lopez distinguisheth this tree from the Cocco tree, which is there also growing: and another Palme that beareth Dates: others that beare Cola, like a Pine-apple, excellent for the stomacke, and for the Liuer most admirable: it being supposed that the Liuer of a Hen or other Bird, putrified, sprinkled with this matter, recouereth the former freshnesse and soundnesse. Other sorts of Palmes yeeld other fruits, and of their leaues they make Mats, wherewith they cover their houles. Lopez saw a Pomecitron, the kernell whereof left within the rinde, yielded a pretty tall sprigge in foure dayes.

Of stones they haue such store to build with, that in some places they may cut out a Church of one peece. There are whole Mountaines of Porphorie, of Ispar, of white Marble, and other Marbles: one especially, that yeeldeth faire Iacincths, that are good Jewels, flaked like as it were with naturall veins.

The Port and Ile of Loanda lying ouer against the Portugall Towne of Saint Paul, (about twenty miles in circuit) famous for many things, deserueth especiall mention for this, that it yeeldeth, in lesse then halfe a yard digging, Wauers very sweet: but of so contrarie a Nature to the Sea, her mighty neighbour, that when the Sea ebbeth, the water is Salt, and when it floweth, the same is sweet and fresh: as if the Sea imparted that which it selfe hath not, or rather eniued that which he hath, and therefore alway as his coming, re-demandeth that saltnesse from those springs to attend vpon their Ocean-mother. So doe wee see the Siluer Lampes of Heauen in the Sunnes absence to lighten the World, which yet want light, when it is most plentifull, to shew themselves, Euen Nature sealeth and confirmeth Monopolies to her principall Courtiers, alwayas proud, that it thereby better serueth for the Common good, and therefore no precedent to such Drogge and spleen-like Monopolies, Mony-pollings, with which some exorbitant members burie and smother themselves, and make others by lighting heavy, worthily therefore by the Sun of our Great Britaine, at the first rising of his morning brightnesse, dispersed from our Horizon. But how faire is Loanda from Britaine? And yet our scope is to bring Loanda and all the

Of Loango.

T followeth in the course of our Discourſe, to ſet you on ſhore in Loango, the Northerly neighbour of Congo, right vnder the Line, a whole Countrey ſtretched two hundred miles within Land. The people are called Bramas, the King, Mani Loango; ſometimes, as report goeth, ſubiect to the King of Congo. They are Circumciſed after the maner of the Hebrews, like as alſo the reſt of the Nations of thoſe Countreys uſe to be. They haue abundance of Elephants, and wear cloathes of Palme. Andrew Battell liued amongſt them two yeares and a halfe. They are, ſaith he, Heathen, and obſerue many Superſtititions. They haue their Mokſſo's or Images, to which they offer according to the proportion of their ſorts and ſuits: The Fiſher offereth fiſh, when he ſueth for his helpe in his fiſhing; the Countrey-man, Wheat; the Weaver, Alibungo's pieces of cloth; other bring bottles of wine: all wanting that they would haue, and bringing what they want, furniſhing their Mokſſo's, with thoſe things, whereof they complayne themſelues to be diſ-forniſhed.

Their Ceremonies for the dead are diuers. They bring Goats and let them bleed at the Mokſſo's foot, which they after conſume in a Feaſting memoriall of the deceaſed party; which is continued foure or fiue dayes together, and that foure or fiue ſeueral times in the yeere, by all of his friends and kindred. The dayes are knowne, and though they dwell twenty miles thence, yet they will reſort to theſe memoriall-Exequies, and beginning in the night will ſing dolefull and funerall ſongs till day, and then kill, as aforeſaid, and make metry. The hope of this, maketh ſuch as haue ſtore of friends, to contemne death; and the want of friends to bewaile him, makes a man conceiue a more dreadfull apprehenſion of Death.

Their conceit is ſo rauiſhed with ſuperſtition, that many dye of none other death. Kim is the name of vnlawfull and prohibited meat, which according to each kindreds deuotion, to ſome Family is ſome kinde of Fiſh; to another, a Hen; to another, a Buſſe; and ſo of the reſt; in which, they obſerue their vowed abſtinenſe to ſtriſtly, that if any ſhould (though at vnwares) eate of this Kim, he would dye of conceit, alway preſenting to his accuſing conſcience the breach of his vow, and the anger of Mokſſo. Hee hath knowne diuers thus to haue died, and ſometimes would, when ſome of them had eaten with him, make them beleue, that they had eaten of their Kim, till hauing ſported himſelfe with their ſuperſtitious ſgony, he would affirme the contrary. They vie to ſet in their Fields and places where Corne or Fruits grow, a Basket with Goats-hornes, Parrats feathers, and other traſh: This is the Mokſſo's Enſigne, or token that it is commended to his cuſtodie; and therefore the people very much addicted to theft, dare not meddle, or take any thing. Likewiſe, if a man, wearied with his burthen, lay it downe in the high-way, and knit a knot of graſſe, and lay thereon; or leaue any other note (knowne to them) to teſtifie, that hee hath left it there in the name of his Idol, it is ſecured from the lime-fingers of any paſſenger. Conceit would kill the man that ſhould tranſgreſſe in this kinde.

In the Banza, or chiefe Citie, the chiefe Idol is named Chekeke. Every day they haue there Market, and the Chekeke is brought forth by the Ganga, or Prielt, to keep good rule, and is ſee in the Market-place, to prevent ſtealing. Moſeouer, the King hath a Bell; the Frokes whereof ſound ſuch terrour into the heart of the fearful chiefe, that none dare keepe any ſtolne goods after the ſound of that Bell. Our Author inhabited in a little Reed-houſe, after the the Loango manner, and had hanging by the wals, in a Cloth-casse, his Peece, wherewith he vsed to shoot Fowles for the King, which, mote for loue of the Cloth then for the Peece, was stolne. Vpon complaint, this Bell (in forme like a Cowbell) was carried about & rung, with proclamation to make restitution; and he had his Peece the next morning let at his doore. The like another found, in a bagge of Beads of a hundred pound weight, stolne from him, and recovered by the found of this Bell.

They haue a dreadfull and deadly kind of tryall in Controuersies, after this manner: There is a little Tree, or Shrub, with a small Root (is called Imbunda) about the bignesse of ones thumbe, halfe a foot long, like a white Carrot. Now when any listeth to accuse a Man, or Family, or whole Street, of the death of any of his friends, saying, That such a man bewitched him, the Ganga assembleth the accused parties, and scrupes that Root, the scrupings whereof he mixeth with water, which makes it as bitter as gall (hee tasted of it:) one Root will serue for the tryall of a hundred men. The Ganga brewes the same together in Gourds, and with Plantine stalkes hitteeth euery one, after they had drunke, with certaine words. Those that haue receiued the drinke, walke by, till they can make Vrine, and then they are thereby freed. Others abide till either Vrine frees them, or dizziness takes them: which the people no sooner perceiue, but they cry Vndake, Vndake, that is, naughty Witch: and hee is no sooner fallen by his dizziness, but they knocke him on the head, and dragging him away, hurle him ouer the Cliffe. In euery Liberty they haue such Tryals, which they make in cases of Theft, and death of any person. Euery weeke it falls out that some or other vndergoes this tryall, which consumeth multitudes of people.

There be certaine persons called Dundas, which are borne of Negro-Parents, and yet are, by some vnknewne cause, white. They are very rare, and when such happen to be born, they are brought to the King, and become great Witches: They are his Councillors and aduise him of lucky and vnlucky dayes for execution of his enterprises. When the King goes any whither, the Dundas goe with him, and beat the ground round about with certaine Exorcismes, befoze the King lyes downe, and then sit downe by him. They will take any thing in the Matter, not daring to contradict them.

Kengi is the landing place of Loango. They haue there an Idol called Gumbiri, and a holy House, called Musa Gumbiri, kept and inhabited by an old woman; where once a yeere is a solenne Feast, which they celebrate with Drummes, Daunces, and Palme-wines: and then they say hee speaketh vnder the ground. The people call him Mokissa Cola, or a strong Mokissa, and say, That he comes to stay with Chekeke, the Idol of Banza. That Chekeke is a Negro-Image, made, sitting on a stool: a little house is there made him: They appoint him Toccola, which is a red colour made of a certaine Wood & ground on a stone, and mixed with water; wherewith they dayly paint themselves, from the waste vpwards, esteeming it great beauty: otherwise they account not themselves ready. It is for like purpose carried from hence to Angola. Sometimes it falls out, that some Man or Boy is taken with some sudden Embusajase, or rauishment, becoming mad, and making a whooping, and great clamours.

b This seemeth to be Red Sanders. A Bat, saith it is. Log-wood.

They call them Mokisso-Moguat, that is, taken of the Mokisso. They cloath them very handsome, and whatsoeuer they bid in that fit (for it lasteth not very long) they execute as the Mokisso charge.

Morumba is thirty leagues Northwards from hence, in the Mani Loango's Dominion; where he liued nine moneths. There is a House, and in it a great Basket, proportioned like to a Hiue, wherein is an Image called Morumba, whose Religion extendeth far. They are in suborne to this Religion at ten or twelue yeares old: but for probation ate first put in a House, where they haue hard diet, and must be mute for nine or ten dayes, any prouocation to speake notwithstanding. Then doe they bring him before Morumba and prescribe him his Kis, or perpetual abstinence from some certaine meat. They make a cut in his shoulder like to an halfe Moone, and sprinkle the blood at Morumba's feet, and sweare him to that Religion. In the wound they put a certaine white powder, in token of his late admission; which so long as it continueth, doth priuledge him to take his meat and drinke with whomsoeuer he pleaseth, none denying him the same at free cost. They also haue their farall Tryalls befoze his Image, where the accused partie kneeling downe, and clasping the Hiue, saith Mene this Image, where the accused partie kneeling downe, and clasping the Hiue, saith Mene quesa cabamba Morumba, signifying: That he comes thither to make tryall of his innocence; and if he be guiltie, he falls downe dead; being free, he is freed. Andrew Baitell saith, hee knew fixe or seuen, in his being there, that made this tryall.

p. II.

Of the Anziabes.

cap. 5.

Beyond the Country of Loango are the Anziabes^a, the cruellest Canibals which the Sunne looketh on. For in other places they eat their enemies, or their dead; but here they take and eat their kinsfolkes and Country-folkes. They keepe Shambles of mans flesh, as with vs of Beefe and Muttons. They eat their enemies: Their slaues (if cut out, they will yeeld them more in the severall Ioynts, or Pieces, then to be sold alive) they kill, though it be but to save a halfe-peny. Some, of them for wearinesse of life, and some (oh cruelty of vaine-glory) even for valour of courage, in contempt of Death, and esteeming it an honorable prooffe of their fidelitie and manhood, will offer themselves to the Butcher, as faithfull subjects vnto their Princes, of them to be consumed and eaten, that with their death, and after their death, they may doe them service.

These Anziabes stretch from Zaite to Nubia. They haue many Mines of Copper, and great quantitie of Sanders, red and gray; wherewith (mixed with the Oyle of Palme-tree) they anoint themselves. The Portugals temper it with Vineger, for the healing of the French Pocks: by the smoke thereof they driue away the head-ache. It is incredible, or at least would seeme to vs, which Lopez reporteth, that they carrying their arrowes (which are short and slender, of very hard Wood) in the Bowe-hand, will shoot off eight and twenty (so many they hold at once) before the first of them fall to ground; and with a short Hatchet, with a sudden whirling themselves about, breake the force of the enemies Arrowes, and then hanging this Hatchet on their shoulder, discharge their owne Arrowes. They are of great simplicitie, loyaltie, and fidelitie, and the Portugals more trust them then any other slaues. They are yet savage and beastly, and there is no conuersing with them: but they bring slaues of their own Nation, and out of Nubia to Congo to sell; for which they recarrie Salt, and Shells, which they vie for Money; Silkes, Linnen, Glasses, and such like.

^d G. Bar. Ben. part. 1. 13.

They circumcise themselves, and besides that, both men and women, of the Nobility and of Comminaltie, from their childhood marke their faces with sundry slashes made with a knife, lasked (saith ^e Lopez) of their Religion, and it was told mee that they were Gentiles; which was all I could learne of them. They worship the Sunne for the greatest God, as though it were a man; and the Moon next, as though it were a woman. Otherwise euery man chuseth to himselfe his owne Idol; and worships it after his own pleasure. The Anziabi^d haue one King principall, which hath many Princes vnder him.

Of Ambus and Medera, Northerne Regions, little besides the names is knowne. Biafari is inhabited with people much addicted to Enchantments, Witchcrafts, and all abominable Sorceries.

p. II I.

Of the Giacbi or Iagges.

Fthe Giacbi we haue made often mention, and of their incursions into Congo. These, in their owne Language, are called Agag, as Lopez testifieth, and liue on both side of Nilus, in the borders of the Empire of Mohenhe-Muge. They vie to marke themselves about the lip, and vpon their cheekes, with certaine lines which they make with iron instruments, and with fire. Moreover, they haue a custome to turne their eye-lids backwards, so that their blacke skins, white eyes, and cauterized markes seeme to conspire a dreadfull and gashly deformitie in their faces. They hold warre with the supposed Amazones; and of late yeeres haue invaded the neighbour Nations. Their weapons are Darts, their food humane flesh, without all humanity deuoured.

Thus Lopez reporteth by reports. Andrew Baisel liued (by occasion of the Portugals treachery) with the Iagges a longer time then euer any Christian, or White Man had done; namely, sixteen moneths; and serued with the Musket in their warres: neither could Lopez (saith he) haue true intelligence whence they came. For the Christians at that time had but vncertaine coniectures of them: neither, after had the Portugals any conuersing, but by way of commerce: but he being betrayed, fled to them for his life, and after by stealth escaped from them: the onely European that euer liued in their Campe.

He saith; they are called Iagges by the Portugal, by themselves Imbangolas (which name argues them to be of the Imbij & Gale before mentioned) and came from Sierra Liona: That they are exceeding deuourers of mans flesh, for which, they refuse Beefe and Goats, whereof they they take plenty. They have no settled habitation; but wander in an vnsettled course. They rise in Hartwell, and invading some Country, there stay as long as they find the Palms, or other sufficient means of maintenance, and then seek new adventure. For they neyther plant or sow, nor breed vp Cattle: and which is more strange, they nourish vp none of their owne children, although they haue ten or twenty wives a man; of the properest and comeliest slauess they can take. But when they are in trauell, they digge a hole in the Earth, which presently receiue in that darke prison of death, the new borne Creature; not yet made happy with the light of life. Their reason is, that they will not bee troubled with education, nor in their sitting wanderings be troubled with such cumbersome burthens.

10 Once, a secret Providence both punisheth the Fathers wickedness, and preuenteth a vicious Generation, if that may bee a prevention where there is a succession without Generation: and as Plinie saith of the Eseni; Gens aterna est in qua nemo nascitur. For of the conquered Nations they preferre the Boyes from ten to twenty yeeres of age, and bring them vp, as the hope of their succession, like Negro Azimphi, d with education fitting their designs. Thie wear a Collar about their necke, in token of slavery; untill they bring an Enemies head slaine in battaile, and then they are vnollared, freed, and dignified with the title of Souldiers. If one of them runnes away, he is killed and eaten. So that hemmed in betwixt hope and feare, they grow very resolute and aduenturous, their Collars breeding shame, disdain, and desperate fury, till they redeem their freedom, as you haue heard. Elembe

ona, and after much mischief and spoyle settled himselfe in Benguele, twelue degrees from the Line Southwards, and there breedeth and groweth into a Nation. But Kelandula, sometime his Page, proceeds in that beastly life before mentioned, and the people of Elembe by great troupes runne to him, and follow his Campe in hope of spoyle. They haue no Fetis's, or Idols. The great lagge or Prince, is Master of all their Ceremonies, and is a great Witch. I haue seene this Kelandula, (sayth our Author) continue a Sacrifice from Sun to Sun; the rites whereof are these: Himselfe sat on a stoole in great pompe; with a Cap adorned with Peacocks feathers (which fowles in one Countrey called Sbelanbanca, are found wild, and in one place empaled, about the graue of the King, are sity kept and fed by an old woman, and are called Iugilla Mokisso, that is, Birds of Mokisso.) Now, about him thus set, attended forty or fifty women, each of them weauing continually a Zebras taylor in their hands. There were also certain Gangas Priests or Witches. Behind them were many with Drummes and Pipes, and Pungas (certaine Instruments made of Elephants teeth, made hollow a yard and halfe, and with a hole like a Flute; which yeeld a lowd and harsh sound, that may bee heard a myle off.) These strike, and sound, and sing, and the women weaue (as is said) till the Sunne be almost downe. Then they bring forth a pot, which is set on the fire with leaues and roots, and the water therein: and with a kind of white powder, the Witches or Gangas, spot themselves, one on the one cheek, the other on the other; and likewise their foreheads, temples, brests, shoulders, and bellies, vsing many iuchanting termes, which are holden to be Prayers for Victory. At Sun-set a Ganga brings his Kissengula, or War-hatchet, to the Prince (this weapon they vse to weare at their girdles) and putting the same in his hand, bids him be strong, their God goes with him, and he shall haue victory. After this they bring him foure or fise Negroes, of which, with a terrible countenance, the great lagge with his Hatchet kils two, and other two are killed without the Fort. Likewise, fise Kine are slaine within, and other fise without the Fort; and as many Goats, and as many Dogs, after the same manner. This is their Sacrifice, at the end whereof all the flesh is in a Feast consumed. Andrew Battie was commanded to depart when the slaughter began; for their Deuill, or Mokisso (as they said) would then appeare and speake to them. This Sacrifice is called Kissimbula; which they solemnize when they attempt any great enterprise. There were few left of the naturall lagges, but of this vnnatural brood the present succession was rayled.

now called Toroa, there is a Lake called Gale, of no great quantity, whence issueth a River named Camilla, and by the Portugals, the sweet River disembouging at the Falfe Cape, an atme wherof had before entred the Sea (in 32. degrees 40. minutes) of Infante one of Dias his companions, in the first Discouery of those parts, called Infante, becaufe hee there went first on Land. But from thole Hills of the Moone, the Lake whence Nilus springeth hath no helpe: Neyther are there two Lakes, East and West, distant from each other about foure hundred and fifty miles, as Ptolemy describeth; for then the one should be in the Confines of Congo and Angola, the other about Sofila and Monomotapa: where is found but one Lake (for Aquilunde is no tributary to Nilus.) This Lake is betweene Angola and Monomotapa, and containeth in Diameter 195. miles. There is indeed another Lake, which Nilus maketh in his course, but standeth Northward from the first Lake Zembre, and not in East or West parallel. Neyther doth Nilus (as some affirme) hide it selfe vnder the ground, and after rise againe, but runneth through monstrous and Desart Valleyes, without any fetted channell, and where no people inhabited, from whence that fabulous opinion did grow. This Lake is situate in twelue degrees of Southerly Latitude, and is compassed about like a Vault with exceeding high Mountaynes, the greatest wherof are called Cafates, vpon the East; and the Hills of Sal-Nitrum, and the Hills of Siluer on another side, and on the other side with diuers other Mountaynes. The River Nilus runneth Northwards many hundred miles, and then entereth into another great Lake which the Inhabitants doe call a Sea. It is much bigger then the first, and containeth in breadh two hundred and twenty miles, right vnder the Equinoctiall Line. Of this second Lake, the Anzichi giue certaine and perfect intelligence: for they traffique into those parts. And they report, That in this second Lake there is a people that sayleth in great ships, and can write, and vlieth number, weight and measure, which they haue not in the parts of Congo; that they build their Houles with Lime and Stone, and for their fashions and qualities may be compared with the Portugals. This seemeth to be in Goiaime, where the Asoline entitleth himselfe King, and in his title (as x before you haue read) calls it the Fountayne of Nilus: which Aluarez also mentioneth, that Peter Conillan saw. He affirmeth, That there are fewes about those parts, which, perhaps are the people that the Anzichi speake of.

From this second Lake in Goiaime, the River which is there called Gihon passeth through the Pretes Dominion to Meroe, and so to Egypt, as elsewhere is shewed. In these two great Lakes are diuers Ilands, that we speake not of the Tritons, and other I know not what Monsters, there reported to be found. The Lake Zembre yeeldeth not Nilus alone, but Zaire, a faine more spacious River in wide-esse, and more violent in force then Nilus, or any other River in Africa, Europe, or Asia, of which wee lately related. And, besides her Northernne and Westernne Tributes carried by those two Rivers to the Mediterranean and Ocean Seas, shee sendeth her great streames of Magnice, Coaua, and Guama, into the inner or Easternne Ocean.

Magnice springing out of Zembre, receiueth in his Voyage to the Sea three other Rivers; Nagoua, called Saint Christophers; and Margues, which both spring out of the Mountaynes of the Moone, by the people there called Toroa; the third is Arroe, which, besides his waters, payeth to Neptune, which neyther needs nor heeds it, a great quantity of Gold, which it walsheth from the Mountaynes of Monomotapa (a Countrey extending it selfe betweene Magnice and Guama) whose seuen mouthes seeke to swallow vp many Ilands, which they hold in their jaws, but through greedinesse lose that which greedinesse makes them seeke, notable to swallow so great morsels, which therefore remayne and are inhabited with Pagans. Botero sayth, That this River runs out of that Lake, a great space in one Channell, and then is diuided into two; the one called Spirito Santo, running into the Sea, vnder the Cape Coenti; the other Guama, receiueth the Rivers Panama, Luangua, Arrua, Mangiono, Inadire, Ruina, and is sayled more then seuen hundred miles.

Coaua is also a great River. The Inhabitants within Land, about these Rivers, are (as you haue heard) Pagans and rude people. Let me now haue leaue to conuey my selfe downe this River Coaua into the Ocean, and there take view of the many Ilands with which Nature hath adorned this African World, as with many Brooches and Jewels set and hanged about the fringes of her garments: and first, learning what we can of the Ilands in and from the Red Sea hither, we will in some Portugall Carriacke sayle round about the African Coast, and acquaint you with what we shall find worthiest obseruation: and then not willing as yet to see foot in Lisbone, as we meete with the Fleet of Spain sayling to the New-found World, will passe with them for further Discoueries. For, to goe into the Mediterranean to discouery the African Ilands there, will scarce be worth the while. To heare a litle of those few, 60 may content vs.

Thus Authors haue written of the Rivers, which they neuer saw; but John des Santos, a Port-

Portugall Frier which liued many yeeres in those parts, hath giuen a fuller description of the Riuer and Coasts in thole Easterne shores of Africke. By whole narration it appeareth that Cuama and Nilus come not out of one and the same Lake: for Cuama ouerfloweth in March and Apill (not as Nilus in Iuly and August) and makes the Countrey at that time sickly, and driueth the wild beasts to the higher parts, where Lions, Tygres, Elephants, Merus (a kind of horned Alies) Ounces, Rhinocrotos, Buffals, wilde Kine, and Swine, and Horles and Dogs, Zebras & other creatures of those parts are assembled in a peaceable Parliament by the Riuer force ble summons, which so sweth them that (as sometime in Nouus Arke) they forget their preying nature, and quietly expect their dismissal with that of the waters: Riuer
 10 horles there abound and Crocodiles: other strange Beasts, Birds, Fishes, and Wormes they haue with Manna and other naturall rarities, touching which I referre the Reader to the second part of my Pilgrimes, where the Relations of Santos and Iobson, will entertayne him frankly.

Santos also will there acquaint you with the description of the Riuer, Countrey, Mynes and people of those parts: their Kingdomes, Warres, Customes Politike, Oeconomike and Religious: the Portugall Forts of Sojala, Sena, Tete, and the Martts of Mailapa, Luazze, Manzono: the strange Rites of the Kings of Monomotapa, Quitueu, Sedanda and their Neighbours. The Quitueu is King of Sojala, and on that side of Cuama, & hath about 100. women, amongst which his Ants, Sisters, Daughters whom he carnally vseth (which incest to a 20 subiect were death) & when he dyeth, the Successor is he to whom those women giue peaceable and quiet possession of the Kings Houie and themselves. No force is made nor subiection yielded vpon forced possession. The King thus by them receiued is not only admitted of the rest, but adored: yea, they aske of him raine, seasonable Haruest and all things they need, not without great Presents. He hath his Oracle consultations with the Deuill, and euerie yeere on the Obitt day of the former King, the Deuill then entering into some one of the Assembly and giuing answers. Euerie New Moone is a holy day, and the Musimes or Fast days which the Quitueu appoints by Proclamation, which they obserue without working. They otherwise worship no God, nor haue any Idoll, Image, or Temple, Priest or Sacrifice. They call the Quitueu by prodigious titles, Lord of the Sunne and Moone, and especially entitle him in 30 all things Great, as great: Thiefe, great Witch (none else are permitted to bee Witches) great Lion, &c. good or bad, so as Great be the Epithet. The name Quitueu is common toall their Kings, successiue in that Countrey and to the Countrey it selfe. Their Oathes by Poyson, licking of hote Iron, &c. and other strange customes you shall find in the place aforesaid.

§. I.

Of the Red Sea, and why it is so called.

50 For this long and tedious journey ouer Land, where the steepe and snowie Mountaynes, the myrie and vnholefome Vallies, the vnpassable Wildernes, swift Riuer, still Lakes, thicke Woods, and varietie of the Continent observations, haue thus long whiled vs; let vs now by a swifter course take view of the African Seas, and those Ilands which they hold alway besieged, but neuer conquer. In the first place presents it selfe to our Discouery, that Sea which separateth (after the Moderne reckoning) Africa and Asia alunder. This is called the Red Sea; which name (sayth Plinie) the Græcians call Erythraum (this word signifieth Red, and is ascribed by some to a King named Erythraus (whom Poëllus) and some others thinke to be Esaue or Edom, which, the like signification of his name signifying Red, and habitation not very farre distant, make enough probable) by others to the repercussion of the Sunne-beames; by others, to the colour of the Sand and Earth (in the bottome;) and by others to the nature of the Water it selfe. Solinus affirmeth, it is called Erythraum, of King Erythraus, the Sonne of Perseus and Andromeda, and not only of the colour, alledging Varro, that leaned Romane, for his Authour: who also mentioneth a Fountayne on the shoare thereof, which changeth the colour of the Sheepes fleeces which drinke thereof, into a dusky and darker colour. Sirabo citeth the testimony of Nearchus and Oribasius, concerning the Ile Tyrina, two thousand furlongs from Carmania, in which the Sepulchre of Erythraus is shewed, being a great Hill, planted with trees: and that he reigned in those parts, and left his name thereunto: which they learned of Misropastes, who flying from Darius, had hid in that Island. Barrius writeth, That Alonso Dalboquerque (that victorious Portugall, who subdued to many Lands, Seas, and Kingdomes to that Crowne) in a Letter to King Emmanuel affirmeth, That it may be called the Red Sea, of certayne red spots or flaines which are seene therein: and when he entred into the Straits, he encountered a great veine of red water, extending it selfe from Aden as farre as they could see from the ships tops. These red veines of water the Moores ascribed to the ebbing and flowing of that Sea. Iohn di Custro (afterwards Viceroy of India) sayled to the bottome of Strait, as farre as Suez; and much laboured to find the cause, why it should be called the Red Sea: there knowne only by the name of the Sea of Mecca: and they mauelled much at our name Red. He, or Gaspard Alouqui which writ the Booke of this Voyage, which my friend Master Hakluyt communicated to mee, sayeth, that the colour of this Sea is as of other Seas, neyther is there red dust blowne in by the winds: but the Land generally on both sides is browne and very darke, as if it were scorched in some places blacke, and in some white: the Sands are of ordinary colour; onely, in three places were certayne Mountaynes with veines of red, which were hard Rocks. In many places the waves seeme very red by accident: but taking vp the water in a Vellie, out of the Sea, it seemed clearer and more Cryalline then that without the Straits. He caused also some to dig, which did bring him out of the sandy bottome a red matter, branched like Corall. In other places where were greene spots in the Sea, were taken our greene branches and where the Sea was white, the sand there vnder was very white: and though the depth in some places amounted to twenty fathome, yet the purity of the Cryalline waters caused this transparent colour. Neere to Suachen he found most of those spots, and from thence to Alcoer, the space of one hundred thirty sixe leagues. The Sea in this space hath many fishes, the ground whereof is Coral-stone, of which one sort is red, the other very white. The white Sands in the bottome make it seeme white, the Ooze greene, that Corally substance red, which in that space was the most of the three.

But neerer the bottome, towards Suez, in a great space hee saw none. Further without the Strait, he saw chile red spots or veines of water at Cape Fartach, as if Oxen had beene flaine there, yet, the water taken vp in a Vellie seemed cleere; and hee supposed that this rednesse proceeded of the Whales bringing forth their young. Barrius misliketh that coniecture, and those other of Antiquity, in searching the cause of this name of Red, and is of opinion, That the violent currents of the Tydes, assisted with some tempestuous winds, raise ye from the bottome that red floore, whereof we haue spoken, and cause, by the motion of the same vnder the water, this rednesse in the vpper part thereof: which is in more spacious quantity neere the Straits, where there is greater force of the Tydes; and the threads or flaines of this rednesse are lesse in the greater and more spacious Sea-rooms. The Portugall Pilots first thought, that the winds brought out red dust from the dry soyle of Arabia, which no mans experience hath confirmed. Andrea Corsali, which sayled and warred vnder the Portugalls in these Seas, Anno 1516. sayeth, hee knowes not why it should be called red, for the water is coloured as in other Seas: which seemeth to crosse the former reports: and may eyther bee construed of the water generally not discoloured, or perhaps while hee was there, the Tydes and Winds did not conspire to boysterously, as at some other times they doe, against the wedding and weaker soyle in the bottome thereof.

Our English Pilots haue giuen later and better light in their Trade at Mohā and other places, as in the first and second parts of our Bookes of Voyages is euident. But the most learned Pilot for the Erythraean Antiquities is Master Fuller, who in the last Chapter of his fourth Booke examineth the Græcian Fables of Azabarchides, Cestus, Ouarinus, Panagoras, or Baxus also, Mela, Plinius and the rest, and at last concludeth that of Esopus name Edom, the Countrey was called Edumæa, (farre larger then that of Pisidemy; besides it containing a great part of Petrag, and all Nabathæa) and of that Countrey coasting to greata part of that Sea (as appeares by Salomon and Iosaphath) *Ophyr*ian Nauies built at Ezion Geben in Edumæa their owne Countrey) the Sea adioyning was called Edumæa, or in Greeke interpretation Erythraean, that is, Rubrum or Red: as Cephus the name properly by Christ giuen to the fish of the Apostles, is commonly in a Greeke interpretation called Peter.

Howeuer it be for this rednesse, many deceme themselves in directing this name to the Arabian Gulfe, which the Ancients I gaue vnto all this Sea from Egypt to India: and recken the Persian and Arabian Gulfes, armes of the Red Sea. Yea, Arrianus (not hee that writ Alexanders life, who yet in the report of Nearchus his voyage from Indus, to the River Tigris, calls it the Red Sea: but another of that name) in his Perplus of the Erythraean Sea; (translated and illustrated with a large Commentarie by Strabon, and let forth by Ortelius in a peculiar Map thereof) comprehendeth in the title of the Red Sea, all from Arinoe and Egypt, to Malacca, or the Chersonesus Arica. Having now troubled you with the name, why, and how farre the name extendeth: wee may view the lands therein situate; which if any would more fully know, let him read Arrianus and Barrius, and the voyage of Solyman Bassa, 1538. vnto Diu, written by Damianus and Barrius, and the voyage of Ramusius, who was present in the action. I must but touch the principall.

§. II.

Of the chiefe Townes and lands in the Red Sea.

THE Red Sea is neere the beginning of the Sea, which some suppose to bee that which the Ancients call Arinoe, after others Heruon: here is the place where the Turke hath his Arinal and Gallies, for those Seas, the matter whereof is brought out of Carmania, by Sea, by Nilus, and by Camels ouer Land the rest of the way, at incredible charges. Here in old times was a Channell which conueyed the waters of Nilus to this place, where they had Cisternes to receive it; all destroyed by the Mahumetans: and now the inhabitants fetch the water, which they vie, six miles off. Some thinke that Pheraob was here drowned: which passage others set downe at Tor, where the Sea is frained, and is not above nine miles ouer. It seemeth that the prints of the Chariot wheels, which Orsinus affirmeth still remaine as testimonies of *Pheraob*s ouerwhelming vnder those waues, and could not by any industrie of man be done out, but by the mightie hand of God, were some restored in the same forme, are not now there to bee found: for they would soone end the conuersion.

Affion Geber: was a Port hereabouts, whence Solyman sent his Nauie to Oyber, and after him Ishaphar: but not with lyke success: which (Iosephus saith) was Berenice, not farre from Elana. Heruon calls it Edia. Doctor Pea writes that Ezion Geber was neere Eloah, of Elana, or Ilion, the East end of the Bay: the other which some call Suez, is higher.

Berenice was the Port of the Red Sea, where the Indian drugs and spices in the time of the Roman Empire were vnladen and landed, to be carried thence to Alexandria, the whole court whereof Plinius describeth. Agatharchides reckoning diuers Etymologies of the Erythraean title, liketh best of that which ascribes it to one Erythra, who first built a ship to saile in those Seas, also that disallowing that it should be so called of the colour. Hee hath written strange things of the people adioyning. Hee nameth foure sorte of Ethiopians, according to their dwelling neere the Rivers, or Lakes, or Sea-coast, or wandering. Those on the Sea-coast, he saith, lue altogether on fish, which the Tide brings vp, and leaues on the hollow places or plashes neere the shore: which they cast vpon hot Rocks, which cause the fishie substance to fall from the bones: this they treade with their feet, mixing the seede of Palustus, and then make cakes thereof, which they drie in the Sunne, and eat all in common: and on the sit day goe to drinke, laying their mouthes to the water like Oxen, and sup in as much as their skins will hold, not able scarce to breathe, nor eating any thing one day after. Some of those Ichthyophagi or fish-eaters, which haue store of this provision, content themselves with the moiſture of their diet, and drinke not at all. Some of them seeme subiect to an Apathie, not of Stoicks, but of Storks, not shunning or complaining for blowes or wrongs. But mee thinkes I see my Reader haue lenſe, and (not without reason) make complaint of wrong done him in these Relations: and therefore will requere them that will, to our Authour himselfe.

Don Iohn de Castro can better acquaint vs with the later, then Agatharchides with the ancient state. Hee ascribeth to Toro, which he maketh the same with Elana 28. 1/2. degrees. They are Christians, and haue a Grecian Monastere. He reporteth the Moores tradition, that Moset smote the sea twelue times, & thereby opened twelke paths for the Israhelites: 600000. Egyptians were drowned: the Israhelites arrived where Toro now is. At Bolael Xame they found a Towne, within a house like a Chappell, where was hanging a Banner of like, and many Arrows or Darts round about the graue: at the head of the graue was a table with an Epitaph, testifying that there lay buried one of *Mahumet*s kindred: and great indulgence was granted to such deuout Pilgrimes as to that place resorted. But the Portugals burnt it.

Hieronymus de Sancte Stephano, relateth his voyage from Cairo in fiftene dayes to Carz, and a good Port called Cane, finding many buildings and Temples ruined by the way: seven dayes Iourney they went from hence by land to Cosra Haven of the Red Sea. Procopius saith, saith, that this Sea is boisterous and rough in the day time, and calme in the night: that Iotab is one thousand furlongs from Adia, was an Island of lenses: of which hee mentions among the Hometic Arabians (as doe Nepherus, Tudensis, and Peromannus also) which hee extendeth along the Sea: and addeth to them many other Nations and Man-eating Saraceni. What the Portugals have done in these Seas, Barrins, Marmelus, Ostrus, Maffius, & late, Nonius Cugna in his Letter to the King, declares, that Anio 1530, they tooke Surrate, other pieces of Camboja, and many Indian ships, and chased away the Turkes Naute which besieged Aden; and brought the King of Aden to pay yearly tribute ten thousand Seragins. But the Turkes after obtained it.

The length of this Arabian Gulfe & Batera reckons 1200. miles, in breadth 100. for the most part. Comito Venetiano in Ramusius, saith, it accounteth 1400. in length, in breadth 200. and in some places more; so full of shoals, that if they keepe not the Channell in the midst, there is no sayling but by day-light. Outwards bound, they keepe the middle, and have Pilots for that purpose; homewards they have other Pilots which direct the ship within the shallows: and are taken in at Babelmandel, called by e Pisomy, Insula Didori, an Isle in the entre of Strait of the Gulfe, which Strabo saith, the ancient King of Egypt chafned to keepe the passage. Idem is twelve leagues from Mecca, where the ships have used to vnaile their Spices; as before at Berenice: without this Towne is a Molke, which the Moores say is the Sepulchre of Esa. Their water is saine-water; referred in Cilensis.

Passing by the Ile Meluit; the Ile Camaran is famous by the divers spoiles there made by the Portugals: it is in fiftie degrees. This Island (saith Cosmopolis) is the hottest place that ever I saw: not one of vs, but had our secret parts chafed and stayed with heate: and many of our comrade dyed: Dalaqua is an Island where they gather Pearles; 125. leagues long, twelve broad: it is the name also of the Metropolitan Cite. Betweene it and Abex (saith Alonius in the Relation of Cassio voyage) are five Islands, one of which is called Xamos, the land of which is red; the King a Moore. Stachier is the best harbour in all the Gulfe, where the Turkes have taken from the Abasine: it stands in nineteen degrees, and a third. Mazzus is an Island which makes Ercobco a good Haven. But of the Haven and Port on both sides the Gulfe, Barrins & relateth more largely. Of the Isles Achafas and Twice were made but names: likewise of others; whereof Pisomy & both number a great multitude. The people of these parts are Mahumtans, and many Baduini; heathen and the most Moores. Many Jewes are in Aden, the chiefe Towne of merchandize in these parts: the King whereof (after much kinde gratulation) Sahyan Bassa hung & put the yards a-me: and at his returne dealt the like Joke to the King of Zibit, subiecting their State: vnder these heinous pretences to his Great Master. Stachier & tells of Samaritans dwelling in an Island of the Red Sea; which, when any man lauded there, would religiously forbid to touch them: but wee have before mentioned both them and their Letters, supposed the most ancient in the world, howsoever Possellus calleth the present Hebrew letters eternall, and saith, that the Law was written in them: but that they were sacred, and not publicly knowne till the time of Ezra, who excommunicated the Samaritans and their Letters, first publishing (not inventing) a chose which now are in vfe.

The Ascension ascended into the Red Sea, Anno 1408. to Moha, which is a Cite of great Trade. And Anno 1612. diuers English ships were together in the same Sea, where they somewhat amended themselves for such wrongs as by the Turkes and Mogolls, or Mogons, had been formerly offered to Sir Henrie Middleton, and other English men, as you have read before: in our first Booke: as likewise of their finding the good Road of Aden on the Abasine shoare, and of the King of Rehita, which came riding to them on a Cow with a Turbant, and a Cattle shell on his forehead, was drunken with Aqua-via, but kinde to the English: and also of the strong Currents, and strange shining in the night by Cureles, not meete to be repeated.

Of Socotora, Madagascare, and other Ilands on the Easterne coast of Africa.

IN the Ocean without the Strait, neere to the African shoare, are not many Ilands mentioned by the Ancients. Arrianus in his Pariplos speaks of seven Ilands called Pyraeon: & of another great land neere to them, called Monythesius, or Atinibius, now called Madagascare, & Saint Lawrence: some take it for the land of Tambulau, whereof Diodorus hath largely related; and Ramusius hath discoursed thereon: other seeke for that land in Somatra. That Tambulus was a Merchant, which trading in Arabia for spices, was taken by theeues, and made a shepheard: after carried away by Ethiopians; who tooke these forrainers according to their Rites, to expiate their Countrey. For they were enioyned by Oracle to make such expiation once in six hundred yeeres, wiche two men that were forrainers: The ruifilling whereof they were put in a Boat, fit for two women, with six moneths victuall: and commanded to saile southwards, and they should come to a happy land, where the men liued a blessed life. And if they came safe thither, their Countrey should enioy prosperie fix hundred yeeres: if they turned back, they should bring vpon them much trouble. The Ethiopians meanwhile kept holy dayes, and offered sacrifices for their good voyage, which in foure moneths they atchieued: and were exceeding courteously vnto land entertayned of the Ilanders. These were foure cubits higher then other men, very nimble and strong. The reports of this his voyage fauour more of an ^a Utopia, and Plata's ^b common-wealth, then of true Histories. Yet is it thought (as Ramusius discouereth) not altogether fabulous, but that he was indeed in some remote Iland, to which he applied such fancies, as Diadorus reporteth. To leaue there the certain fictions and vncertaine coniectures of Antiquities: and come to more certain Relations; the onely Iland of name without the Streit is, Socotora, in thirteenth degrees; of which we haue spoken largely already, speaking of the Ilands of Asia; yet if any will suffer vs to remember it againe amongst these of Africa (for it lies betwene both) we may here mention what others, and somewhat otherwise, haue related. Sannius calls it Zacotora, and affirmeth that the Sands on the tops of the high Hills therein haue no exemption from the windes: that the people are Nestorian Christians, which obserue the Crosse with much deuotion, otherwise wanting Christian both Baptisme and Doctrine, and are circumcised: that the Moores say it belonged to the Amazons, in testimonie whereof the women still weare the breeches, and gouerne amongst them. Corsali ^c thinks it unknowne to Ptolomey (which others suppose to be his Insula Discoloridis) hee saith that it was inhabited of Christian shepherds, which liued on milke and butter: their bread was of Dates: like to the people of Prester Iohn, but their haire was longer, clothed with onely peece of cloth about their priuities: the Land barren, as in all Arabia felix, and the Sea coasts gouerned by the Arabians. Hence commeth, and is named the Alos Socotrina. They are Isapotes, and haue Churches with Altars, and obserue the Crosse with great reuerence: they enter not their Churches, but stand in the Church-yard or Porch. Their Abuna, or Priest, ruleth them. Other Governour they haue none of their owne. The Portugals haue two Townes there, Oso and Benin. They ^e hold opinion that Saint Thomas here suffered shipwrack: and that of his ship was built an ancient Church, which is yet to be seene, walled about with three partitions, and three doores. They liue for the most part in cabins of boughs, or in caves: their women are as good Souldiers as the men. They are much addicted to magick, and bring to passe matters incredible, although the Bishop excommunicate such as vse it. They will with contrarie winde hinder men that indamage them, from sayling away. Conceited they are exceedingly of their owne excellence. The English haue often traded in this Iland. Master Downton writes, that Mully Amore Benfaide hath long gouerned there, as Vice-roy to his father the King of Fartac in Arabia, not farre from Aden. His strength consists in his Arabs, the rest being slaues, which haue beene banished people. In August they make their Aloes Socotrina of an herbe like Semper vna in Spaine, but bigger, about a tun in a yeere. Their bread is Dates. This Iland, saith Benjamin Day, is in twelue degrees, barren, all rocks and stones, almost no greene thing in the whole Iland, but Dates, trees, and some few shrubs and small trees, and Aloes. Out of the bark of a small tree bring curiell, which a red gum, called Sanguis Draconis. The people be most obedient that euer he saw: all the profits of the Iland is the Kings. Hee seemes kinde to the English, but no great trust (if we trust Captaine Sorie) to be reposed in him, as falsifying both word and weight. They bought Goats there, which they found after to be abuled by the buggaring beastly people. They bought Aloes 2720 pounds, as Master Pring reporteth, at thirte Rials of eight their hundred, which makes of ours but 97 pounds. This was An. 1614. This Iland, hee saith, is twentie leagues long: their Kine at ten Rials of eight: their Goats, Sheepe, Hens, all very leane. The Inhabitants of a Mulla to colour, and some Negroes, apparelled with a peece of Calico about their waistes, and Turbants on their heads. The King in Turkish habit. He had five Camels, and five Horses, which were all in the Iland. Tamarin and Delisix are harbours and places of Trade there. Abadaleria is an Iland, fourteene leagues from Zacotora, from whence it is fifteen leagues to Cape Guardafu. At Tamarind they had no raine in two yeeres together. Two small Iles lie to the North of Socotora, called the two Sisters: the Inhabitants of an olue colour, without Law amongst themselves, or commerce with others. There are also those two Iles, the one of men, the other of women, which wee mentioned in our first booke, & a matter, how true I know not, but very strange. They are Christians, subiect to the Bishop of Socotora, and he to the Zacota in Baldach.

- Many other Ilands there bee of no great name in that Sea, called Sima Barbarensis as of Don Garcia the three and the seven brethren of Saint Brandon; Saint France, Mascarena, Do Natal, Comora, and many other besides those of Quito, Mofambique, and some other for their vicinitie to the Land before handled. The Ile of Saint Laurence (so called by the Portugals, by themselves, Madagascar) is meetest wall those parts, to entertayne the Readers observation, as being one of the greatest Ilands of the world: It containeth in breadth foure hundred and fourecore miles, in length a thousand and two hundred: M. Polo saith, the Inhabitants were Saracens, and were governed vnder foure Lords, eate Camels flesh, vie merchandize or artes. Thus farre did the Great Cao stretch his Tartarian Dominion: and sent hither to spie the Land. That which Polo saith he heard of a bird in this Iland, called Ruch, so bigge as it could take vp an Elephant, hath no likelihood of truth. He calls it Magascar. It is situate from seicenteene to six and twentie $\frac{1}{2}$ of Southerly latitude. Onely vpon the coast they are Mahumetans: within Land Liolaters, black, and like the Cafres: the foule yeeldeth Cloues, Ginger, and Siluer. It serueth to haue better Inhabitantes, if Isaboteco cudge rightly, hauing many fane and fresh Riuer, safe Harbours, plenty of fruits and cattell therein are foure governments, each fighting aginst other. They vse not themselves to trade with others, nor suffer others to traffique with them. The Portugals haue some trade with them, but goe not on land. In the first discouerie of them by the Portugals, 1506, they shewed themselves inhospitable and trecherous; rewarding received kindness, in their Canoas or Boats, made of the body of a tree, with shot. There were said to bee 20 some white people, supposed to be of Chinian off-spring.
- Of the people of Madagascar the Hollanders report, that they are of colour blacke, strong, and well made: they couer their priuities with cotton: they haue large holes in their eares, in which they wear round sticks. They acknowledge one Creator, and obserue Circumcision, but know nothing of praying or keeping festiuals. They haue no proper names, whereby to distinguish one day from another: neither doe they number weekes, monthes, or yerres. Nor doe they number above ten. They are exceedingly afraid of the deuil (whom they call Tamundau) because he vlieth often to asslitt them. They lide most-well on fishing. They marrie but one wife: their time of marriage is, for the men at twelue; the women at ten yerres of age. Adulterie and Theft are punished with death. The men vse to hunt abroad, the women spin their Cottons at home, whereof they haue trees yeelding plentie. If any man kill any of his Kine, all his neighbours may challenge part. Cornelius Hoitman saith, they are sweet-spoken men. They haue a kinde of Branes or Lobos growing on trees, the cod whereof is two foot long. They haue a kinde of seed, whereof a herte make foolish, a greater quantitie kill: herewith they betrayed and killed threecore and eight Hollanders, with their Captaine. The English haue had some knowledge of this Iland to their cost, as those of the Vision before mentioned. But not trailing them too farre, they here finde good refreshing: Captaine Downton arrived there in the Bay of Saint Augustine, Aug. 10. 1614. and bought of them diuers Beeces at a reasonable rate. The people are tall and iwart, their haire smooth and finely plaited: their weapons are darts; neatly headed with Iron. Their cattell fairer then any I haue seene, hauling on their fore-shoulders a lump of fat like the pomell of a saddle. Here were Tamarin trees, with Greene fruit vpon them; the pulpe whereof boyled, cured our men of the Scorbute. They haue store of cotton, whereof they make striped cloth of diuers colours. Another, then in companie, reports them to be a strong active people, not fearefull of gunnes or other weapons, ciuill, honest, and vnderstanding; their weapons small Lances, Bowes, Arrowes, and Darts: their Kine sold at three, foure, or five shillings a peece, as sweet and fat as ours. That bunch on the shoulder is very sweet in taste. And (as one reporteth, he had seene) the skin that compassed one of them, contained six or eight gallons. Here are many Crocodiles. The Vision comming to Gungomay, in the North-west corner of Madagascar, was assaulted by a Number of hundred Canoes by water, arranged in order of a halfe moone; the King treacherously assaulting them out of the woods, and tonke Captaine Michalborne with other Merchants.
- In Saint Marie, an Iland by Madagascar, they met with the King, which was observed of his subjects with great reverence. Here they buried one of their dead men, the Ilanders being present, who signified by signes, that his soule was gone to heauen: and would haue had them to cutt off his legs by the knees. The Ile of Cerne, they called Maurice Iland. They found excellent Ebon trees there, the wood whereof is as black as pitch, and as smooth as Iurie, inclosed with a thick bark. They found of the same kinde some red, some yellow. There were Palme-trees like the Cocos. They found store of birds, whereof they might take some in their nets with their hands. There were no people inhabiting. In the Ile of Bata our men killed a Bat as great as a Hare, in shape like a Squirrell; with two Slopes of skin; which he spread forth when he leaped from tree to tree, which they can doe nimbly, often holding onely by their tails.

The Hollanders in the Bay of Anon Gil Southwards from Madagascar in sixteene degrees, saw the King, blacke of hue, wearing two hornes on his head, and many chaines or bracelets of Brasse on his armes. This place is fertile, the people valiant.

In the channell betweene the firme land and Madagascar, are many Ilands, & great and small, all inhabited by Mahumetans, the chiefe of which is S. Christoph: more Northwards against Mombaza, and Melinde, are three Ilands, Momfid, Zanzibar, and Pemba: inhabited with Mahumetans of white colour. In the time of M. Polo, Zanzibar was Heathenish. The Inhabitants, he saith, very grosse and deformed, and likewise the women. Neere the Cape of Good Hope are the Isles of Dou Aluarez, and Tristan d'Acunha: but, of no great note. The deepepenesse of these Seas, make them vncapeable of many Ilands.

Of Saint Helena, Thomee, Cape de Verd, and diuers others betwixt them, and of the weeds and calmes of those Seas.

N this side the Cape is the Island of S. Helena, in 16 degrees and one quarter of Southerly latitude. It is very high and hilly: the name was giuen of the Saint, on whose day it was discovered. It hath in it store of goats, hogs, hens, and other creatures, which the Portugals haue there left to multiply: for before there was none of them: there also they haue planted Figs, Oranges, Limons, and such like, whereof the Vallies are full; that it seemeth an earthly

Paradise, the Fruit growing all the yeere long. They haue great store of Fish, of which with crooked nayles they take great plenty: the Rocks yeeld tale for the furthering of their provision. As seemeth God hath planted it in conuenient place, for the long and dangerous Indian Nauiagations. There the Portugals leaue their sick, which stay till other ships come the next yeere to take them. It was neuer inhabited: onely an Hermite dwelt there, who vnder pretence of mortifying his flesh by penance, butchered the flesh of the Goats and Bucks so fast for their skins, that the King sent for him home, and will suffer none to dwell there. Abraham Kendall put in there about the yeere 1591. and left on shore, one Segar, a sick man, whom Edmund Parker eighteene moneths after found in good plight; but their vnexpected coming, as it seemeth, so rauished his weak spirits with joy, that it distracted him, and being otherwise of bodily constitution very wel, he dyed eight dayes after. of a Portugall in the same place. In June 1613. the Dutch set vpon two Carriacks in this road, but with ill successe, one of their ships with nine and forty men being casually blown vp, North-west from hence are the Isles of Ascension, not inhabited. Of Loanda, eight to, or rather a piece of Congo, is already spoken. Quer against the Cape of Lopo Goncalues, is the Ile of Nobon: it is not farre from thence = Saint Thomas: an hundred and foure score miles from the shore, and so much also in compass, right vnder the Line. At the first discouerie it was a Wood: Now inhabited by Portugals and Negro's. These liue an hundred and ten yeeres: but few borne in Europe exceed fifty. It is vnwholsome, through exceeding heat, unto Europeans especially, which in December, January, and February, continually overshadowed with a thicke cloud, which so moistens the Trees that grow in great abundance thereon, that from hence dropeth water sufficient for the watering of all their fields of Sugar-Canes. They haue three score and ten Ingenios or Sugar-houses, each of which hath two or three hundred flames belonging thereto.

n. The windes which at other times refresh them, are then by Nature imprisoned in their bowels.

They grind the Canes, and boyle the iuice to make it into Sugar; but by no meanes can they make it so white beere, as in Madera and other places. The refuse of their Canes they giue to their Hogs, which are heere very many, fat, and delicate as the flesh of a Hen. They are some yeeres exceedingly plagued with Ants and also with Rats, White men which liue there, are visited: two houres in euery eight or ten dayes with an Ague, but strangers haue more threwd entertainment, and scarcely in twenty dayes, with great care, can shake off this Shaker. The chiefe Citie is Pouoason, an Episcopall Sea. The Negro's worke sixe dayes for their Masters, and the seventh day for themselves in setting and planting their seeds, fruits, and and provision. Wheat heere sowne, becommeth all blade, without ripening any corne. No fruit which hath a stone in it will heere prosper. The town which hath about seven hundred Families, and the Castle was taken by the Hollanders, 1599.

The Ile Del Principe, was so called, becaule the revenues thereof were in times past allowed to the Prince of Portugall. It standeth in three degrees of Northerly Latitude, Julien Glerobagen took the same, An. 1598. The Iles of S. Matthew, Santa Cruz, S. Paul, and Conception, yield small matter of History. Next to Cape Verde stand seven Ilands, full of Birds, empty of Inhabitants, called Barbanae. But those that are called the Iles of Cape Verde are nine, situate between the Greene and White Capes: Lincolnen reckons ten. They were first discovered by Antoni di Nollu, a Genoway, An. 1440. None of them are inhabited, but the Iles of Iago, and Del Fogo: both which were taken, An. 1596, by Sir Ambr. a Sherley, who had one nights showre of Ashes from that Island of Fogo or Fuego, or of Fire, so called, becaule it continually burneth, which fell so thicke on their ship, that you might write your name with your finger vpon the vpper deeke. Saint Iago was taken and burnt by Sir Francis Drake, An. 1585. Brama and Buena Vista, have braver and goodlier names then Nature. Mau yeelds sale in a Lake of two leagues long, the Sun congealing and turning the waters into Salt. From thence is passed into the Sea, called Sargasso, becaule it is covered with herbs, like to the herbe Sargasso in the Portugall Wets, not vnlike to Samper, yellow of colour, with empty Berries like Goose-berries, but lesse: which beginneth at twenty degrees, and continueth till thirty foure, farre off in the Sea: for the ships in their going to India, keeping neere the shore, meet not with any. The Sea seemeth as a greene field, so thicke that a min cannot see the water, and hindereth the ships passage, except they have a strong winde. Ralph Wilson hath told vs of a new Iland, discovered by the Salomon in 19. 34. to the South, Anno 1612.

The Coast of Africa is foure hundred miles distant, neither is any Iland neere: save that these weeds seeme to make many Ilands. Thus doe men in ships behold the wonders of the Lard in the deepe, no Land being nigh, nor no ground to be found, although it is thought to come from the ground. Some thinke it groweth on the Rocks, and is thence beaten off by the Sea. And indeed, all those Seas are full of wonders, as they passe along the Coast toward the Indies, Thomas a Stenens complaineth of the continuall Thunders, Lightnings, and vniwholsome Raines which there they met: the raine-water, if it stand a little, converting presently to Wormes, and filling the meat, hanged vp, with Wormes. Another also swamme vpon the face of the waters like a Cocks Combe, so venemous, that it could scarce bee touched without perill: Fishes, called Sharkes, most ravenous deuourers, which had other fixe or seven smaller fishes, garded with blue and Greene, attending like Seruing-men. Fishes also (as big as a Herring) with wings which doe not so much helpe them by flying to escape another greater fish that pursueth them by Sea, as endanger them to a Sea-Fowle, which waits that opportunitie. Neither can it fly high or farre, or longer then the wings are wet: nor twinnish falsly hauing exchanged finnes for wings. So haue I seene men thrise worse that haue two Trades than such as haue been skilfull and thrifte in one. Lerim addeth the like wonder of certaine Birds, to tame that they would light vpon the batches, and suffer themselves to bee taken. There are the same Birds which pursue those flying fishes, wiser to hunt them, then to take themselves: as bigg as Crows in feathers, in flesh little bigger than a Sparrow, and farte lesse then the fish which they take and deuoure.

These Seas are also subiect to great and tedious calmes, which not onely hinder the Voyages; but end the lues of many. Giouanni da Empoli saith, in his returne out of India, they were here detained foure and fifty dayes, in which they scarce sailed aboue fixe leagues; and in thirty five dayes they cast ouer-board threescore and sixteene of their company, very few furnishing in their ship: which likewise happened to other ships, their Consorts, so that they had vterly despaird, had not God sent a Portugall ship, that way bound, to relieve them. And would God thus like examples many might not be produced amongst our own: Betweene 17. and 32 degrees of Northerly Latitude, men are subiect to gripings, and haue need to keepe themselves warme.

To returne to our discouerie from Iago where we left: here the Negro's were went to bring slaves to sell to the Portugals for Beads, and other trifles, and Cottons with other base commodities: and them not such alone as they took in warre, but their fathers and mothers, thinking they did them a benefite, to cause them thus to be conueyed into better countreies: they brought them naked. The Iles of Argun are fixe or seuen, inhabited by the Azmalagi, where the King of Spaine hath a Fortresse: concerning the trade whereof you may reade the letter of Melchior a Petenoy.

boughs, with the leafe like that of the Bay-tree, white on the bottome, Greene on the other side. It beareth no flower nor fruit: ituate in the deftiuitie of a Hill, withered in the day, dropping in the night (a cloud hanging thereon) yeelding water fufficient for the whole I-land, which (he faith, it report deceiued him nor; Sir Edward Scory heard of many fewer) 8000 foules, and about 100000 beafts. It falls into a Pond made of Bricke floored thicke with stone, by pipes of lead conuayed from the tree thither, and thence diuided into diuers Ponds thorow the Iland; fetched vp hill by barrels. The Pond holds 20000 tunnes, and is filled in a night. Thus he related to me. Hierro, and Gomera, and Lancarato, are in the hands of priuate men.

Madera standeth in two and thirty degrees: it is the great ft of all the Atlantike Iles,* It 10 was discovered by one Matham an Englishman, who arrived there by tempest, Anno. 1344 together with a Woman, whom he there buried, and on her Tombe did write his coming and the cause thereof, with his and her names, and was occasion to the King of Spaine to dis-couer that and the Canaries. It was called Madera, of the wildernes of Trees there growing. Heere is a Citie called Fouchal. The Ile containeth in compass a hundred and forty miles. The woods which gaue name to the Iland were fered, and burnt so furiously, that the people for a time were forced to go some space into the Sea from the violent heat, which caused such tannesse to the foyle, that at first it yeilded threecore fold; since, halfe so much.
The excellent Wines were of Vines, first brought from Candie. They bring forth more grapes (aith he) than leaues, and Clusters of two, three, and foure spans long. At first, the Pigeons suffred themselves to be taken, not knowing, and therefore not fearing a man.

Fifty miles from the Ile of Madera c is the Ile of Puerto, or Porto Santo, called of all Saints day, in which it was first discovered, Anno 1438. It was taken by Sir Amas d Preston, 1596. Heere are such store of Conies, bred of one these Cony brought hither great with young, that the Islanders were out of hope almost to withstand and amend their damages by them sustined. A little Iland, neere to this, breedeth nothing else. And now we can accompany our Portugals no further. But before I lefe these Ilands, I thought fit to feast you, with some obseruations of an eye-witnesse (elegant Spectator) and learned Gentleman Sir Edmund Scory:

§. III.

Extracts taken out of the Obseruations of the Right Worshipfull Sir Edmund Scory, Knight of the Pike of Tenariffa, and other rarities which hee obserued there.

TENARIFFA is the pleasantest of the Canary Ilands. This Iland hath bene called Niuaria, by reason of the Snow which like a Collar environeth the necke of the Pike of Teyda. The name of Tenariffe was imposed by the inhabitants of the Palmes Iland, for Tener in the Palmesian language signifies Snow, and Iffe an Hill. It is situate in the Atlantick Ocean fourecore leagues from the Coast of Affricke. It is in forme triangular, extending it selfe into three Capes, and stands within eight and twenty degrees of the equinoctiall. The great mountaine of Teyda, commonly called the Pike of Tenariffe, is a Mountaine which begets I know not whether a greater attention, when you come to it, or when you behold from a farre off: but in both very great. The Base of it beginneth at the Port-towps of Gara-chico, from whence it is two dayes iourney and a halfe to the top of it. The point of which, though it seeme as sharpe as a Sugar-loafe (which figure of all other it doth most resemble) yet is there a flat of an acre in breadth on the top of it: & in the midst of that flat a gulph, out of which great stones are with like noise fire and smoke many times cast forth. Seven leagues off this way, may bee traueled vpon Asses or Mules; the rest on foot, and with great difficultie. All the Countie lying about the ascent of the Hill, for ten miles upwards, are ouer-grown, or rather adorned with the goodliest trees in the world of diuers sorts; by reason of the multitude of Springs which intermingling one with another, and with the addition of the violent winter, Raines descend in huge torrents downe into the Sea. In the midst of this hill is the cold intolerable; in the top the heat, and so likewise in the bottome. Through all the cold Region, you must cast your iourney to trauel on the South side, and in the day time; through all the hot Region (which is within two leagues of the top) on the North side, and in the night time. Every man carrieth his owne portion of victuals, and Borrachoes of Wine. Your time of approach to the top must bee about Midday (for the auoiding of the torrents caused by the snowes, and about two of the clocke in the morning, and so you may abide there vntill sun-rising, but no longer.

The

The Sun being exalted aboue the Horizon of the Ocean seemeth far lesse, then when you are on the lower ground, and seemes to whirle it selfe about in manner of a Gyre. The streame that commeth out of the East a little before his rising can be compared to nothing more properly then to the breath of an hot Ouen, and so commeth on his course through an vnclouded Heauen being of a pure blue Christalline colour without the least spot in it. When you are on the top of this Hill all the land lyeth subiected like a plaine and keuell plot of ground vnder you, although there are in this land not so few as twenty thousand shires deformed, and vneuen Rocks, and all the edges of that plaine ground seemeth to bee lusted or fringed with Snow, which indeed is nothing else but the white Cloudes which are many furlongs below you. Neere the top of this Mountayne it heuer reigneth, neyther was there euer any wind stirring thereupon. The same is reported of the Hill Olympus.

- All the vpper part of this Mountayne is afflicted with barrenesse, wanting the generative benefit of the lower and middle Regions of the Aire: for no manner of tree, shrub or leafe beautifieth the head thereof, but it resteth disgraced with an vnseemely baldnesse: out of which towards the South side doe the veins of Brimstone issue downe into the necke thereof, whete the Region of Snow is; among which the Brimstone is intermeued in diuers places. In the Summer time the fires doe often breake forth from out the hole in the top of this Hill, into which if you throwe a great stone it foundeth as if a great weight had fallie vpon infinite store of hollow Brasse. The Spaniards merrily call it the Devils Calderon, who reit the whole prouision of Hell is boyled. But the naturals (the Guanches themselves) do say that it was hell, and that the soules of their wicked Ancestors went thither to be tormented: and that those who were good and valiant men went downe into the pleasant Valley where the great City of Laguna now standeth: then which & the Towns adioyning to it, there is not in any place of the World a more delicates temperature of Ayre, nor a goodlier Obiect for the eye to make a Royall Landship of, as to stand in the Centre of this Plaine, and to behold how nature hath delineated all earthly beauty in the great. On the North side of the land are many fresh waters with falling downe from the top of exceeding high Mountaynes refresh the Plaines, and City of Laguna; and are afterwards by the greatnesse of their torrent carried into the Ocean. The land is parted in the midst with a ridge of Mountaynes like the roote of a Church; haying in the midst of it (like a steeple) the Pyke of Teyda, if you liuie the land into twelue parts; ten of them are taken vp in impassable Rocky Hills in Woods & in Vineyards; add yet in this small remaynder of arable ground, there was gathered as I saw upon their account in the yeere of our Lord 1582. 200. and 5000. Hannacks of Wheat, besides infinite store of Rie and Barley. One of our English quarters make foure, and a halfe of their Hannacks. The soyle is delicately temperate, and would produce all the most excellent things the earth beareth, if the Spaniards would seeke and labour them. The Vineyards of account are in Buena Vista, in Dante, in Oratana, in Tiguessa, and in the Rumble & high place yeeldeth the most excellent Wine of all other. There are two sorts of Wines in this land Vidoria and Malnesia. Vidoria is drawne out of a long Grape, and yeeldeth a dull Wine.
- The Malnesia out of a great round Grape, and this is the only Wine which passeth all the Seas of the World ouer, and both the Poles without sowing or decaying; whereas all other wines turne to Vineger, or freeze into Ice as they approach the Southerne or Northerne Pole. There are no where to be found fairer or better Mellons, Pomegranates, Pomecitrons, Figs, Oranges, Limons, Almonds and Dates, Honey, and consequently Waxe and Silke though not in great quantity yet excellent good, and if they would plant there store of Mulberry trees, the ground would in goodnesse and for quantity equal (if not exceed) eyther Florence or Naples in that commodity. The North side of this land aboundeth with wood as with water. There grow the Cedar, Cypress and Bay trees, the wild Olive, Masticke and Saunne; goodly procereous Palme and Pine-trees which shoot vp into a beautiful straight talnesse. In the passage betwixt Oratana and Carachora, you ride through a whole Forrest of them, the strong laurier of which perfumeeth all the Aire therabouts, of these there are such abundance all the land ouer, that all their Wine Vessels and wooden Vessels are made of them. There are of these Pine-trees two sorts, the strait Pine, and the other growing after the manner of our spreading Oakes in England, which wood the Inhabitantes call the Immortal tree, for that it rotteeth neyther aboue nor below the ground, nor in the water. It is neere as red as Brail, and as hard but nothing so vntuous as the other kind of Pine. Of these they haue such great ones, that the Spaniards doe faithfully report that the wood of one Pine-tree alone covered the Church of los Remedios in the City of Laguna, which is 80. foote in length, and 48. foote in breadth: And that one other Pine-tree covered the Church of S. Benito in the same City, which is 100. foot in length, and 34. in breadth. The noblest and strangest tree of all the land is the tree called Draco: his body riseth into an exceeding height and greatnesse. The land is like the scales of a Dragon, and from thence I suppose it had his name. On the vberke is like the scales of a Dragon, and from thence I suppose it had his name. On the vberke is like the scales of a Dragon, and from thence I suppose it had his name. On the vberke is like the scales of a Dragon, and from thence I suppose it had his name.

Mandrags: they they are fashioned even like the arme of a man round and smooth, and as out of their fingers ends groweth the leafe about two foote in length, in fashion like to our greene wild water legges. This tree hath not wood within its barked, but only a light spongi-ous pith, and they commonly make Bee-hives of the bodies of them. Towards the full of the Moone it sweateth forth a cleane Vermilion Gumme which they call Sangre de Drac, more excellent and astringent by farre, then that Sanguis Draconis, which wee haue from Goa, and from other parts of the East Indies by reason the Iewes are the only Druggists of those parts, and to make many they falsifie and multiply it with other trash foure pound waight for one. The first that were knowne to inhabit this Iland are called Guanches; but how they came thither it is hard to know, because they were and are people meerey barbarous & voyd 10 of Letters. The language of the old Guanches (which remayneth to this day among them in this Iland in their Towne of Candelaria) alludeth much to that of the Moores in Barbary. When Betanchor (the first Christian Discoverer of these parts) came hither, he found them to be no other then meere Gentiles ignorant of God. Notwithstanding, I doe not find that they had any manner of commerce with the Deuill, a thing not visuall among the Indian Gentiles. They held there was a power which they called by diuers names as Achuluraban, Achulucanar, Achguayaxerax signifying the greatest, the highest, and the mayntayner of all. If they wanted raine or had too much, or any thing went ill with them; they brought their sheepe and their Goats into a certaine place, and seuered, the young ones from the Dams, and with this bleating on both sides, they thought the wrath of the Supreme Power was appeased; and that he would prouide them of what they wanted. They had some notion of the immortality and punishment of Soules, for they thought there was a Hell; and that it was in the Pike of Teyda, and they call Hell Echegde, and the Deuill Guayota. In ciuill affaires they were somewhat Regular as in acknowledging a King, and confessing vassalage in contracting Matrimony, re-cting of Bastards, succession of Kings, making of Lawes, and subiecting themselves to them. When any childe was borne, they called vnto them a certain woman, and shee did with certaine words powre water vpon the childes head, and euer after this woman was assumed into the number of that kindred, and with her it was not lawfull euer after for any of that race to marrie or vie copulation. The exercises which the young men vsed were leaping or running, shooting the Dart, casting of the stone, and dauncing, in which, to this houre, they do both exceedingly glorie and delight. And so full of natural vertue and honest simplicitie were these Barbarians, that it was an inuiolable law amongst them, that if their Soule dieth did in any place publicke or private, offer any licentious or inuiolent behaviour to a woman, he was assuredly put to death. The people of this countrie were of a goodly stature, well formed and of a good complexion. There were among them Giants of an incredible greatnesse: the skull of one of them is remaining, in which there are eightie teeth, and his bodie (which was found buried in the Sepulchre of the Kings of Guymur, of which race he was) measured fiftene foot. The people that dwell on the South-side of the Iland, were of the colour of an Olive, but those that dwelt on the North-side were faire, especially their women, hauing bright and smooth haire. Their common apparell was a certaine garment made of Lambes skins like a short coate, without pleate or collar or sleeves fastned together, with straps of the same leather. The ordinarie garment for men and women of the common sort was called Tomarco, onely the women for modesties sake had another couering vnder their Tomarco, which was a sile coate downe to the knees made of skins which reached downe to the ground, for they held it an vnseemly thing in a woman to haue her breasts or her feete vncovered. In this garment they liued, and in this they dyed, and in this they were commonly buried. For their dyet they sowed Barly and Beanes: Wheate was vtterly vnknowne to them. They toasted their Barly by the fire, then did grinde it in certaine hand-mills, such as are now in Spaine; The flour so made they called Gisio, wetting it with water, milk or butter. It serued instead of bread also; and was their greatest and most Generall sustenance. They eat the flesh of Sheepe, of Goats, and Pork, but not commonly, for they haue certaine assemblies, like our festiual Wake-dayes in England, at which times the King in person with his owne hands did giue to euery twentie of them three Goates, and a proportion of their Gisio. After which Feast, euery companie came before the King, shewing their agilitie in leaping, running, wrastling, darting, dauncing, and other sports. They haue a certaine kind of hony out of a fruit, called Mozan, of the greatnesse and bignesse of a pease. Before they are ripe, they are very greene, when they beginne to ripe they are red, and when they are ripe are blacke, nothing vnlike our blackberries, save in their taste which is exceeding pleasant. They eat no more but the iuyce of them which they call Tora, and the Hony which they call Chacacrum. They gather these Mozans very ripe, and do put them into the Sun for a weeke, then they brake them in pieces, and put them into water to bee boyled vntill they come to a sirrope; and this in their Physick for the fluxe, and the grieuings in the backe: and for both these diseases they did
